D sees now, that the greatest of the Clergy approue not these new insolencies: their callings haue more grace vnder the beaury of a King, then in the confusion of a Democracy. The French Nobility (at the least of ten parts, nine) cannot fit them-selues to the humors of the Princes of the league; their propper and essentiall forme is to oppose them-selues against the subuersion of this Estate. The Gentlemen hold their honours, dignities, charges, fees, and iurisdctions by homage of the King: and foresee, that a royalty cannot be suppressed, but the Nobility must like-wise perish: there is the like reason (but without proportion) of the obedience, and fee due vnto a King, as of a rent due vnto the Lord of a Mannor, he that hath withdrawne him-selke from the first, will likewise free himselfe from the last. He sees that the learned and men of honour abhor this disgrace, lately E done vnto the King. The Court of Parliament resolues to abandon Paris. All France is offended with the Kings departure: and without the Kings person, the Tragedy of Chilperic cannot well be acted, nor the instructions of the Aduocate Danid perfectly effected. It is therefore better to play the dutifull seruant, and making vnto the king some few respects, seruice and obedience, to labour to returne into Grace, and at the first opportunity to effect their purpose.

So the Duke of Guise, not able to support him-selke in these high attempts, falls flat down. He protests of his innocency to the King, and of his endeouours to checke the peoples fury: he offers to prostrate him-selke at the Kings feete, to iustifie his honor, the which he saies is strangely wounded by his enemies, that are about his Maiesty. But on the other side, F the glosse doth ill agree with the text: he chooseth a Prouost of Marchants, and Sheriffes at his deuotion, receiues the Arcenal, the Bastille, and other places of strength: deposeth many quarter-maisters and Captaines, takes an oath from such as he installs: seizeth vpon the Kings treasure, as he had done at Chaalons, Reimes, Soissons: and through all the townes of his obedience. And if this mischiefe continues (said he) I protest to preserue both the Religion and the Catholikes.

Then by other letters written to Bassompierre a Lorraine. The King leuies forces and so doe we. A He is at Chartres, and we at Paris. Espernon is chased out off Normandy: the Kings seruants are imprisoned in many great townes: she lesse send to submit them-selues to Paris, and vs. Whilest the Duke prepares a salue for the soare which he had made, and the Parisiens perswade their associates, to maintaine them-selues ioyntly against the King of Nauarre, with whom (they said) the King had made himselfe a partisan, to the preiudice of religion, and the Catholike Church, his Maiesty exhorts his Lieutenants and Gouernours of his Prouinces, to retaine the Nobility, and people within those limits of duety and respect, which tie them to their Soueraigne, and the chiefe citties, not to frame their affections after the modell of Paris. But he speakes no more like a King: his stile is the stile of a man that flies, that feares, that in-treats. And to repaire this disorder, he employes the Queene-Mother. But how could this B turbulent spirit cure the infirmities of the Estate, being irreconcilable in her hatred to the Princes of the blood, and transported in her affection to the children of her daughter, the Duchesse of Lorraine? She aduiseeth the King, to passe ouer quietly the insolencies of the league: but there is no likelihood, she should more regard the profit of her sonne, then the aduancement of the Marquis of Pont her grand-child. Shee brings to this new common-weale (for the royalty seemed now to be changed into a Democracy) complaints, and teares against the brauings and force of a coragious Prince, and a furious multitude. And prom- C ising effects of greater zeale to Religion, more respect in the distribution of offices, and more moderation in the exaction of subsidies, she presumed to giue contentment to those, who made shew to imploy them-selues for a generall reformation, and to reduce the most violent to their obedience.

But this serues but to breed a second treaty like to that of Nemours. Paris without the King, is a body without forme: the most iudicious find it, and lament his departure. The late orders of religious men haue great credit with him. They send the Capuchins in procession vnto Chartres, to mitigate the heat of his choller, and then the chiefe of the city went to excuse the motiues which had forced the people to defend them-selues, and to beseech him to returne to Paris, where he should be receiued with as great ioy, as his subiects were grieved, to vnderstand of his departure: that he should finde better seruants, then those which had councelled him to ruine, and then to leaue them: and that it would please D his Maiesty to graunt them seuen principall points of their petition: the extirpation of heresie, by the forces of his Maiesty, and the holy vnion: the banishment of the Duke of Espernon, and of his brother la Valette: Warre in Guyenne, by the King in person, and by the Duke of Mayenne in Daulphiné: Abolition of the tumults of Paris: Confirmation of officers chosen for the managing of ciuill causes since the Barricadoes: A restoring of the goodly and auncient ordinances of the realme: And an abolition of parties, gifts and abuses brought in by Espernon, and la Valette.

The Queene-Mother presents these Deputies, and the King vrged by the league to graunt their request, lets the Cardinall of Bourbon, and the other Princes vnderstand: that E the peace and warre, the battells wherein he hath so willingly exposed his person, and the last ouerthrow of the Protestant Reisters, haue alwaies beene sufficient testimonies of his zeale to the mayntenance of the onely Catholike religion within his realme: to the extirpation of heresie, and false doctrine: but iealousies and distrust had preuented him from reaping the fruits of the aduantage which he had ouer the said heretikes. That for a present reformation of affaires, and to preuent the feare the Catholikes had to fall vnder the command of Heretikes, he would call an assembly of the three Estates of France: and re-solues presently to reuoke many impositions which oppresse the people. As for the priuat complaints against the Duke of Espernon, and his brother: I will (saith he) alwaies make it knowne in all occasions, that I am a iust Prince, and wil preferre the common profit of my Realme, before any other consideration.

But the two brethren, Espernon, and la Valette, say: to what what end should they make an enterprife at Paris, to take the Duke of Espernon, who was then in Normandy? and why made they Barricadoes, euen to the gates of the Louure, armed the people, and seized vpon all the chiefe places of the city, to chase la Valette from Valence, and other parts of Daulphiné where he remained? and if the confusions of former ages haue kept other kings from F acknowledging

A acknowledging our fathers seruices: and he hath rewarded his meritts in his children; what be those icalous and malicious heads, that enuy our fauours with his maiesty? what censure? what rigour? what law may keepe a King of France, from aduancing to authority some fa- uorites, who reuiue in them the vertues of their ancestors? Moreouer the League makes mention, in what places our fauour hath beene employed: the treaties of the Duke of Ef- pernon in Guienne: his being acquainted with Cleruants negotiation for the Huguenots of Metz: the enterprises he hath made vpon Cambray: his late fauour to the Reisters in their returne: his secret conference with Chastillon, the consultations of that tumult, which hath lately happened in Paris: the taking of Valence, Tallard, Guildstre, and other B places, from the Catholikes of Daulphine, and his practises to stay the yeelding of Aufione. But we say, would to God we had in like sort taken, Chaalon, Dijon, Montrueile, Cambray, and all that are subiect vnto his Maiesty within the heart of France. They tearme vs fa- uorers of Heretikes, And yet wee haue in fixe moneths taken from them by the sword, all their conquests in Prouence (the King, since the death of Henry the bastard, and Grand Prior of France, had giuen this gouernment to the Duke of Espernon) which former Gou- uernours could not doe in twenty yeares. The taking of Sorgues in Daulphine by vs two, during the frozen time of winter: and the ouerthrow of the Huguenots Suisses, by la Va- lette: but especially the last disunion of the Suisses from the Reisters, which made the way for the Duke of Guise, to defeat them at Auneau, and the discontent, wherein the Duke C of Espernon left the King of Nauarre at his departure out off Guienne: are not these suffi- cient testimonies, that their accusations are as friuolous and malicious, as the sale of offices where-with folke charge them? for iustification whereof, the Duke of Espernon offers to present his head at his Maiesties seete, if it be proued that he had euer any such thought in his soule. Contrariwise, who hath during the reignes of Henry the second, and Francis the second, managed the treasure without controll but the house of Guise? whereof the latter follow the steppes of their Predecessors? Who haue forced the King to exact vpon his sub- iects but the warre which they haue kindled and drawne his Maiesty into? what house did euer from so small a beginning grow to so fearefull a greatnesse? To conclude: no man shall blame vs for being Pensioners to the King of Spaine, to haue hindered our King from D the recouery of the Seigneuries of the Lowe Countries, nor to haue stolen away the reuenues of his generall receipts. We will no wayes hinder this goodly reformation: we are not in Court, nor in the Kings presence.

Let vs see the first fruits of this so commendable a gouernement. Haue you left Paris? haue you yeelded it to the King your Lord, and naturall Prince? Nothing lesse: you haue reuol- ted Corbeil, Melun, and Pontoise: you haue (with false perswasions) withdrawne the best Citties of the realme. But we will (in protesting to be ready to deliuer into his maiesties hands, with our liues and honor, all the offices, charges, gouernements and places which it hath pleased him to commit vnto vs) inuite our accusers to doe the like. And if they will pretend in quality of persons: let them vnderstand, that whatsoever either party holds, it E appertaines vnto the King, neither can they keepe it, but at his pleasure. Thus the two bre- thren iustified them-selues, whilest the Court of Parlement makes knowne vnto the King by their Deputies, their grieve for this insolencie, which had forced him to abandon Paris. They appeale vnto his clemency and bounty. They present for an humble excuse of his offi- cers, the weakenesse and feare which had forced them to yeeld to so violent a reuolt: be- seeching him to returne into his city, and to giue rest and content to his Maiesty, order to his affaires, grace to their purple robes, and authority to their offices: and by his presence, to disperse the mutines which diuisions had bred.

For answer. I doubt not (saith the King) but you would willingly haue reformed this disorder, if it had beene in your power: neither of your persisting in the same affection and F fidelity which you haue testified to my fore-fathers. I am not the first that hath beene toucht with such afflictions, neither will I leaue to bee a good father to such as shall be good children. I will alwaies intreat the Parisiens with the quality of a father, as chil- dren that haue strayed from their duty, not as seruants to haue conspired against their mai- ster. Continue in your offices, and receiue from the Queene my Mother the commande- ments and intentions of my will.

Deputies of the Parliament with the King.

The Kings
answer.

This answer was soft and cold: but after dinner, he addes a sharper conclusion, and calling backe the Deputies. I know (saith he) wherefore garrisons are set, either to ruine a towne, or for distrust of the inhabitants. But what cause had the Parisiens to presume, that I would ruine a towne, where-vnto I haue brought so many commodities by my presence, as ten or twelue townes would thinke them-selues greatly benefited thereby? and what distrust could I haue of a people whome I loued? of a people in whome I trusted? Haue they lost a loafe, or any thing whatsoeuer by meanes of these pretended garisons? I fought the preferuation of my good City of Paris, and the safety of my subiects, meaning by a strict search, to put out a great number of strangers, whome I knew to be secretly crept in. They haue offended me, yet am I not irreconcilable, neither haue I any humour to ruine them.

But I will haue them confesse their faults, and know that I am their King and maister. If not, I will make the markes of their offence remaine for euer. I will reuoke my Court of Parliament: my Chamber of accountes, Aides, and other Courts of Iustice. I will take from them the Vniuersity, their honours, freedoms, and Priuileges. I will omit no meanes to be reuenged. Not that I am reuengefull, or accustomed to vse severity: but I will haue them know, that I haue as much resolution and courage, as any of my Predecessors. I am no Vsurper, but a lawfull King by succession, and of a race that hath alwaies commanded mildly. Let them not take religion any more for a pretext. Their liues not a more Catholike Prince, nor that desires more the extirpation of heresies, then my selfe. I would willingly loose an arme, that the last Hereticke were paynted in this Chamber. Returne to your charges, and be of good cheere, I will be for you: and let them vnderstand what I haue sayd vnto you.

Now the most desperate Leaguers found, that the absence of the Court made their fare but simple, made their shops without Chapmen, and their trafficke cold: the shame to bee without a King, made the most audacious mutines to hang downe their heads: the violence of rebellion quailed: many found the dealing of Paris too audacious. And now Paris studied to returne to the Kings obedience: when as the Duke of Guise fearing the losse of many of his friends and seruants, resolues to make his peace. He now speaks of nothing but the Kings seruice, the obedience of his Maiesty, the preferuation of the Estate, the reformation of disorders, and the subiects ease, and (by the intercession of the Queene-Mother) seekes his fauour which he had lost. The Queene-Mother terrifies the King. Those of his counsell, (who for the most part are seruants to the Leaguer) keepe him in this humour: and propounds vnto him a general reuolt of his subiects, with the intelligence, and fauour the League had within Chartres, the which causeth him, for his greater safety, to go to Roan. Finally, they cry out against the Huguenots. My Liege (say they) will you loose the name of most Christian, in winking at these heresies which vndermine the truth? will you alone among three-score and one Kings, your Predecessors, suffer so detestable a medly of truth and falshood?

This Councell carries him away against them in whome he should most trust, who lamenting the decay of his authority, and the weakning of his forces, see that his intentions inclined to his owne ruine. He seemes to be in choller with the King of Nauarres party, to haue the League on his side, (but he telleth no man, that he pretends to vse his forces against them-selues) and drawes certaine articles of the reunion of Iuly, whereby he frames his Edict, not so much against the King of Nauarres religion, as to exclude him, in fauour of the League, from thar, which none but G O D could take from him. But whilst they finish these accords, hee sodenly surpriseth the Isles of Charon and of Marans.

The King by this Edict admits no religion, but the Catholike: he promisseth neuer to make a peace nor truce with the Heretikes, nor any Edict in their fauour. He will haue all his subiects to ioyne with him, that by their common forces they might root out the said heretikes. Hee binds his subiects to sweare, neuer to yeeld obedience after him, to any Prince that shall be an Heretike, or a fauourer of Heresie, degrades from all publike charges, either in peace, or warre, those of the pretended reformed religion: promisseth all fauour to the Catholikes, so as they shew them-selues obedient and faithfull, and depart from all vnions, vnions, practises, intelligences, associations and Leagues, contrary to the vnion which he made by this Edict: hee declares them guilty of treason, that shall refuse to signe to this new vnion, or shall afterwards depart from it: and finally hee aboliseth all that was done and past, but (signing this forced Edict) hee wept.

The Leaguers are now wonderfully puffed vp with hope: yet this reuerence of the royall maiesty is so naturally grauen in the hearts of men, as the onely remembrance of the twelfth of May makes their hearts to tremble. They feare the Scorpions taylor, and that the King by his great facility, should determine against them some mournfull Catastrophe in the last act of the Tragedy. And thereupon two things amaze them sodenly: newes comes, that the fearefull and huge Spanish armie, wherein were a hundred and thirty great ships, and twenty thousand fighting men, vnder the command of the Duke of Medina Sidonia, had by fortune of sea, after their departure from the Grongne in Galicia, lost three gallies of Portugall, many were scattered, and many brused and made vnprofitable for the voyage, and were afterwards so encountred by the Admirall, and Drake the vice-admirall, thwart of Portland, vpon the English coast, as they forced them to turne head, and to retire in disorder towards the towne of Calais, (hoping there to ioyne with the Prince of Parma) with the losse of one gallion, which carried some part of their treasure, and also the instructions for the order which the Generall should follow, hauing conquered England.

A bad beginning, for so braue and proud an ostentation, where they promised themselves an absolute victory. But the progresse and end was yet more fatall. The English Fleet presseth them so neere, as they force them to leaue the Rendezuous in confusion: their Generall Galleasse pestered with other shippes, was cast by the current vpon the sands, neere to the Port of Calais, and remained with the artillery in the gouernours power: The rest were scattered by the English artillery. The Spanish armie lost twelue shippes, and aboute siue thousand men, who had no other sepulchres, but the vast Ocean, and the bellies of sea monsters: Finally, taking their course to the north, bending towards Scotland, and Ireland, those seas were no lesse fatall to the Spaniards, for seuentene of their great ships were sunke, and many others cast vpon the sands and rockes, and the rest of this armie was so miserable shaken, as of a hundred and thirty shippes, hardly thirty arriued in Spaine. Where the Duke of Medina had no other excuse vnto his maister, but the ignorance and treachery of his mariners, with the small experience they had of those Northerne seas: the want of succors from the Prince of Parma, the tempests, ship-rackes finally ill fortune, but not one word of the iudgements of God vpon this giant-like attempt, to bring all England slaues to the mountaines of Grenado, or to the mines of Peru.

The second terror for the Leaguers is, that the King will not returne to Paris, howsoeuer they importune him. I will prepare my selfe (saith hee) for the warre against the heretikes: and for the Parliament which I intend to call, and to giue all Princes that are vnit-ed, contentment and satisfaction. They doubt the Barricadoes haue left much spleene in the Kings heart: and to preuent all contrary euents, they thinke it not yet time to satisfie the oath which they had made, to renounce all intelligences and Leagues which they had made both within and without the Realme.

They take new Councells and resolutions at Paris, to maintaine this authority and credit gotten with so many crosses and disgraces vnto the King, and so to presse him, and to subiect his will vnto theirs, as hee shall not see, speake nor moue, but by the eyes, tongue and sinewes of the League: to haue the Deputies of the Parliament house of their faction, with instructions drawne out of the articles of Peronné, Nancy, Nemours and Giniuile.

To vrge the King against the Huguenots, and to solicit him to ease the people by the discharge of taxes, thereby to make him odious, if hee refuseth the first frutes of their vnion: To make them strong at the Parliament, and to that end to send for all the Nobility of their owne faction, and their adherents, to assist with their armes. To hold good correspondence with the Duke of Parma: and to aduertise the King of Spaine, that this accord made with the King, tended onely to effect their common desseins. To retaine Piffer Collonell of the Suisses, and Balagny Gouverneur of Cambray, with the priuate conuocations 1588. conuentions passed betwixt them. To prevent least the Duke of Neuers, whom the King A resolved to send into Picardy to suppress the violences of the League, should winne away their most trusty friends. To binde the City of Paris vnto the Lord of Villars, gouernour of New-hauen, for the summe of thirty thousand crownes yearly, to haue him fauoura-ble to their party.

These new Councells bred new teares. The King cannot containe them in subscribing of these new articles: but his misfortune forceth him to hazard his estate, to preferue his person. Hee knowes well, that these are but imaginations: that his Edict of reuinion will be obserued by none, but by himselfe: or so far as it toucheth the subuersion of his crowne.
And yet too much bounty or too great apprehension makes him scrupulous to prevent it.
The Protestants offer to try this great quarrell at their owne perilles, so as hee will re- B maine a neuter, and suffer them to appose against the mutinies of the League. Hee reiects this aduice. For there is lesse danger (saith hee) to remaine with those which persist in the unity of our religion, then with those which are diuided, and become heads of new opinions.

So whether it were of a good meaning or of purpose, he returnes to Chartres. Hesees, embraceth and maketh much of the Duke of Guise, and there all his fauours and bounties are liberally bestowed on the chiefe pillars of the League. Hee giues the Duke of Guise the generall command ouer all the men of warre within the Realme. This was not the name and title, but in effect the office and charge of Constable. Hee makes the Cardi- C nall of Guise Legate of Auignon, the which hee promisseth to obtaine for him of his Ho-lineesse. To the Duke of Mayenne, a goodly armie for the warre of Dauphiné. To the Duke of Nemours, the gouernment of Lions, as his father had enjoyed it: and he determined to giue the seale to Peter of Espinac Arch-bishop of Lion, to winne him vnto him by this great bounty, promising to procure him a Cardinals hat of Pope Sixtus, by the meanes of the Cardinall of Gondy, whom he had sent to Rome. Without doubt he had receaued more honor by being Chancellor of France, then in being Chancellor of the vnion. (The Chancellor Hurault Earle of Chyuerny, and the Lord of Bellicure, and Villeroi, had then leaue to attend the Kings pleasure at their houses) He declares the Cardinall of Bourbon the first Prince of the blood, deciding (by a doubtfull speech,) that great question of D prerogatiue, betwixt the Vncle and the Nephew, whereon there hath beene so much written and so much disputed: peruertering the ancient order of succession, and making the Cardinall to serue the passions of the League.

The present vnto the King (being but six & thirty years of age) a successor, who had euen then passed a Climaftericall yeare of threescore and three. Was it not the Leagues meaning, vnder the Cardinall of Bourbons image, to raise vp a stranger, and violently to aduance his tirany, to vsurpe the royalty? To conclude: the King continues, renews and amplifies his fauours to all such as haue any credit with the League: he doth nothing without them, he opens the very secrets of his heart vnto them, and (for their sakes) causeth euery one of their partisans to tast some portion of his bounty, and makes shew to beleue whatsoeuer they say vnto him. His Councell blinds his eyes, so as hee cannot discerne E what is the duty of a good King: they disguise the truth from him, and study onely to fa-tiffie their ambition and couetousnesse. So as to please them, euen in this, hee himselfe puls out those eyes, whereby he did see most cleare, and giues them leaue to retire to their houses, there to throwd themselves from these confusions of state.

The Duke of Espernon was out of Court: but hee had authority from the King, to command in the Prouinces of Aniou, Touraine, Poictou, Angoulmois, and Xantonge. Being at Loches, he is aduertised that the League practised with some inhabitants to deliuer them Angoulesme. He posts thither, & the people receaue him with great honour as the Kings Lieutenant. Hee publisheth the Edict of reuinion, his words and deeds testifie nothing but a courage resolute to preferue the Catholick religion. But behold sodainly a strange Catastrophe. Some Leaguers had perswaded the people, that hee ment to drawe the Huguenots troupes into the Castle, and so subdue the towne. The Maior (being the head of the conspiracy) enters into the Castle on Saint Laurence day, vnder colour to present vnto the Duke certaine posts that were come from Court: hee mounts vpe to his Chamber, at his entrie hee discharged two pistolls, and seekes to force the house. The Duke

The Kings

Troubled
griued Duke
Esper-non in Angoulesme.

A Duke was then in his Cabinet, attending the houre of Masse: where he read the history of Pierce Ganeffon, in old time deere fauored by Edward the second King of England, preferred before all others in Court, enriched with the Kings treasure, and the peoples wealth, but after banished the realme, and in the end beheaded at the sute of the Estates. 1588.

This slanderous libell being printed at Paris, not so much against the Dukes honour as the Kings, compared the Duke with Ganeffon, and concluded, that vnder Henry the third, he should end his dayes by the like tragedy. Vpon the first tumult, the Dukes Gentlemen siet to armes, and repulse this armed multitude: the Maior beeing hurt with the shot of a pistoll through a doore, died within seauen houres after. The alarum flies into B the towne. The people arme, storme, and make barricadoes. But the Duke kept the Castle: the Citadell was at his deuotion, and might by eyther of them drawe in necessary succors to vngage him.

The Seigneur of Tagens, the Dukes Cousin, aduanced with succors: Bordes Captaine of the Citadell being prisoner among the conspirators, loued the liberty of his place, more the his owne life: Mere, Messeliere, Macquerole and Bouchaux, sommoning the beseegeed, found nothing in them but a constant resolution to die rather then to yeeld: and the people were willing to capitulate, when as Tagens by his ariall pacified the sedition: Armes were layed aside, and the prisoners of both parts deliuered. The Duke of Guise hauing made his peace with the King, and disapoynted his most faithfull Councillors: yet C one thorne troubled his foot, the Huguenots Estate. Hee therefore ceaseth not, vntill he sees them assailed in Poitou and Dauphiné: and whilst the Duke of Neuers prepared his armie for Poictou, hee sends the regiment of Saint Paule to the Duke of Mercaur, to annoy the Protestants, and not to suffer them to reape any commodity in the country.

The Duke Mercaur goes into hafe. Poictou, beseegeth Montagu, repaired by Colombiers, whom they of Nants had hourly at their gates. But at the first brute that the King of Nauarre was come out of Rochelle to succour Montague, he retires straight to Nants, Gersey defeated. and left the regement of Gersey, to make the retreat, the which was overtaken, beaten and defeated two leagues from the suburbs of Nants. On the other side, the Duke of Mayenne marched towards Dauphiné, but hee planted the limits of his voyage in Lions.
D Now are two mighty armies in field, the one vnder the Kings authoritie, the other all of Leaguers: But this is not enough. The King by a sollemne oth in the Cathedrall Church at Rouan, had sworne the execution of the Edict of vnion: he hath sent it vnto the Bishops, and commands them to presse the Huguenots in their diocesse, to make profession of their faith, & to abiuire their errors in open Parliaments, royall iurisdiccions & commonalties. This Edict must be confirmed as a fundamentall law of State, and the King prest, to assemble the three Estates of the Realme, as hee had promised by the articles of the peace. Conuocation Henry grants a conuocation, the first day of September at Blois: there (in the presence of of the Estates.
the notablest persons of euery Prouince, Seneschallys and Baylewike,) to propound freely the complaints and griefes of euery man, but not meddling with any practises, or fauouring the priuate passions of any.

But amidst these Commissions from the King, the League wanted no policy to send secretly (to them that were most affectionate to the aduancement of theyr desseins, and to the most passionate Leaguers of the Realme) articles and remembrances which they should put into their instructions, and labour to bee chosen of the Parliament. Soe as in a maner all the Deputyes carried the badge of the League and their instructions were conformable to those which had beene sent vnto them. The King comes first vnto Blois: hee giues order for the place, and for the Deputyes lodgings. The Duke of Guise follows: but it was a great indiscretion for the Duke to go to Blois, seeing the King would not come to Paris. The Deputyes come one after another: but the King finding not the number sufficient to beginne so sollemne an act, hee defers it vntill October.

In the meane time, the King studies, by the credit which authority giues him ouer the three estates of his Realme, to bring the Duke of Guise into open view, and to receaue punishment for all his offences past. And the Duke assures himselfe, that the most part of the Deputyes would countenance his cause, & would serue him as instruments to controll the Kings

1588- Kings power. So euery one labours to aduance his deffine, and to deceiue one another: A but he which shall be deceiued, will verifie, that there is danger in delay. The fixteenth of October all the Deputies were ready, for the Clergy a hundred thirty and foure Deputies, amongst others foure Archbishops, one and twenty Bishops, and two Generalls of orders: for the Nobility, a hundred and fourescore gentlemen: for the third estate, a hundred fourescore and eleuen Deputies, all lawyers, or Marchants. The seauenteenth day, being the first sitting of the prime wits of all France, rauished euery man with hope to heare rare propositions, and resolutions of great affaires for the reformation of the state. The Kings oration being full of liuely affection, true magnanimity, and pertinent reasons, deliuered with an admirable eloquence and grace without any stay, will testifie for euery, that hee exceeded all the Princes of his age in speaking well, and that hee could grauely, pertinently, and very sodenly make answer to the most important occasions that were offered.

Mantelon
keeper of the scale.

Mantelon keeper of the scale, continued his proposition, commended the zeale and integrity of his maiesties intentions, promised the Estates, that vnder his happy command, they should reape in this conuocation, the same effects which had bene tried in diuers raignes: he exhorted the Clergy to restore the beauty and dignity of the Church: The Nobility, to frame them selues after the mould of piety, bounty, iustice, and other vertues of the French nation, so much honored in all histories: the people to reuerence iustice, and to obserue good orders, to fly wrangling sute, swearing, blasphemies, play, lust, vsury, vniust getting, corrupt trading, and other vices, which be the seedes of troubles, and seditions, and the ruine of flourishing estates. He layes open the Kings great debts, his charge and care to roore out heresies, his religion, piety, and deuotion, ending his speech with a commendation, vnder the Kings obedience, of the vnion and concord, necessary for the maintenance of religion.

Thy Clergy.

Renauld of Beaulne Arch-Bishoppe of Bourges, Patriarke and Primat of Aquitania, thanked the King for his loue to his subiects, and God, to haue installed on the throne of this Crowne, a King endued from his youth, with the spirit of wisdom, to gouerne his people, who had cast the lightening of the high God, euen vpon the face of the enemies of his diuine Maieesty, hauing by diuers and dangerous voyages, through diuers nations gotten the knowledge of affaires, who by his onely wisdom and vertue, had lately dispersed a great and mighty army of strangers, and giuen us hope, that vnder so good and great a King, wee shall see heresie suppressed, peace confirmed, the seruice of God established, Churches and Temples restored, iustice and peace embraced, charity abound among men, and by vnity of religion begin here on earth to reigne with CHRIST, the Idea and patterne of that heauenly kingdome, whereunto we aspire. The Baron of Senecel testified the Nobilities affection to the Kings seruice, confessing, that to him alone belongs to worke those good effects, for the establishment of the honour of God, the Catholike religion, things profitable for the Estate, and necessary for his people, offering in the name of them of his order, the zeale, faith, and duty, which the gentlemen of France haue alwaies borne vnto their Kings, their armes, meanes, liues, and persons, to mainetaine the obedience, honour, feare and respect, wherevnto the lawes both of God and man tie the subiects to their Soueraigne.

the Nobility.

The third Estate.

Michell Mureau Prouost of the marchants at Paris, president for the third estate, first thanked God, who had cast his eyes of pitty vpon this realme, in the extremity of their afflictions, then the King to haue yeilded to the humble petitions of his subiects, heard their griefes and complaints, shewed a great desire to restore his people to their former estate, Religion to her former dignity, to rule and settle all orders in their ancient forme, being discorded by this iniury of times, protesting that in so doing their most humble and faithfull seruice should not faile vnto the last breath. And so the first sitting ended.

The oath of the vnion
renewed.

In the second, the Twelofday following the King at the instance of the Arch-Bishoppe of Ambrun, the Earle of Brissac, and the Adiuocate Bernard, speakers for the three Estates, to content the importunity of the League, did againe sweare the oath of the vnion, lately made at Rouan, and making his Edict of Iuly last, a fundamentall law of the Realme, to bind him, them, and al their posterity (yet not derogating from the liberties and priuileges of the Nobility)

A Nobility) hee caused it to bee publicly read by Ruze Seignieur of Beaulieu his chiefe Secretary of State. And to make the memory of so solemne an oath more autentike to posteritie, hee commaunded the said Secretary to make an act, that all the orders of the Realme had sworne in the body of the State, all with one voyce, the Clergy laying their hands vpon their breasts, and the rest lifting them vp to heauen. An oath performed with great ioy, and generall reuiuing of that happy acclamation of, God save the King, so many yeares forgotten among the French nation: and followed with a singular testimonie of the Kings clemency, remitting the Parisiens offence, for the common good of the Catholikes of France, and the ease of his people, whose miseries made him treade vnder foote, his iust displeasure. Hold (saith hee to the Prouost of Marchant of Paris) this word assured, as from the mouth of your King, and take heed that Paris fall not into a relaps, which will bee fatal and not recoverable.

But there was a brute spread ouer all France, that vnder colour of this assembly, they practised an exemplary reuenge against the chiefe of the Estates. Aduertisements came from all parts: this feare went from chamber to chamber: the most apprehensiu desired to be satisfied. The Arch-Bishoppe of Ambrun makes report vnto the King. I knowe (saith the King) the liberties and prerogative of the Parliament: they ought to trust in my word: it is a sinne to grow in zealousie of your King: and these reportes come not but from such as haue no loue to their King, but seeke to make him odious to his people. There shall neuer any cause growe from mee to disturbe this assembly. In the end, the familiarity and shewes of loue from the King to the Duke and Cardinall of Guise, and (for their sakes) to the chiefe of the League, made them lay aside all suspicion of a bloody act, whereof they were aduertised from all parts. And without doubt, if the League had not stirred vp the coales of forepassed indignities, the fire of his wrath had not perchance deuoured them. This blast past ouer, there are other attempts no lesse dangerous. The League sets them on worke that beares their badge, to hit the marke whereat they aymed. To put the King in disgrace, and to install the Duke of Guise in his throne, (for the King of Nauarre is now by this new fundamentall law, excluded from the royall succession.) But what meane they to doe? The Collosse they seeke to build, shall be their ruine: the fire they kindle shall burne them: the Duke they forge, shall be shethed in their owne bowells, and finally, shall leaue of this League a shamesfull and reprochfull memory. To hit this pretended marke, they must make the Kings actions odious to all the world, reproch to him his vnreasonable prodigality, his dissembling, the oppression of his people, the erecting of new offices, thereby to bandy against him the most apparent families of the third Estate, wronged in the suppression of them: or else (neglecting to redresse it,) they should declare him an enemy to the people, and a Tyrant ouer his realme, and so the people should presently resolute to confine him into a monastery.

make the King odious.

They still lay before him the wonderfull coldenesse of the greatest part of the Catholikes to his loue and obedience, seeing themselves forced to liue amongst them that had burnt their Churches, profaned their Altars, massacred the Priests and spoiled their goods. They beeech him to defend the Church, and to prefer the iniuries done to religion, before the violences committed against the state. They propound vnto him, the excessive impositions and subsidies, which had already with-drawne most part of his subiects: and the filthy auarice of strangers, who by continuall inuentions did cruelly impouerish France. They represent vnto him the abuses of the gouernment, in bestowing benefices to al men indifferently, either married, or souldiars, the lust, dissolutnes and ignorance of Prelats: the sale of Offices and places of iudgement. They exhort him not to deale in spirituall causes, or at the least to proceede holily, as it belongs to holy things. To degrad a great number, as well of Prelates, as of ciuill magistrates in soueraigne Courts and inferior iurisdictions, and to punish with death those ministers which by corruption haue crept into the Church, iustice and gouernment, else hee cannot preferue the Estate. In the end, they presse him to reforme the excesse and disorders of his Court, the which are odious to so many Noble spirits, fraught with holinesse, magnanimity and courage, to so many great and rich mindes as bee among the Nobility, which beeing employed, would in few monthes repaire the ruines of this Estate.

1588. Such as find themselves interessed in the cutting off the superfluous number of Officers A and in the buying of their places, diswade the King from this resolution, but to maintaine them in the honours which they enioy vnder the countenance of his Maieſty. The third Estate exhibit their complaints, of the exceſſe of taxes and ſubſidies, wherewith they are oppreſſed of the cuſtomes, forraine impositions, rents vpon ſalt, entries, loane, guffies, increaſe and decreaſe of the priſes of money, with many other exactions and ſurcharges, wherof the king receaued not any benefit, but what was dipt in the bloud of his poore people. The Nobilitie complains of ſeruices done without recompence, and indiſcreet diſtribution of the Kings liberality. The Clergy exclaime, that money which hath bene drawne from them, had nothing aduanced the cauſe of religion.

From complaints of the languishing people, grew the ſuppreſſion of Officers of the new creation, and an intent to eaſe their ſubſidies. But oh politike ſtratagem! The King yeelding to haue them reduced to the yeare one thouſand ſiue hundred ſeuenty ſixe, ſees himſelfe deſtroyed of all meanes to leuy his armies, and to entertaine the greatneſſe of his Maieſties Estate. If hee refuſeth it an occaſion is giuen to mutine the Eſtates, to chaſe away ſuch as are neere his perſon, and to giue him a gouernour.

The Duke of Guiſe on the one ſide, diſwades the King to ſubieſt his authority ſo much: but on the other ſide hee pricketh them forward to be vehement in their perſuites. In the end the King paſſeth this grant of reduction: but hee hopes to make it knowne vnto the Eſtates that with ſo ſmall meanes hee cannot maintaine his royall dignity, nor the warre againſt the heretikes, which they had ſo ſolemly ſworne. They deuife of meanes to make vp the ſtock, and demand an account of ſuch as had gouerned the treaſor, and abuſed the Kings bounty. But whilt they turned ouer their papers at the Eſtates, let vs ſee the progreſſe of the two armies which wee had left in field. That of Neuers conſiſted of French, Suiſſes, and Italians, with many voluntary Gentlemen. Sagonne was Maſhall of the light horſe, la Chastre Maſhall of the field, Chaiſaigneray, Lauerdin and many others commanded the troups. Mauleon was the firſt obieſt of their armes. It is a raſhneſſe to bee obſtinate in the defence of a place which is not to bee held: but it is a treachery to ill intreate them whom wee haue receaued to compoſition. So this firſt victory was bathed with their blouds, who truſting in the force of their courages, neglected the weakenes of their walls. Montagu was defended ſome dayes by Colombiers, who at the firſt ſaluting the Duke with a furious ſkirmiſh, puts him to ſome loſſe. But the Cannon hauing both ſhaken their walls and their conſtancies, they entred into capitulation, the which was honourably granted the laſt day of Nouember.

La Ganache, ſituated vpon the marches of Brittain and Poictou, annoyed both the one and the other Prouince. Let vs leaue the armie there, to ſee how the Duke of Mayenne ſpends his time at Lions. The deſſeins too lightly grounded vpon a peoples mutinie are alwayes ruinous. The Duke of Mayenne knowes it well: and moreouer there is nothing but blowes to bee gotten in Daulphiné. He deſires rather to attend the iſſue of the Eſtates in a pleaſing and delightfull abode: but this ſtay is a great ſcourge to Mandelot. He feares to be diſpoſſeſt of his gouernment. It is giuen to the Duke of Nemours, and therefore he wonderfully ſuſpects the Duke of Mayennes preſents. Finally hee grew ſo iealous, as ſurprized with apprehenſion, with the cholicke, a feuer, the goutte, and the ſlixie, hee carried (the foure and twentieth of Nouember) this teſtimonie into the other world, by the mouth of father Edmond Auger a Ieſuite, in his funerall ſermon. That hee had neuer ſigned the League, and that hee died firme in his religion and the Kings ſeruice.

Whilt the King laboured at the Parliament, to cut off all difficulties which prolonged the warre, and the Duke of Mayenne being at Lions ſuffered the heat of his paſſage into Daulphine to growtolde, Charles Duke of Sauoye foreſeeing the diſſipation of this Eſtate, hee thought that as a ſonne and husband of two daughters, iſſued from the blood of France, hee ſhould be the firſt which ſhould ſet his hand to the diuiſion. The Marquiſate of Saluſes is in the miſt of his territories, he thinks, that for ſuch a prize hee may well breake friendſhip and alliance with the King his neere kiſman, who of meere curteſie had newly deliuered vnto him Sauignan and Pignerol.

With this deſſeine (ſeeing the Kings thoughts otherwiſe ingaged then beyond the Alpes) he

The Marquiſate of Saluſes ſurprized by the Duke of Sauoy.

1588. he makes a leuy of men, threatens Geneua, makes a ſhow to beſiege Montferrat, cauſeth the Marquis of Saint Corlin to go to horſe, and on all Saints night ſurpriſeth the Towne of Carnagnole, and then the Cittadell, being vnſurniſhed of victualls, which Saint Sime ſucceſſor to la Coſte had drawne forth, with hope (ſaid hee) to reſreſh them: to as in leſſe then three weekes he poſſeſſed all the Marquiſate, leauing a reprochfull ſuſpition againſt the Capitaines of the Cittadell, to haue treacherouſly exchanged the double Canons of that ancient arenall of the warres of France, beyond the Alpes, with the double piſtols of Spaine. This conqueſt made the Duke proud, and already in conceit he had deuoured both Prouence and Daulphiné. For a colour he writes both to the Pope & King. That the general reſpect of the Church had made him ſeaze vpon theſe places, leaſt Des Dignitaires ſhould make it a retreat and refuge for Huguenots: and the priuate intereſt of his Eſtates, which he deſires to maintaine in the puritie of the ancient religion, vnder the obedience of the holy Sea: and by his Ambaſſadour he diſguiſeth this wrong with the goodlyeſt colours that may be. He makes a ſhow, not to hold theſe places, but vnder the Kings authoritie: but in time he vſurpes all acts of Soueraignty: hee diſplaceth his Maieſties officers, beates downe the armes of France, ſets vp the croſſe of Sauoy, and in a brauery he cauſeth peeces of ſiluer to be coyned with a centaure treading a Crowne ouerwhelmed vnder his foote, and carrying this deuſe; Oportunè. The King iuſtly moued with this vſurpation, applies this branch to the body of the conſpiracies of the League: he reſolues now to pacifie the ciuill warres, to attend after forraine: and euen then he determines to giue the Proteſtants a peace, and to viſe their aſſiſtance againſt ſuch as make a benefit of the diſcords of the realme. Such as reſpected truly the glorie of the French, gaue him to vnderſtand, that he muſt appeaſe both Huguenot and Liguier, and ſeeke reuenge of this new indignitie: and hunt the Wolfe which breakes into the fold, whilt the Shepheards are at variance. Shall a petty Prince take from a King of France, the pawne which remains to recouer Naples and Milan? foure hundred pieces of Canon, which might beate the proudeſt Fortes of the Spaniards to powder? that ancient ſee of Daulphiné, comprehended in the gifts which Prince Hubert made to the Crowne of France, whereof our Kings haue ſo often receiued homage and ſealty of the Marquiſes, and haue often ſeazed thereon for forfeiture and treachery?

D All the Kings ſeruants, all the Courts of Parliament, all the aſſembly of Eſtates, iudge that theſe be the effects of the League, and that this inuaſion is not without the intelligence of the Duke of Guiſe: euen thoſe which fauour his part, cannot digeſt it. But to auoyde this common hatred which was ready to fall vpon him, he beſeecheth his Maieſtie, onely to aſſure his people, and make them to taſte the frutes of contentment, which he had promiſed in the othe of the holy vnion, that hee would quench the fire which the Huguenots did nourish in this realme, and giue him this commiſſion againſt the Stranger, he will be the firſt that ſhall paſſe the Alpes, to make the Sauoyard caſt vp his gorge. But could they hope for any remedy from him, who by his continuall praſtiſes with ſtrangers, had giuen life and motion to the miſchiefe? So the King, conſidering that neyther his Edict of reuſion, nor the othe to depart from all aſſociations, produced the effects were promiſed: and that the League (conſenting to the pernitiſious deſſeignes of the Stranger) had made the way for the breach of the ſaid vnion, he thinks himſelfe no more bound to the othe of this vnion, and euen then deuſeth to be reuenged of all the offences paſt. In the meane time he diſſembles his diſcontent.

E As theſe newes troubled the aſſembly at Blois, the King of Nauarre (ſeeing the praſtiſes of the League had excluded him, whereas he ſhould hold the firſt place) held another in the Towne-houſe at Rochelle, and by their aduiſe he ſent (in the name of the French exiled for religion) a common petition to the Eſtates, beſeeching the King, To reſtore them the liberie of the firſt Edict, which they call of Ianuarie, To appoint a Nationall Councell, where controuerſies of religion may be mildly diſputed, and holily reſolued, To grant them reſtitution, and free enioying of their goods, To ſuffer their petition to be inrowled, and the contents thereof granted by his clemencie, to the end that nothing may be done to their preiudice.

F Nothing leſſe. This petition was directly againſt the principall intentions of the Eſtates, effected to aduance the League. And therefore, not ſatiſfied with the othe which the King had

The Kings deſſeine vpon this ſurpriſe.

Duke of Guiſe diſſembles.

Aſſembly and petition of the Proteſtants.

1588. had made vnto them by the Ediēt of Vnion they wrest from the Kings owne mouth a more particular declaration, touching the perpetuall insufficiency of the King of Nauarre, and other Pinces of the bloud his cousins, adherents (say they) and fautors of Heretickes, to the succession of this Crowne.

The conclusion of this Parliament should haue bene for the good quiet of the Common-weale. And doubtlesse some small number (whose wils were not tyed to the passions of the Leaguers) wished that remedy which had bene practised in former times against most pernicious heresies: which was a free and lawfull Councell, vniuersall or nationall: but the greater part ouer-ruled both the King and the Estates. The League, to ruine the State, will ouerthrow the pillars, which be the Princes of the bloud: and if the branches of Valois and Bourbon, that is to say, if all the race of Saint Lewis be not degraded, they cannot passe ouer the Crowne to the family of Lorraine. The King by his Ediēt promisseth to dispose of the succession: but he and the Queene his wife are yet in the vigor of their age, they hope that God will blesse them with heires males. He takes no pleasure they should harpe vpon this string: it is a blemish to his authority, and disrobes him before hee is readie to sleepe: when as a Prince hath named his successor, his testament is made.

Yet he is content to satisfie the violent appetites of the League. He suffers them to dispute of the succession, and (in the assembly of all his subiects) to exclude the lawfull successor: he is content they should propound that which most part of Deputies had already resolved. The Clergie had the fourth of Nouember condemned the King of Nauarre for an Hereticke, the chiefe of them relapse, excommunicate, deprived of the gouernement of Guienne, and of all his dignities, vnworthy of all successions, Crownes and Realmes. The Arch-bishop of Ambrun, the Bishop of Bazas, the Abbot of Cisteaux, and other Clergimen impart it to the Deputies of the Nobility and third Estate: all consent to the first conclusion, and appoint twelue of euery chamber to acquaint the King with their resolutions.

But the King of Nauarre had often giuen them to vnderstand, that he was borne during the permission of both religions, instructed and bred vp in one from the which hee cannot in conscience depart, without better instruction: neither hope nor despaire of a Crowne can draw him to so violent and rash a change: he should thereby incurre the blame of inconstancie, infidelity and hypocricie: he is, and alwaies will be ready to receiue instruction from a free and lawfull Councell. These submissions are full of iustice and consideration: hee defends nothing obstinately, it is the honour and zeale of his conscience that binds him. There is no reason then (said the King) to condemne him without hearing. Let vs consider with iudgement and fore-sight, whether it be expedient to summon him againe to sweare the Ediēt of Vnion, and to declare himselfe a Catholike.

The Parliament is not of this aduice. The Cardinall of Bourbon his Vncle (say the Deputies) hath once obtained absolution for him: the Queen-mother had laboured to win him. The King hath sent Doctores to reclaime him: he is bred vp from his Cradle in this new opinion, condemned by the Councell of Trent and many others. The Consistorie hath receiued him into grace, he is fallen into the error which he had abiured: he is therefore an hereticke: he is relapse, and vnworthy of obedience, vnworthy of respect, and vnworthy to be prayed for. The holy sea of Rome hath declared him a Schismaticke, excommunicate, incapable of the succession of the Crowne: the Estates therefore must ratifie this sentence. To conclude, an Hereticke cannot raigine in France; it is an incompatible thing with the Coronation and oath which he ought to take, hurtfull to the honor of God, and preiudiciall to the good of this Realme. Soft and faire: Nature and the common consent of nations will, that that the accused should be heard. God himselfe, who hath no neede to bee satisfied by humane witnesses, and is not bound to any iurisdiction, would not condemne our first father before he called him into iudgement, examined him, checked and reprooued him, and heard his excuses. Heare then the King of Nauarre: hee may say vnto you, that the Pope by surpris hath noted him of Heresie: hee knoweth not yet any other truth, then that wherein the Queene of Nauarre his mother hath bredde him. If hee hath at any time yeelded vnto the force and violence of the time, hee had not then his will free, and as soone as opportunitie gaue him meanes to retire from Court into his Countrey of Bearn, hee framed his beleeffe to the modell of that which had bene prescribed him: but 1588. A but protesting alwaies the Estates and Parlements of France, that he hath no greater desire in his soule, then to see the seruice of God vnited vnder one Religion, by the meanes of a free and lawfull assembly of the vniuersall Church, or a nationall Councell of the French Churches. The Deputies notwithstanding (especially the Clergie) will allow of no reason. They are for the most part transported with passion, and apprehend nothing but what may aduance the League. If the King refuseth this article, the Duke of Guise will dissolue the Estates, and lay all the blame vpon his Maiestie. He hath so well provided for his affaires, as he holds himselfe master of the Castle of Blois, and of the Kings person. There is neither gate, hall, chamber, nor cabinet, but the keyes are at his pleasure: he hath great forces ready. He checkes them that speakes not to his liking: their voices and consents are forced in the Parliament house; he puts in, and puts out, & doth what he pleaseth. Those whom the King and Parlements hold insupportable, find access and support with him. To conclude, see the first Prince of the bloud, the first of the most ancient, and most famous house that doth at this day weare a Crowne, the first of that royall branch of Bourbon, which onely remains after so many sisters and cousins of Aniou, Alançon, Eureux, Berry, Bourgoingne, Angoulême, and Orleans, and which onely succeeded that of Valois, deprived of the right which nature hath giuen him, without calling him, or hearing his iustifications. The Clergie sayes he ought to be no more cited, his heresie, his incapacity to the Crowne is apparent. The Bishop of Chaalons in Champagne, deliues this conclusion to the Nobility. The Bishop of Cominge, to the third Estate: and the Arch-bishop of Ambrun, to the King, to make a law thereof: and then followed the last and lamentable Act of the Tragedie of a distressed King.

But oh men! the Eternal looks on you, and laughs at your counsels: hee now comes vpon the stage to act his part, and to bring forth effects farre from his thoughts. The King is aduertised from all parts of a great conspiracie against his Maiestie. The Duke of Esperron assures him by letters. The Duke of Mayenne (iealous it may be of his brothers greatnesse) aduertiseth his Maiestie from Lion, by a Knight of honour: and the Duke of Aumale, from Blois it selfe by his owne wife, that the Duke of Guise had very pernicious desseignes: that the houre of the execution did approach: that they resolved to seaze on him D and to leade him to Paris.

These aduertisements kindle a new courage in the King, he meanes to preuent him, and discouers his mind to foure, whom he knowes as faithfull to his Maiestie, as enemies to the damnable proiects of the League. He must suppress this new Starre in the East, whom the people worshipped already. The present necessity will not suffer him to bring him forth in view: the Popes respect retaines him: his oath to protect the Estates, makes him irresolute: the troubles, which this execution will cause in people disposed to the League, makes him doubtfull: yet he must die. He hath no quality in France but of a simple subiect: and yet without the Kings authority, consent or sufferance, he hath built a League, had intelligence with the stranger, leauied men of warre, attempted vpon townes, and broken the public peace.

Hee continues his practises against the oath of the Ediēt of Vnion with the Cardinall Morofine, Legate to the Pope, and Don Inigo of Mendosa Ambassador of Spaine. He confirms his priuate confederations with the Gouernors of reuolted townes. He published by his declarations, that he hath not taken armes, but for Gods and the Kings seruice: and yet by the surprize of so many townes, he hath hindered the aduancement of the Kings armie in Guienne against the Huguenots. The obiekt of his armes is the safety and religion of the Catholikes, and to depriue the King of Nauarre of all hope of succession to the Crowne: and in the meane time it appeares, that he hath sought the loue of the King of Nauarre: he hath promised to giue him his sonne in hostage, and to meet him with seuentene Princes of his house at the riuer of Loire, to serue him, and make him King of France. Many letters intercepted discouer, that after his Maiesties pardon of many capitall crimes, he renues his desseignes against the King and his Estate. The surprize of the Marquisate of Salusses is by his intelligence. Hee disgraceth the Kings actions, he blames him to haue vnwillingly made warre against the Huguenots: to haue sold the said Marquisate, that vnder colour of recovering it, hee might diuert the warre against the Heretickes. In steade of reducing the Townes held by the Huguenots, he keeps his Captaines and men of warre at Blois, vpon assurance of a profitable change. He hath caused bookes to be printed in fauor of the lawfull succession of the house of Lorraine to the Crowne.

At the Barricadoes this voice was heard: It is no longer time to dally, let vs leade my Lord to Reims. He hath suffered himselfe to be saluted by the people, with cries and acclamations which belong onely to the Soueraigne Prince. He hath vanted that he was able to take the King prisoner, or to do worse although he entred but with eight horses into Paris, being assured of the force and wils of the citizens: he hath seized on the places of strength within Paris: made Gouvernors, Magistrates and Officers at his pleasure: he hath so corrupted the Estates, as the Deputies speake not but by his mouth: they produce nothing but what hath bene first examined in his Councell. Many cry out, that he stayes too long before hee strikes. He speakes no more but in termes of a Soueraigne, with pride, disdain and threats: he hath refused to subscribe the Edict which the King would publish in cases of treason: hee doth already seale Letters-patents with his Great Seale: he forbids the Commons to giue victuals or munition to such companies as the King had sent vnto them: There remains no more, but to confirme in his person that ancient greatnesse sometimes vsurped by the Majors of the pallace: and to deale with the King, as Charles Martel had done with Chilperic. In the end they represent vnto the King, the Processe of Salcedo, a party in his conspiracie, the Councels of Nancy, and of Paris in Lent last, whereof the chiefe point was: To seaze vpon the King: the instructions of the Aduocate David: the letters of the Queen Dowager of Denmarke, to the Duke of Lorraine her sonne: the attempt of the Barricadoes, and (to heape vp the measure) the practises, corruptions, and violences done by the Duke of Guise to the Estates. The like and lesse crimes haue in former ages brought more famous heades then the Duke of Guises to the blocke. The Leagues and practises of an Earle of Harcourt, of a Constable of Saint Paul, of a Duke of Nemours, haue brought them to shamefull ends.

Pope Sixtus, now liuing, hath of late put to death the Earle of Pepoli of the noblest families of Italy, onely for that he had concealed some banished men in his house. The Duke of Guise himselfe did of late pursue with all violence the disobedience of the Duke of Aniou. His Holinesse hath beleued, that Religion was the onely motiue of the Duke of Guises armes. The Barricadoes, with the vsurpation of the Bastille, and Bois de Vincennes, haue made him to change his beleefe. He himselfe hath said vnto the Bishop of Paris, that the fact was too bold, that the Estate is interested, and that the offence is irreconcilable. Hee hath written vnto the King, aduising him to assure himselfe of the Estates at what price soeuer: that in such imminent dangers, he must seeke out all extraordinarie remedies: and vpon this consideration he graunted the King a Confessor to absolue him of all, reseruing the matter to the holy Sea.

Yea, but the Estates are vnder the Kings oath and protection. Without doubt an oath was neuer broken without repentance. But how is the Soueraigne bound to his subiect, who by rebellion hath violated his oath to his Prince. Necessity forceth the law: great punishments of Rebels haue bene often done in great assemblies. The Kings of England and Poland do practise it well, and our Charles hath died his sisters nuptials with more blood then wine. Moreouer, the Duke of Guise hath great credit with the people of France. It is true: but his party hath no credit but with the multitude: the which is a very moueable and inconstant foundation. Men of account, Townes, Gouvernors, and the Kings Officers, mutin not, but by meanes of the multitude, and seeing him fallen that gaue motion to their rebellion, they will containe themselves. My Lege (say they who feare least this violent counsell which they gaue him in so vrgent necessitie, should be discouered) the Duke of Guise will surpriſe you. They haue already published in Paris, that this is your Climatrical year: they thew forth the razor that shall shauie you: they demand how long they shall suffer you to liue in a Cloyster. The lightning goes before the thunder: the guilt of treason is extraordinarie in the head: so the punishment goes before the instructions and formes of Iustice. One must punish the offendour, and then informe of the offence. The mildest Commonweales, most politicke, and greatest enemies to rigour, haue alwaies, That whereas the estate is in danger, they may begin with the execution. In the end the King is satisfied, hauing remained long in suspence, betwixt the rigour of his reuenge, and the mildnesse of his own disposition. By the Kings countenance, or some words let slip by some one of the foure, they find it dangerous to continue long at the Estates. But the more the Duke of Guise enters into discourse, the more the Kings good countenance dissuades him. And the Archbishop of Lion attending a Cardinals hat within a few dayes from Rome: Retiring your self from the Estates (said he vnto him) you shall beare the blame to haue abandoned France in so important an occasion, and your enemies making their profit of your abſence, wil soone ouerthrow al that which you haue with so much pain effected for the assurance of religion. Mandoth often loofe his iudgement vpon the point of his fall. Aduertisements were come to him from all parts, both within and without the Realme, from Rome, Spain, Lorraine and Sauoy, that a bloody Catastrophe would dissolue the assembly. The Almanackes had well obserued it: it was generally bruted in the Estates, that the execution should be on Saint Thomas day. The cue before his death, the Duke himselfe sitting downe to dinner, found a scroule vnder his napkin, aduertising him of this secret ambush. But (as ambition blinds those whom she hath raised vp to the Pies nest, and the furie of Gods iudgements confounds such as trust in their authority) he writ vnderneath which his owne hand, They dare not: and threw it vnder the table.

The Duke of Guise following the counsell of the Cardinall Morſin, had the one and twentieth of December incensed the King anew, by some bold and presumptuous speeches. My Lege (said he) seeing I find that the affaires decline from bad to worle, and that those things which seemed curable, are growne desperate: I beseech your Maiesty to receiue againe the charge you haue committed vnto me, and giue me leaue to retire my selfe. Hee spake this, to the end that by this discontent he might take an occasion to dissolue the Estates, and bringing the King into an extreame hatred with his subiects, he might play the last act of his long fore-plotted Tragedy. The King had the two and twentieth day following, prepared seuen of his five and forty (they were Gentlemen whom he had appointed to be neere his person, besides the ordinary Archers of his guard) to execute his will, and by many dispatches had assured those townes which he held to be most mutinous. The three and twentieth, he assembles his Councell somewhat more early in the morning then was vsuall, hauing a deuotion to go after dinner, and to spend the holi-dayes at our Lady of Clergy. The Cardinals of Vendosme, Guise, and Gondy, the Arch-bishop of Lion, the Marshalls of Aumont and Retz, the Lords of d'O, Rambouillet, Maintenon, Marcell and Petremolle Superintendants of the Treasor, were assembled. The Duke of Guise comes, and attending the beginning of the Councell, sends for an handkercher: (the groome of his chamber had forgotten to put one into his pocket.) Peruirt his Secretary not daring to commit this new aduertisement to any mans report, tyes a note to one of the corners thereof, saying: Come forth and saue your selfe, else you are but a dead man. But they stay the page that carried it. Larchant Capitaine of the Kings gard causeth another to be giuen vnto him with all speed by Saint Prix the chiefe Groome of the Kings chamber. The Castle gates are shut, and the Councell sits about eight of the clocke.

The spirit of man doth often prophetic of the mischief that doth pursue him. So whilest they dispute of a matter propounded by Petremolle, the Duke sees strange alterations, and extraordinary distemperatures, and amidst his distrust, a great fainting of his heart. S. Prix presents vnto him some prunes of Brignolles, and raisins of the Sunne. He eates, and thereupon the King calls him into his cabinet by Renoll one of the Secretaries of his Estate, as it were to confer with him about some secret of importance. The Duke leaves the Councell to passe vnto the Cabinet: and as he did lift vp the tapistrie with one hand to enter, they charge him with their swords, daggers and pertuisans: yet not with so great violence, but he thew the murderers the last indeauors of an invincible valor and courage.

Thus liued, and thus died Henry of Lorraine, Duke of Guise: a Prince worthy to be in the first ranks of Princes, goodly, great, tall of proportion, amiable of countenance, great of courage, ready in the execution of his enterprises, popular, dissembling, but couering the secrets of his mind, with his outward behauiour, embracing all times and occasions, politicke in stratagemes, making much of his soldiers, and honoring his Captaines. But a Prince who hath blemished the greatest beautie of his praises by extreame ambition, factious, 1588. a great bragger, vaine in belceuing of South-sayers, who assured him of his greatnesse, and of the change of his family into a Royalty: proud, not able to submit his hopes, euen to those from whome he should hope for his aduancement, giuing men to vnderstand by his inclination, that he was not borne to obey, but to command, and with this desseigne he framed the minds of the French, by his first actions, to beleue that he had parts fit to make a strange alteration in a Realme. But let vs apply that great diuine Oracle, and tremble at the apprehension of the horror of Gods iudgements: For this cause will I destroy thee in the end: he will put thee out of thy tabernacle, and thy root out of the land of the liuing. The iust shall see it and feare, and shall laugh at him, saying: Behold the man that hath not taken God for his ayde: and succour, but hath trusted to the multitude of his riches, and hath fortified himselfe in vanitie.

At the noise hereof, the Cardinall of Guise (being amazed) recouers the doore to go away. Larchant staies him with the Arch-bishop of Lion, and lodgeth them in a litle chamber aboute the Kings, lately built for Capuchins and Fenillants. The Cardinall in the heat of this tumult casts forth some words, which he would neuer haue deliuered being well aduised. They report it vnto the King. The King commands La Bastide and Valançay, being both of the siue and fortie to kill him. The first excuseth himselfe, the other accepts the charge, and accompanied with sixe others, goes to the Cardinals chamber, to make him a companion of his brothers death: but being readie to do the execution, I know not what cold apprehension quenched this heate, which had moued him to bathe his hands in the bloud of so great a Prelate without respect of his Order.

The Cardinall of Bourbon, the Duchesse of Nemours (mother to the Duke of Guise) the Duke of Nemours her sonne by the second marriage, the Prince Ginulle now Duke of Guise, and the Duke of Elboeuf had at the same instant guards appointed them, to be assured of their persons. Pericard being kept prisoner, discovered all the practises of the League, and by the instructions he had in his keeping, he informed the King at large of all his masters desseignes. The Earle of Brissac, Bois-Dauphin and some other Gentlemen (faithfull to the Duke of Guise) the President Neully, the Prouost of Marchants at Paris, Compagn and Cotteblanche, Sherifes of the said towne, and Le Roy Lieutenant of Amiens, were put in prison: therest stayed neither for boots nor spurs to dislodge.

Rosieux Secretarie to the Duke of Mayenne, and sonne-in-law to Armonville Maior of Orleans, had already by speciall posts, aduertised his master of what had past: and so practiseth them of Orleans, as Entragues comming from Blois to bee assured of the Towne, found a generall reuolt. Doubtlesse the Inhabitants were inclined to the Kings obedience, if before he would haue granted them, at their humble suite, another Gouvernor at his Maiesties choice then him, who at the first had engaged them, and afterwards by his wilfulness suffered them to runne into the Labyrinth of Rebellion. It is good to yeeld something to a mutinous multitude, and not to thrust them into despaire. The execution done, the King carries newes thereof to the Queene-mother. Madame (saith he) I will hereafter reign alone, I haue no more companions. She answered him, God grant my sonne it fall out well for you: but haue you giuen order to assure the towns where the name and memorie of the Duke of Guise hath credit and authoritie. This vnexpected speech did wonderfully moue the Queene-mother, but that of the Cardinall of Bourbon gaue her a deadly wound. Ah Madame! (saith hee, shee comming to visit him being a prisoner and sicke) you haue brought vs to slaughter. Shee excusing her selfe that she had neither consented nor giuen Councell in this action, left the Cardinall doubling his complaints, and transported with griefe she died the first of Ianuary following. At night they draw the Cardinall and the Arch-bishop from their chamber, to lodge them in a streighter and more obscure place, and there to passe the night, whilest that the King (with-held by the considerations of the quality of a Prelate, a Peere of France, Arch-bishop of Reims, Cardinall at Rome, and President of his Order at the Estates) consulted either of his execution, or freedome from prison. But Iustice hath no respect of persons: and treason is a worse president in a Cardinall then in a simple Priest. Moreouer, the Cardinall might succeed in his brothers credit, and his threats seemed dangerous if hee liued longer. So the King giues Captaine Gast commission to kill him. He craues pardon: but 400. crownes do easily find foure ministers for the execution. The Arch-bishop had his life

A saued, at the humble sute of the Baron of Lux his vncl. The King loued this gentleman and pretended to draw from the Prelate all the Quintessence of the league. The punishment of these two, freed the King of Nauarre from being the cause of the misery of these ciuill warres, seeing the King had thereby noted the first author of these troubles. But this Prince was neuer seene without a singular constancy in his greatest crosses, nor an admirable modesty in his highest prosperities. He vnderstands of the death of two of his mightiest enemies, and would gladly haue seene the Kings wrath and forces turned against the house of Lorraine, whereby he might make his profit in France by the fall thereof, and apply it to his aduantage. But Noble mindes neuer looke on their enemies head, but with a heavy and mournfull countenance. He laments not so much the death but the misery of them of Guise: and yet continues his enterprize which hee had vpon Niort, and the foure and twentieth of December, vnder the conduct of Saint Gelais, Parabel, Harambure, Ranques, Preau, Valieres, and others, hee forced and scaled the towne being amazed, and spoiled it, without any slaughter but of siue and twenty, or thirty men, no rauishing of women, nor iniury to the Clergy. The same daie hee receiued the castle by compulsion from Mal- Niort taken by the King of Nauarre.
corné, furnished with siue great canons, and two very long Culuerins, with the which the Lieutenant of the towne, a wicked and a turbulent man, vanted (when they were cast) to salute the King when he approached the walles of Niort. But the great fury of the victors armes, hauing slaine him in the beginning of the fight, was the cause he made not an exemplary compensation, for the outrages and the vnworthy speeches he had vsed against the said King and the Princes of the bloud.

The Duke of Neuers, on the other side battered Ganache, and the fourth of February (hauing spent eight hundred canon shot) he made two breaches, and gaue an assault, with the losse of aboute three hundred men, and growing resolute in this conquest, where his honour was engaged, he lets Plessis-geste, capitaine of the place vnderstand that he had wonne reputation inough in the defence of so weake a place, that his obstinacy did preiudice the King of Nauarres affaires: that the King by the execution done at Blois, had sufficiently declared warre against the league, and that he ment to imploy the said Kings forces against them. Plessis aduertiseth the King his master: he marcheth to succour him, but his violent D trauell on foote to get him a heate in an extreame cold season, made him stay so dangerously sicke of a feuer at Saint Pere, as the newes of his death was carried to Court. So Plessis yeilded vp the towne, his armes and baggage saued. But this royall army came to nothing: the Duke went to refresh himselfe at his house, wauering some moneths doubtfull of his party: and the King of Nauarre (whom God would vie in so confused a time, to bring him vpon the Theater, not as a disinherited child, according to the intent of the Estates, but to teach men that their struiuing is in vaine against the decrees of his diuine prouidence) hauing recouered his perfect health, assured himselfe of the places neere vnto Niort, Saint Maixant, Mallezaye, Chastelleraut, Loudun, Liste Bouchard, Mirebeau, Vinonne and others, pretending to doe the King some great and notable seruice.

yeilded to the
uers.

E The King by this blow had amazed, but not suppressed the league. Hee had begun well for the warranty of his Estate, but he must not doe things by halucs. In steed of going to horse, making his armes to glister, shewing himselfe betwixt Orleans and Paris, calling backe his army out of Poictou, to oppose it against the attempts of the Duke of Mayenne, and (being armed, and the townes amazed at this great effect) to diuert the mischief which oppressed him within few monethes, he returns to his first remedies, being soft and feareful, against a madde multitude, he is content to send words to retaine his subiects already entered into sedition: he releaseth some prisoners whom hee held least dangerous, continues the Estates, renues the Edict of vnion, and by a generall forgetting of what was past, thinks they will lay downe their armes against him, to imploy them against the King of Nauarre. But a multitude growes madde with mildnesse, and is retained by feuerity. The King finds, that in lesse then six weekes, Tours and Baugency are the frontiers of those Prouinces that were vnder his obedience. And whereas he thought to beginne, he now ceaseth to raigne. So God, who laughed at the vaine attempts of the one, will likewise heape vpon the other, remedies no lesse violent then those he had practised.

Error in State.

Now many awaked from their amazement, and beganne to stirre: the peopled studied of 1589. of new mutinies and new armes. Orleance shut vp their gates: the towne made bar-

 A does against the Cittadell: Paris shewed the fury of their mutiny against the Louvre, they beate downe the Kings armes, imprison his seruants, and aswel by their ransomes and spoile, as by a voluntary contribution, they leauy a great summe of money for the warre. Mar- teau, Cotteblanche, Compan, Roland and others (deliuered vpon promises to reclaime the Pa-risiens) had contrariwise seduced the people. The sixteene Tribunes (let vs know them by their names, euen as they are set downe in an oration made by the Bourgeses of Paris to the Cardinal Caictan) la Bruyere, Cruce, Buffy le Clere, the Commissary Louchard, Morlier, Senault, the Commissary de Bary, Drouart an Aduocate, Alequin, Emonnot, Lablier, Massier, Pas- sart, Ondineau, Tellier and Morin a Proctör of the Chastelet (euery one of which had many Agents and followers) like sixteene furies comming out of hell, sharpened their weapons, B and kindled the coales of murder and dissolutnesse, first at Paris, and then in a manner in al the good towne of the realm, being seasoned with the leuaine of these furious tribunes. The Preachers (fire-brands of these furies) came not into the pulpit, but to powre forth reproches, and iniuries against the King, and by an Iliade of curses to kindle the peoples mindes to rebellion. The people came neuer from their sermons, but hauing fire in their heads, readinesse in their feet to runne, and disposition in their hands, to fall tumultuously vpon such as were not branded with the marke of the league. Hee was neither a good nor a zealous Catholike that had not a bed-rowle of outrages to detest and abhorre that execution of Blois.

Parisiens infor-
 mer, cics,

The porters at the Palace babled nothing, but a cursing of the Kings life: an Elegy to lament the calamity of these two brethren, an Oration in memory of the commendable exploits of the Duke of Guise in Hongary against the Turke, at Iarnac against the Protestants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour against the Reistres of Thoré, at Vimorrey and at Auneau. They cried aloud at Paris: that France was now sicke, and could not be cured but by giuing her a drinke with the blood of France. And because they haue not the body at their deuotion, those things he possessest must suffer for it: his furniture at the Louvre, his pictures are broken, his armes beaten downe, his Images dragged vp and downe, his great scale defaced: they call him impious, vniust, vilaine, prophane, tyrant, damned. The Colledge of Sorbonne concludes by a publike act of the seuenth of Ianuary, That the people of France D are freed from the oath of obedience and fealty which they ought to Henry of Valois, and that law- fully, and with a good conscience they may arme against him, receive his reuenues, & employ it to make warre against him.

The Duke of Mayennes
 courties,

On the other side, Charles of Lorraine Duke of Mayenne, dreaming on his brothers death, provided for the assurance of his owne life, and consulted with the Arch-bishops of-ficiall, the Lord of Botheon Seneshall of Lionnois, and some others of the chiefe, whether there were any safety for him within their towne. We are (said they) bound vnto the King before all others. Make no triall (we pray you) of your seruants, in that which shall be contrary to the Kings will. Arme not your selfe against him: without doubt he will seeke your seruice, when you shall submit the passion of reuenge vnto reason, and will aduance E your house to the good of all France, the which trembles with apprehension of the calamities which this warre shall cause. If the people call you, to set them at liberty, you shall abandon them to the spoile: and to defend the Monarchy against the King, you shall make your selfe the head of a confused and monstrous Anarchie. God did neuer forget the protection of Kings against their mutinous subiects. They bee the Images of God, the children of heauen: and whoeuer armes against them, armes against heauen. More-ouer the winde of the peoples fauour, may for a time fill your sailes, and carrie your defeignes violently to sea, but they are inconstant, light, and disloyall. And if they haue shaken off the yoke of dutifull obedience and loue to their King, what shall they doe to a Prince, to whom they shall not bee bound, but as to the Protector of F their mutinies?

They spake truely, for after the triall of all sorts of governments, France must in the end returne to a royaltie: and the Duke (by a commendable resolution) might haue vnited the mindes which his brother had diuided. But when as others represent vnto him the aduantage hee should haue to succeed in the fauour, credit, and authority of his brother,
 and

A and by consequence his owne hopes: he reiects the integrity of the first counsell: coniures all the friends of his house to reuenge, parts from Lions on Christmas day: in his passage he assures himselfe of Malcon, Chaalon and Dijon. The Court of Parliament there, refused to consent to this rebellion, and therefore the chiefe were driuen away, and some imprisoned, others (apprehending the losse of their commodities) did easily submit their neckes to the yoke of a new Democracy. At Dijon he receiued letters from the King, promising to surcease the punishment of forepassed faults, with the death of his bretheren, whom (sayd hee) I haue caused to die, to saue my life from the daunger whereof you did aduertise mee.
 The Duke (attributing the Kings clemency to some weake and abiect affection, proceeding from feare, either to haue him his enemy, or to loose his friendship) growes obdurate in B his resolution, reiects the Kings Officers, giues commission to Rosne, Saint Paul and others, to command in Champagne and Brie, and to seize vpon the best places: hee comes to Troyes, where the towne (long before corrupted by the infected humors of the league) re-ceiued him with as great honour as they could haue done their King: and in all places where he passed, they were easily drawne into rebellion, euery towne framing themselves after the modell of Paris and Orleance.

Letters from to King to the Duke of Mayenne.

Three thousand men sent from Paris, to succour the Cheualier d'Aumale (besieged in Orleance by the Marshall of Aumont, with the Nobility of the Court, some troupes of foot and horse, and the Kings gards) had beene defeated nere vnto Estampes, by Fargis and C Montigni: but the Marshall vnderstanding of the Duke of Mayennes approach, raiseth the siege, and retires to Boigency. In the meane time, the King himselfe in person did view and examine the conclusions of the Estates: but this soden enterprise of the Dukes, made him to leaue the worke imperfect, and to provide for the safety of his person: and for a conclusion, the fifteenth and sixteenth of Ianuary, he heard the Deputies griefes and complaints vpon the disorders which afflicted France:

The Arch-bishop of Bourges, President for the Clergy after the Cardinals death, imputed the cause of our miseries to contempt of Religion, which breaking the bonds that tie vs vnto God, had in like sort diuided the hearts and willes of families and commonalties. He greatly commended the Kings zeale to religion: insisted long vpon the abuses of the D Church, which the corruption of the time had bred: the vnworthy promotion of Prelats:
 the nomination (to Abbacies, and other spirituall dignities) of all sorts of persons, fouldiars, ignorant men, suborned men, gardiens, lymoniaks, women, and children: touching the alienation of the Clergy lands, plurality of benefices, vsurpation of the reuenues of Hospitals, dep rauation of that goodly ancient order, whereby none might come vnto Commanderies of the order of the Knights of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, vnlesse hee were a Gentleman of three descents: disorders of vniuersities and monasteries, in former times the nurceries of holy fathers. Then he turned his discourse to the disorders noted in the Nobility of France, who were in former ages the terror of all nations, and from whom neighbour nations confesse to haue learned the exercise and profession of cheualry: vpon the excessse E of men of warre: vpon the wasting of the treasure, and other disorders which spring from these first heads: finally he beseecheth the King, to make a good reformation, whereby his people should multiply, Iustice should daily flourish, and peace should bee settled in the Realme.

The Estates
 dissolued.

Charles of Cosse Earle of Brissac, chiefe Pantler and chiefe Fawconer of France, newly restored to fauour, and President for the Nobility, shewes that they be not the hands of Fortune, which enuironed his Maiesties fore-head with this double diademe. It is God, who hath established him our King, who had before chosē him King of a more remote nation, for the piety, faith, clemency, and magnanimity wherewith he hath beene endued from his tender age. That heresie, schisme, and discord, which are crept into the peoples hearts, haue F not taken their beginning vnder his raigne, whom God hath raised vp amidst the furies and afflictions of France, to be reuenged by him, and aduanced aboue all the nations of Christendome, who draw their firme support from the stability of his crowne. That the wished victories in France ouer heresie, shall be vnto the King but a continuance of the route and defeate of that fearefull army of Reistres, Lanquenets, Suisses and French Huguenots, which (like so many trumpets) proclaime in all places, the honours, praises, and victories

 Brissac.

1588. victories of his Maieſty. That now thoſe vowes, faſtings, teares, and toyles of the ancient French, are heard, who ſeemed to demand vengeance againſt the fire, fury, and rage of thoſe, who (after ſo many religious ages) haue violated the ſepulchers of their fathers and ours, and would take from amongſt vs that onely religion which the holy fathers haue planted in old time throughout the world.

Then hauing repreſented the zeale and affection of the Nobility to aſſiſt the King to reſtore religion, and the State to their former beauty, following the example and the hereditary vertue of their Anceſtors, who had chaſed and vanquiſhed the Gothes, Vandales, Ariens, Albigeois, Lombards, Sarrazins, Turkes and Pagans: and continuing the defence of the faith, and the victories of the French Kings, haue left no other limits to the reputation of their valour, then thoſe which the Sunne takes in making of his courſe about the earth. He beſeecheth his Maieſty, to fauour the ancient priuileges of the Nobility, to recompence in them the ſeruices of their Predeceſſors: to confirme the military diſcipline of Kings his fore-runners, not to ſuffer any by fauour or purchaſe, to chalenge the title of Gentlemen: to maintaine the priuileges of the Knights of Saint John of Ieruſalem, to cut off the ſuperfluities in Juſtice: to moderate the ſubſidies: order the treaſure, eſta bliſh the Magiſtrate, plant diſcipline among ſouldiers, reforme the Church, and to puniſh the enemies thereof. Finally he wiſhed a thouſand happineſſe to the King, and peace to his people. But this braue and commendable humour ſhall not hold him long, but he ſhall returne to his firſt party, by a new defection.

The Aduocate Bernard. Bernard Aduocate of the Parliament of Dijon, began his oration with a ſollemne thanks for the Kings promiſe, fully to execute the Ediſt of the vnion: he exhorted all the townes and ſubiects of the Realme, to vnite themſelues not onely in religion, but alſo in good correſpondency for the Kings ſeruice, continuation of his dignity, and defence of the Eſtate. He diſcouered all the other infirmities of this politike body, the which (beſides the vicer of partialities) haue ſtrangely corrupted it: as Blaſphemies, Adulteries, Witchcraft, Simony, outrage in ſouldiers, inuentors of ſubſidies, and new Ediſts, executors of extraordinary Commiſſions, Brokers, and buyers of Offices, who waſt the treaſure, and bring the people to beggery. An inuectiue againſt ſo many Ediſts regiſtred with this Apoſtil: By commandements many times reiterated: ſeeing that in good and iuſt Ediſts, the Soueraigne Princes command is not neceſſary, againſt the treaſure ill employed, and the ſtrange oppreſſions of France. Then requiring a conſeſſion of the Eſtates, hee beſeeched his Maieſty to open the eyes of his wiſdome, for the caſe of his poore people: not to change his godly reſolutions: and to diſmiſſe the Deputies, conſidering the mutinies that were in their Prouinces: to goe and make prooſe (ſaid he) of the effects of their goods willes. But theſe willes were for the moſt part ſubiect vnto thoſe that (vnder a goodly ſhew of warre for religion and the publike good) ſtudied of nothing but rebellion, cruelty, treachery, trouble, and conſuſion. Thus the Eſtates ended, and the King fore-ſeeing the extreame oppreſſion of his ſubiects, in ſo great a leauy of armes, abates the fourth part of their ſubſidies, and ſent to all the Prouinces, to aſſure them of his good intent. But his ſubiects were too much affected to mutinies, too capable of diſobedience, too ready to ſpoile the wife and the rich. The mourning of the Ducheffes of Guiſe, Nemours, and Montpenſier, being ſet at liberty by the King, to bind them to be interceſſors to his mutinous people: the furious cries of Bouiber, Guarin, Cueil, Roze, Pelleſier, Guinceſtre, Hamilton, Chriſtin, Lucain, Mauclore, Commo't, Fewardent and other ſuch Preachers (very fire-brands of ſedition) the perſwaſions of the Prouoſt of Marchants, of the Sheriſſes of Paris, and other Magiſtrates of townes, freely releaſed by the King: had too wickedly ſeduced them. But the Duke of Mayenne arriual at Paris, confirmed the Inhabitants more in the execution of the fore-ſaid decree of Sorbonne.

The Court of Parliament at Paris imprisoned. This decree (quite contrary to thoſe by the which this College hath ſo often commendably withſtood the vnde and violent proceedings of the Court of Rome, againſt the Eſtate of this Realme) could not take effect, whileſt that maieſticall and reuerent Parliament, the true garden of this crowne, had either force or authority. So one of the ſixteene, Buffy le Clerc a poore petty-fogger (lately much honoured, being admitted to preſent himſelfe bare-headed vpon his knee before this reuerent aſſembly) followed by ſome of his acquaintance 1589. A acquaintance and companions, and a band of armed raskalls, enters the ſixteenth of January, armed with a Cuiraffe, and a Piſtoll in his hand, into the great chamber, with an intent to carry away the firſt Preſident De Harlay, and the other Preſidents and Councillors, who perſiſting in the fidelity of their charge, might croſſe the mad and fatall deſignes of the league. The whole body aſhamed to ſee themſelues diſinembred by this inſolent and preſumptuous attempt, followed their head. Buffy then leads them away all, in triumph, two and two, priſoners to the Baſtille and Louvre. Such as were Royaliſts were kept there, the reſt (which leant to this popular fury) preferred their houſes from the ſpoile which this Tribune had pretended, and were ſent home. Some aduerted of this new Commiſſion, ſaued their perſons, but not the conſiſcation of their goods & reuenues. That man was happy that found a friend where to hide himſelfe, or that could get away diſguiſed in his ſeruants weeds, and ſo march many daies on foote to recouer Tours, or ſome other place of the Kings obedience. All diuine and humane Lawes were ſubverted, reſpect of equity abolithed, and the reuerence of publike authority defaced. The Officers of the Parliament being enlarged, giue the place of the firſt Preſident to Barnabé Briſſon: then they make a declaration in manner of an othe, for the entertainment of the vnion. The Princes of Lorraine and many gentlemen ſweare vnto it, the ſixteene ſubſcribe it, one amongſt them prickt himſelfe in the arme, to ſigne it with his owne blood: but remaying lame thereby, he was mockt by his companions.

C The people made a generall counsell of the vnion, conſiſting of forty choiſe men of the three Eſtates, the which was confirmed by the Parliament, to diſpoſe of the publike affaires, and to confer with the Prouinces and townes of the league. For the Church, Brezé Biſhop of Meaux, Rozé Biſhop of Senlis, Villas Biſhop of Agen, Prenost Curat of Saint Seuerin, Boucher Curat of Saint Benner, Ambry Curat of Saint Andrews, Pelletier Curate of Saint James, Pigenat Curat of Saint Nicholas, Launoy Chanoine of Soissons, and ſome-time miniſter at Sedan: for the Nobility the Marquis of Canillac, the Seigneur of Menneville, Saint Pol, Reſne, Montberault, Hauteſort, Sauſſay: for the third Eſtate, Maſſepirault, Nelly, Coqueley, Midorge, Mochault, Baſſon, Marillac, Achart, de Bray, Beau-cler, Bruyere Lieutenant Ciuil, Anroux, Fontanon, Drouart, Cruet, Bordeaux, Haluequin, Soly, Bellanger, Poncher, Senault and Charpentier, all Lawiers or men of trafficke. The great men enter preſently into iealouſie of this number, whereas the people commanded: ſo as (by the Dukes importunity and the aboue named Princeſſes) they ad vnto them Hennequin Biſhop of Rennes, the Abbot of Lenoncourt, the Preſidents Ianin, Vetus, Le Maſtre, Dormeſſon, Videville, D'Amours a Councillor, Villeroy, both father and ſonne, Sermoiſe, Dampierre, La Bourdaſſiere, Le Fay, and many others, who to carry it away by plurality of voices, called vnto them the Preſident Le Sueur, Bragelonne Treasorer, Roland a Sheriſſe, and others, who aſſiſting one another with their voices, ouerthrew many things which thoſe that were deputed for the people were ready to decree, for the confirmation of their tyranny.

The Duke of Mayenne (to ſettle his affaires) ſuffers theſe baſe companions to play the petty Kings. Thoſe of the Clergy, exceeding the authority of the Church, doe in their ſermons excommunicate the father that knoweth his ſonne to be the Kings ſervant, and reueales him not to the counsell of the vnion: the ſonne that diſcouers not his father, the wife and the husband that accuſe not one another, the kiſmen and friends that diſcouer not the goods of their kindred and friends being abſent, to be employed in the warres. The Nobility reapes ſome profit of the ranſomes and ſpoiles of the Royaliſts and Politikes. The people condemne, imprison, ſpoile and ranſome, of their abſolute power, and ſell the goods of any that beares not the marke of their enraged faction. This furious combuſtion of Paris, ſets all the realme on fire: townes and prouinces ſawe themſelues after the mould of the capitall City. Chartres begins the dance, expells Sourdais their Gouverneur, and receiues Reclainville a Gentleman of Beauſe, a partiſan of the League. This towne imports much for the Eſtate of Paris, as one of their chiefe graniers for corne. The Duke of Mayenne poſtes thether, to bee aſſured thereof, and the people receiue him as their Redeemer.

Being arriued there, Rouan ſends for him. He goes: and in all places as he paſſeth, they meete him, preſent him their keys, and ſweare to obey him. Thoſe of Mans murder many 1589. many of the Kings Officers and seruants, spoile others, seize vpon Fargis their Gouvernour, A and send him prisoner to Paris. Angers was assured for the King: but the Duke of Mercœur Gouvernour of Britan, subdued in a manner all the Prouince to his party. Thoulousa murders Duranti their first President (a man who in all the fires he had formerly kindled, did neuer shew that he had any tast of a Huguenot in him) and Dafis the Kings Aduocate. Aix, Arles and Marseilles plant vp sodenly the Ensignes of the League, and follow the dance with the rest. Lions iumps with them, and growing suspicious of the passage of Collonnel Alphonso Corse (afterwards Marshall of France, vnder the title of Ornano) to command the army in Daulphiné which the Duke of Mayenne had abandoned, they declare the occasion why they take armes, sweare to maintaine good correspondency with the Princes, gentlemen and Inhabitants of Paris, and other townes vnited, and to put in execution all the Duke of Nemours commandments, who was now elcaped out of the castle of Blois. B

But we shall see this people as easie to mutine against him, as they were now ready to allow him for their Gouvernour. Chaulons retained almost all Champaigne in their duty and obedience. Rosne was Gouvernour there. But the whole body of the city, aduertised of this great execution at Blois, let him vnderstand: that seeing the Duke of Guise his maister was dead, his authority was extinct, and that acknowledging no other Soueraigne but the King, they would preferue their city from all strange enterprises. Langres deserues an honorable testimony, to haue lesse then all other fostered rebels, and to haue constantly opposed themselues against all the attempts of the league. In other Prouinces the townes bandy C directly one against another, and the most modest affecting neither party, keepe themselves from the storme. The King beholds this pittifull Tragedy, acted vpon the Theater of his Estate, and thinks yet to reclaime his subiects by mildnesse. He pardoneth, he abolisheth, he forgets all, so as euery one will performe the duty of a subiect, and againe promisseth the obseruation of his Edicts of vnion, in fauour of the Catholikes, and for the extirpation of heresies. But in the end, patience prouoked, turnes into fury. He sees that these Princefses, the Prouost of marchants, and the Sheriffes of Paris which were dismissed, doe like vnto Noes Rauens, they cast oyle in steed of water vpon the fires that are kindled. Seeing therefore, the more he seekes by mildnesse to reduce these strangers to the right way, the more violent they grow in their furious passions: he now vseth his authority, hee makes sundry proclamations, aswell against the Duke of Mayenne, the Duke and Cheualier of Aumale, as against the citties of Paris, Orleans, Chartres, Rouan, Amiens, Abbeuille and other adherents, pronounceth both heads and members, disloyal, rebels, guilty and convicted of the crimes of rebellion, treachery and treason in the highest degree: degrades them and their posterity of all honour, if by the beginning of March they submit not themselues to his obedience. And to ioyne armes to his declarations, he makes a speedy leauy of twelue thousand Suisses, by the Lord of Sansy, who molested the Duke of Sauoy vnder the Kings authority, about Geneva: where hauing taken the townes of Bonne, Gex, Thonnou and their castles, he besieged the fort of Ripaille, where the Dukes succours led by Cont Martinegues, were defeated, Martinegues slaine in battaile, with about 2000. men, and the place E yeelded: in the end he calls the Nobility vnto him, sends forth many Commissions to leauy soludiers, transports the execution of Iustice to Tours, which was wont to be in his Parliament at Paris: he commands his chamber of accounts, and all his Officers of the marble table, to repaire presently to Tours, to attend their charges, and depriues from all honours, charges, dignities, and priuileges, all townes adhering to these new reuolts.

This did but kindle more the fires of rebellion. The Duke of Mayenne armes both horse and foot, practiseth without the realme, seekes to the King of Spaine, sends out patters and Commissions vnder a new seale, vsurpes all the parts of Royall Maiesty, goes to field with his troupes, makes choise of the most resolute, and goes to Vendosme with a designe to surprise the King in Tours being ill accompanied. All the great councell was at Vendosme, vnder the assurance and word of Matillé-Benehard gouernor of the towne. But the rich ransomes of these Lords were an inticing baite to a disloyall and wicked foule. He suffers Rosne, to enter, and deliueis them all vnto him, to dispose as of prisoners of warre. A treachery added to other crimes which shall cost him his head in the market-place of Vendosme, when the towne is taken.

A The league increased daily, and the King had need to vse the King of Nauarres forces, 1589.
and where could he find more trusty French-men in so vrgent necessity? To this end hee sends to his brother-in-law, Diana of Poitiers the Duchesse of Angoulême, bastard daughter to King Henry the second, and inuities him to make a truce betwixt them, that by their common forces they may more commodiously withstand the furious attempts of the enemies of the realme, Perce of Morvay, Lord of Duby Marshall of the campe for the King, and Philip of Morvay, Lord of Pléssis Marli, his brother, superintendant of the King of Na-uarres house, treat this truce for the two Kings, and conclude vpon these conditions; that the towne, castle and bridges of Sabmur, should bee put into the King of Nauarres hands for the safety of his passage and of his forces. That all matters vntill a firme peace were concluded (the which should bee treated of before the end of the yeere) should remaine in the state they were in: and for a retreat for sicke and wounded men, one of the three places which should bee reduced by their common forces, provided alwaies there were no head of a Seneschawcy nor Baylswicke. So the King of Nauarre having placed Du Pléssis gouernor of the towne, castle and Seneschawcy of Sabmur, and Du Faur at Langeau vpon Loire, hee freed all suspicions, and all impressions of distrust which they gaue him to diuert his interview:
He passeth Loire, the 28. of Aprill with foure hundred maisters and a thousand Harguebuziers on horse-backe, to ioyne with the forces of Normandy, Maine and other places that attended him: and the last of the moneth doth his duty vnto the King within the park of C Pléssis les Tours, the one making a great shew of loue, the other of a free and ready resolution (laying aside all sealoufie and impressions of distrust, whereby some would haue diuerted this interview) and both of a singular and mutuall content.

Three daies were spent in discourse and conference. The King of Nauarre had repassed the riuer, to cause his foote to aduance: and the Duke of Espernon (who was newly arrived with foure hundred horse, and two thousand foot) marched towards Blois, to keepe the Inhabitants in awe: when as the duke of Mayenne (who staid at Vendosme) seeing the Kings forces diuided, and trusting in the intelligences hee had with some great personages about the King, makes a march of twelue leagues, and the eight of May appeeres with his Vā-guard about the suburbs of Saint Symphorian of Tours, whether the King was gone to D walke. Hee was scarce thirty paces from the suburbs, when as a man came running to the towne, and knowing his Maiesty. My Liege (saith hee) retire vous selfe, the lea is folloved E me. So the King mans the suburbs, with the Regiments of his gardes of Picardy, of Rubempré, of Gerzé lately conuerted from the league to the Kings seruice (greened with that shamefull flight hee had made vnder Duke Mercœur, being elided by the King of Nauarre vnto the suburbs of Nantes) hee causeth them to make barricadoes, lets the Marshall D' Aumont at the gate vpon the bridge, and the Suisses of Colonel Galati within the towne. Hee sends for the King of Nauarre, who was at Chimon, and the Duke of Espernon at Blois. The Duke of Tremouille and Chastillon Colonell of the King of Nauarres foot-men, arriue within few houres. They fight at many barricadoes on foot, E then they made the retreat with the Lord of Grillon, who commanded the Regiment of the garde hauing a Harguebuze-shot through the bodie. Their troupes and men of warre towards night, whom the King caused to bee lodged in some Islands nere vnto the enemy all night.

In the meane-time the Duke of Mayenne beginnes the skirmish, forceth some barrica-does, and kills many souldiers. Gerzé (seeking with too braue a resolution to keepe the enemies from taking vp of his hat, which was fallen from him in defending his barricadoe with his pike) lost his life. The Duke comes, and about foure of the clocke winnes the suburbs, and threatned the towne. The Inhabitants trembled, and those with whom the Duke had intelligence studied to effect their designes. As the night gaue some rest vnto
F their armes, the King of Nauarres troupes arriue: the Duke of Espernon did second him.
As soone as the day beganne to breake, the Duke aduertised of these new succours, burnt two great Arches of wood, and the houses at the entry of the bridge, and with a speed equall to his comming, returned the same waie, leauing a great suspicion against such as accompanied the King, to haue sought great meanes to deliuer him without striking stroke.

Henry is a double ducat,
and a carolus
is but a penny.
Insolency of the soldiers.

His Maieſty aduiſed to giue his enemy a free paſſage to returne. It were a folly (ſaid hee A with a pleaſant countenance) to hazard a double Henry againſt one Carolus, the which is the Duke of Mayennes name. It is a horror to thinke of the inſolencies, ſpoiles, murders, rauifhings, ſacrilege, blaſphemies, irreligions, which theſe braue Champions (armed for the defence of the Catholike religion) did praſtize in theſe ſuburbs, euen in the Church of Saint Symphorian. The Vicar and the Chapplaine beaten and bound all night, did ſee the coſers broken, the goods carried away, women and maides (that were fled thither as into a ſanctuary) rauifhed: and which is worſe, they ſteale away holy things, as Coſpes and Ornaments of the Altar, the Roabes and Veſtments of Prieſts, and many Chalice of diuers mettals, carrying away thoſe of ſiluer, as belonging to heretikes and royalliſts (as they termed them) and therefore good prize: and the others that were not ſiluer they left behind, being (ſay they) of the vnion. The Cheualier D' Aumale and his people ſhewed themſelues braue artiſans in theſe exploits.

Doubleſſe the vnion hath more diſunited the Church, and more ruined the Catholike religion in few yeeres, then the Proteſtants had done in many. We haue ſcene their ſouldiers (and amongst them many Prieſts and Monkes that had caſt away their frockes) force Vicars and Curats of Pariſhes in Lent (with a dagger at their throates) to giue them calues, ſheepe, lambes, pigs, kids, hens, capons and other fleſh, vnder the names of pikes, carpes, barbles, ſoles, turbots and herings, whileſt the Colledge of Sorbonne, and their Preachers, thunder out againſt their lawfull Prince and Soueraigne. The eſſentiall forme of a zealous Catholike was then, to rob Churches, to rauifh wiues and Virgins, to murder men againſt the Altars, and to ſpoile the Clergy, not to bee the Kings ſeruants, which that age held for a crime, but to vomit out againſt him all the indignities, and all the wickedneſſe, which irreligion and impiety could inuent in mad ſouldiers.

We know the Lion by his pawes. The towne of Arquenay (three leagues from Laval) had a Church guilt and enriched by the Lords of Rambouiller, and at that time filled with all the goods of the Inhabitants. Commeronde, with a regiment of ſeuon or eight hundred men (hauing ouer-runne and ſpoiled the country of Aniou, and the country of Laval) comes thither with his men to lodge, in the end of Aprill, who burnt the doores of the Church, ſackt it quite, hauing no reſpect of the feminine ſex: they ſlue a poore man at the foote of the crucifixe, complaining that in the ſame place they had rauifhed his wife: they did their excrements in the holy water ſtocke; perſumed all the Church with their filthineſſe, applied to their owne uſes the ornaments of our Lady, ſold the coapes, the banner and reliques to the Monkes of Eurons: the chalices and croſſe of ſiluer to them of Vague: and to heape vp the meaſure of their villanies (hauing taken the pike of ſiluer and ſome foure and twenty of their holy cakes in it) one of them attired himſelfe like a Prieſt, cauſing ſome twenty of the ſouldiers to kneele downe, and with his hands imbrewed with bloud and ſacrilege, diſtributed them vnto them, and trod the reſt vnder his feete. The like they did within few daies after at Thorigny.

It ſufficeth amongst ſo many to haue noted this horrible impiety in particular, that poſterity may learne, that armes doe not edifie but deſtroy the Altars: and that piety dwels not much among ſuch as follow the campe. The reniue of the two Kings had greatly troubled the Leaguers of Paris. Now they ceaſe not to draw Articles, inſtructions and aduertifements, both within, and without the Realme: they forget nothing that may confirme the building of their conſuſion. They ſend their deputies to Rome, the Commander de Diou, the counſellor Coquelar, the Abbot of Orbais, and the Deane of Reims: who iuſtifie their actions to the Pope: demand a Legate; promiſe the publication of the counſell of Trent, beſeech his Holineſſe, to be grations and fauourable to their deſignes, and to the townes of their aſſociation, and to contribute to the charge of this common warre, whereof they muſt beare the chiefe burthen. In deed they had need of much money, F to furniſh the expenſes of ſo many pettie Kings: but ſome filled their coſers, others paid their debts, and ſome bought lands and Lordſhips. Thus the people are the inſtruments of great men, and the theſe whereon all kinde of ſtorimes and tempeſts doe beate.

Liberty exceeded in all places, and rage againſt the Kings authority ſeemed deſperate. The

A The fire of this reuolt had kindled the heart and all the corners of the Realme: and generally there was nothing but inroads, ſpoiles, ſurprizing and ſacking: when as ſuddenly many checks amaze the League, and giue hope of a ſpeedie reuiuing of the Kings affaires. The Duke of Montpenſier, aſſiſted by the Lords of Hallot, Creuecoeur, Bacqueville, and Lar- chant was in Normandy, with forces for his Maieſties ſeruiſe: and for the firſt fruites, ha- uing defeated the garrifon of Falaiſe, taken three Captaines, cut moſt of their companies in peeces, and diſperſed the reſt, they beſieged the towne, and had brought it ready to yeeld, when as the Earle of Briſſac (who of late did wonders in ſpeaking well at the Eſtates in the Kings fauour) aduanced with about three hundred Gentlemen, and five or ſixe thouſand of them. They lodged in three villages: the Duke forceth two, kills ſuch as make reſiſtance, and chafeſt the reſt with ſmall difficulty. The Earle flies with all his horſe, leauing a thouſand or twelue hundred priſoners, and about three thouſand ſlaine vpon the place, amongst the which were found many Gentlemen.

After this attempt of the Duke of Mayenne, in the ſuburbs of Tours, the King ſends the Lord of Lorges to diſcouer the enemy: the Duke of Aumale hath intelligence thereof, and ſends ſome troupes to charge him. The Lord of Chaſtillon paſſeth at Boiſgencie with two hundred horſe, and as many harguebuziers to ſecond Lorges, and cauſeth Fouque- uille, who commanded in Chartres. He offers to diſcouer them, they charge him, and kill five or ſixe of his men: he retires in haſt, and giues the alarme to the troupes of Picardy, led by Saueſe and Les Broſſes, who commanded about three hundred maſters, and a good number of Harguebuziers on horſe-backe, and on foot. The two Commanders, Chaſtillon and Saueſe are in front one againſt an other. No man makes ſhew to recoyle, and both reſolute to fight. Saueſe puts his Harguebuziers before, and placeth his Lanciers in bay, approaching ſoftly without diſbanding. Chaſtillon diſpoſeth of his foot, makes two battalions of his horſe, and ſets Charboniere and Harambure on his left hand, with their companies of light horſes, and then, he aduanceth to the charge. Saueſe chargeth reſolutely. His Harguebuziers on horſe-back very nere. Chaſtillions footmen receiue them in the like ſort, and with one breath enter amongst the horſe that were come to the charge: they kill many horſes with their ſwords, and looſe but three ſouldiers. Saueſe chargeth the light horſemen vpon his right-hand, and breaking the firſt ranks, had vnhorſed Chaſtillon, and ſome eight or tenne Gentlemen, but with the loſſe of five and twenty horſe; as theſe ſle and fight on foote, Harambure and Fouquerelles comes in: they charge Saueſe and his men, kill about ſixe ſcore Gentlemen, ouerthrow the reſt, and force through them. Thus broken, without meanes to make a new head, euery man flies, euery one placeth his ſafetie in the heeles of his horſe. Chaſtillon goes to horſe-backe, and purſues, chaſing, beating, and killing about three ſcore more in the flight, with all their Harguebuziers. Two Cornets were gotten, and fortie Gentlemen taken, moſt beeing hurt in the conflict. Saueſe carried to Boiſgencie, died there of his wounds, not able to bee perſwaded by any meanes to acknowledge the King, or ſcarce to aſke God forgiueneſſe.

Senlis had of late daies, by the meanes of ſome good Inhabitants, ſhaken off the yoke of the League. It was a troubleſome thorne in the Pariſiens ſide, being diſtant but one ſmal daies journey to come from their city towards Picardy. To pull it out, the Duke of Aumale goes from Paris, with ſome troupes of Balagny, Chamois, Trémont, Congis, Menneville, and an army of the Inhabitants choſen out of euery quarter: he beſiegeth, batters it, and makes a breach, but is repulſed from the aſſault.

Now they aduiſe the beſieged to prouide for their ſafeties: when as the Duke of Longueuille appeared, being followed by the Lords of Humieres, Bonnivet, la Noue, Girry, and other Commanders, the duke of Aumale turnes head, and prepares to fight: but La Noue (whom the King had eſpecially commanded to aſſiſt the duke of Longueuille with counſell in matters of warre) did ſo wiſely make choiſe of the houre and opportunity to charge, as the duke of Aumale, Balagny gouernour of Cambray, and the reſt (putting in praſtiſe the uſe of their long ſpurre-rowels, lately inuented as a mournfull prediction to the League) ſaued

1589. knowledge which he had of his wife. The King being aduertized by La Guesle, commands A he should be brought the next day, but hee is examined first by Portail vpon his pretended acquaintance with his wife, to whom hee answered pertinently, and gaue good obseruations. The next day being come to the Kings lodging; they were called by du Ioralle the first Groome of his Chamber. At the first La Guesle caused the Iacobin to stay neere the doore, and taking his papers he presents them to his Maiefty, who hauing red them, commands the Iacobin should approach, whom he asked what he would say, to whom he answered that it was a secret thing. Some distrust made La Guesle to speake, being betwixt the King and him. Speake aloud (said he twice or thrice) there is not any one here but the King trusts. His Maiefty seeing him make difficulty to speake, commands him againe to B approach. The Baron of Bellegarde, maister of the Kings horse, and La Guesle (who were alone in the Chamber) retired two or three paces. The King bends his eare, but instead of hearing what he expected, this wretch draws a knife out of his sleue made of purpose, thrusts his Maiefty into the botome of the belly, and there leaues the knife in the wound. The King draws it forth, and with some struiuing of the Monke, strikes him about the eye. Many ran in at this noise, & in the heate of choller killing this monster of men, preuented the true discovery of this enterprife, and the authors thereof, worthy to be noted with a perpetual blot of disloyalty and treason. The Physitians held the wound curable: and the same day the King did write of this attempt, and of his hope of recouery, to the gouernors of Prouinces, C to forraigne Princes, and to his friends and confederates. But feeling that the King of Kings had otherwise determined of his life, he did first comfort himselfe, in fore-seeing that the last hour of his crosses should be the first of his felicities: then lamenting his good and faithful seruants, who suruiuing should find no respect with those whose mindes had bene so abandoned to mischief, as neither the feare of God, nor the dignity of his person could dissuade them from this horrible sacrilege. One thing (said hee) doth comfort me, that I read, in your faces, with the griefe of your hearts, and the sorrow of your soules, a goodly D and commendable resolution, to continue vnited for the preferuation of that which remaines whole of my Estate, and the reuenge which you owe vnto the memory of him who hath loued you so deere. I seeke the last curiously, leauing the punishment of my enemies vnto God. I haue learned in his schoole to forgiue them; as I doe with al my heart. But as I am chiefly bound to procure peace, and rest vnto this realme, I coniure you al, by that inuiolable faith which you owe vnto your country, that you continue firme and constant defenders of the common liberty, and that you neuer lay down armes, vntil you haue purged the Realme of the troublers of the publike quiet. And, forasmuch as diuision alone, vndermines the foundations of this Monarchy, resolue to be vnited in one will. I know, and I dare assure you, that the King of Nauarre my brother-in-law, the lawfull successor to this crowne, is sufficiently instructed in the lawes, to know how to raigne well, and to command E reasonable things: and I hope, you are not ignorant of the iust obedience you owe vnto him. Referre the difference of religion to the conuocation of the Estates of the Realme, and learne of me; that piety is a duty of man vnto God, ouer which worldly force hath no power. Thus spake Henry, euen as the last pangs of death carried him within few hours after from this vnto an other world: but (a notable circumstance) in the same Chamber where the counsell was held on that fatall day of Saint Bartholmew, in the yeere 1572. By his death he extinguished the second parcell of the third race of Capets, in the branch of Valois, leauing the crowne to the third Roiall branch of Bourbons, wherevnto the order of the fundamentall law did lawfully call him.

His manners. A mild and tractable Prince, courteous, witty, eloquent and graue, but of easie access, deuout, louing learning, aduancing good wits, a bountifull rewarder of men of merit, desirous to reforme the abuses of his Officers, a friend to peace, and capable of counsell, but weak and yeelding in aduersities, & by that means making his enemies ouer-bould in their ambitious designs. Finally a Prince who deserued to be placed amongst the worthiest of this Monarchy, if voluptuousnesse, luxury and excessive prodigality to some of his fauorites (the which might without enuy haue bene diuided amongst many men of honour,) had not made him negligent and carelesse of the politike government of his Estate, and so blemished the goodliest graces which nature had planted in his soule.

HENRY the fourth, before King of Nauarre, the first of the third Royall branch of the Bourbons 63. French King.

Behold the Theater of mans life: diuers passions appeare in diuers acts, hatred, rebellion, infidelity, treason, and fury shall play a long and Tragick rowle in many scenes. But as our new successor hath eaten the bitter rootes in his youth, so in his age he shall reape the sweet fruits of vertue, being honored, feared, and respected both of his owne subiects and strangers. God gouernes the being of this world by course and temper of diuers seasons. Men reape not before they haue sowed, neither doe they sow before they haue laboured. Thus he gouernes the society of mankind by certaine degrees; that man may know, that he deserues not the sweet, that hath not tasted of the sowre: & that the force of his wit can no way aduance the happy successe of his Estate, without the helpe and grace of that great Gardien, who by miraculous meanes preferres Estates from apparent ruine.

This reigne hath two parcells. The beginning is painefull, full of crosses, and confused: vntill that our Henry (solemnly installed) be acknowledged lawfull King by all his subiects: for till then, the most impudent and passionate, called him the Bearnois in disdain: others more modest, left him his first title of King of Nauarre, or at the least, of Prince of Bearne. But the successe will teach vs, that euen now the Lord would succour this Monarchy, and in despite of all the violent oppositions of man, make our King to triumph over all domesticall and forraigne insolencies, which had disallowed him for the lawfull successor, and almost dispossessed him of his Realme.

Doubtlesse, we must confesse without flattery, that France had need of this Prince, to roore out (like another French Hercules) those hideous monsters which made it horrible and fearefull to her owne children: to restore the French to the greatnesse of their reputation, and this crowne to her former beauty. It is of him that the Princes of our age, and of future

A future ages shall learne to be Capitaines. He himselfe alone hath made more war, then all they haue scene together. Let vs also obserue a great conformity of his raigne, with that of David, in afflictions and blessings, and wishing that God would make him equall in the zeale of pietie and iustice, (the chiefe and firmest pillars of a Royalty) let vs hope, that with a holy ambition, (besing borne a King) he will shew himselfe: and that hee might long raigne happily, to the glorie of God, the good of his subiects, and the health of his owne soule.

But let vs see, by what degrees the fundamentall law of this estate calls him to this Monarchy. Lewis surnamed Saint, 44. French King, had many sonnes. Philip his successor surnamed the Hardy, Peter Earle of Alançon, Robert also Earle of Alançon by the death of Peter, and Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauuaisin: the first and last haue left issue: the two others died without heires, and before their father. Philip hath left by order successiue in direct line masculine and lawfull, or collateral from the nearest to the nearest kinne, all our Kings which haue continued in the third royall race; euen vnto Henry the third King of France and of Poland: by whose death (the name and family of Valois being extinct) the law seekes to the line of Robert Earle of Clermont in Beauuaisin, and finds not any one nearer then the house of Vendosme, whereof our Henry was the sole and lawfull heire-male, as descending in the direct masculine and lawfull line from the said Robert. For Robert had by Beatrix the onely daughter and heire of Archibauld Earle of Bourbon, Lewis, whose lands were erected to a Duchy in the yeare 1329. Lewis Duke of Bourbon, and Mary the daughter of John the 18. Earle of Hainault, had Peter Duke of Bourbon, and James Earle of Ponthieu, Constable of France. Peter had by Isabel the daughter of Charles Earle of Valois, Lewis and James. Lewis surnamed the Good Duke of Bourbon, had by Anne Countesse of Auvergne, Lewis Earle of Clermont, who died without children, John and James. John duke of Bourbon had by Bonne Duchesse of Auvergne and Countesse of Montpensier, Charles, and Lewis Earle of Montpensier, father to Gilbert, of whom issued Charles the last Duke of Bourbon. Charles Duke of Bourbon had of Agnes the daughter of John Duke of Bourgonne, John and Peter. John the second of that name, married Joane of France, daughter to Charles the seuenth, and dying without lawfull heires of his body, the name and armes of Duke, went to Peter his younger brother. Peter the second of that name, Duke of Bourbon had of Anne of France the daughter of Lewis the eleuenth, one onely daughter, Susanne the generall heire of Bourbon, who was wife to the aboue-named Charles, the youngest sonne of Lewis aboue-named Earle of Montpensier, and brother to Charles Duke of Bourbon. But no children growing from this marriage, the branch of the eldest sonne of Lewis created Duke of Bourbon, ended in this Charles Duke of Bourbon, and Constable of France, who died at the siege of Rome, and the Duchie of Bourbonnois being incorporate to the Crown, we must seeke the line of James of Ponthieu (they also giue him the titles of Earle of Charolois and La Marche) Constable of France, the youngest sonne of Lewis the first Duke of Bourbon. James had by Joane the daughter of the Earle of S. Paul, John his successour Earle of La Marche. John had of Katherine the onely daughter and heire of John Earle of Vendosme, issued from the Dukes of Normandy, and Earles of Aniou, James King of Naples, who leauing none but daughters, transported his right of inheritance to Lewis his youngest brother. Lewis had no children by Jane of Rouilly his first wife, the daughter of Ralf Earle of Montfort, and of Anne of Montmorency, but of Jane the daughter of Guy Lord of Guare, and of Anne heire of Lanall and Vitry in Brittany, or of Mary the daughter of Engerard, Lord of Coucy and of Isabel his wife, the daughter of Edward King of England, according to some opinions. By his second marriage, he had John his successor, and Earle of Vendosme the second of that name. John the second had of Jane of Beaujeu (or of Isabel of Beauuais, daughter to the Lord of Pressigni) Francis his successour, and Earle of Vendosme, and Lewis Prince of La Roche-sur-yonne, who of Louise of Bourbon the daughter of Gilbert of Bourbon, and sister to Charles last Duke of Bourbon, left Lewis of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier, who was father to Francis of Bourbon Duke of Montpensier, which was father to Henry the last Duke of Montpensier, Prince Soueraigne of Dombes, Daulphin of Auvergne, Lieutenant generall for the King in Normandy, and husband to Katherine Henriette of Ioyeuze, (a Prince whose vertues France did admire) to Francis were borne, by Mary of Luxembourg, 1589. Luxembourg, Countesse of Saint Paul, and daughter to Peter of Luxembourg; Charles A Earle, but created Duke of Vendosme by King Francis the first: Francis Earle of Saint Paul, (who by Adrian Duchesse of Estouteville had Francis, who died young) Lewis Cardinall of Bourbon, Autoyette wife to Claude of Lorraine Duke of Guise, Louise Abbess of Font-Eureaux. Charles the first, Duke of Vendosme, had by Francis, or according to some others, by Louise the daughter of René Duke of Alençon, Lewis who died at the age of seuen yeares, Anthony who succeeded in his right, and was afterwards King of Nauarre, Francis Earle of Anghien famous for that great battell of Cerifolles, and flaine by chance, at la Roche-Guion, Charles Cardinall, Arch-bishop of Rouan, John, who died at the battell of Saint Quintin, and Lewis Prince of Conde, who made another stocke of the elder Princes of Bourbon. Anthony had by Joane of Albret Queene of Nauarre (daughter to Henry the second of that name King of Nauarre, and by Marguerit of Orleans sister to Francis the first of that name King of France) Henry the fourth of that name French King, by his fathers right, and the second of that name King of Nauarre by his mother. B

The amazement was great in the Kings army, and mens hearts extremely danted with sorrow and griefe, when as our Henry was by the common consent of the army, and as the necessitie of the time and place did suffer, publicly proclaimed King. Some resolved to retire as neuters, to see how the chance of armes would fall: others aspired to change their partie, and made a scruple to follow a King of another Religion. A scruple which neuer entered into the minds of our first Christians, who fought against the forraigne enemies, vnder the ensignes of Clouis, and other Pagan Kings. The Duke of Espernon retired himselfe: many troupes followed his example: few continued firme and constant to reuenge the outrage whereunto the deceased Kings last words had so kindly inuited them, and whereunto euerie French-man ought to haue an especiall regard. C

At Paris there was nothing but ioy and mirth, bone-fires, songs, feasts, masks, pastimes, and cursing the memorie of the King. The wicked Monkes picture was suddenly made, hee was canonized as a new Martyr, and deliuerer of the Church from the oppressions of a tyrant: all that were allyed vnto him, were enriched with almes and publicke contributions: that by this bayte others might attempt the like against the King that succeeded. The Duke of Mayenne (not daring to take vpon him the title of King) caused it by publicke proclamation to be giuen to Charles Cardinall of Bourbon, then a prisoner: and coyned both gold and siluer, with the picture of King Charles the 10. And disguising the vsurpation of his authoritie, he accepted the title which the generall Councell of the Vnion gaue him, of Lieutenant General of the State, and Crowne of France. An absurd title, strange and ridiculous; for a Lieutenant is he which holds the place for another, who (by his absence or other let) can not performe the function of his person. But who can maintaine, that a man may be Lieutenant to an Estate, to a Crown, to a thing without a soule? It is against the rules of Grammar, and against the termes of State, who giue the titles of Regent, and of Lieutenant General for the King, and to tolerate that of Lieutenant in the Estate and Crowne of France. This was properly to conceiue mountaines, and to bring forth a ridiculous moule. D

The Kings declaration.

On the other side, the King seeing the diminution of his forces, testifies his intention by a publicke declaration to the Princes and Noblemen of the army; he assembles the chiefe of the Nobility: he lets them vnderstand the deceased Kings will touching religion, by a generall or nationall Councell, whereof he protests to follow the instruction. I giue leaue, said he, to all such as would leaue me, so to do: yet I am forrie they are no better French-men, for their owne good and safetie. I haue friends enough without them to maintaine my authority. God hath neuer left me, and will not now abandon me. He hath not begun his so miraculous a worke, to leaue it vnperfect: not for my sake alone, but for his owne names sake: and for so many soules afflicted in this realm, whom I desire and promise by the faith of a King, to releue, so soone as God shal giue me the means. But how grievous is this to me, that am your lawfull King, and who leaues you in the liberty of your religion, to see you go about to force me to yours by vnlawfull means, and without former instruction. E

This declaration retained them that were least scrupulous in their duties: and his promise not to alter any thing in religion, might haue shaken many of the League. To crosse him, the Duke of Mayenne publisheth an Ediēt of the 7. of August, in his name & the Councells, of

A of the holy Vnion established at Paris, attending a generall Assembly of the Estates of the Realme, to vnitte (said he) all French-men that were good Christians, for the defence and preferuation of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church, and the maintenance of the royall Estate, in the absence of their lawfull King, Charles the tenth of that name. For whose liberty, he inuited them all to armes. But he desired no more the liberty of his pretended King, then our Henry did to force Religion, the support whereof serues them for a goodly cloake.

Some Parliaments grow iealous of these sodaine changes in the State, and seeme to entertaine the people in doubt and feare of the subuersion of their religion. That of Bourdeaux commands all men vnder their Iurisdiction, by a decree of the 19. of August, to obserue inuiolably the Ediēt of Vnion to the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Church: and declarations were thereupon made. That of Tholoua is more violent. They decree, that yearly the first day of August, they should make processions and publike prayers, for the benefits they had receiued that day, in the miraculous and fearefull death of Henry the third, whereby Paris was deliuered, and other townes of the Realme: forbidding all persons to acknowledge Henry of Bourbon the pretended King of Nauarre, for King: declaring him incapable euer to succeed to the Crowne of France, by reason (said the decree) of the notorious and manifest crimes contained at large in the bull of Excommunication of Pope Sixtus the fifth. Without doubt the authoritie of the Soueraigne court, is much blemished in pronouncing a decree which they must reuoke by a contrarie sentence. Thus the league kindled anew the fires which the siege of Paris had some-what quenched: the Kings troupes decreased hourly, sicknesse diminished their numbers and the Duke of Mayennes increased. The King therefore diuides his armie into three: one vnder the command of the Duke of Longueuille into Picardy: the other into Champagne vnder the Marshall d'Aumont: and he is aduised to passe himselfe into Normandy, with twelue hundred horse, three thousand French foote, and two regiments of Suisses, as well to receiue succours out of England, as to assure some places and passages fit for his desseignes, but with direction to ioyne at need. In his passage, he causeth the Kings bodie to be conducted and left at Compiègne, & reduneth to his obedience, Meulan, Gisors, and Clermont: hee receiues from Capitaine Roulet both the place and the hearts of the Inhabitants of Pont de l'Arche, foure leagues from Rouan, a passage very commodious for the trafficke betwixt Rouan and Paris. He visits Deepe: confirms the towne of Caen, forceth Neufchastel to yeeld, hauing (by Hallots and Guirry his Lieutenants) overcome the succours that were sent thither, and slaine seuen or eight hundred men vpon the place.

Violent decrees.

His conquests.

All these surprises could not draw the Duke of Mayenne out of the walles of Paris. But when as he sees the King lodged at Dernetal, a league from Rouan, and the towne of Eu vpon Bethune brought to his obedience: at the instant request of the Duke of Aumale, and the Earle of Brissac commanding within Rouan, he goes to field, with about three thousand horse and fiftene thousand foot, French, Germains, Italians, Flemings and Spaniards. He promiseth the Parisiens to pursue, beseege, take and bring the Bearnois prisoner, and makes them already by supposition to hire shops and windowes in Saint Anthones street, to see him passe in chaines vnto the Bastile. He passeth the riuer of Seine with this mighty army, and recouers Gournay (beeing lately taken by the Duke of Longueuille) Neufchastell and Eu, and then he aduanceth to stay the course of the Kings prosperitie, who triumphed in Normandie.

This proceeding made the King imagine, they should not part without blowes, and full of that generositie, constancy, and ready resolution which he did alwaies carrie in accidents which did seeme dangerous, sends for his Lieutenants, the Duke of Longueuille, and the Marshall d'Aumont, to approach, for that he foreses a dangerous fit in the Estate which was very sicke. The King parts from Deepe, and marcheth towards the Duke: he lodgeth at Arques, three miles from thence, betwixt two hills diuided by the riuer of Bethune: at the foot of the one is the village, and the castell which commandeth it. He viewes the situation, and finds it fit to receiue the enemy. And not to loose the aduantage which time or industrie might giue him, he casts vp a trench of seuen or eight foot deepe on the top of one of the hills: raiseth the defences, furnissheth it with arillerie, and foure companies of Suisses: provides 1589. guides for the safety of the village, casts vp trenches vpon the weakest places of approach: and a thousand paces off neere to the riuers side where the enemies shold passe, he lodgeth eight hundred French harguebuziers in an hospitall, to cut off the enemies passage. The Duke (whose army was now about thirty thousand men) chooseth rather to leaue the shortest way, then to fight for this passage: and passing the riuier about, hee incampes on the other hill right against Arques, and three daies after, the 16. of September, marcheth against the Pollet, a suburbe of Diepe, where the Lord of Chastillon did fortifie, leauing some number of horse, and troupes of foot to guard his hill and lodging of Martinglife.

There is no such policie as to strike first, and to charge the enemy while he consults, being irresolute whether he shall fight or retire. The King knowes it well: his owne experience hath often tryed it. He therefore sends to view this army, to discouer their forces, and to obserue their countenance. He leaues the Marshall of Biron to command at Arques, and lodgeth in a mill, which they had intrenched vpon the approach to this suburbe. There they make a furious skirmish. But the Leaguers hauing lost nine or ten Capitaines, and a great number of their most resolute souldiers, they had no will to proceed. They leaue the place, and lodge at the nearest village to the suburbes of Diepe: an open place, without defence or houses. So many discommodities were scarce tolerable. Chastillon also dislodged them soone, and made them to seeke another quarter.

On the other side, the corps-de-gard (lodged in the guest-house) would not suffer the enemy which kept both the hill and the lodging, to approach neere the riuier side. Being impatient then to haue such vigilant neighbours, they resolute to charge this corps-de-gard, and to become masters of either banke, that they might approach more freely to the trenches at Arques. The Marshall sees them come, and drawing them on by light skirmishes, makes them beleue they shall haue the better: but suddenly with a furious charge hee scatters them, some here, some there: and many seeking to saue themselves from the fight drowne in the riuier. So this army is charged in three places at one instant: at the mill by the King: at Martinglife by Biron, and at the Pollet by Chastillon. These first amazements whet their corages. They are daunted for this first checke. Battailes are variable, and it may bee, a second attempt will giue them a more happy successe. Being thus resolute, the Duke leaues that great desseigne he had vpon Diepe, and propounds to set vpon the guest-house. Three or foure volleys of our Cannon (said he) will beat it downe. They shot, but prenaile nothing: and seeing their attempts vaine, they leaue force to flie to surprizes.

The 21. of September they passe the water in the night, without drum, without trumpet, and without light, they put themselves in battaile, and meane at the breake of day to worke some great effect. But they haue a vigilant enemy, who will see all, know all, and do all: the King causeth a long trench to be drawne from the toppe of his hill vnto the guest-house, and mans it with foure companies of Suisses and Lansquenets, and some French, supported by the Earle of Auvergne, (who in this warre gaue braue and singular proofes of his valour) commanding three companies of light-horse, and three other companies of men at armes, seconded also by the companies of the Princes of Condé, and Conty, and on the toppe of E the trench he placeth the Marshall of Biron with the companies of Chastillon, and of Malig-ny, (afterwards Vidam of Chartres) and a good number of the Nobility.

All these companies march by the fauours of the Canon (which played from the castell to their aduantage) and charge the Duke of Mayennes corner, ouerthrowes Sagonne with some horsemens, dead vpon the place, and disperse the rest. But a new supply forceth them to retire. The Suisses of Colonel Galatti stay their violence. The Lansquenets of the league (degenerating from the ancient constancie of the Germaines) approach neere the trench, but seeing themselves weake, and engaged with the hazard of their liues, they make offer to yeeld vnto the King. Those within the trench giue them their hands to receiue them. The King seeing them ioyned with his men, runs to charge them, not knowing they had called F vpon his name. But seeing his Maiestie, they yeeld themselves, and lay downe their weapons. Hee receiues them, and assures them of the pay they had gotten in fighting against him. Seeing themselves freed from danger, and the King, Biron and the other troupes of horse, fighting here and there, and that the bodie of the Dukes horse aduanced to charge the Suisses, they turne their armes against them which had newly given them life: they charge

Notable exploits at Arques against the League.

The first charge in three places

The 2 charge

Treacherie of the Lansquenets of the League.

A charge the Marshall of Biron's troupe, make them abandon the trench: become masters and commanders thereof, spoile all the Kings souldiers, take the Ensignes of his Maiesties Suisses and Lansquenets, and deliuer this trench vnto the Leaguers: but they shall not long enjoy it.

For the King seeing that the treacherie of these villaines had made the issue of the combat doubtfull, (seconded by the Duke of Montpensier and his Cornet, and releued with five hundred shot led by the Lord of Chastillon) hee comes furiously to charge, imbrues his sword with the blood of many of them, takes many prisoners, driues them out of the trench and presently plants two Canons there, which shot into the battalions of the enemies Suisses that made the retreat, and strikes such a terror among them, as in short time all leaue B him the place of battaile, being couered with the carcasses of his rebels.

Doubtlesse this spittle-house should be honoured with an eternal triumph. It is the place where they thought haue driuen the King into an extremitie, either to suffer himselfe to be taken at Diepe, or to seeke his safety beyond the seas. It is the place where the veins of the League being opened, they poured forth streames of that blood and vigour which maintained their first iolity. It is the place where five hundred horse, twelue hundred French foote, and two thousand Suisses, had, as it were, prodigiously triumphed ouer thirty thousand men, who with a Gyant-like brauerie, boasted to bring either dead, or bound hands and feete, the greatest King, the greatest Captaine of the world, who like a lightning finding nothing that might withstand the furie of his victorious armes, dispersed and suppressed with the point of his sword, the presumptuous and rash attempts of his mutinous subjects. The Earle of Belin (one of their Marshals of the field) was taken prisoner: many souldiers, but a greater number of men at armes: many Gentlemen, and more Commanders serued as a prey to the birds of the ayre, and the beasts of the fields. The King lost the Earle of Roussy, fixe or seuen Gentlemen, and some souldiers.

Some few daies after, the King doubting (his troupes being but small) might be beaten from their lodging at Arques, he abandoned that quarter, and lodged them neere vnto Diepe vnder the fauour of the Castle. The Duke of Mayenne finding that lodging abandoned, passeth with his whole army vnto the other side of the towne, within halfe a mile: hee plants fixe Cannons, and about mid-night shootes into the port of the towne, to keepe them from issuing forth. The King vpon this alarme, cast vp a trauers before the port, to blind their sight, and sends speedily into England, to hasten the forces which hee expected from the Queene, the which were 4000. men, vnder the command of the Lord Willoughby. But some few dayes after (these troupes being ready to land) the Duke of Mayenne (seeing all his attempts prooue vaine) dislodgeth, and thinkes he hath done much for his reputation, if (by some volley of Canon against Diepe, where the King was, and then against Arques) he publisheth throughout all France, that he is master of those townes without entering. In the end, toiled with the Kings continuall skirmishes, and toucht with apprehension at the first newes, hee hearing of the Earle of Soissons approach, (who had cunningly escaped out of prison) of the Duke of Longueuils, and the Marshall D'Aumonts with their troupes, he went to seeke his safety beyond the riuier of Somme. To assure (said he) those places which by the treaty of Arras he was to deliuer vnto the Spaniard, and then returning to Paris, did nothing memorabile, but established his Councell of sixteene, and forty, the which afterwards he reuoked and disannulled all he could, as we shall see in the course of the History. In the meane time (to busie the Parisiens) those three Ensignes which the trecherous Lansquenets had by a traiterous stratageme stolne in the trenches, brought forth twenty other counterfeits, which the Dowager of Montpensier, sister to the Duke of Mayenne, caused to be made at Paris in the Lombards street. This was a patterne of the subtil deuises of that woman, who euery morning suborning some new post, made him to go forth at one gate, and to enter at another, as bringing still some aduertisement of happy successe, which he sent vnto the Curats to deliuer in their Sermons. And by these politike stratagems, intreated the people in their disorder, and fleeced the purses of the most credulous.

The Dukes retreat made the King suspect that he retired for an aduantage, and that marching to defeat the supplies that came vnto him, he would returne, putt vp with greater courage, and new hopes. His Maiestie therefore leaues the Marshall of Biron at Diepe with 1589. the armie, and resolues to goe meete the Earle and the rest with foure hundred horse. Being A ioyned, he takes the Towne and Castell of Gamache, and recouers the Towne of Eu. This bayte might haue drawne the Duke; but he found his abode in Picardie more safe, and La Fere which he deliuered into the Strangers and enemies hands, made him continue the intelligence he had with the Duke of Parma, whereof we shall shortly see strange effects. So the King returning to Diepe, prouided for the affaires of Normandie, leauing the Duke of Montpensier there, (with the forces he had brought) for his Lieutenent generall: he received from the Queene of England foure thousand men, money, and munition belonging vnto warre.

With this supply his Maiestie parts the 12. of October, and alwaies coasting the enemy, comes to passe the riuer of Seine at Meulan, and marcheth directly to Paris, with a double desseigne, either to fight, or at the least to draw the Duke out of Picardie. The last of October he arriues about Paris, and diuides his troupes into three battalions. The first had foure thousand English, two regiments of French, and one of the Swisses, vnder the command of the Marshall of Biron, for the suburbs of Saint Victor, and Saint Marcell. The second was of ten Regiments of French, and strangers committed to the Marshall of Montmorency, for Saint James and Saint Michel. The third, ten regiments of French, one of Lanquenets, and one of Swisses, commanded by Chastillon and La Noue; for Saint Germaine, Bussy, and Nefle. He giues to either of these troupes a good number of Gentlemen on foot well armed, to support the foot-men, in case of resistance: and behind either of them two Canons and 2. culuerins. The King commanded the one, the Count Saiffons, and the Duke of Longueuille the other. He cauleth the trenches and ramparts without the towne to bee viewed, and the next day by the Sunne rising, he sets vpon them, and forceth them in lesse then an houre: seven or eight hundred souldiers slaine in the streets; thirteene peeces of Cannon carried away, fourteene Ensignes taken, and much spoile gotten; did verifie the saying: That all comes to one end to him that can attend. Here Chastillon did not forget to inuite his friends to reuenge the blood so vnworthily spilt at those bloody Parisien mayns, but by the effusion of his blood, who now suffers for others.

At this new and sudden terror of the Parisiens, the Duke of Mayenne posts to the city with the greatest part of the army. His Maiestie (to see if he would sally forth) presents himselfe the second and third day following, in the suburbs, and without the suburbs, in view of the Cittie, and then afterwards towards Linas vnder Montleheri: but all was in vaine. Thus beeing content to haue taught the Parisiens, that he wanted no meanes to punish them, but desired rather to reduce them to obedience by mildnesse, the King went and tooke the Towne and Castell of Estampes, where Clermont of Lodesue, with about three-score Gentlemen or more, had shut vp himselfe vpon the Duke of Mayennes word, to vngage him with all the rest of his army.

Heere the Queene Dowager sent a petition to his Maiestie, beseeching him to do iustice of that cruell and execrable murder committed on the person of the deceased King her husband. The King sent this petition to the Court of Parliament, remooued to Tours, to the end that his Maiesties Proctour generall requiring it, they should frame indictments against such as were held culpable, protesting neither to spare care nor force, to take that iust reuenge which reason and his dutie required. Doubtlesse the horror of this sacrilege had so wonderfully mooued some of the officers of the Court, as, if they had beene beleued, the Order of the Jacobins had by decree beene rooted out of France, their Couent at Paris pulled downe, and a pillar set vp as a perpetuall monument, and the hangmen of France should haue beene afterwards attired like Jacobins. The Queene Dowager hath long pursued the rooting out of them. But the memorie of Ancestours is venerable, and their Sepulchers religious. Seuentene Princes and Princesses of the house of Bourbon, buried in the Monasterie of the Jacobins at Paris, haue chiefly preserved and kept the Order and their Couents.

The Kings new conquests

The King seeing that by no meanes he could draw forth his enemies, he sends backe the Duke of Longueuille and La Noue, to refresh themselves with their forces in Picardy, Giurinto into Brie, and passing farther into Beaulle, takes Ianuille by composition, then from Chasteaudun he sends to inuest Vendosme, his ancient patrimony. Maillé Benchard commanded about

A about foure hundred men of garrison, and eight hundred Townesmen armed against their Soueraigne and lawfull Lord. The Artillerie had no sooner made a hoale of foure paces wide, but the Souldiers impatient flie to the assault, takes the Castle, and so enters the Towne pell-mell with the garrison, so as his Maiestie seeing himselfe in lesse then halfe an houre in possession both of Towne and Castle, he gaue the inhabitants their liues, but the Souldiers the spoile.

The treacherous part of Benchard to the great Council, (as we haue said,) with the treachery of a vassall and subiect, and the seditious preachings of Iesse the Friar, were the cause that these two principall motiues of rebellion suffered for the people: the one beheaded vpon the pavement, and the other hanged. Lauerdin, Montmorency, and Chastillon became wife by the example of Vendosme, and opened their gates to the Marshall of Biron, who entered into the Towne with all his companie very peaceably.

The King seeing himselfe nere vnto Tours, goes thither: the people receiue him, the 21. of the moneth with an admirable shew of ioy, he giuing the same day audience to the Ambassador of Venice, who in the name of the Seigneury, congratulates his Maiesties happy comming to the crowne, with offer of seruice and loue to the King, and crowne of France. Beaulle, Dunois, and Vendosme, beeing subdued, the Kings army marcheith into Maine: the Earle of Brissac vnderooke to succour Mans, which the King threatned: to that intent he aduanceth with two regiments, and some horse to la Ferté Bernard: but terrified with the noyse of the Canon, he returnes, and contenting himselfe with a pillage of forty horse, and some baggage of his Maiesties Reistres which he met by chance, he proclaimes his victories at Paris. Bois-Dauphin commanded in Mans, accompanied with a hundred Gentlemen, and twentie Enseignes on foote, who in thew would die with their armes in their hands, rather then suffer the King to enter. But must they cause the people to spend a hundred and fiftie thousand Crownes to fortifie the Towne and suburbs, burne so many houses without the Towne, to yeeld it at the thirde voley of the cannon? Learne oh yee people! that great men play with you, as with a tenise ball: and be not wedded to any other party, but that of your Souereigne and lawfull Prince. You run rashly into a bad action: they fortifie you at your own charge, and you are the meanes to vndermine your selues.

D The taking hereof, caused the Castles of Beaumont and Fouteuoyes to yeeld, with the Townes of Sable, Laual, Chasteaugonthier, Mayenne, Alanson, Falaise and many others in the Prouinces of Touraine, Aniou, Mayne, Perche, and Normandy. So as in lesse then two moneths, his maiestie marched with his army (furnished with many cannons, and a great number of Strangers, English, Swisses, and Germans) about eight score leagues, haue achieved many memorable seeges, taken fourteene or fiftene good townes, assured many Prouinces: and in all places as he passed, He came, he saw, and ouercame. Thus our Conquerour made the round of a third part of his Realme, not finding any let to stay the course of his prosperities: when as the Court of Parlement at Rouan, no lesse violent and presumptuous then that of Tholoufa, pronounceth them guilty of treason both against God and E man, and the Estate and crowne of France, that had opposed themselves against the holy vniou: and all Royallists and their successors deprivied of all prerogatiues of Nobility, their offices to be void, and not to be recouered: them as vnworthy to possesse any offices, benefices, or dignities, and all their goods forfeited. These armes were too weake to terrifie his maiesties seruants: this decree did little aduance the League. And the Duke of Mayenne (seeing the King farre off, partly through shame, partly through despaire, and importuned by the Parisiens) was constrained to pacifie their exclamations by some great exploit. But the taking of Bois de Vincennes and Pontoise ended all his Conquests.

An vnjust and treacherous decree.

So many new triumphs did wonderfully amaze the Leaguers: the people grew weary with the burthen of imposts, the spoile of souldiers, and a thousand calamities that did oppress them. To maintaine them in the gulfes of this confusion, the mutinous and corrupt tongues of the Preachers charmed the blind with an impression of many intelligences both within and without the Realme, by the hope of a speedy & great succor from Spaine, by the publication of many libells, which they most furiously vied as fire-brandes to feede this combustion, and by counterfeit deuises they made the Kings name and his actions very hatefull vnto the multitude.

The King in the meane time, continued the course of his victories in base Normandie, A where hauing taken Honfleur a Port towne, he came and raised the sege of Meulan, where the Duke of Mayenne had lien fifteene daies, beeing distant from Honfleur about thirtie Leagues, where he offered him battell. The aduantage (beeing twice as many in number as the King) could not draw him to it. The memorie of Arques was yet too fresh, and the supply of fifteene hundred Lances, and fure hundred harguebuziers which the Duke of Parma sent him, vnder the command of the Count Egmont, made him forbear. Whilest the duke goes to ioine with his strangers, the King takes Nonancourt, and then beseegeth Dreux.

Siege of Dreux.

In the beginning of March the Duke turnes head towards Manté, to passe the riuier eight B Leagues from Dreux. His Maiefty hath intelligence thereof, and giues him leaue to approach within two leagues. To giue and winne a battaile is indifferent vnto him. He causeth his armie to march towards Nonancourt, to view the foard of the riuier of Eure, which runnes there: he himselfe treades out the place of battaile: he imparts it to the Duke Montpensier, the Marshalls of Biron and Aumont, to the Baron of Biron Marshal of the field, and to the chiefe Captaines of his armie: he makes choice of the Lord of Vicq for Sergeant Major of the field: he appointed the Rendezuous for his troupes, at the village of Saint Andrew, foure leagues from Nonancourt, vpon the way to Yury, and the place of battaile in a great plaine neare vnto it. All these old souldiers found the place chosen with so great iudgment and militarie wisdom, as they altered not any thing.

The King hauing deliuered it vnto the Baron, to appoint euery man his place, said: It is no desire of glorie, nor motion of ambition, nor appetite of reuenge, that makes me resolute to this combat, but the extreame necessitie of my inst and naturall defence, the pittie of my peoples calamitie, and the preseruatiou of my Crowne. Let vs refer the euents of this enterprize to the eternall providence. Then afterwards lifting vp his eyes to heauen: Thou knowest, O God, (said he) the since: itie of my thoughts. I beseech thee put me not in the number of those Princes, whome thou hast forsaken in thy wrath, but of those whome thou hast chosen to reparaire the ruines of a desolate Estate, and to releue my miserable people oppressed with the violence of warre. O Lord I yeeld my selfe to the disposition of thy holy and infallible will, and desire not to live; not to raigne, but so farre forth as my life may be to the aduancement and glorie of thy name, and my authority the raigne of vertues, and the banishment of vices. These and such like religious words, mooued all the campe to prayers and workes of pietie, euery one according to his deuotion.

This done, the King disposeth his army according to the plotte which he had layed. He diuides it into seuen squadrons, and in euery one three hundred horse, flanked on either side with footmen: the first he giues to the Marshall d'Aumont, with two regiments of French: the second to the Duke Montpensier with fure hundred Lansquenets, and a regiment of Suisses. The third to the Earle of Auvergne and Guiry, either of them commaunding a troupe of light horse, and on their left hand foure Canons and two Culuerins: The fourth to the Baron of Biron. In the fift were fure ranks of horse, and sixe-score in a front, Princes, E Earles, Barons, Officers of the Crowne, Knights of the Order, Noblemen, and Gentlemen of the chiefe families of France, besides those which the Prince of Conty and La Guishe, great Master of the Artillerie brought that day. His Maiefty was in the head of this troupe shining in armes, like the Sunne amidst the seuen Planets: hauing on the side of him two battels of Suisses, with the regiments of his guards of Brigneux, of Vignoles and Saint Iohn. The sixt to the Marshall of Biron, with two regiments of French: the seuenth were about two hundred and fiftie Reistres. These squadrons were all in a front, but somewhat bending at the ends, in forme of a Cressant. There was nothing more terrible, then to see two thousand French Gentlemen armed from the head to the foot.

The Duke of Mayenne appeared a farre off, and had taken a village betwixt both armies: F but his Maiefty forceth them to dislodge, and wearies them with skirmishes, to draw them to fight: and the approaching night leaues our warriours burning with desire to haue the day call them to the field, to make prooffe of their seruice and duties to their King and contrie. At the breake of day, the men at armes were in their squadrons, the souldiers in their Battalions, and by nine of the clocke euery man did fight in his gesture, in his threats and words.

A words. At the same instant the enemy shewes a bodie of about foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foote, and almost in the same forme, but most glittering, with more feathers, more men, and lesse courage, almost like a Cressant. The Dukes Corner was about two hundred and fiftie horse, augmented with the like number by the Duke of Nemours, who ioined with him, and was almost in the midst of his squadrons as that of the Kings, but flanked with two squadrons of Lanciers that came out of the Low-countries, who were about eighteenth hundred horse marching all together. On the side were two regiments of Suisses couered with French foote, then two lesse squadrons of Lances, seuen hundred on the right hand, and fure hundred on the left, two Culuerins, and two Bastards.

The Sunne and the wind might haue greatly amazed the Kings armie. To preuent this inconueniencie, his Maiefty aduanceth about an hundred and fiftie paces, gettes both the Sunne and the wind, and findes the enemies number greater then he esteemed. But this multitude serues as a spur to euery Captaine to encourage both himselfe and his men. The King goes to the head of his Squadron, beginnes his first worke by prayer, exhorts and encourageth them with a countenance full of Maiefty, ioy, and constancie: Marsuault arrives and giues him intelligence, that the Lords of Humieres, and Mouy are within two thousand paces of the field. But the King had well obserued the point of his happinisse; and will not giue his enemy that honour, to strike the first stroke.

Hee that beginnes well, hath halfe ended, saith the Prouerbe. Hee commaundeth C La Guishe to discharge his Cannon: it pierceth through the thickest Squadrons of the enemies, and shootes nine volleys before theirs could beginne: fure or sixe hundred light-horse, French, Italians, and Wallons, aduance with a full carriere, to charge the Marshall d'Aumont on the one side, on the other side their Reistres charge the Kings light-horse. The Marshall ioynes with them, and makes them turne their tayles presently: their groue of Reistres is so violently repulsed and driuen backe, as they turne suddenly to rally themselves behind the other troupes. Another Squadron of Lanciers, Wallons and Flemmings (seeing his Maiesties troupes separated some-what from the rest which the Reistres had charged) come hottely vpon them. The Baron of Biron makes it good, and not able to charge them in the front, takes them behind, pierceth a part of them: the rest breaketh away like a billow against a rocke: the Baron had two wounds, one in the arme, and the other in the face.

The first charge.

A second charge.

Now comes the Duke of Mayenne with his bodie of horsemen, in the which were the Dukes of Nemours and Aumale, hauing vpon their wings foure hundred Carabins, (which were Harguebuziers on horse-backe, armed with Murriens and Plaisirons) who make a furious salley fure and twentie paces off vpon his Maiesties troupes. This done, the King parts like a violent lightning from the head of his Squadron, beeing sixe hundred horse, hee chargeth two thousand of the enemies: hee breakes them, scatters them, and is so ingaged amongst the thickest of them, as (notwithstanding the great plume in his Caske, and that in his horses head, which made him apparent) hee remained a good quarter of an houre vnkowne euen to his owne people, in this great forest of Lances, amidst a great shower of strokes, giuing a good testimonie, that if before hee could do the office of a great King and Captaine in ordering, so could he now performe the duty of a braue souldier, and resolute man at armes in fighting.

A bloudie charge.

But about all, of a most mild and mercifull Conquerour: who in this bloudie fight, did found forth that gracious speech. Sauet the French, and downe with the stranger. Doubtlesse hee is well kept whome God keeps. Some were greatly attonied and amazed, others trembled and quaked, hauing lost the sight of the Kings Maiefty. This great bodie, whose foundation was so much shaken, beganne to wauer: those who euen now presented their faces so furiously with the poynts of their Launces and swords, do now shew their heeles, cast away their armes, and trust to their horses. His Maiefty beeing freed from this presse, hauing with twelue or fifteene in his companie, taken three Cornets, and slaine the Wallons that did accompanie them, and returning to his Squadron a triumphing Conquerour, hee filled the armie with exceeding ioy, and the armie the ayre, with that louing crye of God save the King.

The Suisses remained yet whole, but abandoned of all their horse, and laid open. They G g g g 3 propound 1590. propound to send the French-foot on the right hand, who had not yet fought to breake them. But the respect of the ancient alliance of that Nation with this Crowne, made the King to grant them life, and receiue them vnto mercie Laying downe their armes they passed to his Maiesties side, & those French that were with them, enioyed the like clemency. But the time his Maiestie lost in pardoning the Suisses, did greatly fauor their retreat that fled, and gaue the Duke of Maienne leysure to passe the riuer of Eure, to breake the bridge after him, and to recouer Mante in safety. The Marshall of Biron stood firme without striking him, yet did he more terrifie the enemy then any other: for seeing this troupe of rescue whole, they supposed that this old souldier hauing beene practised in so many batailles in his life time, would easily breake them, and make the victorie absolute. Hereupon the Marshall d'Aumont, the Earle of Clermont, the Baron of Biron, and other Commanders, returned from the chase, gather together their troupes, and ioyne with the King. And the King hauing receiued his forces that came out of Normandy, makes a bodie, leaues the Marshall of Biron with the army to follow him, sends the Earle of Auvergne before, takes the Baron of Biron on his right hand, and another troupe on his left: and accompanied with the Prince of Conty, Duke Montpensier, Earle Saint Paul, Marshall d'Aumont, the Lord of Tremouille, and many others, pursued the point of his victorie, chasing, beating, and killing, vntill that the broken bridge (diuerting them a League and a halfe out of the way, to passe at the foard of Anet, and the horses (whose legs the Reistres had cut to stop the way) hindring the pursuit, and the approaching night, ended the victorie.

Loss of the Leaguers.

The disorder was great in the retreat of the vanquished, and the slaughter great in the furie of the fight: about fise hundred horse were slaine or drowned, and about foure hundred prisoners. The Count Egmont, the young Earle of Brunswike, Chastaigneray, and a great number of other Noblemen slaine, Bois-Dauphin, Mesdaunt, Cicongne (who carried the white cornet to the Duke of Mayenne) Fontaine Martel, Lonchamp, Lodouan, Falandre, Hengueffan: the Marshals of the field, Treuzay, Casteliere, Desimeux, and many other French, Germanes, Spaniards, Italians, and Flemings were prisoners, whereof the most part being graciously released, did afterwards abuse the Kings bounty by a reuolt, who neuer could practise that viciuill maxime of State, a dead man neuer makes warre. There were twenty Cornets taken, the white Cornet, the great standard of the Generall of the Spaniards and Flemings, the cornets of the Colonel of the Reistres, three-score ensignes of foot of diuers nations, and the foure and twenty of Suisses which yielded. All the foot-men which yielded not, or were not drowned, were cut in peeces. All their artillerie, all their baggage carried away. Such as fled into the woods found lesse mercie in the peasants, then in the men of war. The Duke of Mayenne faued himselfe in Mante, and gaue the Towns-men this floute for their comfort, that the Bearnois was slaine; or litle better. The Duke of Nemours, Bascompiere, the Vicount of Tauennes, Rosne, and some others tooke the way of Chartres. To conclude, his Maiestie pursues them almost to the gates of Manté, finding the waies (notwithstanding his lets) full of runners-away which remained at his discretion. And if those of Manté persisting in their first resolution, to keepe their gates shut, had not yielded to the Dukes earnest request, both he and all his followers had fallen into the victors hands. Thus God poured out his wrath vpon this army: thus a handfull of men defeated many Legions: thus the French spoyled Perou euen in France. On the Kings side were slaine Clermont of Entragues, Capitaine of his Maiesties guards, Tsch Schomberg Colonel of the Reistres, fighting then vnder the white Cornet, Loneaulnay of Normandie, being three-score and twelue yeares old (an honourable graue for that braue old man) Crenay Cornet to the Duke of Montpensier, Felquiers, and at the most twenty Gentlemen more. The Marquis of Nefle being hurt, died within eight daies after. The Earle of Choisy, the Earle of Luden, d'O, Monlouet, d'Auvergne, Rosny, and some others were lightly hurt.

Kings side,

In this battaile they obserue three chiefe things. The first, the Kings firme resolution to giue battaile, with an assured confidence, that the sincerity of his intent, and the equitie of his cause should be fauoured with the assistance of heauen. The second, that at the very instant of the fight it seemed that the earth did bring forth armed men for his seruice: for on the eue and the day of battell, there came about sixe hundred horses vnto him vnexpected. The third, that of two thousand French Gentlemen, onely 1200. did fight: twelue hundred put 1590. Aput to rout an army of foure thousand horse, fresh, well mounted, and well armed, and twelue thousand foot. Without doubt the eternall God of armes doth neuer forget the right of Princes, against their rebellious subiects: and a braue resolution, with a wife command giues a happy end to batailles.

Conquests after the victory

The next day by the sunne rising the Vidame of Chartres went to field by the Kings commande ment, to get some intelligence of the enemy. In the sight of Manté hee caused Daurd of Villeneuve a Gentleman of Quercy neere vnto Cahors, to aduance, whom hee knew to be full of courage and zeale to his Maiesties seruice, hauing seene him many times in good places, and lately very actiue to pursue the victory without care of bootie, like vnto many others. Gold doth many times cause him to bee hated that loues it, and spoiles doe litle aduance the spoilers; But goodly actions, leaue a fauour of immortall praise in generous mindes. Villeneuve resolues not to returne without some certaine newes. All the country was amazed; No man appeared. Hee approcheth neere vnto the towne, to talke with the first hee should meete. Some labouring in the Vines, seeing him armed and wearing a white scarfe, they runne and giue the alarum at Manté. The Inhabitants runne in heapes to the port with all sorts of armes. Hee heeres a great tumult in the towne; and therevpon takes an occasion to sound their awills. Hee pricketh on his horse to the turne-pike, and cries out that he came from the King to know their intentions: That he hath his armes open to receiue them with clemency that fauour the Iustice of his cause; and his sword ready to force them that thinke to pull from him the Inheritance which nature and law had giuen him.

God blessed his desaigne, and disposed the hearts of this people to follow the better way. About two hundred of the chiefe Inhabitants, come to him to the port. Hee shewes them the Iustice of his Maiesties armes, exhorteth them to renounce all forraigne leagues, and not grow obstinate, through the perswasions or promises of such as pretend to rauish the crowne, against all right and reason, and to consider that this warre was meere for state, and that religion was onely a maske: witnesse the Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates, which say masse daily in the army, with all libertie. That they should deliuer their resolutions freele, the which beeing reported to the King they should feele the effectes, which a people merites of a most mercifull and conquering Prince.

Being thus perswaded, and seeing the King armed with right and force, all ioyntly lift vp their hands, and protest to liue and die in the fidellity, which good and loyall subiects owe vnto their lawfull Lord, and that by their true obedience, they would wipe out rebellion wherevnto they had suffered themselves to bee carried, in the common deluge which had drowned the other people of the Realme. The Duke of Maine beeing aduertized by a strange captaine of the garrison, of the other which hee had seene giuen by the Inhabitantes, from the which hee could not diuert them neither by threatnes nor violence: In steed of assuring himselfe of the Towne, as hee might well haue done, hauing many souldiers with him, both horse, and foote considering that to settle his fastie vpon the vncertaintie of a popular friendship is to build vpon a quick-sand: Hee retires by the opposite Port without any trumpet, leauing the souldiers in so bad termes with the Inhabitantes, as feare putting winges to their feete, they followed the Fortune of their Commander. Thus by the industrie of this Gentleman (worthie doublelesse to bee registred in our Historie) the towne of Manté importing much for the bridge which it hath vpon the Riuer of Seine, came without charge or losse of men vnder the Kings obedience, who the next daie made his entrie there with all signes of ioy. Vernon another bridge vpon the same riuer did in like manner plant the banner of France. And the Heauens seemed to poore more blessings vpon our Henry, and to make his way easie to an absolute Royaltie: for the Earle of Rendan (chiefe of the League in Auvergne) was the same daie of the battaile of Yury, shamefully chased from the siege of Issoire, slaine in battaile, his troupes cut in peeces and his Artillery taken, by the Lords of Curton, Roignat and Chasseron.

telle gotten of the League.

As they had abused the Mantois with a vaine assurance of his death, whom they durst not looke vpon nor encounter, so with the like practises they must delude the Parisiens. The Duke

1590. Duke of Mayenne, his Sister of Montpensier, and the other heads of the league, deceived of A their hopes, published by printed bookes, that at the first assault at Dreux, the Bearnois had lost about five hundred men, that their wounds had made a greater number vnfit for their armes: that the Marshall of Biron was wounded vnto death. That in an other encounter nere vnto Poissy the vnion had gotten a great victory. That in the battaile of Yury, the combate had bene long, and the losse almost equall. That if the Bearnois bee not dead, he is little better. But such as (glad to haue saued themselves) came to Paris, marred all, in verifying the contrary, making the people to hang downe their heads, and to wish for peace by a still and mournfull muttering. The fire-brands of hell in their pulpits made the losse farre lesse then it was, giuing them an assured hope of speedy and new succors from Spaine, for the restoring of their Estate and destruction of the Maheulties, so they then called such as did fight vnder the Kings Ensignes. B

And the Duke of Mayenne after he had made a certaine practise vpon the towne of Senlis (for the which twelue as well captaines as souldiers, and many others beeing ingaged in the same conspiracy, past through the hang-mans hands, the third day of Iuly) went into Flanders, to the Duke of Parma: that is to say he went to ruine his honour and reputation, for beeing a maister at home amongst his owne country-men, hee went to make himselfe a seruant and slaue to an ambitious proud man, who hath often in skorne made him attend at his Cabinet doore, and lacquay after him, before hee could receiue an answer of any matter of small importance: to the great griefe and disdaine of the French Gentlemen, that did accompany him, who scorned to imbase themselves to those proud humors. Doubtlesse it was necessary the Duke should try the insolency of strangers, the better to know the courtesie of the French, and submit his armes and person to the King his Soueraigne and lawfull Lord: the meanes whereby hereafter hee shall abolish the memory of things past.

Aduersity makes the wilfull more obstinate. The Court of Parliament at Rouen, for execution of the former decree, puts to death the seventh of Aprill, some prisoners the Kings seruants: and three daies after they declare all those persons guiltie of high Treason both to God and Man, that followed the King of Nauarre (so spake the decree) and would not yeeld to King Charles the tenth of that name, ioyne with the Vni- D on, and carrie armes vnder the Duke of Mayenne. Whilest these threaten by their decree, and the Duke goes to begge releefe, the King beeing at Manté laboured to reduce the Parisiens to reason by mildnesse. But these trumpets of sedition, imputing this delaie to want of courage, perswaded the people, that shortly their sworne enemy should haue worke enough, and that at length hee should bee ruined, that a little patience would giue them a great victorie: that they must not yeeld to any Article whatsoever: making impudent allusions to the name of his familie, who is now seated in the throne of this Monarchie.

Siege of Paris. These insolent exclamations brought the King about Paris. Paris is accustomed to liue from hand to mouth: the benefit of the Halles, the place Maubert, and other market-places, is the cause that the most part of households doe not know what prouision meanes. And the chiefe of the League had so settled this former beliefe in the citizens mindes, as of a hundred, foure-score and nineteene had neglected to prouide for things necessary to endure the toyle of a siege. So as the taking of Manté, Poissy, Pontcharenton, Corbeil, Melun, Montreau vpon Seine, and Lagny vpon Marne, brought Paris in few moneths to extreame necessity. Compiègne, Creil, and Beaumont stopt the riuier of Oise.

Erronious decision of Sorbonne. But the ordinary cries of the Preachers: the practises of the chiefe, and the Ladies of the league, and the erroneous decision of the faculty of Sorbonne, giuen the seventh of May in the third generall congregation, held to that end in the great Hall of the said Colledge, prohibiting all Catholikes according to the law of God, sayd they, to receiue for King an Heretike or fauourer of Heretikes, relaps and excommunicate, although he doe afterwards obtaine by an outward iudgement absolution of his crimes and censures, if there remaine any doubt of dissembling, treachery, or subuersion of the Catholike Religion. Condemning all them for Heretikes, forsakers of Religion, and pernicious to the Church, that should suffer any such to come to the crowne. All these made the multitude more obstinate against the extreamest

A extreamest miseries which the rigour of a long and painfull siege may cause. Besides this decision, they had yet stronger restraints to bridle mens tongues and actions that fauoured the floure de Luce in their hearts. The sixteene tribunes set spies to obserue the speeches and countenances of such as they suspect: that is to say, of such as wish for peace, and haue not lost the remembrance of the true Princes of France. And if any one chance to say. It were good to treat of a peace. He is a politike: hee is a Roialist, that is to say, an heretike, and enemy to the Church. They spoile, imprison, yea put to death, such as doe not applaud this horrible tyranny.

The Duke of Nemours, in the Duke his brothers absence, commanded at Paris, and for his chiefe counsellors he had, the Popes Legat, the Ambassador of Spaine, the Archbishop of Lion, the bishops of Paris, Rennes, Placencia, Senlis and others. Panigarole, bishop of Ait, Bellarmin and Thyrens Iesuits, who with diuerse processions, fastings, voves and supplications, betwixed the people in their greatest famine: many zealous doctors, curats, priests and monkes tooke armes, and the friars with their Breuiaries in open musters were admired by some, and laught at by others. The Cheualers D'Aumale, with some others, laboured by sallies to annoy the Kings troupes, who content to repulse them, hoped their bellies would shortly make their tongues to sing a new note. The Duke of Mayenne on the other side courted the Parmesan: and the King of Spaine proceeded so slowly in his succours, as the best iudgements did perceiue, hee rather sought to entertaine, then to quench their thirst. C

The Parisiens in the meane-time had leisure to sharpen, but not to satisfie their appetite. The corne and other prouision of the publike, was wasted the first moneth. Such as had any prouision in their houses, kept it very secret, and others that trusted too confidently to the words of the chiefe Commanders and Preachers, perished of hungar, or at the least indured much, struiuing against the cruelty of famine. All passages by water were cut off, the taking of Saint Denis depriued them of the plaine of France, and but for the passports (which a little fauour or money obtained easily of the captaines and gards) the citizens had in few weekes bene brought to the Kings discretion, who yeelded good for euill, suffered them to carry victuals for the Duke of Nemours, the Ladies and others who practised his D ruine, except Nitri Gobert, who by his ordinary sallies had often conference with the King to produce in the end great effects for his Maiesties seruice, and by his returne to the Royall party euaporate the bad fauour of foure thousand crownes which had carried him to the mutines faction in the greatest necessity of the Kings affaires.

Their misery grew extreame in the third moneth of the siege. There were a hundred thousand people dead of hungar, griefe and pouerty, in the streetes and hospitals, without releefe, and without pittie. The suburbs ruined, beaten downe and wast. The city needy and solitary. The rents of the Towne-house (being the chiefe liuings of many families) were extinguished: their lands about the City wasted and desolate, the Vniuersity forsaken, or seruing to lodge peasants, and the Schooles for stables for their cattle: the Palace not frequented, but by some idle persons, the grasse growing whereas before they could hardly goe for presse. The shops either without worke-men, or without trafficke. No corne, no wine, no wood, no hay vpon the riuier. Nothing passed but was subiect to the garriisons of Saint Denis, the fort of Gournay, Cheuruze and Corbeil: the Halls were empty, no marchants in market-places, no meanes to make money, nor to get meate. To conclude, see this Queene of cities, this little world, this Paris without Peere, wast, desolate, and at the last gaspe, and (to augment the disorder) many reliques were eaten, the Jewels and the crownes of ancient Kings molten, and for a peece of bread, many Wiues and Virgins doe willingly abandon their bodies, and their honours to the souldiers.

But all these miseries and horrors cannot moue these hard-hearted Pharaocs. The sixteene, the forty, and the chiefe of the faction, betwix the people, as it were with a sleeping potion which benums the members, to cut them off by peece-meale when they bee asleepe, that hauing sucked the bloud, the vitall heate, and the hearts out of their bodies (as they haue done the siluer out off their purses) they might confine their insolent tyranny, without controul: They force the Parliament (being subiect to the houses of Spaine and Lorraine) to publish a decree the fifteenth of Iune, Forbidding vpon paine of death all men to A forced decree of the Parliament at Paris. speake

the people,

Deputies sent to the King.

But the bellie hath no eares: the people are not fed with paper, or with the Duke of Mayennes promises, nor with his trumpets. They haue already eaten dogges, cats, horses, asses, moyles, herbes, rootes, and any thing that might quench the rage of famine in such extreame dispaire. They come tumultuously to the councell assembled in the palace, to requere a peace. They prouide for this mutinie by a sillie reliefe of eight or tenne daies. At the end whereof a great number appeare armed in the same place, and demand peace, or bread. Gou, a capitaine in the towne, steps forth to feed these famished people with words, but no bread, and for his reward hee was wounded in the shoulder with a sword, whereof he died within few daies after. The Chanallier D' Aumale flies thither, and followed by a troupe of men at his deuotion, shuts the Palace gates, imprisons them that were armed, and hangs two, out of the whole multitude, to suppress the like fits of this dispaireing people. These popular mutinies had confounded the chiefe Leaguars, if they had not preuented it. To this end, they assemble with the chiefe of the citie, and notwithstanding the decision of the Sorbonne, and the decree of the Court, they resolute to send the Archbishop of Lions, and the Bishop of Paris to the Kings Maiesty, to seeke some meanes of pacification.

Before they part, they will haue leaue from the Legat, least they incurre some Ecclesiasticall censure. The Legat consults with Panigrola, Bellarmino, and Tyrens, whether the Parisiens did fall into excommunication, being forced by famine to yeeld vnto an Heretike Prince. If the Deputies going to such a Prince, to conuert him; or to better the Estate of the Catholike Church, were comprehended in the excommunication of the Bull of Pope Sixtus the fifth: the Doctors answer no. Thus the Deputies come to the King, to Saint Anthonyes in the field. The King heares their speech, tending to a generall peace for the Realme, or a particular for Paris, if the Duke of Mayenne will not seeke a Generall; But what can they hope to obtaine of a King of France and of Nauarre, treating with him but with the simple quality of King of Nauarre?

answer to the Deputies

Your Councell (said his Maiesty) contradicts it selfe, demanding peace of him, whom they will acknowledge but for a King of Nauarre. I will, and desire peace, to ease my people, but not according to your propositions. I loue the city of Paris as my eldest daughter, and will do her more good then the requirers, so as she be thankfull vnto me, and not to the Duke of Mayenne, nor to the King of Spaine. The brute of the Spanish succors for Paris do not amaze me. I know the practises of Spaine, and with the helpe of heauen will conuert them into smoake. Paris & the Realm of France are not fit for King Philips mouth: I will giue the Parisiens eight daies to consider of their yeelding, and of the Articles of peace for the whole realme. Vpon their refusall, I know well how to vse a Conquerors right against the chiefe motiues and fauorers of rebellion: the constancy of them of Sancerre, the dispaire and victory of the Gantois, whereby you magnifie them of Paris, is impertinent: for those of Sancerre were prest to these extremities by the violences of such as would take from them their goods and liberties, their religion and liues. Contrariwise I will giue the Parisiens life, which Mendoza the Ambassador of Spaine takes from them by famine. As for religion, in forme your felues of these Princes and Noblemen Catholikes, if I doe force their consciences in the exercise of their religion, or otherwise. The comparison with them of Gant is not good. The Parisiens haue sufficiently shewed their courage, in suffering their suburbs to be taken. I haue fife thousand Gentlemen with mee, who will not bee intreated after the Gantois manner. I haue likewise God, and the equiuy of my cause. Make a faithfull report of my words to them that haue sent you.

With this answere, and other speeches testifying the Kings good meaning, and the small feare he had of the League, these Deputies goe to the Duke of Mayenne: and hee sends them backe to the King, and giues great hope to incline to a peace. But, hee not amazed at this treaty (said he to the Parisiens, by a Secretary of his, going after the Deputies) I will rather die then make a peace. And being aduertised, that Paris would shortly be forced through want to yeeld vnto the King. The taking thereof (answered he) shall be preiudiciall vnto him:

A this conquest shall disperse his army, and then we shall preuaile easily. But his Maiesty would neither see, nor suffer the ruine of his capitall city: and his meaning was not to seize vpon Paris in such sort as his enemies supposed. It greued him to see so many ill aduised people: And if the Dukes of Mayenne and Parma, comming to succours them, would hazard a battle, he hoped by their ouerthrow to bring the Parisiens vnto reason.

Thus the Duke thought to abuse the King with deuises, and vnder a colour of treaty win time, in fauour of the besieged. But the King being aduertised, that the Duke of Mayenne was parted from Bruxelles, and tooke the way to Paris, followed by Balagny, capitaine Saint Paul and other troupes, his Maiesty aduanceth with a troupe of horse, and marcheth seuen teene Leagues, to incounter him: and missing them but one houre, he forceth them to flie B into Laon. The Duke fortifies himselfe there with his forces, and approaching vnto Meaux, he giues a generall hope of a bataille. The King goes againe towards him: but hee findes the Duke fortified betwixt two riuers, attending the Duke of Parmaes comming, who beeing come, renues this first hope, and with this defeigne he goes to lodge at Clay and Fresnes, fixe leagues from Paris. The King raiseth the siege, comes to meet him, appoints the Rendezuous for his army: the next day, the thirtieth of August, on the plaine of Bondy in the way to his enemies, hee chafeth their quarter maisters from Chelles, who began to marke out their lodging, and forceth a troupe of eight hundred horse to retire into the body of C Chelles, about six thousand horse, in the which were fixe Princes, two Marshals of France, many Noblemen, more Commanders, more great capitaines then are in all the rest of the world, foure thousand French Gentlemen (whom the bare shew of a combat doth draw more cheerefully to the place of bataille, then to a gallant wedding) and eightene thousand foote French and strangers. The Duke of Parma standing vpon a hill to view them. Deshefe (said he to the Duke of Mayenne) these ten thousand men, which you assured mee would bee so easily overcome? there appeares about fife and twenty thousand in the best order that I haue seene. This Duke made more account to saue one of his men, then to kill ten of his enemies. So resoluing not to hazard anything, they change their swords and lances, into shouels and pick-axes, and intrenching themselves in the Fenne, auoided the danger; D and preferred his army: neither could skirmishes nor alarums make him abandon his trenches.

On the eight day of the moneth, the mist was great, and the winde being contrary, carried away the noise of the enemies canon. The Dukes laying hold of this occasion, make a bridge of boates, besiege Lagny vpon Marne, a weake towne, lying behind their backs, and halfe a mile from their campe: they batter it, and take it by force, but not without an honourable and vertuous resistance of three hundred men that kept it, but holding it not gardable they razed it. To draw them out of their fort, his Maiesty makes shew of a great enterprize against Paris: he makes his defeigne knowne, that he will attempt it by escaladoe: and the tenth daie at night goes from the campe with a good troupe. But they keepe E themselves within their Fennes, yet could they not long subsist in this straight, where they endured all wantes: and hungar in the end would driue the Wolfe out of the wood. The King offered them bataille in vaine: hee attended the tryall of the Dukes forces in vaine. Hee therefore mans those places hee held about Paris, sends backe some of his troupes into Touraine, Normandie, Champagne and Bourgongne, and retaines a sufficient armie to annoy his enemies.

This proceeding drawes the Dukes to field, to free Paris. Parma calles himselfe a Redeemer: and to make his profit of this aduantage, hee besiegeth and taketh Corbeil by force, and killes all that hee findes in armes. Rigaude (a braue and valiant captaine) commaunded there, and hauing no time to fortifie so great a power, hee found there F an honourable Sepulcher. For dying at the breach, hee performed the duetie of a faithfull and valiant seruant to the King. But the Parmesan lost the Marquis of Renty, with a great number of men, blemished his reputation, and weakened his army: for whilst that he wastes time, the King makes new defeignes, which shall bring the league into greater difficulties.

Euen then the Agents of Philip would haue filled his good City of Paris (for so the Spaniard

But on the one side the plague was great, and victuals very scant: and on the other side; the forces of Maurice Earle of Nassau prevailed in the Low-countries: the Queene of England sending great succours thether. And the sixteene tribunes of Paris seeing themselves at some more liberty, thanked the Duke of Parma, giuing him to vnderstand, that his aboad at Bruxelles, would be more pleasing and more safe for him. His army decayed visibly: he sees himselfe in the midst of an inconstant multitude, and to dismember his forces to leaue any with the Parisiens, were to loose them, to draw the King vpon him, and to be in danger of an overthrow. So in the end of Nouember he gathers together his troupes, and makes his retreat, being pursued, tired, and beaten with daily losse, euen to the frontiers of Arthois, by the King, the Dukes of Neuers and Longueuille, by the Baron of Biron, Gurly, Parabell and others. To reach strangers, that France cannot be taken nor ruined, but by it selfe.

He had no sooner turned his backe, but Corbeil and other small places held by them, returned to the Kings obedience : the garrisons placed there by them, repaied the French bloud lately shed at the taking thereof : and Paris fell againe into new confusions and like necessity. The Duke of Mayenne was greatly troubled to afflit the Parmesan in his retreat. During the which, the Marshall of Biron tooke Clermont in Beauvoisin for his Maiesty, of five or six other townes, and twenty forts or castles, possessed by the enemy. The Duke of Parma being out of the Realme, the King made his entry into Saint Quentin, being receiued with an honourable entertainment, and exceeding ioy of the Inhabitants : and the tenth of December, he was aduertised, that Humières, Boissière his brother-in-law, and Parabell, had forced Corby, scaled the walles, fought with the garrison, slaine all men of defence, and conquered the towne for his Maiesty.

We have conducted a mighty enemy out off the Realme: let vs now obserue some particular exploits, for which wee would not interrupt the continuance of our History. The Leaguers forces consisted of men, who sought their priuate profit in the confusion of the Estate, and by consequence, wished for nothing but increase of disorders: so all their designs tended onely to spoile and desolation: to the preiudice of the Kings subiects, but to no advancement of their party. In Daulphiné those of Vienne fought in the month of March, to shew some effects in fauour of the crosses of Lorraine. Those which had the Floure de Luze printed in their hearts, assure the towne for the King. The Colonel Alphonso, and Des Dignieres goe to succour them: and from thence goe and take Pont of Beauvoisin, and Saint Laurence du Pont, possessed by the League.

voisin, and Saint Laurence du Pont, possessed by the League.

In the meane-time, the Marquis of Saint Sorlin, brother to the Duke of Nemours, hath an enterprise vpon Vienne. These two Commanders flie thether with speed, and repulse the enemy. Alphonso desires to see how he carries himselfe in his retreat, hee falls into an ambush laid by the Baron of Senecey, is taken prisoner, and paies afterwards forty thousand crownes for his ransom. Des Diguieres tooke the townes and castles of Briançon and Dexilles, and entred vpon the territories of the duke of Sauoy. Then in November he besieged and forced Grenoble a Parliament towne, to set vp the armes of France, and to change their affections, which inclined to the factions of strangers. So wee may say, that Dauphiné was the first Prouince of the Realme, wholly subdued to the King from the league: the which was chiefly performed by the valour and diligence of the Lord of Des Diguieres. In Normandy the duke of Montpensier tooke Honfleur, and forced the Leagueurs to leaue the field. Thus the league decreased in diuers countries: and to giue them a mate, the King did sollicite a leauy of Reistres in Germany, by the Vicont of Turenne. On the other side, Gregory Sfondrate, lately installed in the Pontificall Chaire, and a Partisan of Spaine, reuiued the hopes of the League, promising a succour of fifteene hundred horse, and eight thousand foote, vnder the command of Francis Sfondrate his Nephew. During these preparations, the Cheualier D' Aumale attempts vpon Saint Denis, scales the wall by night, enters the towne without losse, and held himselfe for maiister thereof, when as the Lord of Vicq, a valiant, wise, and resolute Gentleman, comes into the streete, chargeth the Knight, laies him dead vpon the place, kills most of his followers, and puts the rest to flight. This Knight was one of the chiefe of the League, violent, hardy and valiant, but of a strange disposition, insupportable and dissolute.

The

A The King tyred the Parisiens with continuall alarms, and new enterprises, but rather to terrifie them then to ruine them, and to giue them occasion to open their eyes, and to consider of their estate. They grow so amazed, as they wall vp Saint Honoris gate, vpon an aduertisement that the Kings troupes would make some great attempt the twentieth of Ianuary. The Parrisiens feare, serueth the Agents of Spaine for a pretext to draw in some regiments of Spaniards and Neapolitaines, attending some great succors from the Duke of Parma. The hope of these new succours from Spaine and Italy, serueth the chiefe of that faction, as a bridle to restrain the Parisiens. But the more to incourage and content the whole body, Gregory the foureteenth of that name, assisted by many Cardinalls doth againe
B excommunicate the King and his adherents: he sends a monitory to the Cardinall of Placentia his Legate at Paris, by Marcellin Landriano his Nuncio: and for the effect of his purposes and promises, he begins to arme, to nourish (in steed of quenching, as a common father) the combustions of this realme.

On the other side (the Castilian having priuate intelligence with the Duke of Mercœur) the Spaniards land in Brittainy, and fortifie Blauet a port of the sea: and thereby in a manner dismember the whole Prouince, vnyted to the Crowne vnder Charles the eight. The king sent La Roue to make head against them: and retrying to Senlis, hee tooke the way to Brie accompanied by the Duke of Neuers, (who hereafter shall be of the Kings party, vpon the assurance the Cardinall of Bourbon gaue him, that he might without scruple of conscience carry armes for his King, although of a contrary religion,) he makes a shew to beseege Prouins, Sens, or Troyes; then with a fodaine change he giues out, that his meaning was to goe to Tours, to redresse some disorders: but he commands the Marshall of Byron (who returned from the conquest of Caudebec, Fescamp and diuers other places for his Maiesty, to make a shew to passe through Beause, to ioyne with him, and that sodenly he should turne and inueit Chartres, before that any greater forces should enter.

Chartres was enuiroined the tenth of February, befeeged, battered, and assaulted, but valiantly defended almost two moneths & a halfe. La Bourdaisiere commanded there, who hauing endured some assaults, it was propounded in the Kings Councell to raife the seegge: but the Earle of Cheuerny, (lately restored to the office of Chancellor by his Maiesty,) did vehemently impugne it, hauing an especiall interest in the reduction of this towne, by reason of some lands he possessed thereabout, he aduiseeth the King to giue a generall assault: insists vpon the dishonor and preiudice it would bring to the Kings affaires, and the commodities hee should receiue by the taking thereof, being one of the keyes of Paris, which might greatly settle his estate, and annoy his rebels. The Lord of Chastillon, (comming from rayfing of the seegge of Aubigny, which La Chastre, chiefe of the League in Berry had befeeged) promisseth the King that if hee will make him his Lieutenant on this side the riuer, he will deliuer it into his power within eight daies. His Maiesty giues him this commande. He makes a bridge of wood, the point whereof reached vnto the breach, that they might come couered to handy-stroakes with the enemy. This new engin amazeth them, and draweth them to composition: the which they obtayned on Good-friday, vpon condition to yeeld within eight daies, if they were not releued. The Duke of Mayenne would not loose the certaine, to runne after the vncertaine. He held Chasteau-Thierry so straightly begirt, as the Vicont Pinard was forced to capitular with him before the King could come to his succour. So the King lost Chasteau-Thierry, and in exchange tooke Chartres, a goodly and a strong place. There came forth about six hundred men with their armes, horse and baggage, and the nineteenth of Aprill the King made a triumphant entry in armes, appointed a garrison, restored Sourdis to his gouernment, reduced Aulneau and Dourdan, to his obedience, and then went to refresh himselfe at Senlis.

Let vs now see some other finifter accidents, which in time fhall helpe to ruine the league. A thousand horfe, and eightene hundred Harguebuziers, Prouençals, Sauoyards and Spaniards, feeke to fubdue that Prouince for the Duke of Sauoy. La Vallette inuities le Dignieres to do the King herein a notable feruice: hee goes, and both ioyntly charge thefe troupes of ftrangers and baf tard French, they kill foure hundred maifters and fifteene hundred Harguebuziers, take many prifoners, and carry away fifteene Enfeigns, winne many horfes and much baggage, and loofe but one Gentleman and fome twenty fouldiers.

This done Les Diguieres returns into Daulphiné. Being gone, the League recouers new A forces in Prouence by the fauour and credit of the Countesse of Sault: but she had neyther force nor vigour able to countenance the factions of Spaine and Sauoye. The Duke of Sauoye lately returned from Spaine, growes ielous of some intelligences preiudiciall to his Estate, and sets gards both ouer her and the Lord of Crequy her son. She is cunning, counterfeits her selfe sicke, conceales her discontent, and in the end finds meanes to escape with her sonne disguised to Marseilles.

In Poitou.

In Poitou the gouernour of Loches, hauing taken the Castle of la Guierche, the Vicont of the sayd place preffeth his friends, intreats the Duke of Mercœur, assembles all he can, to recouer his house. The Baron of Roche-pose ioyned with some other Commanders of the Country for his Maiesties seruice, comes and chargeth the Vicont, kills a. B. boue three hundred gentlemen, his best footemen, and aboue seauen hundred naturall Spaniards that were come out of Brittain, to succor the Vicont. The Vicont after he had maintayned a little fight, flies to a river by, where thinking to passe in the ferry-boate, the presse grew presently so great, as boate, and passengers sunke. La Guierche with many other gentlemen slaine or drowned, did almost equall the number of the Nobility which died at Coutras.

Then the Princes, and Noblemen, Catholiks, following the King, did sollicite his Maiefty to turne to the Catholike religion, and had by the Duke of Luxembourg sought to appease the bitternesse of the Court of Rome, against the estate of this realme. The Dukes C returne with small hope: the petitions made vnto the King, to prouide for his dutifull subiects of both religions: to preuent the new attempts of Gregory the fourteenth and his adherents, to the preiudice of this Crowne, were the cause of two Edicts made at Mante in the beginning of Iuly: the one confirmed the Edicts of pacification made by the deceased King, vpon the troubles of the realme, and disanulled all that passed in Iuly: 1585. and 1588. in fauour of the League.

The other shewed the Kings intent to maintain the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion in France, with the ancient rights & priuiledges of the French church. The Court of Parliament at Paris, resident at Tours and Chaalons in Champaigne, hauing verified these D Edicts, did presently disanull all the Bulls of Cardinal Caictans Legation, and other Bulls come from Rome the first of March, proceedings, excommunications and fulminations, made by Marcellin Landriano, terming himselfe the Popes Nuntio, as abusive, scandalous, seditious, full of impostures, made against the holy decrees, Canonickall constitutions, approved Councells, and against the rights and liberties of the French Church. They decree, that if any had beene excommunicate by vertue of the sayd proceedings, they should be absolved: the said Bulls and all proceedings by vertue thereof burnt in the market place by the hang-man. Landriano the pretended Nuntio (come priuely into the realme without the Kings leaue or liking) should be apprehended and put into the Kings pryson, and so to proceed extraordinarily against him. And in case he could not be taken, hee should be summoned at three short daies, according to the accustomed manner, and tenne thousand E frankes giuen in reward to him that should deliuer him to the Magistrate. Prohibitions being made to all men to receiue, retayne, conceale or lodge the said pretended Nuntio, vpon paine of death. And to all Clergie men, nor to receiue publish or cause to be published any sentences, or proceedings comming from him, vpon paine to be punished as Traytors. They declared the Cardinals (being at Rome), the Archbishops, Bishops and other Clergy men, which had signed, and ratified the sayd Bull of Excommunication, and approved the most barbarous, abhominable and detestable Parricide trayterously committed on the person of the said deceased King, most Christian and most Catholike, deprived of such spirituall F liuings as they held within the realme, causing the Kings Proctor generall to seaze thereon, and to put them into his Maiesties hands: forbidding all persons eyther to carry or send gold to Rome, and to prouide for the disposition of benefices, vntill the King should otherwise decree.

Thar of Tours added this clause to their decree: they declared Gregory, calling himselfe Pope the fourteenth of that name, an enemy to peace, to the vnion of the Catholike Apostolike and Romane Church, to the King and to his Estate, adhering to the conspiracy

A conspiracy of Spaine, and a fauour of rebels, culpable of the most cruell, most humane, and most detestable Parricide, committed on the person of Henry the third of famous memory, most Christian and most Catholike. The Parliament of the League, did afterwards condemne and cause those decrees to be burnt at Paris, which were made against the Bulls, and Ministers of the Romish sea. So one pulled downe what an other built vp. During this contrariety of Parliaments, there falls out a crosse to diuide the intentions of the Spaniard, and Lorraine without the realme, and of the Dukes of Mayenne and Nemours at Paris. Euery one by diuers practises affected this Crowne, and euery one tryed all his wittes to set it vpon his owne head. But these men had diuided it amongst them, giuing the rest to B vnderstand, that they fed themselues with vaine hopes. To cast more wood and oile into the flames of their diuision, and to ruine one by another, matters were so handled, as the fifteenth of August, the young Duke of Guise escaped out of prison in Tours, and nor far from the riuer, found a troupe of horse appointed by the Lord of La Chastre, to conduct him. This escape caused many bonfires, and greatly reuiued their hearts, who held this Prince fit to make a King of the Vnion. But the cleere-sighted thought with reason, that his arrivall at Paris would rather ruine then aduance their party, and the deuises and practises of other pretendants, must needs soone kindle an extreme and common ielousie amongst them.

Wilest these consult with their most trusty friends and seruants, what effects might C grow by this new accident the King in the same moneth besieged Noyon in Picardy, defeated the succours sent by the league, foure times, killed their most resolute men at armes, tooke many Prisoners, put the rest to flight, and at the Duke of Mayennes nose (who to auoyde this checke, which the League was like to receiue, attempted vpon Mante, sought to force his Maiesties Suisses lodged at Houdan, and approached neere to Noyon, but would not fight) heaping shame vpon his enemies, he forced the besieged to yeeld to his obedience: and moreouer went and dared him to fight before Han. Whilest on thother side the Prince of County reduced Sellies in Berri to the Kings obedience, at the winning whereof hee wonne more honor, being strongly scituated in a marish, then Malherbe and in the keeping of it: for he suffered it to be recouered within two months by him that D had lost it.

Noyon taken by the King.

Let vs returne into Daulphiné, to be hold the most memorable, and most fatall defeat for the enemies of this crowne, the most vertuous expedition of armes, which for these many yeares hath most broken their desseignes vpon Prouence and Daulphiné, and most E weakened the League in those Prouinces, which the Sauoisien affected: Don Amedeo, bastard brother to the Duke of Sauoy, Don Oliuares chiefe of the Spaniards, (whome the Duke had lately obtained of King Phillip his father in law,) the Marquis of Treuic and others, conducted twelue or thirteene thousand men, by the plaine of Poontcharra, neere to the Castle of Bayard, in the valley of Grasiuodan. Doubtlesse the place should ruine the memory of that incomparable Knight, who by the valour of his armes, hath in former times E wonderfully tyed the realme to commend his merits: the Lord Les Diguieres meets them, chargeth and defeats them, leauing two thousand five hundred slaine vpon the place, carries away many prisoners, and most of the Commanders, takes eightene Enseignes with Red Crosses, and makes booty of all their baggage, which amounts to aboue two hundred thousand Crownes, in Chaines, Jewels, Plate, mony, both golde and siluer, horse and armes. Two thousand Romaines and Milanois, which had saved themselues with Conte Galeas of Bel-loyeuse their Commander in the Castle of Aualon, were the next day at the victors discretion: sixe or seauen hundred were cut in peeces, the rest were sent to a place of safety, with white wands in their hands: and then sent home into Italy, with an oth neuer to carry armes against France.

The army of Sauoy defeated.

F The King seeing, that neither by the taking of Noyon, nor by any other baite, he could draw his enemies to fight, doth presse them yet more neerely. To this end he commands, that Paris should be restrained on all sides, both by water and land, and enioy no commodities, but by the mercy of the neighbour garrisons (the which hee enterrayned, vpon the tributes and customes imposed vpon victuals, which they suffered to passe to Paris: and by this meanes empied the inhabitants purses, stript them, and drew out of the City H h h h 2 necessary necessary commodities for his troopes,) then with one part of his army, he marcheth into Normandy, surpriseth Louiers and then resolueth to beseege Rouan, the inhabitants whereof seeming no lesse obstinate then the Parisiens, where-vpon he made a voiage to Diepe, to prouide for all things necessary for this seige, from thence he sent an Ambassador to intreate the Queene of England to assist him at this seige with foure thousand men for three moneths, and to haue the Earle of Essex to command them, the taking of which towne imported very much he said for the Trade of the English Marchants. The Queene did willingly grant these succors, and the Earle came at the appointed time with foure thousand foote, and a hundred and fifty horse as gallant troupes as could be scene: the King in the meane time was in Picardy attending his Germaine army which came vnto him vnder the command of the Prince of Anhalt. The English lay idle and halfe of the time was spent that was limited for their stay: at the last the King sent the Marshall of Biron to ioine with them with part of his army, who beseegeing Gournay with their ioyned forces they tooke it by composition, and then vpon the Kings arriuall they went to inuest Rouan, where at their first sitting downe the garrison made a gallant sally vpon the English quarter, but they repulst them and beate them into their towne as valiantly, but the English lost in this skirmish Maister Walter Deuoreux the Earle of Essex brother, a gallant yong Gentleman and of great hope. This seidge grew long and the inhabitants cried out for succours being reduced to a very desperat estate. So the King of Spaine sends to the Duke of Parma, commands him to leaue the government of the Low Countries to Cont Mansfield, to go and free Rouan, and to imbrace such occasions as should be offered. Wherevpon he parts from Bruxelles with 4000. foote, and 3000. horse: and fortified with the succours of Italy, and 3000. Swisses, he marcheth by small journeis, for he wisely conceiued that his maister sent him into France for the same considerations, that he wold haue giuen him the conduct of his army by sea into England, and vnder this shew of armes he practised an other designe: to cause the estates of the League to giue the Crowne of France to the Infanta of Spaine, whome the father promised to marry with one of the heads of the party, whom the estates should name.

This tended greatly to the preiudice of the Duke of Mayenne, for he was married: and the eldest sonnes of Lorraine, the Dukes of Guise and Nemours were to marry. He is therefore now resolutely determined to crosse the 16. Tribunes of Paris, who with their Champions carried away the peoples voyces, and aboue al others, did feed the Spaniards hopes in this realme, to whome (inticed by the gold of Peru, and his prodigall promises) they had already solde the Capitall City. The 16. growne hatefull through their tyrannous authority, feare to be soone suppressed: they resolute to preuent it, and rather to vnhorse the Duke, the better to aduance their affaires according to King Phillips intentions. One thing seemed to aduance their desseigne: they held prisoner one named Brigard a Proctor of the towne-house, accused to haue had intelligence with the King, and for letters written to his Maiesty. Brigard escaped out of prison: they suspect the President Briffon, and the Councillors Larcher & Tardife, to haue fauored his escape. In this fury the 15. of Nouember, they seaze vpon these 3. venerable persons, hale them to the Chastelet, cause them to be strangled in the close prison, and the next day, hang vp their bodies at the Greue, with infamous writings on their breasts. This execrable fact might haue extended farther, and made the like spectacle of any one that should in any thing haue controuled the actions of these homicides. The Duke of Mayenne (who treated with Parma) posits to appease this tumult. He sends for Espritel, Francis of Ardilly a gentleman of Beause who commanded in the Loure in the absence of Riuande his kinsman, asking him if there were an executioner prouided. This had bin sufficient to amaze the most constant, if he were not assured not to haue failed against the comandement which the Duke had giuen him at his departure, nor to obey any but the Lord of Belin. He offers his hand to Ardilly, and commands him to cause those which he should send vnto him to be presently hanged. Cruce, Louchart, Hamellne, Auroux, Emonnet, Ruffe le Clerc, and many others of the 16. which could not be found in the heat, escaped the gibbet. Cruce had bene first hanged if the Bishop of Triest had not purchast his pardon from the Duke of Mayenne. Louchart had escaped this mischiefe if he would haue accepted the honor which the Duke offered him to make him commissary of the victuals in the army. I will not (said he proudly) goe out of Paris.

Division between the Duke of Mayenne and the sixteene

A You haue men about you to whome you serue as a buckler, if your presence were not, we would make them change their Language. Hamellne seeing Louchart strangled, made a long prayer in French. Emonnet, a violent man, struggled much with the Hangman that bound him, thinking they would onely terrifie him: Hamellne being led towards his companions he desired to be confessed, protesting before all the assistants, being about forty, that he was not culpable of the president Briffons death: yet that God had worthily punished him for that he had in a night wickedly slaine a Secretarie belonging to the Cheualier d'Aumale, whome he had scene receiue two hundred crownes in gold which he had. Auroux excused himselfe that he was not of Loucharts practice although he had solicited him, that he tooke his death in good part, for many other great offences which he had committed, but he named them not. Thus these foure rascalls were hanged in the Lower Hall of the Loure, the which they call Saint Louys Hall, and by him, who for that he had made no refusal to put them secretly to death and without any ordinary forme of proceeding, whome the beauty of their Scarlet Robes made reuerent and to be respected, shalbe hanged within few yeares after with other confederates of that cursed attempt, when as after these furies the capitall city of this realme shall acknowledge her lawfull Lord, and the Court of Parliament recouer her former dignity, to reuiue these miserable wretches opprest at this day by the damnable commands of these Tribunes. The Duke of Mayenne by this execution shortned their number, weakened their authority, and maintayned his owne as well as he could, and to pacifie the people, guilty of this mutinie, he published the tenth of December, an abolition of things past in this disorder. The King in the meane time made his necessary prouisions for the siege of Rouan, and appointed his store-houses at Caen, Pont Larche, Ponteau de Mer, and other places. On the other side, the hope of speedy succours from the Stranger, the presence of Henry of Lorraine, eldest sonne to the Duke of Mayenne, and the arriuall of the Seigneur of Villars, with 600. horse and 1200. Musketers, made the Cittizens to persist in their rebellion: & the Parliament, to forbid all men by a decree, in any sort to fauor the party of Henry of Bourbon, vpon paine of death: ordaining that the oth of the vnion made the 20. of Ianuary, in the year 1589. should be monthly renewed in the generall assembly made to that effect, in the Abbay of Saint Owen, with comandement by the sayd Court to the inhabitants, to obey the Lord of Villars, Lieutenant to the sayd Henry, in all he should command for the preseruatiou of the towne. Moreover Bauquemare then first President, procured that all the Inhabitants should sweate before La Londe Mayor of Rouan, to reueale all such as by word or deed should fauor the King of Nauarre, to bee exemplarily punished. Villars hauing got footing within Rouan, he presently displaced his superior: settles his authority, expells all such as he suspected, fortified Saint Catheryns mount, and did all acts of hostility against the King, anoying his army what he could, the which besides the obstinacy of the beseegeed, was to encounter with the extreame rigour of the winter, sickness, and want of victuals. But they surpassed all these difficulties cheerefully, and the beseegeed were ready to yeeld, when as newes comes that the Dukes of Mayenne and Parma had taken Neuschastell, (abandoned by the Kings garrison) and were lodged at Franque-Ville halfe a dayes iourney from Rouan. The Duke of Guise, la Chastre and Virry his Nephew led the foreward. The Dukes of Mayenne, of Parma and Sfondrate Nephew to Gregory the 14. the battaile. The Duke of Aumale, the Earle of Chaligny, brother to the Queene Douager, Beisaulphin, Balaigny and Saint Paul the reuerward: Bossempierre and la Motte, Lorrains, led the Suisses and the artillery. Whilest that the King made a necessary voiage to Diepe, to frustrate some intelligences of his enemies, the Marshall of Biron drawes forth seauen peeces of artillery to Bans, a village about Darnetall, plants them in three places, and puts himselfe in battaile, to receiue the Duke of Parma, who should come to lodge in the valley on that side, and by his countenance, made them thinke that he had a desire to fight. The King arriues, continues in battaile almost thirty houres, and prouokes his enemy by continuall skirmishes. But he was encountered by a cunning temporiser, who passing with his troupes wide of Darnetall, made the king to deuise a new stratageme, to drawe him on more, and to engage him, as it happened soone after. The King dismisseth his Nobility, but with charge to be ready at the first command, & by continual skirmishes kept Rouan from any releefe, from the twentieth of March to the 21. of Aprill. In the end the Dukes 1592. of Maycenné, Guise and Parma, seize vpon Caudebec, from whence the garrison was dislodged, and the same day they come to Rouan, but stay not many howers, neither had they means to victuall it. His Maiefty seeing that Rouan was not supplied with victualls, passeth at Pont-Larche, cauleth his army to a pance towards Fontaine-le-Bourg, and sends for all his garisons of Louuiers, Mante, Meulan, Vernon, and other places neere, so as fortified with about 3000. horse and 6000. foote in lesse then 6. daies, he turnes head towards the village of Iuetot, where the Dukes of Mayenne and Guise were lodged, charge them forward and defeats it quite, chaseth the Dukes about two leagues from Parmaes quarter, leaving their baggage and plate in the possession of La Guisché. The first of May he takes from them an other lodging, leaues about sixe hundred Leaguers dead vpon the place, and loofeth but 5. souldiars and 18. or 20. hurt. All these checkes should draw the Dukes to fight: but Parma seeks onely to free himselfe from the King, and the rest had no desire to make tryall of their valours. They held themselues very close intrenched and fortified within their Campe issuing forth no more then they had lately done neere vnto Lagny. The King preffeth them, and takes from them all passages both for victualls and retreat. They likewise intrench a great wood, and to stoppe the Kings approach, lodge there 2000. Spaniards and Wallons. In sight of their whole army his Maiefty forceth this intrenchment, and had it not bene for a smal number who by great speede recovered the army) had defeated the whole troupe. For ten daies space the King tyred them with continuall skirmishes during the which he views the situation of their Campe and the 10. of May he made choise of such forces as he held necessary, and by five of clocke in the morning chargeth a quarter which the leaguers held to be most safe, and without resistance, kills about 2500. men vpon the place, carries away about 2000. horse, and winnes all the baggage. To conclude, this warre brought forth nothing so memorable as that which was done at Caudebec, at Iuetot and at Aumale. But for a prooofe of the perpetuall assistance and fauour of Heauen to our King, amidst this thundering of artillery, and so many showers of shot, his Maiefty was hurt with a Harguebuse in the reynes: but yet so miraculously, as the force of the bullet was spent in the emptines of the aire, and lay betwixt his armour and his backe, giuing the King this lesson by a diuine aduertisement, My Lord, husband your life more sparingly: it is necessary for your subjects. The Duke of Parma escaped not all these encounters without a musket-shot in the arme: the wound did accompany him to his graue.

In the end blowes, hunger and extreame thirst, forced these Dukes to take their way to Paris in confusion, from whence Parma (carrying no tokens of victory) passed through Brie, recovered Arthois, and so went to refresh himselfe at Bruxelles: then in the end of the yeare he died in Arras, as he returned from the Spaw. His reputation began to decay. He had preuayled little in France, and Conte Maurice did daily take something from him in the Low Countries. He had bene aduertised, by a great soldiars and a man of iudgement, that hauing taken the Towne of Antwerp (against the opinion of all the world) in the yeare 1585. he would shake hands with warre. Doubtlesse this Prince should haue ended his labours by this great seruice done to King Phillip his maister, as the most glorious triumph, which Spaine had long time seene.

Thus the Duke of Parmas troups by land were weakned, and those hee had imbarcked were fought withal, some taken, and the rest sunke by the Hollanders. So Sfondrate came to consume his troups in France. Thus France escaped at this time the proud threats of her ancient enemies. Rouan pressed with as great necessity as before, bought corne out of Villars store-houses, at his owne price, whereby he got an infinit treasure. The King weighing well the toile his Nobility had endured dismissed some, and reteyned the most resolute, and to hinder the Parmesan from attempting any thing, he sent the Marshall of Biron to follow him at the heeles. Who loath to remaine idle, beseegeth, battereth and takes Espernay. But Espernay must be the fatal place to end his labours, and by his death breake off some other desseins which his Maiefty had, who to stoppe the entry of another army of strangers (which King Phillip at the intreaty of the chiefe of the League, nothing sorry for the Duke of Parmas disgrace, whose pride they could not beare) determined to send, vnder the conduct of the yong Duke of Parma, assisted by the Duke of Feria, vntill the comming of the Arch-Duke Ernest, brother to the Emperour Rodolphus, gaue order for the most vrgent affaires

Affaires of his realme: hee diuided his forces into the most conuenient places, to set vpon the League, where they had greatest strength, and laboured to effect some intelligences hee had within Paris. But the period of his happines was not yet come. During these practises, the Duke of Mayenne surprised Ponteau de mer: and to get more bagges of double pistols, he treats againe with the Agents of Spaine, touching the assembly of their Estates, to make the Crowne electiue, against the fundamentall Law of the realme. But he had his desire apart, and the greatest part of the Parliament was tired with this hidious confusion, vnder the which their scarlet robes could not appeare so beautifull, as vnder a stately Royalty: and the chiefe of the third Estate inclining vnto peace, abhorred these tedious furies of the League: The Duke of Nemours for his part layed the foundation of a petty Monarchie at Lions, but hee built it vpon the sand. He was now installed in the Towne which Maugiron had sold him treacherously, considering the shew he had made of faithfull seruice to the King, and the towne and Castles of Vienne in Dauphiné, the which he had receaued to the prejudice of the truce, which was then betwixt them of Lions and Dauphiné. Beeing assured of these good places, he goes to field, but with more brute then fruite: for he did not fortifie his party, but by the taking of Saint Marcellin and Echelles, places of weake resistance: and doubtlesse Belliere won more honour in the defence, then the Duke did in the conquest of the last. The Colonnell Alphonso, and Les Diguieres, vpon assistance of the truce were farre off, the one in Prouence, the other in Languedoc, where both opposed themselues against the forces of the League. This breach recalled them soone into Dauphiné, where with their ioynt forces they recouer that which the Duke had taken, not daring to oppose himselfe. In the end Les Diguieres hauing thrust the Duke of Nemours out of Dauphiné, (who by fauour of the forces of Sauoy, thought to settle himselfe there) enters into Piedmont, in the month of September, fortifies Briqueras, batters and takes the towne and Castle of Caours, chargeth the Dukes men at Vigon, forceth and defeats them. The Duke of Sauoy posts to Turin, and seeks to take the fort begonne at Briqueras by scalado. Hee is repulst with dishonour and losse. They charge him in his retreat, but some feare of an ambush made them retire. And Les Diguieres (hauing left the Lord of Piët. to commaund in Piedmont) returns to Grenoble, whether the affaires of the Prouence did call him.

On the other side seeing the armes of Spaine had preuayled so little on the land, they must try if some enterprize by sea would repayre their former losses. The Gouvernour of Fontarabye had long practised vpon Bayonne with a Phisition named Blancpignon, who had intelligence with a Spaniard that had liued long in the Towne, and vnder borrowed reames of arte, did by letter negotiate the surprise of Bayonne, and the rooting out of all the Kings officers and seruants. Their treason was so well aduanced, as a fleet of shippes with an armie at land, was ready for the execution, when as by God permission La Hulliere Gouvernour of Bayonne surprised the Lacquay comming from Fontarabye with letters of credit to the Traytors, who being taken and beheaded afterwards, discovered soone the whole practise: but the Spaniard chose rather to die then to write those letters hee was required, to giue direction to the attempters, and to lay a plot for his companions.

In October, the Duke of Bouillon followed with 400. horse and 200. harguebusers, before the towne of Beaumont, defeated Ambise great Marshall of Lorraine, Lieutenant generall to the Duke, accompanied with eyght hundred horse, and two thousand foote: hee slew the Commaunder, and about 7. hundred others, tooke their artillery, their ensignes, and their Cornets, sent home foure hundred Lansquenets, with white wands, and lost not one man of marke. A small fish called Remora stayes a great ship: so a paultry hens roust ruines the League in Languedoc and Quercy. The Duke of Joyeuse (brother to him who died at Courtras), hauing spoiled the Country about Montauban with 6. hundred maisters and foure thousand foot, French and Lansquenets, in the end became maister of Monbequin, Mombartier, Monbeton, and tooke Barre by composition: but in reuenge of 80. souldiars he had lost before it, (contrary to his faith) he puts most of them that yeked to the sword. A treachery which caused his brothers death, and for the which, the vengeance of God shall soone confound this man. The fort of Saint Maurice came in like sort into his power, and then hee besieged Villemur. The Lord of the place called Reniers, commaunded about two hundred and fifty souldiars, whome the Lord of Thémines Senechal Seneshall of Quercy (a wife and valiant Gentleman) releued suddenly with fixe and forty men, as well Cuirasses, as Harguebufiers, led by the Seigneur of Pedoue: and then (being ioyned with the Duke of Espernon) hee caused Ioyeuze to raise the siege, recouered Mauzac and some other small places thereabouts.

But whilest his troupes sleepe at their ease, after the order and maner of the French, with too great confidence and contempt of the enemy, the Duke of Ioyeuze, sets vpon them with all speede in the night, kills foure hundred, hurts a great number of them, and but for the wisdom and aduise of Themines had slaine all the rest, and gotten two Cannons of Montauban. This done the Duke of Espernon retires into Prouence. His brother La Valette died in February, and the Estate of Prouence required the Dukes presence beeing Gouernour. Ioyeuze layes hold of this occasion, and the tenth of September retournes and camps before Villemur. Reiners commits the place to the Baron of Mauzac, to Chambert and la Charze, wife and valliant Commanders in warre: and goes himselfe to gather together some succors at Montauban. The Seigneur of Desme, is happily there with some forces, and without any stay puts himselfe into Villemur. Ioyeuze made his battery of eyght Cannons, and two Culuerins, when as Themines accompanied with fixe score Maisters, and 200. Harguebufiers, marcheth courageously to succor them, causeth his horsemen to light, and sends their horses safely backe to Montauban, and so with great dexterity, thrusts himselfe into Villemur. And in good time; for the next day, the 20. of September, Ioyeuze gaue a furious assault, but it was valliantly defended, with great losse to the enemy. At the same instant Themines giues an alarm with foure Trumpets, which hee had brought with him, chargeth Ioyeuze fiercely, and defeats a regiment newly come from Tholouse, with a supply of powder, bullets, pikes, and iron forks.

Hereupon the Marshall of Montmorency Gouernour of Languedock supplies the beseged with some troupes led by Leeques and Chambault, who aduertised of new forces, come to Ioyeuze, attends some dayes for Missillac Gouernour of Auuegrne, to ioyne with him. Ioyeuze meanes to preuent them, and before they ioyne with the Auuegrnac, to set vpon them. Hee chargeth them at Bellegard, and finds the beginning succesfull and pleasing, but the end foule and mournfull: for hee left the field and returned with great losse. D

Notwithstanding hee meanes to amaze the beseged, and by the Councell of Onoux and Momberault, politike Captaines, he makes many fires in his Campe, as a signe of victory and ioy: but Themines, Leeques and Chambault did but laugh at this policy. Missillac arriues at Montauban with a hundred Maisters and a good number of Harguebufiers. Ioyeuze hauing his troupes then disperfed, some before Villemur, others in field against the Kings seruants, all the Commanders resolute to fight with him. Missillac leads the forward, Chambault the battayle, Leeques the reerward: and the neeneth of October, they resolutely set vpon the Dukes first trench, by the regiments of Clouzel and Montoisson, garded by two hundred souldiers, and presently succoured by foure hundred others, they force them and chafe them: to their second trench, after an houre and a halfe fight vnder their Commander. The rest of the Kings armie comes violently vpon them. Themines issueth out of Villemur and chargeth them behind. He leaues the place, & retires farther off to Condomnes, where his Campe & artillery remained. His men seeing themselves pursued, take this retreat for a flight: they grow amazed, all disband, all fly in disorder, feare makes them to loose their iudgement, and the most part casting themselves into the riuer of Tar, (the bridge of boats which Ioyeuze had made beeing vncapable of so great a presse) desired rather to try the fortune of the water, then of the victors sword. They cut the bridge, which was in a maner the death of all them which had trusted in this violent Element. Ioyeuze disapoynted of the vse of the bridge, leapes among the rest into the riuer of Tar, beeing full of them that fled, and the Tar swallowing vp his body, as the rest, leanes his soule to seeke the place of his destiny. The Victors passe the foard, and charge them that did swimme in the water, pursue them that fly, cut all in peeces they incounter, and of so great a number bring but forty three prisoners.

The Duke of Ioyeuze drow

The death of about three thousand men ruined the League in Languedoc and Quercy. Three Cannons, two Culuerins, two and twenty ensignes, and all the baggage, were the spoyles of this so memorable day. And to make it the more memorable, the victors

A lost but tenne men, whereof foure, beeing not well knowne, did by mistaking run like fortune with the vanquished. Thus Villemur hauing indured aboue two thousand Cannon shot, was fully deliuered, with the losse of seauenteene souldiers only. The Dukes body was drawne out of the water and buried in Villemur, and the Kings armie, consisting of fixe hundred maisters, and two thousand and fixe hundred shot, besides those which remained in the place beseged, retired, (hauing purchased great honour) to their garrisons. Thus the Leagues affaires began to languish: the impatiency and lightnesse of people (who promise vnto themselves much, and suffer little) did quench this great heat which was lately seene in good townes, and the whole party runs headlong to their ruine. They did no more

B take for paiment the assurance which was giuen them, to prouide shortly for this common disorder: & by an assembly of the Estates, proceed to the election of a king, who should raise the pillars of their Estate, and restore the good order and harmony that should be betwixt them. The zeale of the new Pope, Clement the eyght, moued them very little. The forces and pistolets of Spaine grow hateful vnto them. The actions of the Duke of Mayenne are detested, they abhorre the tyrannies which other petty Kings would practise in their Provinces, and did well foresee, that the ambition of great men would soone thrust the people into the gulfe of vtter ruine: finally euery one begins to lift vp his head, and to desire peace. They speake of it in the open Parliament of the League. The chiefe of the City ioyne with them that are desirous of quiet, and in the end procure an assembly of the City of Paris, in the midst of Nouember. They speake very plainly, to end these troubles, and to send to treat with the King to that end and purpose: besides (by the death of the Cardinall of Bourbon lately deceased,) the preferring and aduancing of the vnckle before the nephew, which they pretended, was no more of force.

declines.

The Duke of Mayenne seeing himselfe ready to be disapoynted, goes to the towne-house, intreats the assemblie to referre the decision of that poynt to the Estates, and to forbear to deale therein. Otherwise (sayd hee) I shall haue reason to thinke that the authors thereof are ill affected to our party, and will deale with them as with the enemies of our religion. Notwithstanding all his threats, it was decreed, that attending a conuocation of the Estates, they should send vnto the King to obtaine a free trafficke betwixt them and the Townes of this Realme. The Duke not able to impugne this conclusion seemes to allowe thereof. This was to recover some life after a long numnesse and faynting, and to returne to the way of obedience: But the Legat of Rome (a pensioner of Spayne, and the chiefe of the League) hoping to drawe the affayres to another course, calling from all parts the Deputies of Townes confederate to assist at the Estates at Paris, they sought all meanes to mortifie these motiues of charity to theyr Countrey which reuiued in the most modest. And the better to aduance theyr desseines, they publish a certaine writing in forme of a Bull, commaunding and giuing authority to the Cardinall of Placentia to assist and to confirme the future election of a new King. This doth sufficiently discover that which hitherto they haue concealed and kept secret, couering (with the pretext of religion) their wicked and damnable conspiracy: which opened the gates to the ouerthrow and ruine of all order and humane society, instituted by God, especially of this most famous and flourishing Monarchy, whereof the fundamentall Law consists cheefly in the order of the lawfull succession of our Kings.

The Court of Parliament (beeing remooued from Paris to Chaalons,) by a decree of the eyghtenth of Nouember, (confirming the request of the Kings Proctor generall,) allowed of his appeale from the graunt of the sayd Bull, and authority contained therein, the publication and execution thereof, and whatsoeuer was therein contayned. They decreed, that Philip of the tittle of Saint Onuphrins, Cardinall of Placentia, should beey cted to plead against the sayd appeale. They exhorted all men not to suffer themselves to be infected with the poyson and witchcraft of such rebels and seditious persons: but to continue in their duties like good and naturall French-men, and to retaine still the obedience and loue they owe vnto their King and Countrey, not adhering to the practises of such as (vnder the colour of religion) would inuade and trouble the Estate, and bring in the barbarous Spaniards, and other vsurpers.

or fauour the said rebels, or to transport themselves into any townes or places that might bee assigned for the said pretended election: vpon paine for the Nobles to be degraded of their Nobility, and they and their posterity to bee declared infamous and base, and for the Clergy to loose the possession of their benefices, and to bee punished as all other offenders, guilty of treason, troublers of the publike peace, traytors to their Countrey, without hope to obtaine pardon, remission or abolition. And all townes not to receaue the said rebels and seditious to make the said assembly, to lodge, intertaine or harbour them. Moreover they decreed, that the place where that resolution had beene taken, together with the towne of the sayd assembly, should be quite razed, without hope to be reedified, for a perpetuall memory of their trechery and treason: Commanding all persons to set vpon such as should transport themselves to the sayd towne, to assist at this assembly: And to the Protector generall to informe against the authors, and procurers of such monopolies and conspiracies made against the Estate.

This decree was but laughed by the heads of the League, and did nothing daunt their priuate hopes. Euery one makes his faction apart. Euery one desired to sit in his maisters chayre: and not one would bee a seruant or Companion. The Dukes of Guise, Mayenne, Nemours, and Sauoy, the Marquis of Pont, sought by sundry practises to get the voyces of the pretended Estates. The instructions found in the cofers of the Baron of Tenisley, after his defeat by Vaugrenan, who commanded for the King in Saint Iohn de Laune in Bourgoigne, did sufficiently discouer the high proiects which certaine bad Councillors made this yong Prince to conceiue. But about all, the Duke of Mayenne, supposing that after the death of the Duke of Parma, (whom hee feared as very opposit to this authoritiy,) this occurrent would giue him meanes to recouer his credit, began to play the King within Paris, hoping the Estates would prefer him before the yonger: or at the least, the title of Lieutenant generall to the King of Spaine, could not escape him in the conquest of the realme. For the first fruits of his absolute power, hee forceth the Presidents and Councillors remaining at paris to receiue Rosne one of his most trusty friends, with the title of Marshall of the crowne and Gouverneur of the Ile of France, dignities fit for a Nobleman of a better house and quality. And to bridle the Parisiens who demanded peace, he caused on Christmas Eue, going vp to the Pallace (the city beeing in armes,) the foresaid decree against the Popes Bull to bee openly burnt, then by a publike declaration hee inuited all the Catholikes of the Realme to vniue themselves, and to forsake the obedience which they shewed to a Prince, whose profession and perseuerance made him incapable, and appoynted the conuocation of the Estates on the feuenreenth of Ianuary following at Paris. There ioyntly to seeke (without passion said hee or respect of any mans interest) the remedies which they should thinke in their consciences to bee most profitable for the preservation of religion and the Estate.

But what Estates? Like vnto those of Troyes, where they disinherited Charles the seauenth, the true and lawfull heyre of the Crowne, as excommunicate. Estates chosen almost of all the scemme of the people, of the most mutinous and seditious: corrupted by money, and all pretending some priuate profit in change and inuocation. A Parliament compounded of men, which eyther enioyed the benefice, the office, or the house of their neighbour, or that had stolne his goods or detained his reuenues, or (to conclude) that feared by a peace to bee toucht for some committed crimes, bankerouts, infamous and wicked. Estates where there appears not one Prince of the blood, no Chancellor, no Marshall of France, no Presidents of Soueraine Courts, none of the Kings Proctors generall in his Parliament: few men of reputation, knowne to haue loued the peoples good and their owne honours. No men of marke and account: without whom they could not assemble, nor hold any iust and lawfull Estates. Finally a Parliament, where they see none but passionate strangers, gaping after France, greedy of the blood and wealth thereof, ambitious and reuenging women: corrupt Preefts, licentious and full of vaine hopes. No Noblemen of worth, but three or foure, who already had resolved to abandon that faction: all the rest were beggarly, louing warre and trouble, during the which they eate the poore mans bread, not able to maintaine their owne traines in time of peace, An Italian Legat, and vassall to a strange Prince, (who in this quality neyther can nor ought to haue any place)

A place) sent to hinder the liberty of voyces, and to authorise such as had promised him to do wonders for the affaires of Rome and Spaine. A Cardinall of Peluë, a Frenchman by nation, but pleading the cause of the King of Spaine and the rights of Lorraine. The Duke of Feria, and Mendosa Ambassadour of Spaine had their Agents and Aduocates, by whom they gaue them to vnderstand, that the King of Spaines intention was only, to haue a King chosen that might pacifie the troubles of the realme, deliuer them from their enemies, defend them against all assaillants, and restore the Crowne to her first beauty. And representing the voluntary bounty of the Catholike King, and the great effects of the succors giuen by him vnto France, wherein he had employed about sixe millions of gold, he would inferre, that none but he was capable of this election: or else in regard of him, the Infanta Donna Isabella, to whom, the sayd Ambassadour durst maintaine, that by the Lawes of nature, of God and of the realme, it did belong. Doubtlesse from the Insolent proceedings and proud desseins of strangers, the soueraigne author and gardien of Estates caused the preservation of this monarchie to grow. They commended this Ambassage, and received it with honour. But the pretensions of this Infanta were reiectd at the first, as a proposition contrary to the fundamentall laws of the realme. His Agents seeing themselves frustrate of this first demand, they frame a second, vpon the election of the Arch-duke Ernest, first brother to the Emperour, to whom the King of Spaine promised to giue his daughter to wite, when as the assemblee had declared her Queene of France. But what should become of so many Competitors growne vp in France? So this proposition finding no man willing to entertaine it, remayned frutelesse.

The desseins of Spaine.Craft by some men
of honour.

Now some thinking to giue the last mate to the Kings good fortune, vrge a third expedient: That if they giue this Crowne vnto the Noble Infanta, and to him of the Princes of France, comprehending the house of Lorraine, whom the King of Spaine should choose, they would cause this election to be seconded with an army of eight thousand foote and two thousand horse, and within few monethes to be fortified with the like numbers, which soone should reduce France wholly and peaceably to these new Kings: that they would giue a hundred thousand Crownes monethly, so long as the warre should last, to entertaine tenne thousand foote, and three thousand horse within the realme. Was not this to feed mens mindes with fancies, dreames and imaginations? But no man giues his voice to this last proposition. Doubtlesse there was no proportion to recompence the succors sent by Philip to the reuolted townes, with the Crowne of France.

Contrariwise many hauing their mindes meere French, knew well that this proposition was to make matters irreconcilable, and to bring an immortall warre into France, and therefore with a feruent zeale, and great affection they opposed themselves against the reception thereof: hoping the eternall prouidence, who had so often raysed France from most gricuous falls of warre, and from greater infirmities, would now preuent these latter dangers, otherwise then by the subuersion of the lawes which were made to support it. The declaration which his Maiesty opposed to that of the Duke of Mayenne, did much preuaile to fortifie those good mindes in their commendable resolution, and prepared their hearts generally to conceiue a great hope of a speedie peace. For the King discouering the practises of his rebellious subiects, namely of their heads, and the Dukes treachery, presuming to assemble the Estates of the realme, which may not be called but by royall authority, and for matter of religion, hee protesteth that besides the Conuocation of a Councell, if there may be found any better or more speedie meanes to come to the instruction which they pretend to giue him, to diuert him from the exercise of his religion, to that of the Catholike and Romish, he will willingly embrace it with all his heart, giuing leaue to the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, and other Noblemen that did assist him, to send their Deputies to the Pope to deale in this instruction, and to be pleased therewith; and blaming the Leaguers who had hindred the effects, hee layed a good foundation of the obedience which his subiects prepared for him. Declaring moreover this pretended assemblee at Paris, to be attempted against the Lawes, against the good and quiet of the realme: and all that should be treated or concluded therein, abusive, and of no force. Terming the Duke and his adherents in that case, guilty of high treason, shewing that he could maintaine his authoritie against all vsurpers.

declaration against the Leaguers.

1593.

But offering pardon to all townes, Commonalties and persons seduced by the chiefe of the League, and exhorting them to remember themselves, hee made his subiects begin to tast that great and admirable clemency, whereby hee hath wonne the hearts, and brought the affections of the French to a perfect and most voluntary obedience.

The conference at Surere.

To this declaration of his Maiesty, the Princes and Noble-men Catholikes that were about him, added another, which they sent to these pretended Estates, and required that some should be deputed on eyther part, to resolve of the fittest expedients to pacifie these troubles, for the preferuation of the Catholike religion and the Estate. The Duke of Mayenne and his party accept of this conference, so as it may bee done by Catholikes onely, and it began the twenty ninth of Aprill at Surene neere Paris. Whilest the good Cardinall of Bourbon liued, hee was an instrument for the League: now hee is dead, religion is their onely pretext. And the more the King giues them hope of his conuersion to the Romish Church, the more violent they are to drawe the people from this beleefe.

Cross by the court of Rome

The Legat seemes to crosse it, and by a publike exhortation full of iniuries against his Maiesty, hee labours to perswade the French, that the King long since dismembred from the body of the Church, was most iustly pronounced incapable of the Crowne. Then opposing himselfe against the decrees of the Parliaments of Tours, and Chaalons, made against the monitories of Landriano, hee extolles his maisters prayfes, condemnes the Parliament which had condemned his Bulls, magnifies the Estates of the League, who reiect-ed an obstinate heretike and relaps, with a resolution neuer to yeeld vnto him, for (said he) such is the Popes will and pleasure. But why a relaps and obstinate, considering the due submission which our Henry makes to yeeld to better instruction? The Pope himselfe will harken soone vnto him, and all the Consistorie will blesse his resolution.

The answer of the Estates to the Partis of Spaine.

Both the Duke and Legat preuaile little in their deuises. Those which held the first place in this assembly, and had no other care but to preserve this Monarchy, found this expedient: that to frustrate the former propositions, they should say to the Duke of Feria and other ministers of Spaine, that it would be now out of season, and dangerous to make this election: and that the assembly reserved the conclusion thereof, vntill they might see an army ready, by meanes whereof their resolutions might be supported and put in execution. Courage! This clame promiseth that we shall soone anchor in a safe harbour. And that which aduanceth the shippe of our estate with a more prosperous gale, that great and Magnificent Senat of France remayning at Paris, resumes their credit, and the beauty of their scarlet robes: they exhort the Duke of Mayenne to imploy his authority of Lieutenant, that vnder colour of religion, the Crowne fall not into strangers hands, against the lawes of the Realme, and to provide speedily for the peoples quiet: and by a decree of the eight and twentieth of Iuly, they declare all treaties made, or to be made to that end, voyde, and of no validity, as being made to the hurt and prejudice of the Salique Law, and other fundamentall Lawes of State.

A decree of the Parliament at Paris.

This decree did wonderfully incense the Duke of Mayenne and the agents of Spaine, especially against the President Le Mostre who deliuered the speech: who encountering all their chollers, left them to bite vpon the bridle. But see now the fatall blowe, which ruines that third party, by the which Catholikes were ready to thrust the realme into new combustions, and cuts off all difficulties, as well in them which made a scruple to fight vnder the ensignes of a king of any other religion then their own, as in others which had so long time shadowed their mutinies, and rebellions with this goodly pretext. The king, after the taking of Dreux, satisfied in his conscience, by the instruction of the Archbishop of Bourges, of Re-ne Benoist Curate of S. Eustache in Paris, and of some other doctors, desires to be admitted in to the bosome of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Church, and the twenty fife of Iuly made a publike & sollemne profession at S. Denis to the said Arch-bishop, assisted by Charles Cardinall of Bourbon, Arch-bishop of Rouan, and Nephew to the deceased, nine Bishops, with many other prelates and religious men: he protested to liue and die in the sayd Catholike religion, swearing to defend it against all men: he made profession of his faith, and performed all ceremonies requisite in so sollemne an act: and then he receiued absolution and blessing, with an admirable ioy and acclamation of the people.

The Kings conuersion.

1593.

A Presently after this sollemne act, his Maiesty sent the Duke of Neuers, the Marquis of Pisani, and Henry of Gondy Bishop of Paris to the Pope, to yeeld obedience by them to the holy see, and to testifie that he desired no lesse to imitate the example of Kings his Predecessors, and to deserue the title and ranke of the first sonne of the Church by his actions, then they had bene careful to get it and preserve it, and to beseech him to allow of his conuersion, and to countenance it with his owne blessing. This is that great action of State which the chiefe of the League most feared: for what could they now obiekt against the King, to contradict his right, and to terme him incapable of his inheritance? See now by what subtilty they seeke to crosse his Maiesties affaires, and to support strangers. They complaine first of his sodaine change, and say they may not trust him: that his Holinesse must beginne and end this worke. That the King should make all submissions to the Sea of Rome, and attend if the Consistory would declare him capable to gouerne the Realme of France. That hauing commandement from the conclave they would aduise to doe what should be reason. Vntill the which were effected they would not treat any more with the Kings deputies, and till that this change of Religion which the King had made, were approued by the Pope, whereof afterwards they would take aduise, for assurance of the preferuation of the onely Catholike Religion in this Realme.

The Duke of Mayenne hauing (to his great prejudice) so often tried the proud insolencies of the Spaniards, and since knowne that their practises tended onely to feed a perpetual fire of diuision among the French, by meanes of the election of a new King, whom they promised to marry to the Infanta, had often protested, that when he should see the King returne into the bosome of the Church, from the which his Religion had excluded him, hee would presently yeeld him obedience as his most humble seruant. The Kings conuersion doth now free him of this imaginary scruple. The King himselfe offering him offices, and honourable aduancements, seekes to drawe him out of those snares from the which hee would willingly bee freed. But he is so farre engaged as hee can hardly retire himselfe: and some hope that the decisions of Rome, the resolution of the Estates, the conclusions of the Colledge of Sorbonne, and the practises of Spaine, would yet worke some good effects in his fauour, doth with-hold him from accepting of his Maiesties offers.

But on the other side hee cannot digest the aduancement of the Duke of Guise, whose marriage with the Infanta the Partisans of Spaine did solicit, as being heire to his fathers pretensions. And to ouerthrow it, hee seemes in generall termes to approue so great an honour done vnto his Nephew: but requiring for his owne particular so high and difficult things, he giues them easily to vnderstand, that he will not subiect his will, to the appetites of Pope Clement, nor of Philip King of Spaine, neither yet to the decision of the Estates whilest that he crosseth the propounded election of the Duke of Guise. The conference at Surene giues the subiect meanes to tast the liberty of the fields and the sweetnesse of peace, concluding the last of Iuly a general suspension of armes on either side for three moneths, E a meanes which shall soone reduce whole Prouinces with-drawne from their ancient obedience. In the meane time, the more the Agents of Spaine see their practises disapointed, the more vehement they are that the Court of Rome should giue no audience to the Kings submission.

They oppose themselves by the meanes of the Ambassador of Spaine at Rome, against the negotiation of the Kings Ambassadors with the Pope. They speake of his Maiesties conuersion, as of a counterfeit thing, to deceiue the Church, and after his confirmation to ruine the Catholike Religion. To conclude, they doe their best to quench these coales of charity, which were kindled in the peoples hearts, and cause the Pope to reiect this faithfull and willing obedience, whereby the King will shew himselfe a successor of the piety of Charles, Charlemagne, and Saint Lewis, as well as heire of their scepter.

But see one of the most violent attempts of the league, which had almost dissolued this harmony, which was prepared by a general reconciliation of the French among themselves, and of them to their lawful and soueraigne Lord. The 26. of August Peter Barriere borne at Orleans, was taken prisoner at Melun, where his Maiesty was then, by the discovery of a Iacobin a Florentine, to whom hee had confessed himselfe in Lions (the Priest reuealing this

And in truth the wretch was found seized of a sharpe knife with two edges: and for this cause he was pinched with hot pincers, his right-hand burnt off, holding the said knife: his armes, legges, and thighs broken, and his body burnt to ashes and cast into the riuer.

The like treason practised by the Duke of Mercuer, whereof the chiefe were the Marquis of Afferac of the house of Rieux, the Seigniors of Crapadant and Bois-marin, had intrapt Henry of Bourbon Duke of Montpensier (who made warre in Britan for the King) and the Parliament of Rhenes, if the discouery in time had not brought these three heads to a publicke scaffold, and many others to the Gallows.

Lions against
the Duke of Nemours.

Whilest the Agents of Spaine labour for this election, and their partisans doting will doe as the frogges, who weary of their quiet King, made choise of the Storke, who in the end deuoured them all: the Duke of Nemours made his faction apart, and seeing that by the nomination of these goodly Estates he should be excluded from his pretensions: knowing moreover that his brother on the mothers side, did crosse all his designs, and bare him no good affection, he resolved to canton himselfe in his gouernment, and by many and sundry forts both on the water and on the land, to plant his fortunes there. Already the Cittadels and forts hee held at Toissay, Vienne, Montbrison, Chastillon in Dombes, Belleuille, Tisy, Charlieu and else-where, threatned all Lionois with seruitude, if the Lord of Saint Iulian would haue sold him Quirieu for ready money: whom in the end (thrust on by the perswasions and presence of their Arch-bishop, sent by the Duke of Mayenne with this Commission among others) they force into his house, & the eighteenth day of September put him with a gard into a straight prison in the castle of Pierre-ancise, from whence in the end disguised, (playing the part of a groom of the Chamber, which carried forth the excrements of his maister) hee passed through the gardes turning away his face more for feare of being knowne, then for the ill smell: and elcaping from them the three and twentieth of March following, being dispossessed of all his meanes, and expelled from his places, he went and died in Auecy, a house of his owne, in the county of Geneua in Sauoy, not without suspicion of being poysoned at a feast that was made him.

Mante.

This generall surceasing of armes prolonged vnto the end of the yeere, and Religiously obserued on either side, brought a great quiet to France, and gaue the King leysure to assemble some of the chiefe of the Realme at Manté, to consult vpon sundry affaires, and particularly to heare the complaints of such as stood in doubt of the Kings change in Religion, and were greued at diuers contrauentions of his Maiesties Edicts, whereby they suffered many wrongs in all Prouinces: for the partisans of Spaine, for their last refuge, continually exclaymed of the incompatibility of two Religions in France, and many inclined to this opinion: that the King ought not to be admitted, but he should promise expressly to banish all such as made profession of any other Religion then that which hee did embrace: or at the least to abolish all publicke exercise. But the King employed all his care to vnite his people in concord: and this new change did nothing alter the affection which hee did beare indifferently to all, as a common father of his subiects.

Thus armes were laid aside, whilest the Lord of Des Dignieres hauing beaten the Sauoyard in diuers encounters, in Prouence, in Daulphiné, vpon the frontiers, and in Sauoy vpon his owne land, conquered many places in Piedmont, and lately succoured Canours which the Duke had besieged two months, gaue great hope to force this neighbour enemy soone to yeeld what he had lately vsurped of this crowne, if he had bene supplied with men, munition and money, and if some priuate seeds of new combustions had not drawne him away, to quench those fires which threatned to consume Prouence.

By

By what meanes and degrees, the townes subiect vnto the league, returned to the obedience of this crowne: and the Spaniard chased out of the Realme.

But courage oh my country-men! After a long and sharpe Winter, wee begin to seele a pleasant spring. As the Sunne rising on his horizon increased in heate and brightnesse, so the people are ready to imbrace the French liberty: their naturall affection to their lawfull Prince reuiues: now we shall see them which made the wound giue the remedy: the French striue now to submit themselves vnto their King, and the King to receiue his subiects with an admirable clemency and fatherly affection. The Lord of Vitry giues the first checke to the Spaniard. The sundry conferences hee had had with his Maieity before Paris and else-where, doe now worke a great effect: for deliuering the towne of Meaux to the King as a New-yeeres-gift, he gaue a plausible beginning to this yeere, and made the way for the Lord of La Chastre, his Vncle, at Shroffside to bring vnto his Maieity two goodly Duchies at once, of Orleance and of Berry. And to summon Monsieur De Villars to follow these commendable examples, he writes vnto him, I haue giuen a New-yeeres-gift vnto the King, Monsieur de la Chastre hath feasted him at Shrouetide: shew you your selfe vnto him on horse-backe at mid-lent: which letter shall soone take effect. Some townes practised by the heads of the league demand a continuance of the truce, but it was onely to prolong the miseries of France. The King therefore doth publish a declaration, shewing the wicked and damnable practises of the Leaguers, who vnder the continuance of a truce, would confirme their tyranny. Hee prescribes to all in generall one moneth of respit to acknowledge their lawfull King, and to performe all necessary submissions, to be restored to their charges, benefices, goods and liberties. He condemnes the rebels, and reuokes his pardon the time being expired. The brute of this declaration, and the Kings preparatiues to punish the obstinate, terrified the heads, and the most part of the townes and Comonalties, yet hee was content to hold the staffe, but not to strike: and the prouidence of God conducted the worke of this restauration, by other then violent meanes. The Duke of Mayenne sought all meanes to auoide this blow, but hee had no forces able to preuent it. So this vnion, cimented together with so many shifts, othes and coniurations, is dismembred on all sides: the most obstinate apprehend their totall ruine, if they persist in their rebellion.

The Kings Coronation.

Here was one thing very necessary to seale the generall approbation of the Kings lawfull authority. Hee was not yet anointed, nor crowned, and the want hereof, (as if the Coronation were the essentiall forme of a Royaltie) serued yet as a maske to many to with-hold their obedience. It is good in some things to please the peoples humor, and doubtlesse the end will shew, that this solemne action did serue as a bright Lantern, to guide them to the port of obedience, which had resolved to yeeld.

And, for that the rebellion of Reims had shut the gates against him, Chartres was the Rendezuous of this solemne ceremonie, and the Abbay of Marmoustier furnished the Oyle, which they keepe Religiously in the holy viall, with the like vse and vertue, as in former-times Rapin was annointed at Soissons, Lewis the fourth at Lions, Hugues at Compienne, and Lewis the yong likewise at Chartres. Thus was our Henry anointed in Chartres by Nicholas Thou bishop of the same place, the 27. of February, in the presence of 1594. the Prince Conty, the Earle of Soissons and the Duke of Monpensier, Princes of the blood, A of the Dukes of Longueville, Luxembourg, Retz, of Vantadour, and of the Earle of Saint Paul. Of the Bishops of Angers, Orleance, Nantes, Maillezais and Beauvais. The Marshall of Matignon supplied the office of Constable; The Duke of Longueville of Lord Steward, and the Earle of Saint Paul his brother of Lord Chamberlaine. The next day his Maiesty receiued the order of the Holy Ghost by the hands of the Bishop of Chartres. Let vs now see the fruits of this solemnity. The towns and commonalties of the league begin to tremble, and the most part determine to send their deputies to his Maiesty, being resolved to receiue his commandments.

The fruits of his Coronation.

Lions reduced

Misfortune is good for some thing. The Marquis of Saint Sorlin, brother to the Duke of Nemours, being yet a prisoner, afflicted the Inhabitants of Lions with all acts of hostility. The King of Spaine, on the other side confirmed his intelligences more strictly with them of his faction: and gaue them assurance by the Duke of Terra-nova, gouernor of Milan, of a leauy of twelue hundred Suisses, the which with other forces he would thrust into the towne, vnder pretext to succour it against the violences of the Marquis, but hauing drawne them in amongst the Inhabitants, he should through the fauour of the partisans of Spaine, make himselfe master of the towne. Lions was now ready to fall vnder the rule and tyranny of a stranger: but God stirs vp meanes beyond mans reason. Some good men alwayes wel affected to France in their hearts, with the consent of foure sheriffes, resolved to seeke the meanes to draw the towne to his maiesties obedience.

They acquaint Colonel Alphonso with their enterprize, who giues them assurance of his fauor and succor in so good an occasion. The seuenth of Ianuary hee comes to the suburbs of Guilloriere with goodly troupes. And the same day betwixt three and foure of the clock in the morning Iaquet one of the Sheriffes, assisted by the Seigneurs of Liergues and clock in the morning Iaquet one of the Sheriffes, assisted by the Seigneurs of Liergues and de Seue (followed by a good number of armed men) force a gard placed at the foote of the bridge vpon Saone, and constrain them to leaue the place. The towne is in armes, they make barricadoes in their streetes. Such as were of this enterprize, repaire to the quarters that were assigned them: euery man desireth the liberty of France. They seize vpon the Arcenall, and on the most factious officers and captaines of the towne. All the people wear white scarfes and fethers. That happy cry of, God save the King, sounds in the ayre. D They make bonfires in al places, they burne the armes and liuery of Spaine, Sauoy and Nemours, and the picture of the league in forme of a witch, and set vp the Kings in all places. Herevpon Alphonso entred the towne, accompanied with d'Andelot, Cheurseres, Saint Forient, Basheon, la Liegue, Baume, de Mures, with many other gentlemen of the country: and for the finishing of so good a worke, hee depose the suspected captaines of the towne, receiued the oath of fealty to the King of such as hee did substitute in their places: and afterwards the councell of the towne did resolve and swear neuer to admit any Italians or Sauiouyfiens to publike charges: nations which had most nourished the fire of vnciuill rebellion within their city. The like broile in a manner recovered the obedience of the towne, and Parliament of Aix in Prouence to his Maiesty. The Duke of Espernon built a Cittadel E there, to keepe them in awe, with whose humors they could not well agree. Moreouer hee was not in good termes with the King, and seemed to pretend some inuouation to the prejudice of the Kings affaires. The nobility of the country grew also in hatred against him, and from their secret discontents grew to open armes to expell him the country, wherevpon they made a protestation for their taking armes against him, as followeth.

It is most certaine that the alteration which hath happened in this Prouince, hath produced diuers effects in the hearts and opinions of men: some wil iudge one way some another, as their passions and humors doe lead them: the most calme (without percing into the grounds of these affaires) wil condemne these stirs, and blame them as new seeds of troubles and diuisions, and wil say that it is to make this Prouince fall (before her full recovery) into a more dangerous relapse. Those which are more cleere-sighted will commend the diligence of such as haue foreseene the dangers, wherevnto they see this weake and languishing body ready to fall, if they should suffer this last and mortall accident to seize vpon them. Amidst this multitude there may bee some (yet few) who gaping after the prey of

A of their desolate country, and more carefull to gather vp the peeces of her ship-wrecke, then to stretch forth their hands in the midst of the waues and tempest, will mock at those that cast themselves into the maine sea to preferue it. But without doubt such as haue the liuely impressions of the Kings seruice, and of the loue of their deere country, will extoll vnto Heauen this braue and generous resolution: The which hauing beene ioynly vnderaken by the whole Nobility of this country, or the greatest part thereof, they thinke it their duty to: publish the causes and to make knowne to the world, the Holy and iust intention which moueth them to distract themselves from the obedience and command of the Duke of Espernon, and to take armes to oppose themselves against the execution of his dangerous and pernicious designs.

B Wee must necessarily confess that the Graces of the diuine bounty, haue beene particular and the effects of his admirable prouidence wonderfull, in the preservation of this Prouince during her troubles and calamities, whereof wee haue alwaies scene a certaine care of his supreme power, as if with an angry hand, he would chastise it, and with the other full of pity, draw it out of the gulfe of miseries: for if euer Prouince were set to sale by the ambitious designs of Gouernours and neighbour Princes, it seemes that this hath beene more hotly pursued, and with greater violence then any other, by the vnmearured ambition of these famished and turbulent spirits; So as it hath runne many fortunes, and wee haue scene it almost drownd in a miserable gulfe of seruitude and tyranny. But as soone as the building thereof was raised, and that it seemed to haue some forme and increase, God did sodainely suffer it to be ruined euen to the foundation.

Notwithstanding it had scarce crept out of one extremity, but soone after we haue scene it enter into greater perplexities, whether it were so expedient, as if her preservation depended of the diuision which hath alwaies ballanted and held in equality the powers of diuers parties: or else that the chastisements ordained from aboue were not fully accomplished: hence it happened that this poore Prouince being newly deliuered from the greatest seruitude which did euer threaten it, and being escaped as it were miraculously out of the griping tallants of our nearest neighbour: Euen then when thee thought to take some rest, and breath from her miseries. Behold at the same time arrives the Duke D of Espernon, who after the decease of the Lord of La Valette his brother, making vse of the troubles of France, wrested by importunitie from the King the authority to command his army in this Prouince, for although his Maiesty had full knowledge of his honour and carriage, yet was he so surcharged with warre, and had so many crosses, as hee could not then vse his free and voluntary disposition: But for verie notable considerations suffered himselfe to bee ouerwaied by the violent pursuite of the said Duke. Notwithstanding the King a most wise Prince, and who hath the case of his people in singular recommendation, would neuer grant him the Gouernment of this Prouince, but onely the commandment of the army, weakning politickly by this meanes his authority, whom he knew very able to vsurpe more then did belong vnto him, and taking from E him the meanes to execute the secret threats which he made to rebell if he did not content him: thinking alwaies to put in practise his antient custome to obtaine all things by importunity from Kings, and by force from Gentlemen which had serued the King vnder the command of his deceased brother.

The townes fearing some new alteration in the country, if the said Duke should bee discontented (for that the gouernment of many good places were in the hands of Gascones) to cut off all occasion of troubles, they did write vnto his Maiesty in fauour of the said Duke, who cannot deny but at his arrivall and since, he hath beene alwaies assisted by the said Gentlemen and many others, which ranne vnto the Kings seruice with all affection, obedience, and fidelitty, as if the King had beene there in person. But they staid not long before they discovered his high conceptions, and the strange designs which hee hatched: for his violent and vnymited ambition could not bee dissembled, nor finde any vaile for to couer it. Then they beganne to obseue in all his actions a particular Project of an absolute and soueraigne command: in his publike speech the Kings name was still vsed, but in priuate hee had wordes tending to alter the devotion of his subiects: words vnfitting for the mouth of an Officer of the crowne, and for one that had bene so fauorably aduanced to so great wealth and dignity by the bounty of our Kings; yet he makes the Kings seruice his pretext, prostituting his authority to settle his tyranny; Many men of honour and worthy of credit can witnesse: the chiefe discourses which they haue heard to their great griefe: And no man is ignorant that in the treaties which he hath made to end the troubles of this Prouince, hee hath alwaies sought in his secret Articles to suppress the Kings name, and hath giuen to them of the league great assurances. He did not much regard the Kings interest, so as hee might giue authoritie to his owne particular. Finally he made them silently to know, that no man could bee in fauour with him vnlesse he were in disgrace with the King, and resolued with himselfe to forget the name. But knowing that he could not possesse the hearts of the Gentlemen with so vnjust a condition, and that they would be wonderfully estranged at these vnlawfull attempts, he resolued to seeke the assurance of his desseignes else-where, then in their assistance: for the execution whereof he sent to seeke support, and to contract alliances and confederations in Spaine and Italy with Princes that were enemies to his Maiesty. Euery man knowes the bishop of Mirepoix voiage into Italie, and the subiect thereof. Euery man knowes that the Dukes Agent hath bene seene in the court of Spaine, treating of matters of great importance: euen then at the same time he beganne to murmure, falling vpon the pretext of Religion, and maintayning that the Kings conuersion was impossible. Hee seized vpon the best places of the Prouince, and especially of those which had giuen greatest proofes of their fidelities to the Kings seruice, as being most suspect to him, and least assured. Hee causeth strong Cittadels to bee entertained at the charge of poore people, whom he sleaeth to the bones to effect his desseignes, and doth intreat them more cruelly then if they were townes conquered by force from some barbarous enemy, and giues them Gouvernours of his owne nation, for the most part men of meane callings. As for the Nobility he deprives them of charges and authority: seekes by all meanes to take from them both credit and courage, insults ouer them with iniurious words; contemnes them with proud and disdainfull countenances, and keepes them backe from the knowledge of affaires: Notwithstanding he forceth them to assist and serue him at their owne charge. Hee will haue them tied to his boot, and that they ruine themselues in following him, and yet he will not in any sort honour them, nor acknowledge their merits: And if they seeke another party with any of the Kings seruants, he opposeth himselfe, and becomes a mortal enemy to them that doe it. To conclude, he will not consent that they employ themselues to any other thing then to the infamous seruitude wherunto he would subiect them. But on the other side if we will consider the oppressions of the people, what discourse and what time would serue to represent the rigorous vsage which they haue received? Who could haue the patience and the heart to set downe particularly the insupportable oppressions which they haue endured? Who could relate the excessiue impositions which the said Duke hath laied vpon them, and the infinite summes of money which hee hath exacted? It may bee truly verified by vnreprouable witnesse, which shall bee produced in time and place, that the expences which hee hath made, and the money which hee hath consumed in one yeere, within the Prouince, exceeds all that hath bene spent since the beginning of the warre vnto this day: and yet there hath bene no memorable seruice done for his Maiesty, or for the quiet of the Prouince. May wee boldly say that the gifts and presents which hee hath made in one yeere, by assignation vpon the people of his owne authority, and about the ordinary impositions for the warre, haue amounted to the sum of two hundred & fifty or three hundred thousand crowns: yet it is most true, and will be verified by the mandates which he hath made. Who euer heard speake, of so monstrous a prodigality, that a small Prouince contayning about the twentieth part of France, hath bene forced to surmount the greatest bounties of Kings, after so great ruines and desolations, and that this excess is one of the least partes of the charges and extorsions which they haue indured since his comming. Poore Prouince! what sinne, what offence hath made thee so guiltie, that thou shouldest incurr so seuer a punishment, and that the generall fluxe of this flourishing Estate, should bee vomited out of this greedy body into thy bosome, as a contagious poyson into the extremities, by an expulsiue vent, to the end it might worke vpon thee his last rage and furie? And what more cruell torment

A torment could afflikt thee, then to be condemned to glut (by the exhausting of thy means) that couerous and insatiable hunger, which neither the bountie of the most prodigall Kings, nor the rich treasures of France, could euer satisfie? What streames of wealth would disalter this insatiable thirst, which the wealth and bloud of the people, so often sucked by this horle-leach, could neuer quench? If our predecessors had written that which wee haue seene by effect, of his infinit excess and expences, wee should hold it for a fabulous discourse: and it may bee that which we shall leaue to posterity will not be receiued for truth. For to affirme that in a little barren country, such an one as Prouence is, after the spoils of a cruell warre of five yeares continuance, being at the last gaspe, should be able to pay in one yeare three or foure millions of crownes, for Subsidies and Impositions to the Duke of Espernon to make warre: and that moreover the souldiers haue liued at discretion, spoiling friend and foe indifferently, with all liberty, and that his expence hath in a manner equalled the leuie of money. If we had not wherewith to proue it, it were better to be silent, then to aduance a thing so excessiue and incredible.

There will remaine many other things to speake of the odious behauiour and damnable desseignes of this audacious spirit, who flies so high a pitch vnder the blind fauor of a great fortune, that he presumes there is nothing impossible vnto him, nothing forbidden him, and that all that is vnder heauen owes him obedience and homage. But now occasion is offered to note succinctly the most important points, and to discouer by this litle pattern the rest of his violent and reprooued actions, and from thence we shall draw liuely reasons and infallible arguments, to condemne the basenesse of them that should be so bad seruants to the King, and so vngratefull to their countrie, as not to oppose themselues (with the hazard of their liues) to the inuasion of this dangerous plague. As for vs, hauing well considered all these things, and foreseeing the traine of a thousand more dangerous inconueniences: we haue thought that the tytle which we beare, the honors and fauors which we, and our predecessors haue receiued from our Kings, and the naturall bond which wee owe vnto our Countrie, doth inuite vs to embrace these affaires, whereon, hauing often consulted, and duly examined the reasons of either part, in the end it was concluded, that this disease wold by litle and litle grow incurable, and that the onely remedy did lye in the points of our swords. That there was neuer warre more profitable, more iust, nor more honorable, wherein consists the vrgent necessity of the Kings seruice, the releefe of the people, and the preservation of the common liberty. If any one will accuse vs for taking armes, without his Maiesties expresse commandement, and propound, that wee might haue sought some milder remedies, then to fly to violence: we will answer, that the onely consideration of the good of his seruice, hath made vs rather to take this course then any other: for if wee had begun by the way of complaint and petition to his Maiesty, it had but exasperated the sayd Duke, and made him more resolute in his enterprises, for the execution whereof wee haue knowne him so obstinate and vehement, and so bad an obseruer of his Maiesties commandements, as it could not enter into our thoughts, that he would euer obey any thing that should be inioyned him, contrarie to his desseignes, the which he would neuer giue ouer for any consideration, but would rather violate the truce in many Articles which might preiudice his priuate affaires. How preiudiciall then would it be for the King, if complaining of his oppressions, we had bene the cause that the Duke of Espernon (fearing that his Maiesty would call him backe) should on the other side (as it was in his power) leaze on the best Townes of this Prouince, and expell his Maiesties good seruants? Can wee enter into these termes without wonderfull danger, or the King prouide for our complaints without the hazard of this Prouince, considering the troubles and ciuill diuisions wherewith France is yet afflicted? Were it not better to preuent, and surprize him, then to suffer our selues to be preuented and suprizd? was it not more expedient for the Kings seruice and our quiet to assaile him rather then to threaten him? to breake the chaines which held vs bound, then to enter into a perpetuall slauerie? Do we not know that in desperat diseases there must be desperate cures, and that when there is question of great and dangerous enterprizes, wee must rather execute then propound them. We are so farre from offending the King in this sodaine taking of armes, as we maintaine, that we haue herein, giuen him a worthy prooffe of our affection and loyalties, wherein he receiues two of the greatest seruices that could be done

done him in France. The one is in freeing this important Prouince from the hands of the Duke of Espernon, one of the most dangerous enemies that he hath among his subiects. The other is, that the chiete towne of the Prouince, a Court of Parliament, and an infinite number of men of honour and quality; which were of the League, haue by this taking armes, found meanes to returne with safety vnder his Maiesties obedience, from the which nothing detained them, but the apprehension of the Duke of Espernons rigour: so as there is not any Prouince in France, where as the Kings name is so much honored and respected at this day, nor his authority more firmly settled then in this. An example of great importance for the rest of France, and which will make all them resolute to acknowledge their naturall Prince which are yet wavering.

Finally, we haue that confidence in the bounty of our King, such hope in his clemency, and such assurance in his perfections, as we assure our selues, not only to be aduowed when he shall heare our iust complaints and griefes: but also that of his grace he will also free vs: for it belongeth not but to his royall and victorious hand, to pull away the bonds wherewith we are yet fettered in the knots of this hard tyranny. And the better to make knowne the sinceritie of our iust and holy intentions, attending his Maiesties pleasure, wee haue thought good to haue recourse to Monsieur Des Diquieres, as to one of the worthiest seruants his Maiestie hath, and whose merits for so great and worthy seruice, should haue purchased more credit: to the end that he might so examine our actions and proceedings, as he may make a true report vnto his Maiestie, who cannot find a more faithfull witness, nor more capable of the affaires of this Prouince: whether he hath made many voyages, and done memorable exploit of armes for the preferuation thereof. And in the meane time the better to attaine vnto the good whereat we ayme, and remembring the great miseries and calamities which haue afflicted vs heretofore: we are resolute to forget all our ancient hatreds and factions, as well generall as particular: to burie the memorie thereof, and to vnite our selues together for the Kings seruice and vnder his good pleasure, with so strict a bond of loue and friendship, as it may neuer be broken. And with this goodly vnion, wee implore first the ayde of God, and then the assistance of all good men, whom we inuite to this holy and commendable worke, and to the participation of so pretious a glorie. For where shall we find Crownes worthy to honor their vertue, which shall attempt so high an enterprife, in seeking to shake that great Colosse of fortune, which was held indomitable, and which no man durst attempt? what prayes can worthily extol the valor of the Prouengals, to haue had the courage to assaile that audacious spirit, who contemned Kings, and whom all France feared? Can there be a worke more worthy of memorie to future ages, more profitable for the Kings seruice, and of greater merit, both before God and men, then to ouerthrow this tyranny, which would dismember the royall authority, continue the war, massacres, and disorders, deuoure our goods, rauish our liberties, and make our poore countrie desolate for euer? Let vs all then ioynly with one will and consent take armes: let vs put on our cuirasses with a braue and obstinat resolution: let vs neuer lay them down vntill we haue restored the Kings authority in this Prouince; chased away disorders and oppressions, freed the people, and redeemed the libertie of our country with the price of our bloods, to reduce it wholly vnder the command of that great and inuincible Monarch, to whom we are most happy to belong, and that it hath pleased God to make vs to be borne vnder his raigne. And by the same meanes let vs ioine all together in humble prayers, to the end they may be of more force to moue his Maiestie to grant vs this full deliuerance so much desired. It is impossible but that generous mind which hath bene so mild and pittifull vnto his vanquished enemies, would be moued at the miserable spectacle of the calamities which did afflict his most faithfull subiects, and will disperse the clouds of our miseries by the bright Sunne of his royall bounty and fauour.

Hereupon they had called vnto them Les Diquieres, and the King commands him to go with speed, and to oppose his forces against the Dukes in Prouence. Hee wanted men, money, and necessary provisions, to entertaine that which he had exploited in Piedmont: hee therefore furnisheth the places he held, as the time would suffer him, and goes to crosse Espernon, razed the fort he built against the towne of Aix, and reduced the inhabitants to their ancient obedience.

The miraculous reduction of Paris to his Maiesties obedience.

Middest so many happy Catastrophe's for the restoring of this Monarchie, some notable inhabitants of Paris, which loued the Flower de-Luce in their soules, made the way to free it from the rule of strangers: but many difficulties crossed the meanes they gaue vnto the King, who employed all his desseigns to recover the ancient throne of his Predecessors, but by the mildest meanes he could. Paris was neuer without some Prince of the house of Lorraine: and aboue foure thousand French, Spaniards, Italians, Lansquenets, and Wallons, kept the City in subiection. Seeing then that of many enterprizes not any one could succeed happily, neither might they attempt it by open force, without a horrible effusion of blood, and bringing the City in danger of extreame desolation, a surprize was therefore necessarie.

It was now almost readie to be effected, by the meanes especially of the Lord of Belin C Gouvernor of Paris, of Martin Langlois, Seigneur of Beaurepaire one of the Sheriffes of Paris for that yeare, and some others, of whom they had assurance for the execution of their proiect, as well of the citty, as of the souldiers practised long before. But the Duke of Mayenne being aduertised that the said Belin had intelligence with the King, puts him from his gouernement, and doth substitute in his place the Earle of Brissac: and to fortifie the garrison with strangers, he causeth foureene hundred naturall Spaniards to approach. By this displacing of the Lord of Belin, all their first desseignes are made frustrate: but the Earles humor was found apt to vnite them. He sought the meanes to bring to light the effects which he had resolute, to purge the ill opinion of times past. As Langlois attended some fauourable opportunity to discover himselfe to the said Earle, his Maiestie sends him D word that he is agreed with him, that he should not feare to open himselfe vnto him, touching the meanes he had plotted with Belin. He confers with the Earle, lets him vnderstand such as be of the intelligence, and they resolute together, That to bring the King in without effusion of blood (as he desired) the eue before the execution, they shold carry some stufte to the new gate, that vnder colour to wall it vp, they should draw away the gabions that stopt the gate: that in the night they shold cut away the earth which stopt that of S. Denis, and so seaze on the one and the other. That the Sheriffe Nerat with his children should take Saint Honoris gate, whereof he had the keys, and draw in a good number of men of war, to fauour the enterprife, and that by Saint Denis gate should enter another troupe of sufficient armed men, as well to seaze on the gate, as on the rampart of either side, to make a E barre betwixt the Spaniards and the Wallons, and keepe them from ioyning. They keepe two gards neare Saint Denis gate, one at Saint Eustace Crosse, and the other at the Temple. At the same instant the garrisons of Melun and Corbeil should enter by boate at the Bulwarke by the Celestins, and shold be receiued by John Grosfier, and by the Seigneur of Chenuallerie, the first beeing Capitaine of the sayd bulwarke, and the other Lieutenant generall of the artillery remaining in the Arcenall. And to auoid a popular tumult, a brute should be spred abroad of a peace betwixt the King, and the Duke of Mayenne, whom (vnder color of the peoples iealousies of the Spaniards, which he had caused to approach vnto Beauuois) they had found meanes to send him out of Paris, with promise to cause them to retire. That ouer night they should giue tickets to the chiefe whome they knew desirous of a peace, (as for the multitude of factions, and the partisans of Spaine, they durst not speake openly vnto them to bring in the King, and some that were desirous of peace, could not rest assured of his clemencie and bounty) by the which they should be aduertised of the accord, and intreated to arme with their friends for the bringing in of the Deputies of either part, which should come in the morning to make the publication, and resist the Spaniards that would oppose themselues. So it was decreed, and so executed.

A bold and adventurous execution.Paris obeys
the King.

This order being resolved on, it was imparted to those with whom the enterprise had been long before concluded, by the means of the Lord of Viques then Governor of Saint Denis, to whom the greatest honour is due, both for that all the associates did rely upon him and daily were advertised and encouraged by him, and also for that he did carry himself so wisely in Saint Denis, as he was more Governor of Paris, than of Saint Denis. The nineteenth of March, the Secretaries of the Lords of Brissac and Saint Luke carry it to Senlis to the King, with a plot of the Cittie, setting downe the places of the strangers guards, and of their partisans. They are searched going out of the towne, but they remember not to looke into their gloves, where their instructions were written by the hand of the said Langlois the Sheriffe. The King gives them aduice for the execution, the night before the two and twentieth day of the moneth, about foure of the clocke he finds all things ready, and the new gate, and Saint Denis gate at his deuotion. He enters with his troupes led by the Lords of Hunieres, Belin, Viques, and Fauas, at the same gate by the which the deceased King parted mournfully out of Paris. At the same instant the Lord of Vitry comes with a troupe of men at armes to Saint Denis gate, beates backe the strangers, who made resistance vpon the rampar, enters the towne, sets guards at the gate, and on the rampars, then passing through Saint Denis street, he encounters his Maiestie, whose troupes were come to Saint Michels bridge, and before the Pallace.

Thus according to the oath which his Maiestie had taken of the Captains of euery company, Not to do or suffer any insolencie or outrage to any citizen, but to such as should obstinately make resistance, all his troupes enter without disorder, without murder, without spoile, and by their perfect obedience testifie how great his authoritie is that commaunds ouer them. The King being seized of the Louure, the pallace, both Chastelets, and other chiefe places of the city, and assured of the Duke of Feria and his Strangers, he went armed with his caske on his head, with an incredible concourse and ioy of the people, to our Ladies Church, and there gaue sollemne thanks to the Soueraigne Protector of this Monarchie: who hauing as it were, led him by the hand, by such extraordinarie and miraculous means, into the Capitall city of the Realme, gaue him hope that he should soone chase the stranger out of his inheritance, and peaceably enjoy the throne of his predecessors. In the meane time the Earle of Brissac, John L'huillier Master of the accounts, and Prouost of the Merchants, with the Sheriffe Langlois, accompanied with the Heralds, went through the Cittie, proclaiming the Kings generall pardon: causing them to take white scarfes, and gaue tickets printed at Saint Denis, containing an abolition of all offences past. So as in lesse then two houres, all the city was quiet, euery man went to his ordinarie exercise, the shoppes were opened, as if there had beene no alteration, and the Towns-men grew familiar with the men of warre. There was nothing but signes of wonderfull ioy and loue: the bitterness of the proud and insolent command of the Spaniard, made the Parisiens to tast the sweetness of the fatherly rule of their Kings, and those detest him as an enemy, who lately feared and respected him as a master.

A happy and famous day, wherein the people (lately so contrarie and full of crueltie) E reduced to that miserie, as they durst not sigh in their miserie, exceeding glad to see a means to enjoy their ancient libertie, know not with what acclamations to receiue their peacefull and gracious King, who by his wonderfull clemency, washing away the blemishes where-with Paris had beene vnworthily polluted, made the Inhabitants of slaues cittizens, restores them, their wiues, children, goods, honors, Magistrates, and liberties, and giues peace to them who lately held it a crime to demand bread onely, and capitall to demand bread and peace together. His Maiestie suffered the Duke of Feria, Don Diego with other Commanders and men of warre, to depart with their baggage, their matches out, and their armes downe. The Bastile made some shew of resistance: but as all was prepared to force it, and that their victualls (which were purposely kept backe) beganne to faile them, de Bourg hauing the commaund thereof, yeelded it three dayes after: and his Maiestie to recompence such as had serued him in this enterprise, gaue them great gifts with many Offices and aduancements.

He confirmed all the companies of the Cittie, and disanulled the declarations which had been published in the moneth of March 1589, he restored the Lord de O to his government, from

A from the which the generall reuolt had expelled him: he appointed him to go to the town-houle, to take an oath of the Officers in the presence of Master Francis Miron, one of the Kings priue Councell, Master of Requests, and President of the great Councell; Ouer-seer of the discipline of the Kings armies, and appointed to assist him. And the Earle of Chiuerney Chancellor of France, assisted with the Seigneurs of Ris, Pontcarre, Miron and other Councillors of the Priue Councell, and Masters of Requests of the Kings house, to the number of twelue, went to the pallace, and caused the letters of re-establishment of the Court of Parliament to be read, and at the instance of Loisell, appointed in the absence of the Kings Officers, they tooke the oath of all the Presidents, Councillors, and Officers of the said Court, before the returne of the Parliament remooued to Tours, in the yeare 1589.

B And so in like sort to other companies, the chamber of Accounts, Court of Aydes, and chamber of the money, to whom Councelors were sent to do the like as to the Parliament, and to continue their places and dignities, with the other Officers resident at Tours, whom this happy reduction brought within few weekes after to their ancient seat of Iustice. Paris being freed from the command of strangers, and reduced vnder the obedience of their naturall and lawfull King, it was needfull to repaire that which the libertie of warre had changed, touching the lawes and grounds of the Estate, and the rights and honours of the Crowne. To this end, the Court of Parliament lately established, reuokes, and disanuls by a decree of the 30. of March, all other decrees, orders, or oaths giuen or made since the 29. of December, 1588. to the preiudice of the Kings authoritie, and the lawes of the realme, decreeing that as things forced by violence, they should remaine suppressed for euer. And especially they dis-anulled all that had beene done against the honour of the deceased King, as well during his life, as after his decease: forbidding all persons to speake of his memorie, but with honour and respect: commanding to informe of the detestable parricide committed on his person, and to proceed extraordinarily against such as should bee found culpable.

They reuoked the authoritie giuen to the Duke of Mayenne vnder the title of Lieutenant generall of the Estate and Crowne of France, forbidding all men to acknowledge him with that quality, to yeeld him any obedience, fauour, comfort, ayde, vpon paine of high D Treason. They likewise enioyned the Duke of Mayenne, vpon the like paines, and other Princes of the house of Lorraine, to acknowledge King Henry the fourth of that name, for King of France and Nauarre, for their King, to yeeld him the obedience of faithful seruants and subiects. And to all other Princes, Prelates, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Townes, Commonalties, and priuate men, to forsake that pretended faction of the League, whereof the Duke of Mayenne had made himselfe the head, and to yeeld vnto the King, obedience, feruice, and fealty, vpon paine to the said Princes, Prelates, Noblemen, and Gentlemen, to be degraded of their Nobility and Gentry, and they and their posterity declared base, with confiscation of bodies and goods: and the razing of their Townes, Castels, and places, that should infringe the Kings Ordinances and commandements. They reuoked and disanulled E all that had beene done or decreed by the pretended Deputies of the assembly held at Paris, vnder the names of the generall Estates of the Realme as void, done by priuate persons, chosen or suborned for the most part by the factious of this Realme, and partisans to the Spaniard, hauing no lawfull power: forbidding the said pretended Deputies to take vpon them this quality, and to assemble any more in the said Cittie, or else-where, vpon paine to be punished as troublers of the public quiet, and guilty of high Treason. They inioyned such of the pretended Deputies as were yet resident at Paris, to retire home to their houses, to liue there vnder the Kings obedience, and to take the oath of fealtie before the Iudges of those places. Moreover they decreed, that all processions and sollemnities instituted during the troubles thereof, should cease, and in stead thereof, the two and twentieth day of March F should be for euer celebrated, and the same day a generall procession should be made after the accustomed manner, where the said Court should assist in their scarlet robes, as a remembrance, to giue God thanks for the happy reduction of this said Cittie to the Kings obedience.

As the Vniuersity by their trecherous decision had before countenanced and supported the Parisiens insolencies and mutinies, so now by their humble and due submission, of their owne owne proper motion, they seeke to repaire the crime they had committed. James d'Ambaise A Doctor in Philosophie, chiefe Rector, chosen since the reduction of Paris, the Deane and the Doctors of Sorbonne, the Deanes and Doctors of other faculties, all the members and officers of the Vniuersitie, come to the King to yeeld him a testimonie of their loue, and finding him in the chappell of Bourbon, prostrate before his Maiestie, they acknowledge him their true and onely naturall Prince, sweare to be obedient and faithfull seruants to him for euer, and beseech him (as to his other people which submit themselves like good and loyall subiects) to extend his fauour vnto them. The Kings own disposition did moue him, but the place did inuite him to this pardon. He protests before God, to be as ready to remit the offences of others, as he desired Gods diuine Maiestie to be mercifull vnto his. So hee receiued them, and sent them home gratioously, granting them this Edict following.

The Kings Edict or Declaration, vpon the reduction of Paris vnder his obedience.

HENRY by the Grace of God, King of France, and of Nauarre, to whom these presents shall come, greeting: As it hath alwaies beene our desire and intent, (since it pleased God to cal vs to this Crowne) to settle a good and assured peace in this our Realme, to the end that the disorders, violences and miseries of warre ceasing, God might be serued according to his holy commandements, and the authority of the lawes and of our iustice restored, vnder the protection whereof, the three Estates of our Realme may happily enioy with peace that which doth iustly belong vnto them. To attain vnto the which, we haue (as euery man knoweth) employed all our meanes, with the hazard of our life, preferring death before the blame and infamy which would iustly fall vpon vs, if we should suffer the vniust vsurpation and dissipation which some pretend to make of this Crowne. And not to omit any thing which is in the power of a good Prince, for the settling of peace and vnion among our subiects, so necessarie and so much desired of all good French men, we haue with much patience supported and given vnto the publike, the offences and rash attempts of many, who without this respect, haue deserved severe and exemplarie punishments: We haue for this consideration after the victories, pardoned them which haue attempted against our life. And for the great compassion which we haue had of the capitall City of our Realme, to auoid the saeke, and spare the blood of many good Cittizens which did not participate in the wicked desseignes of such as did nourish rebellion, we haue chosen rather to be frustrate of the obedience which was due vnto vs, then to see innocent men which dwell there, with the women and little infants, and so many goodly buildings, exposed to the violent rage and fury of fire and sword. Hauiug moreover, for this consideration granted in Iuly last a generall truce for three moneths, during the which the Deputies of that party which doth not obey vs, did assure vs that they would send speedily vnto the Pope, to haue his aduice vpon the resolution which they were to take, in the conclusion of a good and durable peace and reconciliation with vs, who am their King and naturall Prince. Wherein they also promised to employ themselves with all loyaltie and affection, to settle a peace in this Realme, the which made vs more easie to yeeld vnto the said truce, although we knew well how much we were prejudiced thereby, and what great advantage wee might haue had by armes: hauiug (during the parle of peace) taken Dreux in view of the chiefe of their party, beeing assisted by their Protectours of Spaine. At which time we wanted no meanes to presse the Citie of Paris in such sort, as necessitie should in the end haue aduiled them to shake off the yoke of such as had so long tyrannized, and insolemly abused their miserable patience. But we yeilded of our authoritie, to the end the Pope might be satisfied, and truly informed of all our actions, to whome our intent was to haue recourse to discouer our wounds, and to implore his ayd, fauor, counsel, and assistance: and to that end wee made choice of our deare and welbeloued Cousin the Duke

A Duke of Neuers, a Prince full of all vertues, wisdom, piety, and of great merit: who preferring the seruice of God, and the good of this Estate, before the discommodities of his health, and the tediousnes of the way, had coragiously vnderaken a voyage to his Holines. And as for the Deputies of the said party, whom they promised confidently to send with al expedition, We do not find that during the truce, they made any accompt to dispatch them. And notwithstanding that since the conclusion of the said truce, wee haue not discouered in all their actions, but desseignes prejudiciall to the publike good of the realme, with whose spoiles they pretended to cloath and to enrich themselves with the bloud and meanes of good and loyall French men: there being fallen into our hands a certaine oath made by the chiefe of the said party, in a manner at the same time when as they signed the truce, and promised to treat faithfully touching a good peace, and to reconcile themselves vnto vs, and to that end to send to Rome to haue the Popes aduice: The said oath containing, that they would neuer treat any peace with vs; wherein they suffered themselves to bee so transported by the passions of the King of Spains Ministers, as they made no reseruatiou of the Popes authority, vnto whome they said they would send: wherwith being iustly incensed, notwithstanding at their great instance, & to iustifie our actions vnto the Pope, we granted them a prolongation of the truce for two moneths. But conceiuing how little they desire to see an end of the miseries of this Realme, with the authority they haue vniustly vsurped ouer part of it: iudging also by their cunning delaiies, that they seeke nothing but to prolong the miseries of France, and to assure their vniust vsurpation: We hauiug therefore with the aduice of our Councell, refused a prolongation of the truce for 3. moneths more, which they required of vs, with such importunity, as we haue iust cause to beleue, that this pursute was not to purchase a peace, but rather that during the said time the King of Spains forces, beeing come vnto the frontier of our country of Picardy, they should haue better meanes to reuiue the war, to the ruine of our good and loyall subiects: the which God by his grace wold not suffer, causing vs to see plainly (by the letters which were intercepted) their wicked desseignes to continue the miseries of this our realme. His diuine bounty hauiug taken the defence of our iust cause into his protection, moued an infinit number of our good subiects to acknowledge their natural duty, in the reduction of the towns of Meaux, Lion, Orleans, Bonrges, Pontoise, and others to our obedience. But the memory shall neuer be lost of the happy reduction of our good city of Paris, the chiefe of our realm, which hapned the 22. of March, with such mildnes, and order, as not any one citizen can iustly complaine of wrong. The peoples ioy and acclamations, which haue seen their King so much desired, was not lesse, then if they had had the same security which is giuen them by these presents, of our grace, fauor, protection, and forgetting of things past, with assurance that the merits of such as shewed themselves faithfull to our seruice shall neuer be forgotten. The which considering, and the speciall bounty wherewith it hath pleased God to fauor vs in this occasion, we hold our selues bound more then any men liuing, to make our actions pleasing to his diuine providence. For this cause, acknowledging that there is nothing makes vs more like vnto God, then clemency, forgetting freely all offences past: we declare by these presents, that we receiue into grace, the citizens of our good city of Paris, and of our speciall fauor and royall authority, do abolish all things hapned in the said city, during, and by reason of the present troubles, the which we will shall remaine extinct, and held as if they had neuer hapned. And to this end, with the aduice of the Princes and Noblemen of our Councell, we haue ordained, as followeth:

1 First, we will and ordaine, according to the Edict of Pacification, made by the deceased King, our most deare Lord and brother, in the yere 1577. and the declarations made since by vs, for the obseruation thereof: That in the city and suburbs of Paris, or within ten leagues round about, there shall be no exercise but of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish religion: Wee forbid all men expressly, not to molest the Clergimen in the celebration of diuine seruice, and the perception of the fruites and reuenues of their Benefices, whereof by these presents we put them in full possession: We will & command, that all they which since these present troubles haue seized vpon Churches goods and reuenues belonging vnto the said Clergy, residing within the Diocesse of Paris, as well of those which are within it, as in any other part of our Realme, and which detain them, shall restore them full and quiet possession, with such right, liberties and securities as they had before they were dispossessed.

2 And for a more ample and perpetual declaration and testimonie of the singular loue and affection which we beare vnto our good city of Paris, we do restore it to all her ancient priuiledges, rights, grants, freedoms, liberties, and immunities, which heretofore haue beene giuen by Kings our Predecessors, the which we do grant anew, confirme, and continue by these presents, to enioy and vse hereafter, as they haue done in former times, and before these present troubles: as well in that which concerns the Vniuersity, the City, the Prouost of Marchants, Sheriffs, and other officers: as al other Bodies, Colledges, and Companies, of what quality soeuer, which haue beene there established before the said troubles.

3 And to take away all causes of future sutes and quarrels, by reason of things past during the said troubles, we ordaine, that all which hath past in the said city of Paris, and therabouts, in regard of that which may concerne the said Inhabitants, and others which were within the city at the time of the reduction thereof, (who within 8. daies after the publication of these presents, shall take the oath and make the premises contained in our declaration heretofore published in our Parliament at Tours) since the beginning of the present troubles, and by reason thereof vntill this present day, shall remaine extinct, both the taking of armes, enterprizes, and forcing of towns, taking of money from Receiueurs, of tythes, and customes of Salt, of all Impositions of money whatsoeuer, coyning of money, practises, leuying of souldiers, exploits done by them, leagues, negotiations, and treaties made both within and without the realm: sales of moucable goods, cutting of woods and timber, fines, booties, ransomes, and all other acts of hostility, and generally all other things done in publike or priuate, during the present troubles, or by reason thereof: for the which the said Inhabitants, nor any of them, shall not hereafter be questioned with, pursued, or molested, in any sort whatsoeuer. And to this end wee will, that they shall remaine quie and discharged, imposing perpetuall silence to our Proctor generall, and all other persons: Vve do also expressly enioyne them to forsake all leagues, treaties, assotiations, practises, and intelligences, both within and without the Realme, contrarie to our authority, vpon paine to bee punished as guilty of high treason. And to auoid all occasion of quarrell betwixt our subjects, we forbid them by these presents, to iniure or prouoke one another, either in word or deed, by reason of that which hath past during the said troubles, but to liue peaceably together, like brethren, friends, and fellow-citizens, vnder the obseruation of our Edicts, vpon paine for those that shall infringe it, to be presently punished, and without any other forme of proceesse, as troublers of the publike quiet.

4 We ordain moreover that all decrees, commissions, and executions thereof, sentences, iudgements, contracts, and other acts of Iustice giuen betwixt persons of the same partie, and betwixt all others which haue willingly contested, as wel in soueraigne Courts, Prouostie of Paris, presidiall Court, and other iurisdictions of the said city, Prouosty, and Viconty, during the said troubles, shall take effect. And there shall be no question made for any that haue bin put to death during the same, by the authority of Iustice, or by the law of arms and commandement of their leaders. And all decrees, sentences, and iudgements giuen against them that were absent, holding a contrary party, were they ciuill or criminal, in all the soueraigne Courts of this realme or iurisdictions thereof, shall be void and of none effect: as also all iudgements and sentences giuen against the Earle of Brissac, in regard of the party which he hath held, shall be reuoked, and withall the grants made by vs or our predecessors of any thing belonging to them, in consideration of the faithful seruice which he hath done vs, and to the generall of this realme, in the reduction of our good city of Paris vnder our obedience: and whereas some of the said Inhabitants haue been put to death, for some causes during the said troubles, we will, that the said executions shall not preiudice the honour and memory of the dead: and that the confiscations which our Proctors haue, or may pretend, shall be of no effect, to preiudice their widowes, children, and heires.

5 We will, and our pleasure is, that all the said inhabitants which shall performe the said premises, and submissions, and take the oath, shall return into the possession of their goods, offices, dignities, and reuenues, wherefoeuer they be, reuoking all gifts and graunts made thereof to the preiudice of them to whom they did belong, or of their widowes and heires.

6 And concerning seizures which haue bene heretofore made of the goods, lands, rents, & reuenues, of the said inhabitants of Paris, & other places of the said Prouosty, & Viconty, which

A which shall performe the sayd promises and submissions shall remaine void. And wee giue vnto the sayd Inhabitants, a full discharge of the said Seizures, and do acquite them of all that may be due vnto vs by reason thereof: Notwithstanding any other former grants, the which we reuoke and disanull, without any regard to bonds and promises not discharged, made by Labourers and Farmers, as well to Donotaries, as to Commissaries and Farmers of Iustice, the which shall remaine void. And as for debts due vnto the said Inhabitants, we will, that without regard of any former grants made, (the which we in like manner reuoke) that they may constrain them that are bound vnto them by bills, promises, bonds, or transports in the same manner as they might haue done before the said troubles.

7 Al prouisions of Offices made by the duke of Mayenne, shall be void and of no force. B And yet they which haue obtained the said prouisions by death, or by resignation by them of the same party, (except the Offices of Presidents in our Soueraigne Courts) shall be maintained in their said Offices by our letters of prouision which shall be granted them without paying fine. As also al new Officers erected by vs touching the Impost of Salt, shall be in like maner confirmed, which hauing obtained prouision from the D. of Mayenne shall be void.

8 They that haue bin prefer'd by the D. of Mayenne to Benefices not consistoriall, being within the said city, and void by death, shall be confirmed, taking from vs all necessarie Expeditions: and those which haue bin granted them by the D. of Mayenne shall be voide.

9 And in regard of such Inhabitants as were not within the cittie at the time of the Reduction thereof, wherefoeuer they were, shall enioy the like benefite with the rest, if they retorne within one moneth after the publication of these presents, performing the said submissions, to liue there vnder our obedience.

10 Any of the said Inhabitants which shall depart the city with our Passports, to retire themselves into any other places of our obedience, shall enioy their goods without trouble or molestation, carrying themselves modestly, not doing any thing contrary to the dutie which they owe vs, and performing the submissions and promises aboue mentioned.

11 To ease the said Inhabitants during this present year, the debtors of any of annuall Rents shall not be forced to pay about the Arrerages of the said yeare, quarterly, without preiudice to precedent Arrerages, for the which there shall bee an order made to releuee D them as much as may be.

12 That Accompts made at Paris during the troubles by any Accomptant before the Officers of the Accompts which haue resided there, shall not be subiect to reuision, if it be not in case of the ordinance.

13 Our meaning is not to comprehend in this Edict, that which hath beene committed by way of theft, and without warrant, for the which wee giue all men liberty to seeke their remedies by the way of Iustice, as they shall thinke good: In like manner all they are excepted which shall be found guilty of the execrable murder committed on the person of the deceased King our most deare Lord and brother, and of conspiracie against our life: as also all crimes punishable betwixt men of the same party.

E We command our louing and faithfull Chancellor, Officers of the Crowne, Dukes, and Peeres of France, and all other Noblemen of our Councell, and Masters of Requests of our household deputed by vs, to cause these presents to be read, published, and enrolled in our Court of Parliament, Chamber of Accompts, Courts of Aydes, and in all other places where it shall belong: We will and command, that the contents thereof shall be inuiolably kept and obserued, notwithstanding any oppositions, or Appellations, Edicts, Declarations, Decrees, Judgments, Letters, Commandements, Defences, and other things to the contrary: to the which we do for this regard derogate; for such is our pleasure. And to the end it may be firme and stable for euery, we haue caused our Scale to be set to these presents.

Given at Paris in March, 1594.

Signed. HENRY.

F Paris gaue example to all the rest of the Realme. And the first fruites of this happy reunion began to ripen in the hearts of other Towns and Commonalties. So the moneths of Aprill and May were spent to receiue the submissions of diuers Prouinces, and drawing to the kings obedience, many captains, Gentlemen, Noblemen and other chief pillars of the league: so as euery bird hauing his fether, the Crow in the fable remained in the end naked:

Diuers reductions in diuers places.

The Lord of Villars submits himselfe to his Soueraigne Lord, and yeelding him the townes A of Rouan, New-hauen, Harfieu, Montiuillier, Ponteau de mer, and Vernueil: he obtaines in exchange the office of Admirall of France, and hereafter resolues a most obstinate warre against the Spaniard. But a sad accident shall soone frustrate the desseignes hee made with his Maiestie. Abbeuille hath bene alwaies called the Cittadell of Picardie, lying at the mouth of the sea. Muspin the Maior, and some Inhabitants, had resolued to giue a great checke vnto the League: but the feare of the duke of Aumales factions restrained them, and the seditious impressions of Preachers, (who throughout the Realme, haue bene the greatest motiues of these last mutinies) made this their good will fruitlesse. The king beeing aduertised thereof, did hazard Franc, one of the Secretaries of his chamber, who was borne at B Abbeuille, to sound and discover the end of their intentions.

He parts in Aprill, and vnder colour to visit his friends, he behaues himselfe so discreetly in his negotiation, that in lesse then eight dayes they resolued in open assembly to send their Deputies to yeeld themselves at his Maiesties feete, who in token of so good a seruice, ennobled Franc and his posteritie, and augmented the priuiledges of the Towne. In the same moneth, the Inhabitants of Troyes expelled the Prince of Iauille, and recalled the Lord of Inteuille, their ancient gouernor for the King. The Townes and Prouinces contend, who shall haue the honour to returne first to their due obedience, from the which these popular furies had withdrawne them, Sens, Poitiers, Agen, Villeneuve, Marmande, and other Townes of Gasconie, and in a manner all that had followed the dance of Orleans and Paris, do now frame themselves to their tune. And all this is done in few weeks. The most factious of the party, did still feed the fire of rebellion in some townes of Picardy: Amiens and Beauvois wauered: the Spaniard possessed Laon and La Fere, places of importance in that Prouince: and the Count Charles of Mansfield had euen now besieged and taken Capelle, a small towne, but strong, in the Duchie of Thierafche. The King beeing aduertised thereof, went home to their trenches, to draw them forth to fight: but making no shew to come forth, to get that by force, which he could not obtaine by reason, he besiegeth Laon, defeats the succors at sundry times that come to the besieged, kills about fiftene hundred of their men in sundry encounters, and taking the towne by composition in the end of August, he ends (by this act) the furies of ciuill wars without hope of reuiuing, and then returnes triumphing to Paris. Chasteau-Thierry, before the siege, and after the siege of Laon, Amiens, Beauvois, and all the townes in Picardie (except Soissons and La Fere, which the Duke of Mayenne and the Spaniard held) did shake off the strangers yoke, and took the oath of fealty to the King. Cambray did likewise acknowledge him, and gaue his Maiesty such aduantage, as his enemies remained without meanes to maintaine the war, and without hope to obtaine their peace. The Duke of Mayenne in the meane time entertained all his friends and intelligences at Bruxelles: but the supplies of men and mony which hee drew from thence, were not able to stay the course of the Kings prosperities. He therefore retired himselfe into Bourgongne, to assure such places as were yet at his deuotion.

Contrariwise, his neere kinsmen retiring themselves, left him almost alone to treat E with the Spaniard. The Duke of Nemours made his accord at the Castle of Pierre-ancise, but beeing escaped the 26. of Iuly, as we haue said, death deprived him of the vse of his liberty, as we shall see hereafter. The Duke of Guise did first testifie, that he desired nothing more then the Kings seruice, and drawing in the moneth of Nouember to his Maiesties seruice his breethren with himselfe, many Noblemen, the City of Reims, and many other places, it did greatly shake this monstrous building, which was now ready to fall to ruine.

The Duke of Guise reconciled to the King.

Processe against the Iesuits renewed.

The Sect of Iesuites had as chiefe pillars of the League, mightily supported it vnto this day, and by all meanes labored to aduance the Spaniard in France: they had spread throughout the whole Realme, the furious effects of the fire which they had kindled, and continued in priuate confessions (as lately in their Sermons) to disgrace the memorie of the deceased F King, and the Maiestie of the King now reigning: and to encrease it, the principall of their Colledge, and some others, had lately approoued, countenanced, and perswaded that execrable attempt of Peter Barreere. The Vniuersitie of Paris grounding the renewing of their ancient Processe against the Iesuites, vpon these considerations and motiues, demand the rooting out of them. Some great men, and of the chiefe men of Iustice, sue for them: the

A Cardinall of Bourbon supports them: The Duke of Neuers makes their cause his owne. The respect of their learning, care, and diligence to instruct and teach youth, did moue them: and a very vrgent cause must draw the Court of Parliament (whose authority notwithstanding they did contemne and reiect) to prononnce and declare this great decree, the which an accursed and detestable attempt, by one of their owne disciples, did in the end extort. They procured that the cause might be pleaded secretly, for that (said their Aduocat) to defend my Clients, I shall be forced to speake some things offensive to many which haue lately turned to the Kings seruice. But their pleadings are to bee read in Arnault against them, and Perforis for them, both graue and learned Aduocates.

By the reduction of so many Prouinces, Townes, Commonalties, and priuate Noblemen, the League shall be now confined into some corners of Bourgongne, Picardy, and B Brittany, where the Spaniards (to haue alwaies footing within the Realme) entertained the hopes of the Duke of Mayenne and Mercœur. The first began to fall from them: but the other (grounded vpon some vaine pretentions of the Duchie, where he gouerned by reason of his wife) hoped to preuaile, if not of all, yet at the least of a good part. The Queene Dowager his Sister, laboured to make his peace: but he delayed the time, knowing that in his greatest extremity he should find grace with the King. The Spaniard beeing brought into Blauet by his meanes (a fort which the situation of the country had made almost impregnable, as if they had built a fort neare vnto Croisic, to shut vpe the entry of the port at C Brest, they had also made another right against it on the other banke) hoped, that beeing chased out of the other Prouinces, he should yet hold this as a pawne for the mony he had disbursed. His Maiesty sent the Marshall d'Aumont, and Generall Norrice, a braue Commander of the English, to encounter him, who fortified with a Fleete, vnder the command of Captaine Forbisher, they became Masters of Quimpercorentin and Morlay, and then they forced the new fort at Croisic, and slue (but with the losse of men, and of the said Forbisher) foure hundred souldiers, to whome the guard was committed: which seruice was chiefly performed by the English, to their immortall praise.

War in Brittainie.

France grew quiet, yet must they employ the souldiers, and carry the warre into the Spaniards country. It seemed this would free the Realme, but seldom doth it bring forth the D effects that are expected. Yet for a triall, the King agrees with the Estates of Holland and their confederates, to invade the Duchie of Luxembourg with their common forces. The Duke of Bouillon, now Marshall of France, and the Count Nassau, seeke to enter in October, but they find the passages stopt, and the Count Charles Mansfield before them, who by the defeat of the Hollanders troupes, made this attempt fruitlesse. On the other side, the King seekes to keepe the frontiers of Picardy safe from the Spanish forces, and threatened Arthois and Henault, that if they fauoured the forces of Spaine, which molested Cambray and the countries thereabout, he would make violent war against them. The Estates of those Prouinces make no answer to these threats, framing their excuse that they could draw no direct answer from the Arch-duke Ernest, Lieutenant generall for the King of Spaine in the Low-countries, who soone after perswaded the subiects of the said countries to arme, and to invade France. The better to know Picardie, and to iudge of what should be necessary against the attempts of this new enemy, the King makes a voyage to the frontier, and then returns to Paris, to celebrate the solemnity of the Knights of the Order of the holy Ghost, and to receiue the Ambassadors of Venice, Vincent Gradenigo, and Iohn Delphino being sent to congratulate the happie successe of his affaires, and Peter Duodo to succeed Iohn Mocenigo. At his arriual he receiues three good aduertisements: That the Marshall d'Aumont had taken from the Spaniard one of the places he had fortified in Brittainie: That the Spaniards thinking to enter into Montuail, hauing giuen fifty thousand crownes to the Gouernour, had bene repulsed with the losse of fife or sixe hundred men: And that the Marshall of Bouillon had ioyued with the army of Count Maurice in despite of Count Charles.

F But oh monstrous prodigie! the onely remembrance should make our heire to stare, and our hearts to tremble. The 27. of December, the King beeing booted in one of the chambers of the Louvre, hauing about him his cousins the Prince of Conty, the Count Soissons, and the Earle of S. Paul, and a great number of the chiefe Noblemen of his Court, bending down to receiue the Lords of Ragny, & Montigny, who kist his knee, a yong man called Iohn Chastel, Kkkk 3

The King hurt in the face.

1594. Chastell, of the age of eightene or nineteene yeares, the sonne of a wollen Draper in Paris, a Nouice of the Iesuites, encouraged by their instructions, and thrust on by a diuellish furie, creeps into the chamber with the presse, and surprizing his Maiestie as he was stooping to take vp these Gentlemen, in stead of thrusting him into the belly with a knife, as hee had determined, he stricke him on the vpper lippe, and brake a tooth. This wretch was taken, and confessed it without torture. The King vnderstanding that hee was a disciple of that schoole. Must the Iesuites then (said he) be iudged by my mouth?

Thus God (meaning by this cursed and detestable attempt) to countenance the pursue of the Vniuersitie of Paris against that sect, John Chastell hauing declared the circumstances of his wicked intent, was found guiltie of treason, against God and man in the highest degree, and by false and damnable instructions (holding that it was lawfull to murder Kings, and that the King now rainging was not in the Church, vntill he were allowed by the Pope) was by a decree of the Court condemned to do penance before the great doore of our Ladies Church, naked in his shirt vpon his knees, holding a burning torch of two pound weight, to haue his armes and legges pinched at the Greue with burning pincers, and his right-hand holding the knife wherewith he fought to commit this parricide to bee cut off, his bodie to be torne in peeces by foure horses, burnt to ashes, and cast into the wind, and all his goods forfeit to the King. The said Court decreed by the same sentence, That the Priests, schollers, and al others terming themselves of that societie, (as corrupters of youth, troublers of the publike quiet, and enemies to the Kings state) should depart within three C dayes after the publication of this decree, out of Paris, and other places where they had Colledges: and within fiftene, out of the Realme, vpon paine after the said time to bee punished as guilty of high treason, all their moueable and immoueable goods to be forfeited, to be employed in godly vses, forbidding all the Kings subiects to send any schollers to the Colledge of the said societie without the realme, there to be instructed or taught, vnder like paines as before.

The Decree was executed the nine and twentieth of the said moneth. Peter Chastell the father, and John Gueret schoole-master to this murderer, were banished, the first for a certain time out of Paris, and fined at two thousand Crownes, the last for euer out of the realme, vpon paine of death. The fathers house standing before the pallace, razed, and a pillar erected containing (for a perpetuall monument) the causes of that ruine. Amongst the writings of one named John Guignard of Chartres, were found certaine outrageous and scandalous libels against his Maiestie, made since the generall pardon granted by him at the reduction of Paris, for the which he was executed the 7. of Ianuary following. Experience hath often taught, that armes produce greater effects abroad in the enemies countrie then at home, and that the goodliest triumph is sought farthest off. Our vnciuill confusions were forged chiefly in Sprinc, and the Iesuites had beene the chiefest worke-men. One Francis Iacob, a scholler of the Iesuites of Bourges, had lately wanted to kill the King, but that hee held him for dead, and that another had done the deed. And this horrible attempt of late vpon the sacred face of his Maiestie, (wherein he was miraculously preserued) doth witnesse, E that they were the chiefe fire-brands. So the King grounding the necessitie of his armes vpon these considerations, after he had rooted this Sect out of the Schooles, which they held within the Iurisdiction of the Parliament of Paris, hee published a declaration for the making of warre against the King of Spaine. Without doubt the reasons were very apparent and manifest, and the beginning more fauorable then the end.

War proclaimed against the Spaniard.

The Marshall of Bouillon begins this new warre: he enters the Duchie of Luxembourg with an armie of a thousand horse, and foure thousand foote, and at the first puts to route eleuen Cornets of horse of Count Charles neere to Wirton, kills two hundred and fiftie vpon the place, makes the rest to leaue armes, horse and baggage, and to saue themselves in the next Forrest. Philip likewise for his part proclaimes warre against our Henry. The Duke of Lorraine on the other side, hauing taken a truce with his Maiestie, the Baron of Auffonuille, with the Seigneurs of Tremblecourt and Saint George (who before made warre vnder him) now take the white scarfe, they enter the County of Bourgongne with a thousand horse, and siue thousand foot, and at the first they seaze vpon Vezou, Ionuille, and other places.

Behold

Some Lorraines
serve the King.

A Behold the fire which threatens two Prouinces: but the Spaniard suffers them not to be consumed, as men presumed, that being busie to quench it, he would leaue Picardy in quiet. He commands the Archduke Ernest, that with the hazard of the Low-countries he should transport all his forces into Picardy, and moreouer causeth the constable of Castille gouernour of Milan, to passe the Alpes with a great army of Spaniards and Neapolitans, who recovered the places, and forced the Lorraines, to disperse themselves.

The Arteficiens and Hannuyers, fore-seeing the desolation which the continuance of this warre would cause, solicited the Archduke to seeke some meanes to quench it: but death cuts off the course of his enterprife. The Earle of Fuentes (that is to say Fontaines) aduanced them couragiously, causing the gouernour of Arrhois to enter into Picardy with a thousand horse, and sixe thousand foot. Behold rough seas and great stormes, which violently beat vpon our great Pilot: but in despite of their attempts, he shall guide his ship to a safe port, and bring his enterprises to an end. Vienne, Niz, Autun, Beaune and Dijon, did happily assit him: let vs see the successe. The Duke of Nemours escaped from prison, assembled a good troupe of souldiers, horse and foote, and drawing to him three thousand Swisses which wintered in Sauoy for the defence of the country: with these forces he pretended to subdue the Prouinces of Lionois, Forest, and Beauueilois, and to reuenge the disgrace he had receiued in Lions. For a beginning, he had reduced to his deuotion, Thisi a strong castle in Lionois, Vienne in Daulphiné, Feur, Montbrison, Saint Germaine, and C Saint Bonnet, townes in Forest: and by this restraining them both aboue and beneath the Riuer, hee made an account either to bring Lions to some extreinty of victuals, or to cause some tumult among the people, who should giue him entry into the citie. Being ready to effect his desseignes, the Constable parted from Languedoc, to ioine with the King, he resolues in this encounter to doe him a notable seruice. Hee comes into Lionois, followed with 1000 horse, and 4. thousand choise. Harguebuziers, happily for the preseruacion of the country: for he presently staied the course of the Duke of Nemours prosperity, who posting to oppose himselfe against the Constable (hauing made a voyage to the Constable of Castille, with hope to haue authority ouer these forraine forces, and to dispose of them for the execution of his desseignes) fortifies Saint Colombe, a small village at the foot D of the bridge of Vienne towards Lionois, lodgeth some troupes there, and the rest he puts in garrison into the towne.

Picardy.

The Duke of Nemours
makes warre
against Lionois.

This great multitude of men shut vp in Vienne, makes their victuals grow scant: they likewise want other necessaries and munition for warre. The Constable cuts off al means from them. The Swisses mutine for want of pay, and beeing called home by their Colonels, goe to ioine with the forces of Sauoy, which the Marquis of Treffort commanded, being Lieutenant generall for the Duke of Sauoy, on this side the Alpes. To curbe Lions more straightly, the Marquis came to winter his men at Mountluel, a small towne of Sauoy, three Leagues from Lions. The Constable preuents him, and surprising the towne, dis appoints the Marquis, lodgeth his men drie, and leaues the Sauoyien subiect to the injuries of the aire, and ketpes him from attempting any thing against Lions.

E The Constable aduertised of some discontent betwixt the captaines of the strangers that were in Vienne, and the Seigneur of Disimieu a Gentleman of Daulphiné, who commanded in the castle of Pipot, the chiefe fort of the said towne, hee practiseth Disimieu, lets him vnderstand of his dueitie to the Kings seruice, his naturall Prince, his duty to his country, and the profit he shall bring by the reduction of this towne, to so many people threatned with foraine oppression. Disimieu giues care, and without any great difficulty, hauing passed his word to the Constable, suffers the Seigneur of Montoisson to enter the castle with a troupe of Harguebuziers. The Constable parts the foure and twentieth of Aprill, with eight hundred Harguebuziers, three hundred horse, and many Gentlemen, as well of the country, as his owne followers: and marcheth toward Vienne. The Marshall of Ornano doth likewise meete him, with siue hundred Harguebuziers, and two hundred maisters. All F flew themselves about Vienne at noone-day. Then Disimieu giues the Siegneur of Cheylart, and Dom Prince de Colonnell of the Italian foot (that were there in garrison) to vnderstand, that beeing well informed of the sinister practise and charge they had to seize vpon his person, hee had resolved to yeeld the towne and castle vnto the King: yet would hee

1595. not put it in execution, before he had obtained a safe conduct for them and their troupes. A
Montjoie shewes himselfe with his troupe, and makes Cheylart and Vincenzo to accept the condition that was offered them. They goe forth, and take the way to Sauoy, garded by a company of light-horse. Dismaieu brings them vnto Saint Blandine, where the Constable attended him, and there takes the oath of obedience and fealty to the King. Towards night the Constable entred Vienne, and receiued the towne and castles of Pippet and La Bastie in his Maiesties name. So Vienne, the onely Sanctuary of the Duke of Nemours, the Rendezuous of strangers, and the Port of Daulphiné to neighbour Prouinces, caused the quiet of al the country, and neighbors about. Since the which the duke alwaies droopt, being contemned, hated, and frustrate of his attempts: and finally he ended all his griefes by a mournfull and lamentable Catastrophe.

As all things succeeded happily for the King, the Marshall of Biron hauing taken Beaune in view of this great army of the Constable of Castille, Autun and Nuys in Bourgogne, hee puts himselfe into Dijon, being called by the Inhabitants, hee chased away the Vienne count of Tauannes troupes (who held the Inhabitants shut vp in a corner of the towne) fortified their barricadoes against the castle, and did beleaguere it, attending his army, which made haste to returne out of the Franche Conté. His Maiesty fore-seeing, that the Constable of Castille being free, after the recouery of Vezou, should bee employed by the Duke of Mayenne, to succour the castle of Dijon, wherein consisted the chiefe hope of his rising, makes hast to Troyes, giues solemne thanks for so happie a victory, and C takes his way to Dijon, arriues there the fourth day of Iune, carrying with him the execution of a designe, more miraculous then all the rest. Without doubt our posterity may put this History with the fabulous tales of the foure fennes of Aymond, of Rowland, Olmer, and others, if wee set not downe the truth, with the chiefe circumstances: for is it not a dreame, an enchantment, and a fabulous tale, that foure-score Cavaliers, but true French Gentlemen, generous, and well led, haue amazed and put to flight, two thousand horse? But what durst not this braue Nobility doe, hauing in the head of them so incomparable and valiant a captaine, and a King so well beloued and respected of all?

The Castillian had already passed his troupes and Artillery, vpon bridges of boares at D Grey: when as the King hauing fortified the Inhabitants with a thousand men, commanded by the Earle of Thorigny, he viewed the castle of Dijon, the fort of Talon a canon-shot from the towne: and all the approaches, whereby the enemy might attempt to succour the castle, made choise of a place of battaile fit to stay him, and where to make forts for the restrayning of the said castle: he resolues to free him of halfe his paines, and to meet him in the midde-way, with a double intent, the one to fight with him at the passage: the other, to giue the assailants time to finish their trenches against the castle. For the execution heereof, hee assigns the Rendezuous at Lux vpon Tille and Fontaine Françoisse to a thousand horse, and five hundred Carabins, whom hee would vse in this rare stratageme: and the same day partes with the onely companie of the Baron of Lux, and some E a thirtie horse, and comes to Lux, and from thence to Fontaine Françoisse, putting a troupe of foote into two castles which are in the village of Saint Seine vpon the riuer of Vigenne, to stoppe the enemies passage. It was the directest and best waie to come to the succour of Dijon.

Wonderfull
effects of the Kings armes.

A league from Fontaine Françoisse, the Marquis of Mirebeau giues his Maiesty intelligence, that hee hath encountered with two troupes of three or foure hundred horse, which made him retire in hast: that he did thinke to haue scene some wings of the army behinde, but he had no leisure to discover them plainly. He spake truth, for all the Castilians army was aduanced to seize vpon the passage of Saint Seine. Some weak spirit, or lesse generous then our Henry, would presently haue resolued to make an honourable retreat: but this did kindle his courage, and increase his desire to see their countenance. Hee sends the Marshall of Biron with the company of the Baron of Lux, to discover if it were the armie, or some other troupe that went to the warre, and himselfe followed the Marshall about three-score horse vpon a hill, mid-waie to Saint Seine, situate at the foote thereof on

A on the one side, so as the villages cannot see one another. The Marshall resolues to chafe them, to see what the enemy did behind. He sees the enemies army comming to the said village, and nere vnto a wood fast by, about three hundred horse, which had beat backe the Baron of Ausonuille, whom his Maiesty had likewise sent before with a hundred horse, to see if the enemy marched or staied.

Thee (supported by their whole army, which followed them at the heeles) put forth one troupe on the right-hand, and an other on the left, who make a shew to charge the Marshall, that they might obserue what forces followed him. To frustrate their expectation, he catcheth the Marquis of Mirebeau to stretch forth at large on the one hand, and the Baron of Lux on the other, and then assured that the enemies army followed, he beganne to B make his retreat towards the King. The enemy presseth him, taking this retreat for a kind of flight: But he retired onely, to charge more furiously. The Baron of Lux sees a troupe, which aduanced before their army, and enters so horly amongst them, as his horse being slaine, hee remains engaged in great danger, if the Marshall had not fallen on them with so rough a charge as they were constrained and forced to turne their backs. Heere-vpon issue forth from the woods, many troupes of horse, which in all, with them that marched before, made about twelue hundred. The Marshall (discouering them) retires more speedily, as well to aduertise his Maiesty that all their army followed, as also to tell his Maiesty, that hee had meanes with his horse to fight with theirs before their foot could arrive. Before he could deliuer this vnto the King, the troupes of the Baron of Thiangies, C Therissier, Villiers, Hondan, and a company of Carabins ioyned with him, whom hee had chased, and force him to turne head, but with twenty horse onely, for the great number of enemies at the first view had amazed most of them which followed the Marshall. Hee chargeth, and ouerthrowes the first hee encounters. But two wounds, one on the head, with a sword, the other with a Lance which razed the skinn of his belly, made the victory for a while doubtfull. Without doubt his braue resolution and wise command encouraged many that were amazed, and confirmed that, which in shew tended to ruine. The onely feare which they had, least he had more men in the village or thereabouts, then he had made shew of, kept the enemy backe, and made them to attend the rest of the army which aduanced: in the meane-time they put them into five esquadrons. His Maiesty sees himselfe engaged to fight, and hath small meanes to make it good, for the troupes followed easily, and the houre of the Rendezuous was not yet come. The King notwithstanding aduanceth a troupe of horse which newly arriued. But discouering this great cloud of enemies ready to charge them, they retire to his Maiesty.

The wildome
and valour of the Marshall of Biron.

An aduent-
rous charge.

One torch may kindle many lights. If our Henry had wanted resolution: if his valour had not bene able to heat these cold and frozen hearts: if numbers had exceeded his courage, hee had bene wonderfully perplexed. It was a shame to retire, a rashnesse to aduance, and dangerous to make a stand. There was perill to fight, or not to fight. Hee chooseth rather to exceed the limits of valour, then to be noted of any cowardise. He aduanceth to them that fled, and causeth some to turne and to ioyne with his troupe: The Lord of Tauannes arriues with his company, increasing his number, which are about two hundred horse, but not yet well ioyned. Herevpon the Duke of Mayenne appeares vpon a hill, and sends forth three esquadrons against his Maiesty, which flanked him on the right hand, the one of three hundred horse, the other of two hundred, and the third of a hundred and fifty, and two others against the Marshall of Biron.

The King aduanceth, with about foure-score horse, and chargeth the first Squadron so violently, as he giues them no leisure to thinke to fight, ouerthrowes the second, and disperseth the third, with about five and twenty horse, which remained with him (the rest pursued the victory) strikes terror into all, and leaues the vanquished no other safety, but to die by the hands of so incomparable a Conqueror. The Marshall of Biron seconds this admirable victory with a great resolution, who followed with about fifty horse, defeated the two esquadrons that came against him, one after another, within threescore paces of the Duke of Mayenne, who stood firme on the hill with his troupe of three hundred horse, whether the run-awaies fled, thinking there to be in safety.

The King and the Marshall charge them ioynly, force them, put them in rout, and pursue victory.

pursue them vnto the corner of the wood. Here the King findes their battailions of foot, A and great store of muskets and other shot planted alongest it, with foure hundred fresh horse, sent to receiue the Duke, a hundred paces from their battailions. So his Maiefty makes a stand, and the enemies freed from him begin their retreat. The Kings horse follow them to the top of the hill, and there put themselves in bataille. The King hauing taken breath in the place from whence he parted to goe to the charge, diuides his men into two troupes, one for himselfe, the other for the Marshall. Here, about a hundred French gentlemen take the place from fiftene hundred horse, and by this meanes the King was master both of the enemies bodies, and of the place of bataille. His Maiefty gathers together such as were dispersed, to make the better shew. Herevpon arriues the Earle of Clermont, B Verry, the Kings light-horse, those of Cesar Monsieur, the Duke d'Elbeuf, the Earle of Chiuerny, the Cheualier d'Osse, the Lords of Risse and Aix, which made about sixe hundred horse of his bands of Ordinance, all greued that they had not followed the fortune and valour of our King, to be partakers of the honor which he had won.

flight.

With this supply he turnes to ouer-take them that fled, and pursues them two leagues, nere vnto Grey: but nor able to follow this shamefull flight hee was content his glory should surmount their shame, and that his valour had vanquished their force: and vsing this famous victory with piety, hee let all the world know in his person, that it is not the sword, nor the arme that strikes, nor the number of men, that preserues Kings in the midst of armes: but that high Providence, which fighting with the one hand for the iust cause of lawfull Princes, against the attempts, and violences of vsurpers and Tyrants: and holding victories in the other, decides the quarrels of Soueraignities, by the equity he finds in Princes armes vniustly oppressed, and makes it manifest that the admirable enents of batailles consist and relie not onely in number or force, but in the free disposition of his fauours, vnto a people whose miseries he will shorten, which the continuance of warre hath bred in a diuided Estate.

The enemy returned to lodge at Saint Seine, and dislodging the next day with feare, they repassed the water vpon their bridges, leauing both the one and the other side of the hill at the Kings deuotion, who without doubt had giuen them a great checke vpon this retreat, if his footmen had beene with him, and the horses lately arriued could haue endured the toyle in the vehement heat of the sunne. The Duke of Mayenne and the Castilian lost in this charge sixe-score men slaine vpon the field, three score prisoners, and two hundred hurt. His Maiefty, onely foure slaine, and one prisoner. But for a notable circumstance, and a signe of the especiall care of God ouer his person, hee performed these exploits without any other armes then his cuirasse alone, and was well assisted to their great commendation by the Dukes of Guise and Elbeuf, the Lord of Tremouille, and the Marquises of Treynel and Pizany, by the Lords of Inteuille, Roquelaure, Chasteauvieux, Liencourt, Montigni, Mirepoix and others. And in despite of all the furious attempts of the league, the castle of Dijon, and in a manner all Bourgongne was soone after reduced to the Kings obedience: and now the third time, he freed his realme from strangers. The King in the end E inuades the cuntry, forceth one of their lodgings in the view of the Constable of Castille nere vnto Grey, becomes master of the field, takes Aspremont and many other places: hee had forced their chiefe forts, if the Suisses had not intreated him to retire his army, and to suffer that Prouince to inioy her ancient liberty.

The Princes absence did imbolden them that were light-headed to discover the rash imaginations of their braines. The Colledge of Sorbonne was not it so well purged of factious humors, but their yet remained some leuaine of sedition and scandal. For Florentine Jacob an Augustine Monke maintained in his disputation in the Colledge of Sorbonne, vnder Thomas Blanzey Doct or in Diuinity and principall of the Colledge of Calui; That without doubt all Spirituall and Temporall things depend vpon the successor of Saint Peters F Chaire, whereas Clement the eight at this day, the great and most soueraigne Bishop, Lieutenant to God on earth, for he hath Spirituall and Temporall power ouer all. And all in generall, Cardinalls, Bishops and others of what estate and condition soeuer, ought to obey him, and adhere perpetually vnto him as the members vnto the head. And that the Church hauing the power of two swords, grants vnto Kings and Magestrates the vse of the temporall

A temporall for the defence of the good and rooting out of the wicked. But the Court of Parliament, the true seat of Royall Iustice, ready and carefull to maintaine the estate against such as would shake it, in that which concerns the affaires of the crowne, declares by a decree of the nineteenth day of Iuly these two Articles to be false, scismatical contrary to the word of God, holy decrees, canonically constitutions and lawes of the Realme, tending to the rebellion and the trouble of the publike quiet, wherefore the Monke being conducted from the prison of the Consergery vnto the Sorbons hall; the Deane, Sindre, Doctors, Lyceniats and Batchelors, being assembled by the found of the bell, he declared (being beare-headed and vpon his knees, Blanzey also, assisting beare-headed, but standing) That rashly and made secretly he had propounded the said positions to be disputed off, and maintained by him in his Ordinary Act, for the which hee was sorry and demanded pardon of God, the King, and Iustice. The questions were torne in peeces, and defences made to all Batchelors to present the like against the Kings power and the obedience which all his subjects owe him, the establishment of the royall Estate, and the rights of the French Church, and to the Deane, Sindre and Doctors of the faculty, to receiue them, nor to suffer them to be printed nor disputed, vpon paine to be declared guilty of high treason, and vnworthy to inioy the priuiledges granted to the faculty of Diuinity, by the Kings predecessors to the King now reigning, and confirmed by him. And to eternize the memory, the court ordained, that this decree should bee written in the Registers of the said faculty, and read euery yeere at C the first assembly of the Sorbonne by the Beadel of the said faculty: inioyning the Sindre to certifie the Court of the reading thereof, within three daies after it should be done, vpon paine of disobedience: This present decree was executed by Iohn Forget one of the Kings priuy counsell, and President in his court of Parliament, Stephen Fleury, Ierosme Angenouff, Ierosme Anrox, and Prosper Baum counsellors in the said court, and deputed Iudges to that end, in the presence of his Maiesties Procter general, who by a graue and Maiefticall admonition did shew zeale and affection to conuince the error and rashnesse of any one that would attempt to make a breach in the royall and soueraigne authority, to weaken the temporall sword, which God onely did put into their hands for the preservation of the good and punishment of the wicked.

D Whilest the King continues his victories, the Marshall of Bouillon executes a dangerous enterprize, but of importance, vpon the towne and castle of Han. Han opened the way for the Spaniard from the fronter vnto Beauvais and Amiens: but this surprize cunningly performed, did wonderfully anoy them, and not one Spaniard of those which had it in gard escaped either death or prison. Six score naturall Spaniards, and six or seuen hundred captaines and souldiers of diuerse nations were slaine, and three or foure hundred prisoners. But all this scumme of men could not recompence the death of that braue and generous Nobleman Humieres, one of the chiefe actors in the enterprize, as much lamented first by the King, then by the Nobility, and generally of all France, as his vertues and merits had made him commendable and necessary for his Maiesties seruice. La Croix E master of the campe, Mazieres Lieutenant to Suruille, and Boycourt captaine of Humieres gard, were companions of his valour, and graue. The towne was taken for the King, with the death of some twenty other gentlemen, and about a hundred souldiers. But the Spaniard soone after reuenged this surprize vpon Casteler, but more sharply vpon the towne of Dourlans, for hauing put to rout the fuccors which the Marshall of Bouillon sent, slaine the Admirall of Villars and many gentlemen, they tooke the towne by assault (not for want of men or munition, but by their bad order, and the intelligence which the Commanders in the towne had with the enemy) and entred it with such great fury, as they had no respect of sex or age: hauing no reason for their horrible cruelty, but the fresh remembrance of their companions. It is (cried they) to reuenge those of Han.

Han surprized
for the King.Humieres

Dourlans for the Spaniards.

F The Duke of Neuers, the Marshall of Bouillon, and the Earle of Saint Paul, Commanders of the Kings troupes, hauing diuided the charge amongst them, to incounter the Spaniards, the Marshall and the Earle went to provide for the places about Bollogne, and the Duke for those vpon the riuier of Somme. Passing by Amiens, he finds the people and chiefeest so amazed, that to assure them, hee was forced to lay aside the quality of his person, and to promise to put himselfe into Corbie, foure leagues from Amiens, to defend it if the enemy

1595. enemy approached. He enters it the third of August, views it both within and without, takes A a survey of the quantity of munition, and of the number of mouthes, and provides as time and necessity would permit him for things necessary for the preservation of the place. The Spaniard had an other designe: for the first day of the moneth he parts from about Dourlans, and taking the way betwixt Peronne and Corbie, seems to threaten Saint Quentin or Cambray. So the Duke leaves Corbie, but doubtfull whither the Spaniard went: yet aduertised by the Vicont d'Auchy, governor of Saint Quentin, that the enemy approached towards him, he goes to defend Saint Quentin. He is no sooner arrived, but newes comes, that the Earle of Fuentes is lodged about Cambray, to besiege it with seenteene thousand men, and three-score and two peeces of artillery. The Lord of Balagny, Marshall of France, by his articles of capitulation with the King, confirms this advice by his letters of the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth and foure-teenth of the moneth, and requires to be soderly re-leueed, for the pitifull Estate of Dourlans terrified the people: the towne was it provided of men, this huge number of canons, and this fearefull multitude of soldiers, strooke a generall terror among the citizens.

Cambray besieged.

But to reuiue their spirits, who were ready to yeeld obedience to a new Lord, the Duke of Neuers sends them his onely sonne, the Duke of Rethelois, assisted with the valour and wisdome of the Lords of Vicques, Buihy, Trumelet, Vaudecourts, Sugny, Fleury, Chaltrey, and others, with about three hundred and fifty horse. The Peasants by their bells giue the a-larum from village to village, and a paltry bridge of wood at Anne, two leagues from Cam-bray, staying their troupe, gaue the Earle of Fuentes meanes to put his horse in battaile almost directly in the way where the Duke should passe. He auoides it, and going aside encounters a gard of five and twenty Lances, making a stand on this side of a hollow-way: hee chargeth them, cuts them in peeces in the fight of their horse, which could not succour them by reason of the said way, and passing on, hee falls into a troupe of two hundred and fifty horse, marcheth directly to them, scatters them, goes on his way, and comes to the towne-ditch. The Inhabitants know him and receiue him with much honour, and ioy to see so braue succors.

Cambray yeel-
ed to the Spaniard.

But it was too weake against such a number of assailants: the King was farre off, the Estate of Bourgundy kept him occupied: the affaires of the Prouince of Lionois required his presence. The Inhabitants of Cambray began to decline in affection: they were malcontent with the tediousnesse of the siege, and the ruine of their houses by the canon, and of the constraint to take certaine money made of copper, and not suffer them to imploy, it, carrying on the one side the Kings armes, as Protector, and on the other those of the Lord of Balagny, created Prince of Cambray by the Articles of his redition. On the other side the enemy made strange attempts, and gaue horrible threats against the besieged. They shut their eares against all perswasions, and make a disloyall resolution to yeeld, and hoping for better viage and more liberty, they open the gates to the enemy. The Duke of Rethelois, Balagny, Vicques, and others flie into the Cittadell. The Duke would retire his sonne, and makes the besieged despaire of any speedy succors. So the ninth of October Balagny signed the capitulation, offered by the enemy: but with so much griefe and sorrow, as the same night he signed it, his wife being a woman of a great spirit died, not able to endure that so precious a Jewell as Cambray (whereof she was newly created Prin-cesse) should fall into the Spaniards cruell hands.

Thus this ancient member of this crowne was lost: Thus the onely triumph of a sonne and brother of the Kings of France was blemished. Doubtlesse had it not bene for the impatency and disloyalty within, the fault of some great men that might haue preuented this mischiefe, all their attempts had bene in vaine: for the Earle of Fuentes was ready to build forts about the towne, rather to vanquish them by a long siege then by assault. And the King hastned his entry into Lions, to come to their speedy succour. The Duke of Neuers died soone after, greeued on the one side for so great a breach made to this Estate, and satisfied on the other, that his sonne had shewed himselfe so valiant in the conduct of the succors he put into the towne.

The King seeing the Constable of Castille shut vp into Dole and Grey, being loath to hazard a battaile, he went and made his entry into Lions the fourth of September, assured
the

A the Prouince, provided for the troubles of Prouence, nourished not so much by the league, as by the discontentments and partialities of some which had no intelligence with them: he receiued Sis Dauphin to his obedience, with the towns of Chasteaugontier in Aniou, and Sable in Maine, and for recompence of his seruice, honored him with the place of a Marshall of France. Then he granted a generall truce throughout the whole Realme, to the Duke of Mayenne, which after so many stormes, and so many tempests, shall in the end bring vs to a safe port, so necessary to quiet the diuisions of this Realme.

The King being prest to make a generall truce, and cessation of armes through out his whole Kingdome, vpon the assurance which the Duke of Mayenne hath giuen him to cause it to be obserued by all them which doe yet make warre, as well vnder his authority as in the B name of the vnion: his Maiesty desirous to ease his subiects of the oppression of warre, hath granted them these Articles, following.

1 First that there shalbe a good and firme truce and cessation of armes throughout the Realme, Countries and Seignories thereof, and of the protection of the crowne of France, for the space of three monethes, to beginne, in the Gouvernements of Lionois, Forrests, and Beauuailois, where as his Maiesty now is, and in the Duchie of Bourgondy, sixe daies after that these present Articles shalbe signed: within the which they shalbe proclay-med within the townes of Lyon, Dijon, Chaalons and Seure. In the Gouvernements of Daulphiné, Prouencé, the Isle of France, Bourbonnois, Niuernois, Auvergne, Chartres, and C Orleance, eight daies after the date thereof. In the Gouvernements of Champagne, Picar-die, Normandy, Britan, Berry, Tourraine, Mayenne, Lymoges, high and low Marsh fifeteene daies after. And in the Gouvernements of Guyenne, Languedoc, Poyctou, Xaintonge, Angoulmois, Metz, and the country of Metz, twenty daies after this present accord: And yet it shall end generally the same daie.

2 All persons both Clergy Nobility and Inhabitants of towne and country, may during the present truce, gather their fruits and reuenues, and inioy them wherefoeuer they bee, and may re-enter into there country-houses and castles, which they that hold them shall be bound to yeeld vnto them, and to leaue them free without all let, vpon condition that they shall not cause any fortification to bee made during the said truce, alwaies excepting those D castles wherein there is any Garrison imployed for the warre, the which shall not bee restored: yet the Proprietaries shall inioy the fruits and reuenues depending thereon, notwithstanding any guists and ceasures which haue bene made.

3 The labourers and husbandmen, may with all liberty follow their labour, and accustomed workes, and shall not bee hindred, nor molested in any sort, vpon paine of death for them that shall doe the contrary.

4 Euery man may freely passe throughout the Realme, without any constraint to take a passport: And yet no Marshall enter into any towne or place of strength of a contrary partie, but with these armes, that is, a foot-man with his sword, and a horse-man with his sword and Pistol or Harguebuze, sending first to aduertize them that command there: who E shall be bound to giue them leaue to enter, vnlesse the qualitie and number of the Persons minister iust cause of ieaousie of the surety of the places where they command: which is referred to their Iudgement and discretion. And if any of a contrarie party shall enter into any of the said places, without declaring themselves, and demanding leaue, they shalbe good prize. And to preuent all controuerfies which may growe, they that command in the said places, granting the said permission, shalbe bound to giue it in writing without charge.

5 The money of taxes and impositions set vpon Marchandize and other commodities, shalbe leauied during the said three monethes, as they bee at this present: neither shall they be augmented but by his Maiesties commissions, and without preiudice of the Accords, and F particular treaties, already made for the perception and leauy of the said money, the which shalbe entertained and kept.

6 Notwithstanding the said money shall not bee leauied by anticipation of quarters, but onely for the quarter running, without his Maiesties permission, and by the officers of the elections, who in case of resistance, shall haue recourse vnto the Governor of the nearest towne, to bee assisted with forces for the charges whereof they shall not exact
but

1595. but one fould vpon the Liuer of those summes for the which the constraint shalbe made. A

7 As for arrerages of the said taxes, and taillon there shall not bee leauied aboute the quarter that is in being, and during the same, vnlesse it be one other quarter of that which is of the present yeere, without his Maiesties permission.

8 That during the present truce, there shalbe nothing attempted vpon the places of either partie, nor any act of Hostillity done: And if any one should so farre forget himselfe as to doe the contrary, his Maiesty will cause reparation to bee done for his part, and punish the delinquents as troublers of the publike quiet, as also the Duke de Mayenne shalbe bound to doe for his part: And whereas hee shall not haue meanes to doe it, to abandon them vnto his Maiesty to be pursued and punished as aboue, neither B shall they be releued or assisted in any sort?

9 In like manner if any of the said Dukes partie refuse to obey the contents of these present Articles, hee shall doe his best endeauor to force him: And if within fiftene daies after requisition made they shall not obey, it shalbe lawfull for his Maiestie to make warre against him or them that shal thus refuse, neither shall it be lawfull for the said Duke, or any that depend of him, to assist or succour them in any sort what soeuer.

10 It shall not be lawfull to take any places, during the present truce to fortifie them, although that they were not held by any one.

11 The Prouost Marshalls, shall doe their duties in apprehension in the conrey and in fragrant delights, without distinction of parties, with charge to send them to those Iudges C to whom the knowledge should belong.

12 It shall not bee lawfull to quarrell or challenge one another by Duels, or assemblies of friends, for any difference that hath happened by reason of the present troubles, be it for the taking of men, houses, cattaille, or any other occasion whatsoeuer, so long as the said truce shall continue.

13 The Gouvernours and Lieutenants generall, and others commanding in euery Prouince, shall assemble, after the publication of these present Articles, or shall depute commissioners in their behalfe, to aduise what shall bee necessarie for the execution thereof, for the good and ease of them that are vnder their charges: And whereas it shalbee held profitable and necessarie, to adde, correct or diminish anything for the particular good of the said Prouince, they shall aduertize his said Maiestie and the Duke D of Mayenne.

14 These present Articles are granted, not meaning they shall preiudice the Accordes and perticular Orders made betwixt the Gouvernours, and Lieutenants generall of Prouinces by his Maiesties commandement, and the consent of the said Duke of Mayenne, and others that haue power to doe it.

Made at Lions the 23. of September 1595. and signed by the King and Duke of Mayenne.

E

God raiseth vp a great meanes from beyond the mountaines, to make the way easie for a generall peace and re-vnion of people distracted from his Maiesties obedience. The Pope mooued in the end to see the eldest sonne of the Church, and the chiefe Christian Prince prostrate at his feete, shewes himselfe a true father of Iustice, to vanquish the difficulties and oppositions, whereby the Ambassador of Spaine had crost his Maiesties constant and iust pursute, since the time of his conuersion. The 18. of September he opens the streames of his blessings vpon our Kings head: and all the Colledge of Cardinals, all the people, all the city of Rome, crie out with that happy acclamation, God saue Henry of Bourbon King of France and of Nauarre, most great, most victorious. God saue the most Christian and most Catholike. God saue the chiefe sonne of the Church. F

The Pope
blesseth the King.

Few daies after the newes of this sollemne action, the King went from Lions in post by night, to goe to the succor of Cambray, but the effects were not answerable to his care and good will. The Cambresiens had already conceived some hope of greater libertie, they hoped to get much by the change, and yelded their neckes to a new command. There is neither

A neither meanes, counsel, nor reason, that can stay a multitude, when as a disordered appetite or freedome doth transport them. His Maiestie findes other worke to imploy his forces: hee sought to roote this forraigne power speedily out of Picardy, which held his hands bound, and insulted ouer him: La Fere is the chiefe and most important fort of the Province, he besiegeth it and finds therein an obstinate and inuincible resolution. Perseuerance is necessary in all actions of warre, but especially in the siege of townes, and there is no place which the munition & the situation makes impregnable, but time & famine will force, subdue and bring vnder. Whilest the King leaues the besieged nothing free but the aire, and drives them to all extremities, the Duke of Mayenne on the other side (seeing his retreats in a manner all lost, and that he is in disgrace with the Spaniards) sues for his Maiesties fauour, and vpon his simple word hee promisseth to come vnto him wheresoeuer he pleased. B The Marquis of Saint Sorlin, now Duke of Nemours, by the death of his elder brother, yelds with the like facility.

La Fere besieged.The Dukes of Mayenne and Nemours re-ceiued into grace.

Neuer Prince did more easily remit the wrongs were done him. The King grew more cold then was requisite in a siege of such importance, to attend the treaties of the one and the other. He commended the first, for the affection he had shewed to preferue the realme entire hauing not done, nor suffered it to be dismembred, but of some places, in the great declining of his Estate, and declares that he had alwaies heard that the second had no part in the troubles and diuisions of the realme, by any designe preiudiciall to the Estate. This C reunion of the Duke of Mayenne performed at Monceaux in Brie caused the yelding of Soissons, Pierrefont, Chaalon vpon Soane, Seurre in Bourgongne, and some other places, to the Kings obedience, wherevpon the King made an Edi& as followeth.

Henry by the grace of God &c. As it is the duty of a good King to loue his subiects, as his children, to intreat them as his owne, and to thinke that their felicity is his: God and men are witnesses, that since it pleased God to cal vs to this crowne, we haue had no greater desire then to free our selfe of this charge. For hauing found this Realme full of factions, warre, and diuisions, more dangerous then haue beene heretofore, we haue neither spared our blood to defend our authority, nor our clemency to forget wrongs which haue beene done vs: to the end wee might soone free our Realme from oppressions and ciuill warres, D the very spring and mother of all miseries. Wherein we confesse that wee haue beene no lesse assisted by the grace and blessing of God in the one, then in the other. For if hee hath often giuen vs victories ouer our enemies, hee hath also giuen vs a will and meanes to vanquish them by mildnesse, that haue made themselues worthy; so as we may say that we haue no lesse aduanced the re-vnion of our subiects by clemency then by armes. And therein we haue beene chiefly moued by the great loue wee beare vnto our owne particular interest or aduantage. Vwe haue also had a great regard vnto the causes which haue incited many of them to arme, being grounded vpon the care which euery man should haue of his soules health, the which we haue held so much the more worthy of commiseration & E excuse, for that wee doe acknowledge as a true Christian, that there is not any thing hath more power ouer vs, then this bond. Wherefore hauing often tried by our selfe that force doth rather fortifie then change the resolution of man, in matter of Religion, and that it is a grace which is infused into vs, not by our owne iudgements, nor by any other, but by the onelie bountie of the cuer-lyuing God and by the working of the Holy Spirit.

Assoone as we had any breathing from our great toyles, by the aduantages which God hath giuen vs ouer our aduersaries, wee drue vnto vs Prelats and Doctors of good life, and learned in the Holy Scriptures, to instruct vs in the truth of the Catholike Religion, whereof God by his Grace hauing made vs capable, with a firme resolution to perseuer therein vnto the death: wee haue since had no greater desire then to participate in the F vnion and societie of the Catholike Apostolike and Romish Church; and our reconciliation with our Holie Father the Pope; and the Holie Sea, as all men may see by our actions, and the continuall pursuites which wee haue made: The which haue beene so crost, by the ordinarie practizes of our enemies, and their power at Rome, as if our constancie and reason had not mooued and fortified the vertue and singular bountie 1595. of our Holy father (who like a common father did onely regard the good of Christian Religion) we had neuer attained to the happinesse of his holy blessing, nor of our reconciliation so much desired, for the quiet of our conscience, and the better satisfaction of our subiects, moued only with the zeale of Religion. Wherein we haue great cause to praise God, and to magnifie his holinesse and equity, who by his wisdom and bounty hath confounded the insolency and falshood of our enemies: Wee haue no lesse cause to admire Gods diuine providence in that it hath pleased him to make the way of our saluation, the surest meanes to winne the hearts of our subiects, and to draw them to obey vs, as hath beene seene soone after our vnion to the Church, and euer since continued.

But this worke had not beene perfect, nor the peace absolute, if our deere and wel-beloued cousin the Duke of Mayenne, chiefe of his partie, had not followed the same course, as he was resolu'd to doe, when as hee saw our Holy Father allow of our reuinion: The which hath made vs to like better of his actions then before, to take in good part the zeale which hee had to Religion, and to commend his desire to preferue the Realme, the which hee would not suffer to bee dismembred, when as the prosperity of his affaires seemed to giue him some meanes: As also since beeing weake, hee chose rather to cast himselfe into our armes, and yeeld vs the obedience, which God, Nature and the lawes commanded him, then to seeke other remedies which might continue the warres, to the great preiudice of our subiects: The which makes vs desire to acknowledge his goodwill, and to loue and intreat him hereafter as our good kinf-man and faithfull subiect. And to the end that both hee and all Catholikes which shall imitate him in this dutie, may bee the better confirmed, and others incited to the like resolution: And also to the end that no man may hereafter seeme to doubt of the sincerity of our re-vnion to the Catholike Church, and vnder that pretext stirre vp new seeds of dissention to seduce our subiects and draw them to their ruine: Wee declare and protest that our resolution is to liue and die, in the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Religion, wherof wee haue made profession: our intention is also to procure the aduancement thereof with al our meanes, and with the like care and affection, as the most Christian Kings our Predecessors haue done, by the aduise of our good and loyall Catholike subiects, as well of those which haue alwaies assisted vs, as of others which haue since yeelded vs obedience, maintrayning notwithstanding the publike tranquillity of the realme.

1 In the meane time wee will that in the townes of Chaalons, Seurre and Soissons (the which wee haue left as townes of suertie to our said cousin, for sixe yeeres) nor in the Baylie-wike of Chaalons, wherof wee haue graunted the gouernment to one of his sonnes, beeing seperated for the said time from that of Bourgondie, or within two leagues of Soissons, there shalbe no other exercise, but of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Religion during the said sixe yeeres, nor any person aduanced, to publike charges and offices, which shall not make profession of the said Religion.

2 And to the end the re-vnion vnder our obedience of our said cousin, and of all those which shall imitate him in this dutie, may bee absolute and perfect as it is fit, as well for our seruice, and the quiet of al our subiects, as for the honour and safety of our said cousin, and of others which would inioy this present Edict: wee haue and doe reuoke all Edicts, Letters-patents, and declarations, made and published in our court of Parliament at Paris, and other places, and iurisdictions, since the present troubles and by reason thereof: And all iudgements and decrees made against our said cousin the Duke of Mayenne, and other Princes, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Officers, Communalities, and priuate persons of what quality soeuer, that will take the benefit of the said Edict: wee will and our meaning is that the said Edicts Letters-patents, and Declarations, shalbe drawne out of the Registers of the said court, and other places and iurisdictions, to the end the memory thereof may bee suppress'd and extinct.

3 Wee forbid our subiects of what qualitie soeuer, to reuiue the memory of things past, during the said troubles, nor to iniurie one another by word nor deed, the delinquents to bee punished as troublers of the publike quiet: To this end wee will that all markes of dissention, which might breed any bitterness amongst our said subiects, being brought into our townes and other places since the present troubles, and by reason thereof,

A thereof, shalbe taken away: inioyning all Maiors, Consuls, Sheriffes and other officers to haue a care thereof.

4 Wee will also and ordaine that all Clergy men, Gentlemen, Officers and all others of what quality and condition soeuer, that will acknowledge vs with our said cousin the Duke of Mayenne, shalbe restored to their Goods, Benefices, Offices, Charges and Dignities. Notwithstanding all Edicts, gifts of their goods, rents, and debts, and prouisions of their offices to any other persons, sales, confiscations, and declarations, which haue beene made and in-rold: All which we reuoke and by vertue of this present Edict doe put them in full possession thereof: vpon condition that our said cousin and they, shall sweare fidelity and obedience vnto vs, and shall presently depart from all leagues, practises, affociations, or intelligences, made both within and without our Realme, and shall promise hereafter not to make any vpon what pretext soeuer.

5 Our said cousin, with the Princes, Noblemen, Clergy, Gentlemen, Officers and other Inhabitants of Townes, Communalities, and Borroughes, which haue in any sort followed and fauored his party and shal come and acknowledge their duties with him, within the time limited by this present Edict, shall not be called in question for things past and committed by them during the present troubles, and by reason thereof: And we will that all iudgments and decrees which haue or may bee giuen against them for this respect, with all proceedings, and informations shalbe voide and of no force, and shalbe taken out of the Registers without any exception, except crimes which are punishable in the same party, and the murder of the deceased King, our most honored Lord and brother.

6 And notwithstanding hauing often consulted vpon this fact, with the aduise of the Princes of our blood, and other Princes, Officers of our crowne, and of many Noblemen of our counsel: And hauing since examined the informations made during the space of these seven yeeres: By the which it hath appeared vnto vs that the Princes and Princesses our subiects which had fallen from the obedience of the deceased King our most honored Lord and brother, were not any way charged: we haue and doe declare by these presents, that the said exception shal not extend to the said Princes, and Princesses, which haue and shall acknowledge the duty whereto they are bound vnto vs, according to this present Edict: Many other great considerations mouing vs therevnto, and the oth which they haue taken not to haue consented vnto the said murder: we forbid our Proctor generall both present and to come, and all others to make any pursuite against them, and to our Courts of Parliament and al other our Iudges and Officers to take knowledge thereof.

7 Moreouer all they that haue been put out of our townes, since the reduction of them to our obedience, by reason of the present troubles, and for such causes as should be remitted by the present Edict, or were absent at the reduction thereof, & are yet for the same causes, being desirous to inioy the benefit of the Edict, may returne into the said towns and inioy their houses, goods and dignities, notwithstanding al Edicts, Letters and Decrees to the contrary.

8 Our said cousin the Duke of Mayenne, and the noblemen, gentlemen, gouernors of officers, communalities, and other priuate persons, which haue followed him, shalbe in like manner discharged, of al summes of money leauied and taken by them for what cause soeuer and in like manner they that haue furnished the said money shalbe acquitted and discharged.

9 In like manner they shalbe discharged of all acts of hostility, leauies and conduct of men of warre, coyning of money, casting and taking of artillery and munition, as well in publike Magazines, as in priuate houses, surprizes, ransoms, fortifications, raylings of townes and castles, enterprizes, burning and ruining of Churches, and suburbs of townes, erecting of counsels, iudgments & executions thereof: priuate commissions, as well in ciuill, as criminal causes, voiajes, intelligences, negotiations & treatises both within and without our realme.

10 They which haue executed the charge of Commissaries general of the victuals, vnder our said cousin, & vnder the noblemen commanding in the priuate Prouinces of our realm, the which shall obey vs according to the present Edict, and within the time limited, shalbe freed from al question, for all sorts of munition, victuals, horses, furniture and other things done by them for the execution of their charge during the present troubles, neither shall they be answerable for their Deputies, Clerks and other officers, imploied by them, neither 1595. shall they be bound to yeeld any account of their offices, but onely bring a certificate from A our cousin, that they haue serued faithfully the execution of their charges.

11. All memorials, letters and publike writings, since the first of Ianuary 1589. for what cause soeuer, shall remaine suppressed, and the authors shall not be questioned with, imposing silence in that respect, aswel to our Proctors general and their substitutes, as to all priuate persons.

12. Our pleasure also is that their shall be no search-made against the Siegnior of Maigny, his Lieutenant, and the souldiers of our said cousins gard, hauing assisted at the death of the Marquis of Maignely, which happened against the will, and to the great griefe of our said cousin, as hee hath protested. And the said fact shall in that respect bee abolished, neither shall they haue any further need to obtaine any other letters, or more ample declaration: the like shalbe for those which haue obtained letters frō our said cousin for that fact, the which haue bin verified by him which did hold the place of great Prouost in his traine.

12. All sentences, iudgements and decrees, giuen by Iudges of the same party and betwixt men of the same party, or others which voluntarily contested, shalbe of force, and not be reuoked by our courts of Parliament, or other Iudges, but in cases of appeale, or by some other ordinary course: And whereas any reuocation, or cessation hath bene made, it shal now remaine void and of no force.

14. The time which hath run since the first of Ianuary 1589. vnto this present, shal not auale any person of diuers parties, to purchase them prescription, or pre-emptiō of instance. C

15. Al that hath been executed by vertue of the iudgments, or publike acts of the counsell, erected by our said cousin for ransoms, allowing of pardons, remissions, and abolitions, shal take place without any reuocation, for that which concernes priuate persons.

16. Such as haue bene aduanced by our said cousin, to offices being void by death or resignation, in townes which shall acknowledge vs with him, as also of offices, of the receiuers of salt newly erected in the said townes, shalbe maintained therein, in taking prouision from vs, the which we wil cause to be giuen them.

17. And in regard of those which haue bene preferred to the said offices by our said cousin, the which haue bene void in townes which heretofore haue followed his party, were it by death, resignation, or new creation, made by vs, or our predecessors, who haue since followed our said cousin, and not sworne obedience to vs according to our Edicts, returning now to our seruice with him (who are peticularly set downe in a rowle signed by vs) shall in like manner bee maintained in the said offices, taking prouisions from vs: The like shalbe done for benefices, specified in the said rowle.

18. If there be any suite vpon the prouision of offices, within the townes which shall acknowledge vs, with our said cousin, granted by him, betwixt persons which are yet of the said party, or one of them, and shall acknowledge vs with him, he that shall obtaine a declaration of our said cousins intention, shalbe confirmed, so as he bring the said declaration within six moneths after the publication of this present Edict.

19. And for that they which haue bene preferred to offices, by death, resignation, new creation or otherwise, and haue paid their fines to the receiuers of the casualties on the party of our said cousin, may pretend some remedy against him, or them, that haue received the said money, either to be maintained in the said offices, or to haue their money restored: we haue and doe discharge by these presents our said cousin, and the said treasurers and receiuers, from all actions and demands, which may be intended against them in this respect.

20. All they that shal acknowledge vs with our said cousin, which haue inioyed the fees, rights, and profits of any offices, fruits of benefices, reuenues of houses, lands and signiories, rents and any mouable goods and rights belonging to them of the contrary party, by vertue of the gifts, ordinances, commandments, rescriptions and quitances of our said cousin the Duke of Mayenne, shall not bee subiect to any restitution, but shall remaine fully discharged; They shal not in like maner, demand nor challenge any thing of that which hath bene taken from them by our commandment and authority, and received by our other subiects and seruants, excepting of either party the mouables which shalbe found in being, the which may bee challenged by them to whom they doe belong, paying the price for which they were sold.

A 21 In like manner Ecclesiasticall persons, which shall acknowledge vs, with our said cousin, and haue not yet taken the oath of allegiance, hauing payed their rithes to his Receiuers, with the money for the alienation of their temporall lands, shall not bee called in question for what is past, but shall be fully discharged, and in like manner the Receiuers which haue made the payment.

22 All summes of money which haue bin payed by the commaundement of our said cousin, or of them which haue had charge of the treasure vnder him, to any persons, or for any cause soeuer, by the Treasurers or Receiuers, which haue the managing of the publike money, who shall acknowledge vs with him, shall bee allowed in our Chambers of Account, without any exception, for that the forme and order of Finances hath not bene duly obserued: and the accompts which haue bene made, shall not be subiect to reuision, but in case of the ordinance: We wil that for the reestablishment of all parties raised, and held in suspence, all letters and necessarie vallidations shall be giuen them. And as for Accompts yet to make, they shall be heard in our Chamber of Accompts at Paris, or else-where, whereunto they shall not bee constrained within one whole yeare. And our said cousin, nor the Treasurers, Receiuers, and Accomptants, shall not bee answerable in their owne names, for the Commaundements, Rescriptions, and Quitances, which they haue giuen for matters depending vpon their charge, vnlesse they haue bound themselves particularly.

C 23 The Edicts and Declarations made by vs vpon the reduction of the payment of Rents constituted, or Annuities, shal take place for them that shall make vse of this present Edict, neither shall any one pretend, that they are deprived of the benefit of the sayd Edicts and Declarations, for that they haue not satisfied, within the time prefixed by them: and the time shall not runne against him, but from the day of the publication of our sayd Edict.

24 And for that the widowes and heires of such as are dead, of our said cousins party, may be called in question and molested, by reason of things done during the troubles by their husbands, and them to whom they are heires: We will, that they shall enioy the same discharge, granted by the precedent Articles, to all those that shall take the oath of allegiance with our said cousin.

D 25 All those that will enioy the present Edict shall be bound to make declaration within fixe weekes after the publication thereof, to the Court of Parliament, where they dwell, and shall take the oath of allegiance: that is to say, the Princes, Bishops, Gouvernors of Provinces, Officers, and others hauing publike charges, in the hands of our most deare and faithfull Chancellor, or of the Parlements where their charges lye, and the rest before the Bayliffes, Seneshals, and other ordinary Iudges, within the said time.

E 26 Vpon a declaration made vnto vs by our cousin the Duke of Mayenne, for the towne of Marseille, and others of our country of Prouence, which haue hitherto followed his party, and will obey vs with him by vertue of this present Edict. We haue ordained and promised that they shall enioy the contents, which are inserted in secret Articles, granted by vs vnto our said cousin.

27 Moreouer, desiring to giue all occasions to the Dukes of Mercure, and Aumale, to returne to our seruice, and to yeeld vs obedience, after the example of our said cousin the Duke of Mayenne, and at his most humble suite: We haue in like manner declared, that we will willingly looke vpon their demands, when they shall present them vnto vs, and shall acquit themselves of their dutie towards vs, so as they do it within the time limited by this present Edict. And we will, that the execution of the Decree made against the said Duke of Aumale in our court of Parliament, shall presently surcease, vntill that wee haue otherwise ordaine<sup>d</sup>, meaning to reuoke and suppress the said Decree, if the said Duke of Aumale doth acknowledge vs as he ought, during the said Terme.

28 Knowing with what affection our said cousin, employes himselfe to reduce such as remaine of his partie to our obedience, and by that meanes to settle the Realme in peace, we haue bene also pleased, that the Articles which concerne our deare and louing cousin the Duke of Joyeuse, and the Marqueses of Villars and Mont-pezat, as also the Seigneur of Estrange, who doth now command in our towne of Puy, with the Inhabitants of the sayd Towne, 1595. towne, the Seigneurs of Saint Offange, Gouvernor of Roch-fort, du Plessis, Gouverneur of A Craon, and La Senery, Gouvernor of Ganache, hauing beene scene and resolued on in our Councell, vpon the memorials which they haue sent to that end, the which our said cousin hath presented vnto vs, We will, that what hath bene thereupon accorded, shall be obserued in euery point; so as our said cousin shall make it appeare vnto vs within sixe moneths, that they haue accepted that which we haue granted vnto them, and that within the same Terme they shall take the Oath of allegiance: otherwise we meane not to be tryed to the obseruation of the said Articles.

29 Hauing regard, that our said cousin hath engaged himselfe and some of his friends and seruants, in many summes of mony, set downe in a Scedule, and signed by him, amounting to the summe of three hundred and fifty thousand crownes, the which he informed vs was employed for the warre, and others of his party, and not any thing conuerted to his owne priuate vse, nor of his friends and seruants which stand bound, whereof desiring to discharge him, and to giue him the more meanes to do vs seruice: Wee promise our sayd cousin to acquit the said debts specified in the said Scedule, vnto the summe of three hundred and fifty thousand crownes principall debt, and seven and twenty thousand, sixe hundred and fifty crownes for the arrerages of some part of the said debts, the rents and arrerages being cast vp, for the time specified in the said Scedule, signed by vs, and by our said cousin, and to discharge him wholly with his said friends and seruants, which stand ioyntly bound. And to this end to cause to bee payed vnto him within two yeares, in eight payments quarterly; the first quarter beginning the first day of this present moneth of January, the summe of one hundred twenty one thousand and fifty Crownes, the which we haue ordained shall be assigned vpon some generall receipts of our sayd Realme, to bee employed alwell in discharge of the said debts, with the rents and interest, as of the arrerages thereof, vnto the time specified by the sayd Scedule, signed by vs, and our said cousin: And hereafter to cause the sayd rents and interests to be payed, vnto the full extinction thereof. And as for the other debts contained in the said Scedule, signed by our said cousin, remayning of the three hundred and fifty thousand Crownes: Wee promise to our said cousin, to returne and deliuer vnto him the promises, contracts, and bonds made by him and his friends, and seruants, within foure yeares, without paying any arrerages or interest, or else to giue him within the said time valable iudgements of the invaliditie of the said debts: so as our sayd cousin, his friends and seruants shall be wholly discharged. And vntil the said promises and bonds shall be restored vnto him, We will and ordaine, that neither hee nor his friends and seruants which stand ioyntly bound, shall be constrained to pay all or any part of the said three hundred and fifty thousand Crownes, nor the arrerages or interest of the sayd rents. And that all letters of Surcease, Interdiction, and Euocation in our Councell of State, shall be dispatched whensoever need shall require, vpon the extract of this present Article.

30 Moreouer, desiring to free our said cousin the Duke of Mayenne of all interest, towards the Suisses, Reistres, Lansquenets, Lorraines, and other strangers, to whom hee hath bound himselfe, as well for the leaue of men of warre, as for the seruice which they haue done, during their abode in his partie: we promise to discharge him of all the summes for the which he stands bound, as well in his owne priuate name, or as chiefe of his said party, and to put them with the other debts of the Crowne, according to the verification which hath bene made by the deceased Seigneur of Videuille, Intendant of the finances, and by the Esleuz of the said Countrey of Bourgondie, for the regard of the said Suisses, Reistres, Lansquenets, and Lorraines, since the said verifications, reuoking and disanulling by these presents, the bonds which he hath contracted in his owne name for that regard: And particularly to the Earle of Collate, Colonnell of the Lansquenets, and other Collonels and Captaines of the Suisses and Reistres, so as he shall not be molested by vertue of the said bonds, seeing there came not any thing to his priuate profite: so as he shall haue all letters and necessarie prouisions concerning the same.

31 The secret Articles which are not inserted in this present Edi&t, shall be inuolubly obserued: and vpon the extract thereof, or of any of the sayd Articles, signed by one of our Secretaries of State, all necessarie letters shall be dispatcht.

Comman-

A Commaunding our Councillors, our Court of Parliament, and all other Chambers, Courts, Iudges, and Officers, euery one in his Iurisdiction, to cause these present Articles to be read, published, enrolled, and inuolubly obserued without breach, and all they to whom it shall belong to enioy the contents thereof, causing all troubles and lets to the contrarie to cease: for such is our pleasure. And to the end it may be firme and stable for euer, we haue set to our hand and Seale. Given at Fontain-bleau in January. 1596.

Signed. HENRY.

B THIS Reduction of the Duke of Mayenne serued the Marshall d'Aumont as a spur to crosse the exploits of the Duke of Mercœur in Brittany. Hee had lately seized vpon Chaize, a place situated betwixt Normandy, Maine, and Brittain, and from thence commanded the neighbour Prouinces; stretching out his wings thirty leagues round about, without contradiction. They of Caen did first complaine of it: the Marshall d'Aumont aduertised of this prize by the Earle of Montgomery, sends for Capitaine Gentill (whose merits haue giuen vs subiect to make an honourable mention of him else-where.) Gentill gets leaue of the King, and goes to view Chaize in a darke night, but he could find no meanes to force it, beeing seated high, emioured with steepe rockes, a riuer, and two pooles, hauing no approach nor entrance, but by two narrow Cawseys, whose issues must bee discovered by light. He returns thither at a full Moone, and finds no other expedient, but to open the wall by the force of his Engines, by the meanes of a little hole which hee found close to the ground. Yet this place is fortified with a double ditch, flanked by the dungeon, and hath but a very narrow Cawsey to passe vnto, and to descend into the ditch by Moone-light, in view of a Sentinell set right ouer it. Circumstances able to discourage the vndertaker, if some inward motion of a diuine assistance had not fauoured his designe. Hee vndertakes it, moued with the excesse and violences of this insolent Garrison, consisting for the most part of Spaniards, and roguish strangers. The Earle of Montgomery, and the Seigneur of Roches his brother, led many of the Nobility thither with sufficient forces. At their first approach the Sentinell giues the alarme: the Garrison is presently in armes and man the walles. The first petard dischargeth within the hole: all runne thither to defend the entrie: foure others follow as speedily as their shor. Gentill applied a great mortar, when as behold the wall opens, and giues them meanes to enter. He calles for a Saulsige to scatter them that came thronging to the breach. Des Roches brings it vnto him, but he is stricken dead with a musket shot. Gentill cast the Saulsige among their feet, it burnes some, lames others, sets fire of their furniture and powder, dischargeth their peeces, and makes a terrible spoile. Gentill cast himselfe desperately into the breach: the Earle of Montgomery seconds him, preferring the publike profit of this victorie, before his priuate griefe for the death of his brother. All the troupes strue to go in, and pourue their enemies vnto the entrie of the Dungeon. The Engines beeing speedily prepared to force them, induced them to capitulate, euery one to depart with a white wand: leauing the place to the discretion of the Earle Montgomery, and to Gentill a desire to make other enterprises in Brittain, the which he had effected, if the Duke of Mercœur had continued in rebellion against the King.

The hazard and burthens of rebellion, ruined the Duke of Aumale onely: hee would be more willfull then all the rest. He therefore grew so incensed against him, as the Court of Parliament at Paris made his processe, declared him guilty of treason in the highest degree, his picture to be drawne in peeces with foure horses, all his goods forfeited to the King, adiudged his goodly house at Aner to be razed to the ground, and for more detestation of this trechery, the trees about it cut off by the waste. But he sought his safetie with Albert Cardinall of Austria at Bruxelles, lately come to succed the Arch-duke Ernest his brother. Albert assures the besieged in La Fere, to free them: but he suffered the succors that shold releue them to be defeated. And the Earle of Fuentes hauing manned the Townes of this 1596. new conquest, went to winter in Haynault, and gaue the King means to dismisse most part A of his horse, to be ready in the Spring against the Cardinals desseignes. In the meane time he assembled the Estates of Picardy, Bolognois, Vermandois, and Thiersche in Amiens, prouided for the estate of the Prouince, and punished some Captaines with death, whose couerousnesse had partly bin the cause of the former losses.

Whilest that our Henry assisted now by the Duke of Mayenne in person, brings them of La Fere to be ready to submit vnto his Maiestie, behold the beginning of this new yeare, sowes the seedes which shall bring forth most profitable fruites for the perfect restoring of this Estate. The townes and whole Prouinces desire a generall deliury, and nothing staies the effects, but that some gouernours will haue the honour, to see the canon at their gates, before they treat of their accord: others set their places to sale. A filthy traffick, fit for the confusion of this age, but vnworthy of all good order, vnworthy the duty of good subiects, and vnworthy of the liberty and honour of the French Nobility. The King reducing them by force, which will not voluntarily returne to their duties, he willingly giues care to the mildest and shortest course. He should spend more mony to get more honour, but hee frames himselfe after the example and modell of Charles the seuenth, whose two raignes had many conformities. He desires rather to buy a place for money, then to beseege it with much more charge, and great losse of men. The people suffer great losse, and oft times the issue is doubtfull.

Ioyeuze.

The first fruites of this new yeare are most happy in generall, and most honourable for C the chiefe authors thereof. The Duke of Ioyeuze holds the first ranke. It is hee which shall take againe his profession of a Capuchin, whereunto he was vowed after the death of his wife: and by the deasse of the last Duke of Ioyeuze his brother, (drowned neere to Ville-mur) had left it to succeed in the name, gouernement and estate of the deceased. Without attending of any force, he yeelds freely to his Maiesties seruice, and the King opening his armes and heart, makes him partaker of his especiall fauors, honouring him with the title of Marshal of France, and one of his Lieutenants general in Languedoc in the towns, places and countries, he brings to his obedience: giuing him this testimony, that the onely zeale and profession of his religion, had made him take armes, without any other pretension whatsoeuer. By his example the Officers of the Court of Parliament remaining at Tholousa D for the exercise of Iustice, the Capitouls, and all the rest of the citizens, together with all other people of the Prouince of Languedoc, which held the contrary party vnder the authority of the said Duke, make knowne vnto the King the desire they haue to yeeld obedience and duty to his Maiestie, and their resolution to perseuer therein.

yeelds.

The Duke of Guise did second this happy beginning of the yeare, and doth sweeten the sharpnesse of those losses which the Spaniard had caused vs lately to suffer. He was still vigilant to embrace all occasions that might settle his affaires in his gouernement of Prouence, wherewith the King had newly honoured him; hauing already, with the helpe of the Lord of Les Diguieres, reduced Cisteron and Riez to the obedience of this Crowne, and Martegues with the Tower of Boue, seated at the mouth of the sea, the towne and cittadell E of Grasse, with the helpe of the Earle of Carces, and the Lord of Croze: he finds a fit opportunity, to make knowne vnto his Maiestie, that he had quite forsaken the alliance and correspondence which he had with the Spaniard.

Marseilles.

Lewis of Aix, and Charles of Casau commanded in Marseilles with great authority: violent men, and of the Spanish faction. They bargained with Philip to sell him this towne of importance, the port of al the Prouince, and the key of one of the chief entries of this realm, where the Emperor Charles had often knockt, yet could neuer get it open, and for the execution of their designe, had already caused some Spanish gallies to approach, vnder the command of Prince Charles Doria of Genoua. All such as were fled out of Marseilles, propounded some enterprises vpon the town to the D. of Guise, but all were weak, and of small possibility, yet had he purchased some reproch to faile in his seruice to the King, if hee had not attempted some one. Peter of Liberta commanded at port Reale: a man of courage, and full of affection to the Kings seruice. He acquaints the Duke of Guise with his resolution, either to kill or to shut out these two Tribunes, who euery morning at the opening of the gates went with their gards to walk without the towne; that laying an ambush nere vnto the gate,

A gate, it would be easie to seaze on, to be masters of the port, and so consequently of the Towne. The Duke thinks well of this enterprize: he takes the name of the gate and of the person, for a presage of good fortune. The gate is called Royall, and the liberty which the Predecessors of the undertaker had in old time purchased to the towne of Calui in Corteca, from whence they came, had deserued this goodly surname of Liberta. But the Dukes nere abode at Aix, held these two petty Tyrants in perpetuall distrust. To free them of this iea-lousie, he retires from Marseilles, to employ his forces in some place which might breede no distrust in them. He doth therefore beseege and take the townes of Hieres, Saint Tropez, and Draguignan: blockes vp the Cittadels, undertakes the siege of La Garde, a small Towne, but with a strong castle, which the Duke of Espernon held, being a corriuall to the Duke of Guise, in the gouernement of Prouence: batters the place, makes a breach, and giues two assaults, and euen when as they held him farre engaged at this seege, he riseth, retires his Cannon, comes to Toulon the fifteenth of February, giues the Rendezuous to all his troupes, at ten of the clocke at night, at S. Iulian two leagues from Marseilles: he approacheth, and sends his Sentinels of horse before to aduertise him of the signe which Liberta should giue him, which was to shut the wicket after the Tribunes, or one of them as occasion serued. It was a faire day, when as these Consuls being aduertised that they had discovered fiftene souldiers, two hundred paces from the gate, Lewis of Aix goes forth, and to discover them, he causeth twenty muskets of his guard to aduance. Barlemew of Liberta puts to the wicket, and shuts Lewis out, and Casau within. Manon Leader of the Dukes Sentinels, seeing the signe giuen, sends eight horsemen to charge these musketiers, and aduanceth with the rest towards the gate by another way: the foot-men present themselves to the charge, as was resolved, but in stead of good reception, the canon and small shot playes on them from the towne. Casau meaning to go forth with his guards to follow his companion, Peter of Liberta thrusts him sodainly through the body: his musketiers charge Liberta, his brothers assist him, the Captaines, Hernien, Laurence, Imperiali, and some few others, to whom he had imparted the enterprize, disperse these gards, and set vpon the gate, crying, Liberty by the King: and by the authority of this name assured many which were vncertaine what party to follow: then with Liberta they set themselves to gard the port. Lewis of Aix D seeing himselfe shut out, and these vnknowne men comming to charge him, found meanes to get ouer the wals, and to enter the towne by a boate which he found happily, and beeing accompanied by Fabio of Casau, the sonne of Charles that was slaine, and five hundred of his friends and partisans, he comes to force the gate on the towne side: but being repulled, he goes to the corps-de-gard that was before the towne-house. Here, by some rumor that he heares, he takes an impression of the peoples ill affection towards him. To free himselfe, he makes shew to go to the other guards, and so goes to sea with Fabio, to get Saint Victors port, and to assure himselfe of the rest. Some of his friends march after him, some disperse themselves in the town, and some begin to cry, God saue the King, and Liberty. It rained sore, and the Duke of Guise amazed at this long protraction in the towne, thinking the E intelligence had bene double, thought to retire his men ingaged in fight, against the musketiers of Lewis of Aix, when as Imperial and Laurence come to assure him that Casau was slaine. Then began his troupes to march into the towne, and for his better assurance, the President Bernard in the open street assembles what honest men he could, and ioynes with the Dukes men, promisseth them that were armed before the town-house, life, liberty, and freedom: then going to another gard nere to the hauen, and to S. Johns Church, where at the first broile about a thousand men were together in armes, by meanes of the like promise he easily drew all this multitude to sound forth that happy cry: God saue the King, and Liberty. These two troupes beeing assured, they visit three or foure other gards, whose attempts were to be feared: some they change, doubting such as commanded, leaving such as they F knew desired to be freed from the command of strangers. So as in lesse then an houre and an halfe, they were all dispersed that lately fauoured this new tyranny. Thus the Flower-de-luce, which an vnwholsome wind from Spaine had till now blasted at Marseilles, recovered its ancient beauty, and the white scarfes, which feare had kept in their coffers, or made them to reiect, were now put on.

A hardly resolution.

Charles Doria grows amazed. He dreames of nothing but of his retreat: but so surprised 1596. as he forgot part of his company. The haue seemed too little to carry forth their least A cock-boate, feare and amazement had so daunted them. The Capitaine of S. Johns tower, and that of the Moores-head, might haue stayed them, or at the least hindered their escape: but they were stricken with the like terror, expecting the last act of this Tragedy.

The Seigneur of Bauffet, Capitaine of the Castle of Idf, fought to annoy the stranger with his Cannon, but being farre off he did them small hurt. Lewis of Aix had thrust himselfe into Saint Victors Abbey, and Fabio of Casau into our Lady of La Garde, but so amazed as they could not thinke of their owne safeties. Twelue hundred Spaniards being along the haue, retired to enter into their Galleys: but this generall terror had so daunted them, as they saue themselves without any remembrance of their men. The Duke of Guise charged them by the Baron of Sel, Lieutenant of his company of men at armes, and La Pierre Capitaine of his gards, who slue a great number vpon the place, and got aboute a thousand muskets, harguebuzes and pikes, and the onely Ensigne which they had, which feare made them forget to their great shame and confusion. The Duke entring into Marceilles without any troupe, made knowne vnto the people the freeness of his affection, and the assurance he had of them: he confirmed all things for the Kings seruice, disappointed the designs of the factious which remained in the towne, and by his presence did so amaze all the garrisons thereof, with the Towers and Forts, as they submitted themselves to his discretion, and obeyed the King.

Doubtlesse this young Duke wonne much honour in this action, namely, that the soldiers entred without effusion of blood and without spoile, restrained by the respect of his presence, they were contented to haue the houses of Aix and Casau for their booty. On the other side, those of La Fere (hauing nothing free but the ayre which cannot bee kept from prisoners) suffered (with the hope of succors) the extreamest discommodity which might afflict a place strictly beleeged. The Cardinall of Austria (newly come from Spaine into Flanders) promised to deliuer them. Men supposed this Prince hauing made no profession of a military life, would find small credit among martiall men, who rather follow actions then words, and the example then discipline. But hee will teach vs that the surest stroakes come from the head: and if the old Duke of Guise could by a gallant stratageine recover a Towne from the English, most important for the Estate of this Crowne, hee in like sort by the like exploit will make himselfe the terror of all Picardy. He departs from Bruxels, and giues it out that he will succor La Fere. For his first fruites, hee findes means to giue them some releefe of men and munition in March. Then in Aprill he causeth his army (being very strong) to turne head towards Calais, beleageeth, batters, and takes both towne and castle by assault, against all the resistance of the beleeged, and puts many French Gentlemen to the sword, being sent to supply the castle. The Seneschall of Montimart commanding the French, and Aluarez Oforio the Spaniards in La Fere, hauing for the space of fiue moneths endured all the toiles of war, and seene the riuer within the towne to rise two or three foote by the labour of men, had the 22. of the said moneth, by a good composition, somewhat recompensed this so notable a losse, if the Cardinall had planted here the limits of his victories. But continuing the prosperity of his armies, whilst the Kings are wearie, and demand rest after so great a toyle, he goes in the beginning of May, and camps before Ardres, a very strong towne, and notwithstanding their great defence, became Master thereof the 23. of the moneth, and resolues to people these townes, of his new conquest, with strange Colonies, and prepares to adde vnto them, that of Hulst in Flanders. In the meane time the two armies spend the rest of the Sommer in light roads, one into anothers country.

War in Ar-
thois.

In the beginning of September the Marshall of Biron enters Arthois, takes the castle of Imbercourt, encounters with fiue cornets of horse, of the Marquis of Varambon, followed by fiue or six hundred horse of combat, chargeth them, he kills all that seek to withstand the violence of his armes, puts the rest in rout, takes the Marquis prisoner, and afterwards had forty thousand crownes for his rancome: filled the whole country with feare: then inuading the County of Saint Paul, he tooke and spoiled the towne and some other places.

The Cardinall busied at the siege of Hulst, hearing that the Marquis was taken, hee sent the Duke of Arctot to command in his place. As he enters into Arras, the French assaile it on the other side, spoile the country about it, and (laden with bootie) the Marshall retires safely

A safely to the frontiers of Picardy. Being discharged, he returnes to Bapaume, spoiles Hebuterne, Benuiller, Courcelles and other places, defeats such as would make resistance, and carries away more spoile then at the first. And seeing the Duke of Arctot incamped neere to Arras, vnder the fauour of the Cannon, intrenched carefully and loath to hazard any thing, knowing that he was to deale with one of the happiest and most valiant warriors of Europe, they fire all, and reuenge (as oportunitie would suffer them) the Spaniards outrage in places lately taken: they make a roade towards Bethune and Therouenne, bring away many prisoners, furnish their places with Cattell at the enemies cost, and without any resistance go and campe in the plaine of Azincourt. The Duke supplied with eight hundred foote, ioyned to the regiment of Colonel Bourlote, parts from Arras the fift of October, and goes and incamps at Saint Paule. The Marshall leaues him there, returnes into Arthois, runnes vnto Douay, spoiles all: then returning into Picardy, hee gaue the Duke of Arctot means to recouer the Castell of Himbercourt: who content with this conquest dismissed his army, and disposed of his companies into garrisons. Then by the means of the Duke of Bouillon, the alliance was confirmed and sworne betwixt the King, the Queene of England, and the vnited Prouinces of the Low-Countries. For matters past there is no remedy and the Politicians hold, that there is no Law more vnprofitable, then that which tends to reforme what is past. The King therefore to settle his affaires, and to provide for the future, resolute not to suffer these new Colonies of Dourlans, Capelle, Casselet, Cambray, Calais and Ardres, and with the new yeare, to renew a deadly warre against the Spaniard, which might not be attempted without a mighty army, nor the army leuied without treasure, the which he could not recouer without the helpe of his subiects, he assembled, in manner of a Parliament, the greatest and most discreet of the three orders of his realme, at Rouan, the fourth of Nouember, where the inhabitants, of their owne voluntary free will, spent foure hundred thousand crownes to make his Maiesty an honorable reception, where he receiued the Garter (a marke of the order of England) by the hands of the Earle of Shrewsbury.

His Maiesty desired to deserue these two glorious titles of Deliuicer and Restorer of his estate. At his coming to the Crowne, he had found France, not onely in a manner ruined, but almost all lost for the French: but by the grace of the Almighty, by the prayers, by the good counsell of his loyall Subiects, (who make no profession of armes) by the sword of his Princes and of his braue and generous Nobility, by his paines and labour, he had preserued it from losse. Let vs saue it now from ruine (said our King, speaking to the assembly) Participate my deere subiects wish me in this second glory, as you haue done in the first. I haue not called you, as my Predecessors did, to make you, approue my will. I haue caused you to assemble to haue your Counsell, to beleue them, and to follow them: finally to put my selfe into your hands. A desire which seldom commands Kings that haue white haire, and are Conquerors. But the loue I beare vnto my Subiects, and the exceeding desire I haue to adde these two goodly titles, to that of King, makes me to find all easie and honorable. The sharpenesse of winter had layd armes aside, and the excessiue raine caused many inundations, whereof amongst others followed that of the millers bridge at Paris, which sinking on Saint Thomas night, was the losse of three hundred persons, slaine in the ruines of the building, and drowned in the riuer. Whilst they examine the resolutions taken in this honorable assembly, and that the King prepares for a mighty army to chase the Spaniard out off Picardy, behold the Capitall city of this Province, strong of fear, and wel fortified, where his Maiesty pretended to make his Arcenall and store-house for the warre against the Stranger in Arthois, and other Prouinces of the Low-Countries, was surprised in the day time, the people being at a Sermon, without force, and without defence, by the practise of some factious; and the carelesse baseness of the Inhabitants, who standing vpon their ancient priuileges, had refused to receiue the Suisses into garriison. Hernand Teillo Gouernour of Dourlans for the Spaniard, aduertised that the cittizens of Amiens (a proud people, and little practised in armes) would not receiue the garriison that the King offered them for the preseruacion of their towne, hastens the effect of those intelligences he had there, and on munday the 10. of March he attires 40. or 50. souldiars like peasants, laden with many burthens, & armed vnderneath with daggers, and short peeces, and marcheth with about seuen hundred horse and fiue thousand foote:

he laies his ambushes neere vnto the town, and the next day sends his disguised souldiars to A the gate of Montrescut, following a cart; which being vnder the portcullis, one of the pretended peasants cuts the horse trace, and by the great disorder of the horse, hinders the liberty of the gate. The others presently discover their armes, seaze vpon the Corps de gard, and giue a signe to the ambush. The ambush comes, horse and foote enter into the towne, and goe directly to the market-place: the troupes enter, take the forts, and seaze vpon the Arçenall and munition which the King had lately sent, and in the end compound with the townesmen for the redeeming of their goods. But at length they had both cloth and siluer, and those of Amiens shal not tast much of the Spaniards command, but the sharpenes thereof will make them desire the mildnesse of the French. The great bell of Beffroy did ring at the first tumult, as it was their manner: but few were moued thereat. Some heard the Sermon, others slept at their ease, and some were contented to shut their shoppes and to retire themselves into their houses. The Earle of Saint Paul was then in the towne, but seeing the small care and indeuour of the Inhabitants to resist this foraine inuasion, he gets him-selfe out of Amiens with al speed, and retires to Corby. This affront had in shew made the realme without all hope of recouery, and without meanes to assayle, for the effects of all the Kings desseins seemed disapointed in their beginning. They thought Amiens could not be recovered but by surprise, and that the hope to take it would be lost with the enterprife, and now the Spaniard began to thinke that Amiens should be the bounds of the Country of Arthois, as in former time vnder Phillip Duke of Bourgongne. But when as the affaires require a present remedy, our Henry wants neither courage nor counsel. They were hopes built in the aire. His Maiesty doth speedely beseege it, giues order that no greater forces may come to raise vp these mountaines of pride, which built the honor of their nation vpon the shame of such a losse: he batters it with fise and forty Cannons, makes the Marshal of Biron Lieutenant in his army, beseegeth it on the strongest part, restaines their sallies, keeps them within their trenches, and approacheth in such sort, as by the midst of Iuly, they might hurt one another with stones: then lodging vpon the ditch, and cutting off the beseeged daily in their sallies, or by other stratagems, he made Hernand to hast the Cardinall to his succour.

Enterprife;
vpon Perpig-
nan.

Some place of importance taken from the Spaniard might in shew serue as a reprimall. Captaine Gentill, of Geauaudan, tried all his wits and inuention for this desseine, for the effecting whereof hee went by night to viewe the Towne and Castle of Perpignan in the Conty of Roussillon, and found no difficulty but to leuy men without alarume in the country. Languedoc might furnish sufficient, being the frontier, but the Spaniard entertained many secret Spies. Gentill therefore thinks it best to take them in more remote places, two hundred horse were to be leuied in Poitou, who vnder a collour to ioyne with the Duke of Guise, take their way by Guyenne to Beziers, and should giue no ielousie in regard of their small number. And two thousand foote leuied in Viuarz and Geauaudan by the siegneures of Fosseuse and Chambauld should crosse base Rouergue vnder collour of putting themselves by the Kings commandement into Bayonné, (whither by the common brute the Spaniard was bringing an army) and by the rocky and hidden waies should descend on the side of Beziers, soone after the taking of Perpignan: faigning to take the way to Thoulouze to recouer Bourdeaux, and from thence Bayonne. This resolution being taken, Gentill imparts it to the Seignuer of Plessis Mornay at Saumur, & to the Constable at Paris. They allow of it, and he, assuring himselfe to take the Castle at the first without Perard, during the long nights, hee might from the Castle (being furnished with about thirty peeces of Ordinance) thundring in to the enemies trenches, bring his troupes into the town, and the Bruite of this vnexpected news would haue armed twenty thousand men in Languedocke in eight daies to invade all the country of Roussillon. The King him-selfe heald it feasible, and caused dispatches to be made to Gentill, as well for himselfe, as for Fosseuse and Chambauld. But at the instant poursuite of the Bishop and inhabitants of Mende, for his Maiesty hauing commanded that the Cittadell should be demantled, and Fosseuse Governor of the place pretending recompence for some charges, before he would suffer the Cannon to be transported. The king commanded the Duke of Vandrador to besiege him within Mende in the moneth of August, and to force him to that which he would not willingly yeeld vato.

The

A They of Perpignan thinke this siege attempted to surprise them, and stand vpon their gardes: notwithstanding his Maiestie giueth order for another leuie in Languedoc by the Lords of Spondillan, Conas, Montbasen, Legues and other chiefe men of that clymat; but whose actions being neere the Fronter, could not be hidden from the enemy. Thus Gentill seeing his desseine anticipated from the longest nights to the shortest in the yeare, and that those of Languedoc were employed therein, he thought it could hardly be successful. The marshall D'ornano had the conduct of this enterprife. Ten or twelue thousand men followe him confusedly as to a certain victorie. But the most part are thrust on with the glistering of the doubloons of Spaine, and with a desire of spoyle. And can we wonder if heauen doth not blesse those enterprises where the consideration of priuat gaine doth march before that of the publicke good? he was not come out of Daulphiné where he was Gouverneur, before all the neighbour Prouinces were posselt of it: and aduertisements were come out of Spaine to them that were threatened. Vpon their approaches to the towne, the Marshalls guide wandred in the night. The Pettards were brought neere vnto the Towne gate, but the rolling bridges to ioyne vnto the draw-bridge could not be made redie before day. The Towne was barricadoed euen vnto the gates, and the Cannon planted. All the whole countie did shine with the fires that were made, this enterprife being vndertaken with too much bruit; and some of the chiefe commanders swallowing vp al the best spoyles of an imaginarie conquest, learned, that it is a rashnesse to deuide the Bares skin before the Beast be taken: moreouer reason would not but the author of a goodly enterprife should haue the principall conduct, to the end that he should either reape the honour of his exploit, or the blame of his errour. Gentill is knowne to bee capable for such effects, and if many during our inciuill warres had performed the like stratagems both in qualitie and quantitie to him, France had not so long groaned vnder the burden of her miseries. All France did in the meane time runne to the siege of Amiens: all Europe attended the issue, and did iudge that the end thereof would be the beginning of our slauerie, or of our libertie. But whilest the plague afflicts the besieged, that many and sundrie exploits of war diminish their numbers; and many remaine vnprofitable, by reason of their wounds, let vs wander a little into some other prouinces both within and without the Realme, whereas their war hath any thing common with ours. The want and dearth of victuals afflicted Brittanie in the moneth of May, and forced the Marshall of Brissac in Iuly to deuide and separte some troupes which he had assembled and gathered together, to preserve some parishes about Rennes which the enemies threatned to spoyle. The Lord of S. Laurence, lieutenant for the Duke of Mercœur in his armie, desirous to visit the said Duke lately come to Chasteaubriant, and to giue him newes of some braue stratagem, takes fixe companies of men at armes with his own, the regiment of Tremereuc, brother to Saint Laurence, 40. harguebuziers out of euery companie of the garrisons of Dinan, and some other troupes both of horse and foot, making 600. or 700. men, and comes to lodge at Maure 7. Leagues from Rennes. The Lords of Tremblay, la Troche, Teny, la Courbe, Beaumont, and Pomeray, being lodged at Messac vpon Villaine, 3. Leagues from Maure with some forces, march by the Marshalls commandement, their Colonel, to fight with Saint Laurence: they find he was dislodged, follow and ouertake him within 300. paces, charge the troupe led by Tremereuc, appointed to make retreat, kill about 60. and force the rest to flie to their maine strength. They presse them in such sort as they must either suffer themselves to be murdered without resistance, or else fight: they turne head, take a place of aduantage, in a field well ditched about, & there make some resistance. But seeing Tremereuc brother to Saint Laurence already taken prisoner, La Pomeray Captaine of Dinan, and Vieux Ville flaine vpon the place, with about 150. souldiars, and some members of companies, all giue way, all flie, all are put to rout, and the most part falling into the peasants hands, find lesse mercy with them, then they had done rigour with the victors. This was the twentieth of Iuly. On the other side, as the Spaniard had set one foot into Picardie, so did he long labour to cast the other into Campagne, and had many desseins vpon the Townes lying vpon the riuier of Meuze, Mesieres, Sedan, Mouzon, Villefranche, Rocroy, and Maubert-Fontaine: but the care and loyaltie of the gouernours, hauing alwaies made frustrate the hope of his enterprises, he now conuerts his open force into secret intelligences and dishonest practises.

Villefranche is a very small towne, or rather a corps de gard made of foure square bastions, built by King Francis the first, to serue as a barre against the incursions of the Bourguignons (so they call all the King of Spaines subiects lying vpon this frontier, and euen those of the Duchie of Luxembourg) and falling into strangers hands, it opened them the gate to enter into Champagne, and gaue them an assured retreat to fauour their inroads. To this intent Gaucher, late one of those souldiars which they call of Fortune, being come within ten yeares to some credit by armes, practiseth with some souldiars of the garrison, to sell and deliuer him the place. These souldiars giue eare to this trafficke, entertayne Gaucher, but with as crosse a hope, as his name was vntoward and ominous, for they impart the matter to Tremelet Gouvernor of Villefranche, commaunding one companie of men at armes, and threcof foot. Tremelet by this trafficke pretends a great effect for the Kings seruice, B commands the souldiars to deale more plainly with this Captaine, imparts it to the Earle of Grandpré, to Rumesnil, and to Estuicaux Gouverneur of Mouzon, Maubert, and Sedan, and drawes from them assistance of men, and meanes to frame a double intelligence. These marchants treat with Gaucher, agree vpon the time and houre to deliuer their ware, they receiue some money in hand, and take his word for the rest.

teated.

The fourth of August at night was appointed for the execution, and for a signe a Cannon should be discharged. But Rumesnil had the night before brought in a supplie of men, needfull for the preseruatiou of the place, and with the rest he lay in ambush halfe a league from the towne, as Gaucher should passe. Gaucher approcheth, he causeth all his troups to light, a quarter of a league from Villefranche, puts a part of them very secretly into the ditch, and followes with the rest, to second the first attempt: but at all aduentures he causeth his horse to be led after him. The first enter by fauour of the souldiars: the signe is giuen, and being giuen, those which thought to surpris, find themselves surprisid: all are put to the sword, consumed by wild-fire, or drowned in the ditch. Rumesnil comes out off his ambush at the same time, chargeth Gaucher behind, kills him three hundred men vpon the place, and suffers few of the enemies to escape, through fauour of the night: finally, of fure or fixe hundred men which he brought, scarce fiftie escaped death or imprisonment, and had it not bin for the horse which Gaucher held readie to fauour his flight, he had not escaped the victors hands.

Sauoie.

Let vs passe into Sauoie, and see the progresse of the Kings forces, the taking of places, D and victories obtained. This warre shall helpe much for the recouerie of Amiens, for they diuert the forces of Sauoie from molesting of the King in sundrie places at once: for the managing whereof, the Lord Les Diguieres parted from Court in the end of March, with the title of the Kings lieutenant general, gathers together about 600. horse, and 5000. foot, in the moneth of Aprill, May, and Iune: enters into Maurienne, a Countrie depending on the Duchie of Sauoie, the high way to Piedmont and Italie, surpasseth with much labour and toyle the difficulties of the wayes, rockes, and steepe hilles: in the end he recouers the toppe of the mountaine, finds there a Corps de gard of 500. men well fortified, and with his tyred armie chargeth them with such furie, as the enemye nor able to withstand their force, is constrained to quit the place. Presently the armie comes to S. Iohn of Maurienne, E the chiefe towne of the Countrie, and seisseth on all the valley.

taken.

These conquests as sodainely executed, as wisely attempted, thrust on the Conquerour to go and fight with certaine Spaniards which were sent into Flanders to oppose against the prosperous successe of Cont Maurice: but the bridges being broken and the waters verie great, stayed his passage. Hereupon newes come, that Don Sanchio Earle of Salines, generall of the Duke of Sauoies light horse, is about Braçorant with a part of the Dukes armie. Les Diguieres marcheth thither, chargeth the Earle, makes him to quit the Castle of Saint Michell, and some other villages where he had fortified himself, chafeth him by Mont-Senys into Piedmont, and so hotly, as the most part, to make themselves more light, cast away F their armes. Being thus peaceably possessed of all Maurienne, he fortifies Saint Iohn and the Castle of Saint Michel, and seisseth on all the forts that might serue for the safetie of the Countrie.

To stay the Conquerours course, the Duke of Sauoie passed the mountaines, by the valley of Ault with three thousand Italians, and a good number of horse, and came by Chamberly

A Chamberly into Tarentaise, where his armie remayned vnder the commaund of the Earle of Martinengues, consisting of eight hundred horse, and fixe thousand foote: he came and incamped beyond the riuer of Isere (yet vnder the fauour of the Cannon of Montmelian) at the Castle of Saint Helena. Des Diguieres continues his conquests, hee approcheth within musket-shot of the Duke, besiegeth and takes the tower of Aiguebelle, the castles of Rochette, of Villars-Sallet a house of the Earles of Montmaieur, de L huile and Chamoux, and besiegeth the fort of Chamoussier, being defended by Philippin, bastard brother to the Duke of Sauoy, places very commodious and profitable for victuals and forrage, and which stopt the passage from Sauoy into Maurienne.

B Here newes comes to Les Diguieres that the Duke raiseth a fort on the other side of Isere, to assure the passage for his army, and meanes to lodge at Caumoussier, a place of great advantage for him, which might greatly annoy the Kings army and the passage betwixt Daulphiné and it. This fort was of a triangular forme, made defensive and raised the height of a pike in one night, it was garded by 600. choise souldiars out of the whole armie of Sauoie, and fortified with many gentlemen of the dukes Court. Les Diguieres vewes it, & propounds it in Councell, and according to their aduice that were about him, salutes it with some volleys of Cannon shot, opens it at one point, sends two thousand harguebuziers, commanded by the Lord of Crequy his sonne in law, who seconded by a troupe of horse, enter furiously into the fort, and in despite of their obstinat resistance, and the force of foure pieces which played incessantly from the other side of the riuer along the flanks of the said fort, they carried it in sight of the Duke, and kil by the sword and water about 400. men, and many of the Dukes gentlemen, who was in person in his army beyond the riuer of Isere, and so razed the fort. The Baron of Chauuierieu borne in the Countie was slaine there, the Colonel was taken prisoner, and the Castle of Chamoussier yeilded the next day by composition. The towre of Charbonniere, a place strong of situation, which couers Aiguebelle, and might be made fit to annoy Montmelian, seeing their Captaine and many others slaine with the Cannon came likewise into the victors power.

The Castle of Aignille remayned yet, a strong place both by nature and art, vpon the side of a mountaine, inaccessible of one side, hauing on the other side a double ditch, with a D thick ramparre betwixt both. Yet was it taken after two hundred Cannon shot. This place assured all Maurienne, and that which lies beyond Isere to his Maiesties obedience from Mont-Senys vnto Montmelian. The supplies the Duke expected, caused the Lances of Sauoy to remaine in quiet. Being now fortified with two thousand five hundred Suisses, and as many Spaniards and Neapolitans, he comes with all this army to lodge about Montmelian, and resolues to set vpon the Kings army. To free him of some part of this trouble, Des Diguieres turnes towards him with his forces, and comes to incampe at Mollettes halfe a league from Montmelian, the riuer of Isere being betwixt them. The Duke passeth the riuer vpon a bridge of boates made neere vnto that of Montmelian, and lodgeth at the Castle of Saint Helena, right against Molette, places some-what high and within Cannon shot E one of another, separated by a great meadow and a fenne; at the first they salute one another by skirmishes, and if the Sauoisiens had done what they might, they had greatly annoyed our men, who were not lodged nor scarce arriued. The night approaching ended the combat, with the losse of a hundred good men, and gaue meanes to the Kings troups to take breath, and prepare to be reuenged with vsurie. The next day the Duke shews 1500. foot, and 1500. horse, in bataille in this great meadow, but with such aduantage, as no man might charge them. Des Diguieres intrencheth himselfe at the foote of the meadow: euery master of the campe, euery Captaine takes his quarter, and by the care of the Lord of Crequi commanding the foot, the Kings campe was in short time out of present danger, which seemed to threaten their ruine. In the meane time they faile not on either side to trie their F swords, and pistolls, two to two, three to three, troupe to troupe, and nothing but a simple ditch, yet deepe and full of water, keeps the two armies from a bloudie fight.

Thus for some daies these warriors inflamed their resolutions, when as the Duke of Sauoy propounded to his Councell a great disscine, for the execution whereof the foureteenth of August by eight of the clocke in the morning, he secretly drawes three thousand men into a great wood, neere to the trenches of the Kings army, lodgeth his Suisses with a battaillon of foot on an other side, sets his horse in a vallie, and encouraging them by his presence, causeth about two of the clocke, a Cannon to be discharged, for a signe of a cruell and bloody battaile, but fuller of passion then of iudgement. The losse fell vpon himselfe: the Kings troups, both horse and foot, were with a firme resolution prepared to withstand their force. They come to skirmish: the noyse of the Cannon drownes all other sounds, the fire of the shot inflames the ayre and seemed for fūe houres together to dazell the light of the Sunne. the meadow is couered with dead carcasses, the enemies blood dies the brooks, and inflames our men to fight. The Seigneure of Crequi receiues a musket shot in the right arme: but the Lion is chafed and stormes at the sight of his owne blood. So retyring himselfe apart vnder a tree to be drest, he returnes speedily to his companions, and burning with a generous heat of reuenge, shewes that he is a right heire, both in blood and vertue to that braue Lord of Pontdormy, who hath so often heretofore died his sword and arme in the blood of the stranger being enemye to this Crowne. About twelue hundred men flaine or hurt made the day famous, and made the Sauoisien loose all desire to trie any more the firme resolution of our men, grounded vpon the right of a most iust offensiu warre.

The Duke of Sauoie defeated at S. Helene and Mo-lletes.

If al this great armie, neither by the thunder of their Cannons, nor the furie of their shot, neither by the force of their men at armes, could any thing shake the constancie of our men, doth Colonnell Ambrose thinke to preuaile more with fūe hundred natural Spaniards assailing a Corps de gard, placed on the side of a fenne? but he doth increase their shame, in stead of reuenging their publike losse. The Seigneurs of Baume and Poët receiue him with such resolution, as they kill a hundred and fiftie vpon the place, and take many prisoners: the rest they force to cast away their armes, to be the more light to flie. The Duke spent the night to burie his men, and to carrie away the wounded: then he dislodged the sixteenth, and went to lodge at a village called Barraux beyond Isere, at the entry of the valley of Grisuaudan towards Grenoble, and there begins a fort, busying himselfe in the building thereof vnto the end of Nouember. This change of lodging inuited our men to do the like. Des Diguieres comes to lodge at Castle Bayard, and his armie at Pont-Charra, halfe a league from the enemye, the riuer being betwixt them: he keepes his men in continuall skirmish, to the enemies losse, and by this placing of his campe, makes the enemye doubt that he would attempt the passage of Eschalles. To crosse him the Duke sends many troups to enter by the valley of Pragelas into the countrie of Briançon, and to shut vp the passage in case he were besieged. The check he receiued counteruailed the first. The water, the sword, and the steepe mountaines, deuoured a greater number of his men, then the skirmishes of S. Helene and Molletes.

At Pont Charra.

Behold a third, which shewes that God doth fauour the iust cause of armes, and makes their effects happie against the iniustice of vsurpers. The eight of September, the Lord Des Diguieres (who lets not slip any occasion) is aduertised that Sanchez Earle of Salines, (to draw him to succour his owne Prouince, and to leaue Sauoie) goes to spoyle about Grenoble with fūe hundred maisters diuided into two bands of horse.

To adde this victory to the former, hee sends two houres before day, the Seigneurs of Baume, Authun and Saint Iure with two hundred horse, and a hundred Carbins to lie in ambush in an Island in the midst of the riuer of Isere. At the breake of day, the Earle passeth in sight of them: they suffer him to aduance about halfe a league, then they issue forth of their ambush, and wade through the other part of the riuer to their saddle skirts, they ouertake the Earle at La Frette, charge him furiously, kill Dom Iohn de Sequano first Captaine of the horse, Dom Roario, Dom Probro, with many other. Commanders and men at armes, to the number of two hundred: and by the taking of Dom Euangeliste, who led the second troupe of the Earle of Gatinari, of Dom Iohn Toc, brother in law to the Earle, and three-score others, they end the combat, and returne with honour, hauing lost but sixe men in this bold encounter. Some daies after, the Lord Des Diguieres passeth the riuer with most part of his horse at Chaparouillon, and there charging a troupe of the enemies, which made a good shew by the fauour of some trenches, gaue the Seigneurs of Crequi and Buissie the second honor of this victorie.

At La Frette.

At Chaparou-illon.

The last of October, the Kings armie ill lodged at Pontcharra, retyred to Grenoble: from thence Des Diguieres sent foure regiments towards Barfelonne, and surmounting the 1597.

A toyle of the way, being of most hard access for the Cannon, tooke Aloft: then in the end of Nouember, Saint Genis, to disapoint the intelligences which the Duke of Sauoie might haue with some ill affected in Daulphiné: for a few daies before the Earle of Roche had failed by the meanes of Albigny a yonger brother of Gordes, to deliuer the Towne of Romans to the Sauoisien. But Saint Ferriol, that commaunded in his absence, had some inckling: who by the aduertisement he gaue to the Officers of the Parliament, whom the plague had transported to Romans, he saued the Towne from the rule of a Stranger.

The Duke wonderfully grieved to haue failed of Romans, retyres to Chambery, and the Lord of Crequi with some regiments to Maurienne, very happily to make his coming famous: for hauing first by the assistance of the Lord of Pasquieres, kept Dom Amede the Dukes bastard brother, from passing with his troups on the side of the mountaines, hee made the way open for a braue and generous stratageme. The Earle of Carraual would likewise passe with a regiment of twelue ensignes, and two Cornets of horse. Crequi parts before day from Saint Iohn of Maurienne, marcheth directly towards him, incounters him at Saint André, chargeth, defeats, takes him prisoner with all the commanders, and for a monument sends their colours and Cornets to the King, which hang yet as a trophie in our Ladies church at Paris, to his Maiesties great content. Let vs now see the countenance of them that were besieged at Amiens. If there were valour without to win the wall, there was resolution within to burie themselves in the ruines thereof, rather then to abandon it. The batterie continued with a strange furie. The extraordinary deep trenches, the sap and mine, the arriual of the Dukes of Mayenne, Bouillon and the troups which increased daily, gaue hope to the Cittizens of Amiens, soone to see themselves vnder the milde command of their lawfull Prince, and to returne to their ancient fortunes. The sallies, plagues, hurts, and other infirmities had diminished the besieged to the number of two thousand: the diuersitie of nations threatned some new change, the fouldiars would no more trust the cunning and vaine promises which Hernando gaue them by counterfeit letters from the Cardinall: the old & bad drogues killed in stead of curing: finally the letter, of Hernando to the Cardinall being intercepted, giues a verie sufficient testimonie of the vrgent necessitie which leads him to his ruine. It is now time (said he) that wee cease to write, for I labour with the fouldiars and Bourgeses at the ravelin, where within few daies I attend a continuall battery of the enemy on three parts. Mans reason sayes vs: our hope is in God, and in your highnesse speedie coming to giue battaile, or to receiue it. We attend the second causes should worke.

There is no lesse honour to keep well, then to make a goodly conquest. To practise this ancient saying, the Cardinall hauing assembled foure thousand horse, and fiftene thousand foot, with eightheene Cannons, and fūe or sixe hundred wagons chained together, to serue as a barricadoe, and to inclose his campe, he marched to vngage or to succor the besieged, publishing in all places, that he would giue battaile. But before he approacheth, he sends to discouer the way which he was to take, and where he might lodge neere to the towne. This charge he gaue to Contreras, Commissary generall, who led the troupe, to Don Gaston Spinola and Tassed Marshalls of the campe, to Don Amador Landrino lieutenant generall of the light horse, Don Iohn Bracamont, to Colonnell Bourlotte, Nicholas Basto and other chiefe Commanders of his army. These to giue the lesse alarm, take about foure hundred choise horse, and make a shew as if they would come but to Dourlans: but they giue order that the troups of horse at Dourlans, Hedin and Bapaume should be readie when they passed.

The Cardinall
of Austrias Marshalls of his campe
defeated.

Thus increased by the said garrisons, and making a troupe of nine hundred on a thousand horse, the nine and twentieth of August they come beneath Saint Quiricu, a village vpon the bancke of a small riuer, two leagues from the Kings quarter: and begin to vew the said lodging. A troupe of light horse and Carabins coming from an ambush which they layed, discouer them, the Seigneure of Heuecourt doth aduertise the King at sixe of the clocke in the morning.

Behold one of the effects of his Maiesties speedy resolution, of his great iudgement in warre, and his exceeding diligence in his excursions. Behold moreover a patterne of that happinesse which attended him at this siege, and the earnest pennie of an absolute victory which God prepared for him against his enemies. Two alarms had kept the King waking the rest of the night, and he now began only to take a littlerest. He riseth, goes, to horse, hauing having about him the Maister of his horse and some Noble men : he passeth by the Carabins quarter, commands them to horse-backe with some light horse, commands the Constable to stay in the quarter to giue order to all euents, and goes directly where the enemy had bene discovered, more with an intent to provide for the places which they might haue viewed, then to fight : thinking they would not haue bin so slacke in the retreat, being neere vnto an army led by so vigilant a Commander. The Marshall of Byron comes posting after him, the Lord of Montigny brings a troupe of light-horse. Some Noblemen and gentlemen of his Court post thither in hast, to haue their part thereof.

His Maiesty makes a battaillion of two hundred horse, and a hundred and fifty Carabins. He pursues them with all speed to Encre, seauen Leagues from his quarter, he puts his Carabins before, who seeing them selues seconded by his Maiesty, charge resolutely, and so amaze them, as seeing the King so neere them, and knowing him very well, they breake, and take their flight diuers waies, leauing them that were appointed for the retreat, or such as were not well mounted. There were about forty slaine at the first charge, and about two hundred of the best being prisoners, gaue the Carabins meanes to furnish them selues with horse, armes, and apparell.

To make this victory absolute, his Maiesty sends the Marshall of Biron with the Lord of Montigny before, and halfe his troupe with them : the other he keepest with himselfe, pursues them within a League of Bapaume, tithes their troupe by the way, and doth not abandon them vntill they came within view of their retreat : he takes two Cornets from them, and kills or takes fife hundred horsemen. The generall ioy thereof in the army brought C the news vnto the beseege, who by a heauy and mouresfull silence shewed they had no pleasure therein.

lo slaine.

But see the third of September the death of Hernand Tiello slaine with a musket, at the defence of the raelin which his Maiesty caused to be assailed, afflicting them with a publike sorrow, giues the Cittizens an assurance of a speedy deliuey, and the assailants to conceiue a certaine hope of victory. There is no so great prosperity, but is crossed with some aduersity, and trouble. Two daies after, the Lord of Laint Luc, gouernor of Brouage and great Maister of the Artillery of France, slaine in the trenches, obayned that graue and worthy testimony of his valour from his Maiesties mouth, to haue lost that day a most valiant and faithfull seruant, leauing his people much greeued, and the whole campe D lamenting this generall losse to France, as of one of the brauest Captaines of his age.

S Luc slaine.

In the meane time the Cardinall approched, vaunting that he would fight within foure daies. Yet had hee no inclination to put it in practise. The King to draw him to battaile, preuents the policy which the enemy would vse to succour the place : he takes his place of battaile on the toppe of Long-pré, a quarter of a league behind the inclosure of his campe, intrenched as well to saue them selues from the Cannon shot of the towne, as from theirs that came to succour them. And to keepe the enemy from sending in any succors on the other side of the riuer, he leaues the Lords of Montigny, La Noue, de Vicques and Cluseaux, there with three thousand foote and foure hundred horse.

The Cardinall appocheth,

The fifteenth of the sayd moneth, the towne beeing reduced to that Estate, as without E succors it must needs yeeld of it selfe, the Cardinall in the morning castes two artificiall bridges vpon the riuer of Somme, where through the fauour of his forces and Cannon he passeth two thousand, fife hundred men, amongst which were eight hundred choise Captaines, so thrust them selues into the towne, and about two of the clock he shews himselfe in the vew of Long-pré, with an order which in shew did promise a generous attempt. But the diligence of his Maiesty his courage without feare, and the wife order he presently gaue at his arriuall, changed their braue countenance into a cowardly and base feare. The King leaues three thousand men to gard the trenches against the sallies of the towne : he presently marcheth with all his troupes to the place of battaile, and plants his Cannon to his best advantage.

The artillery of the beseege and of them that came to succour them, thunders, but they passe ouer his Maiesties esquadrons. Our men during this seege haue bene well acquainted with the shot of the Cannon, but they stand firme like rockes. They tyre the enemy with continuall skirmishes, the Cannon mightily anoyes them, the admirable gouernment of

A of the Leader, and the firme resolution of the assaylants doth so terrefie them, as at the first attempt they thinke of a retreat, and presently they retire to the quarter where the Kings light horse did lodge by the riuers side. The foure aboue named Colonels hauing discouered the Cardinalls Stratageme, charged them that came to iuccor the towne, kill, take and force the whole body to repasse the riuer in disorder, and to abandon their bridges. The King seeing the enemy lodged alongst the riuer, passeth three Cannons ouer the water, shootes at them and doth annoy their lodging, and remaying all night on the place of battaile, abates the ioy which the beseege had shonen by the number of fires which they had made. So the Cardinall seeing all his attempts fruitlesse, in steed of turning head to the towne, or against the French troupes, he beginnes very early in the morning to retyre
B and to take an other lodging on the mountaine of Vignancourt.

The King followes him with foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foote, lodgeth vpon the next hill and a great valley betwixt them, continues foure or fife houres in battaile before their army, prouokes them by his Cannon and continuall skirmishes, viues all their forces, number, forme and countenance, and seeing them disposed to retyre, determines to charge them in their lodging. But it is good some-times to make a bridge of gold to a flying enemy. Moreouer it was a great glory for his Maiesty to haue shamefully chased him away, without rayling the seege from so great a towne, and to haue pursued him with the Cannon three Leagues.

C They take a contrary way, and couer the right wing of their army, which lay next to the French, with their wagons chained together, they cause their horse to aduance into the head of the army in forme of a halfe moone, and their foote into battaillons, diuided into fore-ward, battaile and rereward : they place their Cannon in the head of these esquadrons, in this sort they place their troupes, and their baggage in safety, making a shew some-times as if they would charge. But seeing, that to come to the gates of the City beseege, they must force through the Kings army, which being in battaile did fight with their countenances and gesture, they haue no will to attempt this passage, and by their speedy retreat giue all France an assured hope to be soone freed from this strange nation which sought to ruine it. The beseege are now forced to yeeld to the victors Lawe. This shameful retreat D hath ouerthrowne their first resolution. Their practises, inuentions, engines, their incredible labour to cast vp earth, their many Cannons, their deepe trenches, their continuall watching, nor the strength of the place, could not keepe the assaylants from lodging vpon their rampar and raelin, and so neere as they came to handy-blowes. So two daies after, the Marquis of Montenegro, who commanded in the towne after the death of Hernand doth promise to yeeld the place, if within six daies hee bee not succored with two thousand horse that should enter into the towne.

So was it sayd and so done. The time inuited the Cardinall, and gaue him leysure, being with all his forces within seauen Leagues of the towne, but he had neither will nor power to releue them. And therefore according to the capitulation made the nineteenth, that the E soldiars should depart with their armes, their matches light, their colours flying and drums sounding, with their horse and baggage, and whatsoever they could carry away of theirs, the fife and twentieth of the moneth, his Maiesty hauing put his army in battaile, sent the Constable, the Marshall of Biron, the Duke of Montbafon and the Lord of Vicques to the port of Beauuois where the garrison should come forth, who coming to the gate, the bridge is let downe, and the Marquis comes forth on horse-bake alone, but followed by a hundred and thirty horse and as many Harguebuziers on foote for the gard of his person. They receiue him and conduct him to his maiesty, who attended him halfe a league from the towne:
The King was accompanied with his white Cornet, wherein were about seuentene hundred horse, and fife hundred Suisses, hauing about him the Prince of Conty, the Dukes of F Montpensier, Neuers and Nemours, the Prince of Ioinuille, the Marshalls of France, and other Noblemen in great numbers, mounted vpon goodly courfers with rich caparazons, and saddles imbrodered with the ground of carnation, were wonderfull richly apparelled, and holding royall Scepters in there hands, they doe imbrace him most gratioously, and then dismissed him. He gos to horse, and by the Kings commandement, the Constable conductes him tow Leagues vnto the confines of the King of Spaines territories.

Amiens yeeld-
ed and the Spaniards depart.

1597.

All the Spanish Captaines, and others both of horse and foote, passing by his Maieſty, light A from their horses and kiſſe his boote, with great humility and reuerence, and follow their Leaders being receiued by the King with amiable and courteous words. After the Marquis and his gard, followed about a thousand women of baſe quality, amongst the which ſome foure hundred of the towne marched willingly, a hundred and threſcore wagons laden with all kind of baggage, and vpon them about three hundred men ſicke of the plague and wounded, foretene hundred ſhot, and ſixe hundred corſeleets well appointed, and in the end ten companies of horſe, ſixe of men at armes Lanciers, and foure of Carabins, which made in all about ſiue hundred horſe.

The King hauing not by policy, but by the moſt memorable attempt, and the greateſt glory of armes that might be, pulled this ſtrong towne out off the ſtrangers pawes, without the recovery whereof, he was in danger to be loſt, and plunged in the gulfe of miſeries: he entered the ſame day into Amiens towards night, triumphant and victorious, as into his owne towne recovered from the enemy, accompanied with a thousand gentlemen on horſebacke, and receiued with a wonderfull ioy and applauſe of all the people: hee lighted at our Ladies Church, and cauſed ſolemne thanks to be giuen to God: he placed twenty companies of foote, and three of horſe in gariſon, and gaue the gouernment thereof to the Lord of Vicques. Doubtleſſe oh Lord we haue reaſon herein to admire the wonders of thy mercy! The ſurpriſe of this place ſeemed late a Charibdis, to ſwallow vp the greateſt part of France. But it is not now alone, that the iudgements of God doe make vs know, that if he pulls vs downe with one hand, he raiſeth vs vp with the other: and if we be vpon the brinke of our C deſtruction, he retires vs by the hand to ſaue vs. So his prouidence ſubuerſed the deſſignes of the Spaniard, who by this trophie promiſed to extend his conqueſts, and recover thoſe places and Prouinces which he had loſt. So from the trouble bred by the enemies of this eſtate, grew the aduancement of our quiet, from their pernicious practiſes the aſſurance of the country, and ſetting of inconstant minds from their vniuſt attempts and violences: one of the greateſt actions that hath bene of long time for the good of France, and preſeruati- on of this Monarchy. The loſſe of Amiens was ſhamefull, but the recovery glorious: the taking ſtrange, but the reduction admirable, at his enemies noſe, and in view of his army. Finally, a reduction, which giues as much conſolation as the inuaſion brought deſolation.

The Cardinall retreat puts the King in hope, that God would doe him iuſtice, for the wrongs that hee and his had done vnto his realme: with this deſſigne hee marcheth with his troupes, and 18. peeces of Canon to Dourlans, into the which the Cardinall in paſſing had put ſome of the beſt men of his army, with a great conuoy of victualls and muni- tion of warre. He preſents him-ſelfe, and ſeekes by all meanes to draw them out of the pre- cinct of their walles. But being loth to aduenture any thing, his Maieſty paſſeth into Ar- thois, fills the country with feare and terror, goes vnto the gates of Arras, into the which the Cardinall had ſhut him-ſelfe, diſchargeth ſiue and twenty or thirty volleys of Cannon, makes a ſtand there: and by all the deuifes which a generous and warlike mind may inuent, hee ſeekes to draw him to ſally forth, and to ſee ſome braue exployt of his men E at armes.

In the end, his Maieſty not able by any ſtratagem to heate theſe cold humours which did freeze their hearts through feare, the reſt of his victorious army, after ſo great toyle, endur- ed in ſo long and painfull a ſiege, the raine and the ſharpenesse of winter which ap- proched called him backe to provide for a people, who by the negligence of their owne health, had lately, as it were, enclouſed within their walls the deſtiny of France, and ſo paſſe into Britanny, to finiſh that great worke, for the reſtoring of this Monarchy, that afterwards he might with all his forces, ſet vpon the common enemy of his Eſtate, if the negotiation of peace betwixt theſe two mighty warriors, practiſed by the Pope, a common father, did F not take effect.

But before wee proceed, let vs ſee the laſt acts of the Tragedy that was played in Sauoy. The diſcommodities of the lodging of Pont-Charra, cauſed the Kings army to winter about Gernoble, and the extraordinary ſnow ſtoppes the paſſages from Daulphiné into Sauoy. The Duke of Sauoy embraceth the time & occasion, to recover the country of Mauryenne He returne.

A He parts in February with twelue Cannons, and by the induction of Albigny, camps be- fore Aiguebelle. At the firſt brute hereof, Des Diguieres ſent the Lord of Crequy, vnder the authority of lieutenant generall for the King in Sauoy: hee cauſeth him to paſſe the rough and ſteepe mountains on foote, where through the rigour of the ſeaſon, appeared no traces of man on the ſide of Vaniagny, to march more ſafely, accompanied onely with ſeuen or eight Gentlemen. He arriues happily at S. Iohn of Mauryenne, findes that the Seigneur of Paſquieres commanding in the ſaid place, had fortified the approaches of the bridges of Amefrex and Hermillon with good barricadoes, and finiſheth them with ſpeed. The fixt of March the Duke puts his Cannon in battery, and the next day Arceſ Captaine B of the ſaid place, yeelds it vpon condition not to ioine with Crequy but to returne towards Grenoble. They ſuppoſed this place would haue held at the leaſt ſixe weekes: and the Sa- uoiſſen, to deceiue the Seigneur of Crequy, being lodged but three leagues from him, con- tinues ſhooting his Cannon into the aire, to perſwade him that the place was not yet yeel- ded. Crequy abuſed by this ſtratageme of Albigny, marcheth with a good troupe of foot, to take ſome lodging from the enemy, thinking that Aiguebelle did yet hold good. But God will haue man to know that he is man, and that his condition makes him ſubiect to the chances of this world. He findes the Duke before him, being diſlodged, the eight of the moneth, and thinking if ſome troupe gon forth to the warre, he aduanceth neere, and with a furious charge ſeekes to open a way through the enemy. The whole armie comes C vpon him, and as he thinkes to recover his Barricadoes by the ſides of the hills, as they gaue him hope, hee findes the ſnowe had ſtopped the paſſages, and finally compaſſed in on all ſides, hee is forced to take a Law from the ſtronger, and by his imprifonment to redeme the liberty of Paſquieres, his Captaines and ſouldiers. The Duke proceeds and taking all Mauryenne, by compoſition, makes great diſſeins vpon the towne of Gre- noble, by the meanes of a fort which he had built to couer his Country on the ſide of Montmelian and Chambery.

The fort was vpon the frontier of Daulphiné, about a quarter of a league within the Kings Country towards Grenoble, vpon the ſide of a hill about the village of Barraux, kept by Beilegarde a gentleman of Sauoy, with ſeuen companies of foote, and furniſhed with all D munition neceſſary, but made rather by oſtentation (hauing as a great wonder ſent the plot therefore almoſt to all the Potentates of Chriſtendome) then by any neceſſity, the place lying neere to Montmelian the chiefe forteſſe of Sauoy, from whence he might commo- diouſly make his deſſeins vpon Grenoble.

Grenoble did wonderfully apprehend this eye-ſore, and Des Diguieres hauing diſperſed the Kings army for to winter, framed many diſſeins and enterpriſes at Grenoble vpon this fort (the which for that it was made defenſible the eue before Saint Barthelmewes day, the Duke called it by that name,) and had attempted it by ſiege, if he had not bene preſſed with E the want of the chiefe ſinewes of warre. In the end vrged by his duty, and mooued by the miſery of his Maieſties ſubiects, and preſſed with the iuſt intreaties of the chiefe officers, both of Iuſtice, and of policy within the Country of Daulphiné, he learns of many ſoul- diers that came forth, the eſtate of the place, with the forces that kept it, and ſends often to view it in the night.

He is informed that it may be taken by Scalldoe in two places, at a corner on the right hand going from Grenoble, and on that ſide which lookes towards Iſere, the earth being not yet about two fadome and a halfe high. He cauſeth the troupes neereſt to Grenoble to approach, makes them to paſſe ouer the bridge into the town, and ſaines that all the reſt ſhal make the ſame paſſage, to go into Mauryenne where the army of Sauoy was. But the 14. of March on Palme-ſonday eue, he ſecretly puts ſome petards into a boat, and 30. ladders, ne- ceſſary for the execution, & at the ſame inſtant he cauſeth his troupes to repaſſe in the night, F in boats prepared to that end, to take from them of the fort all knowledge that they were on their ſide, whereby they might haue occaſion to call for ſupplies from Montmelian of Chambery. Things thus diſpoſed, he parts from Grenoble the 25. of the ſaid moneth, in the morning, ioynes at a village callee Lombin with ſuch as he had appointed for this exe- cution, making about three hundred horſe, and a thouſand or 12. hundred foot, diuided into foure troupes, commanded by the Seigneurs of Morges, of Hercules, Lieutenant to Des Diguieres

Diguières company of men at armes, of Auriac, and of Maurieu, enigne to Sulian: he calls these commanders a part, acquaints them with this designe, to let vpon the fort the night following, and arriues there about eleuen of the clocke at night. The Captaines appointed to plant the Petards and the ladders, performe their charge with an incredible resolution, notwithstanding the alarm which those of the Fort had taken, by reason of the fires indiscreetly kindled by their boyes. The Petards worke their effect happily, one at the false gate, which lookes towards Grenoble, and the other at the principall port towards Montmelian: the alarm grows hot on all sides, so as they within the Fort knew not which side to gard. They mount to the scaladoe: some ladders are ouerthrowne, and with their shot they seeke to repulse the assailants, who get vp and come to bandy-blowes: the weakest must yeeld to the stronger. The enemies sought to make a new head: but after some little resistance, they slue a hundred of them, and the rest leaped over the rampar where the alarm was least violent. Bellegarde and some others remained prisoners: of seuen ensignes, fise were sent vnto the King, the two others were lost in the heat of the assault. They found there six peeces of battery, and three for the field, with great store of powder, leade, match, and corne: which had been so many scourges against the vnjust vsurpations of the Sauoisien, if the reduction of the Duke of Mercoeur, & that which remained to conquer in Brittany, had not laied their armes aside, and aduanced the Treaties which were made for the tranquillity of their estates.

The Kings authority had for nine yeares beene banished out off such places as the Duke of Mercoeur held in Brittanie: This Prouince was a prey for such as enriched themselves with the miserable spoiles thereof: the people hauing nothing left them but their voice, wished to see themselves freed from the tirany of many vicious men, and without mercy, and to taste, with many others, the effects of the Kings clemencie and bounty: and his Maiesty grieved infinitely to see them afflicted, and not able to relieue them, for the vrgent necessity of his affaires. But after a storme comes a sun-shine. The Duke of Mercoeur had often giuen hope of his submission and obedience; but the places of his command, and the qualitie of his person, in his opinion deserued a voyage thether. Our Henry is not slouthfull in that which concernes the good of his realme, and the great loue he bare to the ease and health of his subiects, who with a generall voyce, giue him that fauourable title of Father of his people, and made them willingly to exceed the bounds of modesty.

At the onely brute of his comming, the Lords of Heurtault, and La Houffaye Saint Ofange, commanding at Rochefort vpon Loire, knowing that the Duke of Mercoeur was ready to free himselfe from the Spaniard, and to be reconciled to his Maiesty, they cast themselves at the Kings feet, beseeching him to receiue and accept of them as his most humble seruants and subiects, and that it would please him in that qualiry to continue them in the command of the said place: to appoint what garrison he pleased for the good of his seruice: to grant them a pardon for their taking of armes, and all other things which had followed, vnder the authoritie of the Dukes of Mayenne and Mercoeur, whom they had acknowledged for the heads of the vnion: and with that capitulation they bring to the Kings obedience, the places of Saint Symphorian and Rochefort.

Plessis of Cosne at the same instant yeelded the towne and Castle of Craon to his Maiesties seruice. But the surprise of Dinan by them of S. Malo, one of the strongest places of Brittanie, in the which the said Duke put his greatest hope, forced him to flie to his Maiesties mercie. There is no cause so bad but may be shadowed with some apparant reasons. The Duke of Mercoeur giues his Maiesty to vnderstand, as well for himselfe, as for those that shall submit themselves vnder his Maiesties obedience; that the zeale of the Catholicke religion, the respect of the good of the realme, whereof he had alwaies desired the preseruati- on, and feared the dismembring, the danger into the which Brittanie was brought, when as the King encountered the Spanish violence vpon the frontier of Picardie, the intelligences of the greatest of the Prouince with the enemy, the meanes they had to make diuers enter- prises, and to draw in forces to the great preiudice of the Crowne and State, had caused him to continue so long in armes after his Maiesties reconciliation with the Pope: and there- fore he beseecheth him most humbly to take knowledge of his good will, and to counte- nance and vse him as his most faithfull seruant and subiect.

His Maiesty had alwaies wished, that God would giue him the grace, to end the troubles of his realme: rather by a voluntary obedience of all his subiects, then by force and necessity of armes: that the last come might tast the same fruites, which his bounty shewed to those that had formerly returned to their obedience. So the said Duke of Mercoeur, the Clergie, Officers, Gentlemen, and other persons of all qualities and conditions, making their due submission, and taking the oth of fealty, the King made the Edict which followeth.

An Edict made by the King vpon the Articles granted to the Duke of Mercoeur vpon his reduction to his Maiesties obedience.

HENRY by the Grace of God, &c. We haue alwaies desired that GOD would giue vs the grace to end the troubles of this Realme, rather by a voluntary obedience of all our subiects, then by the force and necessitie of armes, to the end the last come might enioy the same fruites of our bounty, which the first which returned to their duties, haue receiued: The which hath so happily succeeded by the reduction of our deare and welbeloued cousin the Duke of Mercoeur, who hath shewed himselfe so willing to yeeld vs the obedience which he owes, with all those that were in armes with him, as wee haue cause to rest content and satisfied: to approoue the zeale which he hath shewed to haue of Religion, and to excuse our Cousin for that he hath continued so long in armes after our reconciliation with the Pope, and the comming of our deare and welbeloued Cousin the Cardinall of Florence, his Legate in this Realme, hauing giuen vs to vnderstand, that he was kept from making of this Declaration, for considerations which concerne the good of this Realme: whereof he hath alwaies desired the preseruati- on, and feared the dismembring, especially to preserue our Prouince of Brittanie from the danger whereinto it was reduced, when as we were busied vpon the frontiers of Picardie, to repulse our enemies, by reason of the intelligences which the greatest had in the said countrey, and the meanes to attempt and draw in forces, to the preiudice of our seruice, and of the Estate. By meanes whereof, desiring to acknowledge his good will, and to loue and intreate him hereafter as our good kinsman and faithfull subiect, inclining vnto the humble request which he hath made vnto vs, as well for himselfe, as for those which shall returne with him vnto our obedience.

I We haue sayd, decreed, and ordained, and by this our perpetuall and irreuocable Edict, do say, decree, and ordaine, will, and it is our pleasure, that in the towne and suburbs of Nantes, there shall not be any exercise of the pretended reformed Religion, neither shall there be any place appointed for the exercise thereof, within three leagues of the said towne.

2 We hold our sayd Cousin the Duke of Mercoeur, the Prelates, Clergie, Presidents, Counselors, Aduocates generall, and other Officers of the Parliament of Rennes, which haue exercised Iustice at Nantes, together with the Magistrates, Gentlemen, Officers, and others which shall submit themselves with him vnto our obedience, for our good subiects and faithfull seruants, taking the oath of allegiance, and making the submission required for our said obedience: We will and ordaine, that both our said cousin the Duke of Mercoeur, and all the said Clergi-men, Officers, Gentlemen, and others, of what qualitie and place soeuer vnder our obedience, taking the said oath, and making the submission, shall be restored to all their goods, Offices, Benefices, Charges, Dignities, Priuiledges, and Immunities: Notwithstanding all grants, of their said goods, moouable and immouable, rents, debtes, and reuenues, which we will shall remaine voide, and all promises, bonds, and Scedules made to that end, notwithstanding any prouisions obtained of the said benefices, sales, and Confiscations thereof, Edicts and Declarations which haue been made to the contrarie: all which things we haue and do reuoke by these presents. Wee do also giue them full possession and restitution, namely, of Clergi-mens houses, which they that hold them shall bee bound to leaue presently, and not retaine them vpon any pretext whatsoever: notwithstanding whatsoever hath been taken and actually receiued by vertue of the said gifts, of what nature of money whatsoever it bee, as also all perception of fruites, moueable goods and immouable, payment of arrerages, rents, reuenues, and profits, as well of Ecclesiasticall Benefices, as of Offices and Charges: namely of Registers, although that they which did detain the said Benefices, Offices and charges, hold them still, they shall not be subiect to any restitution of either part, neither shall there be any pursute or demand made to the contrarie, against any person whatsoever, except for moueables which are yet in being, the which shall be restored to the Proprietaries if they thinke good, paying the price they were sold for, without fraude. In like manner shall bee restored all papers and instructions which shall be found in being, belonging as well to vs, as to priuate persons, found in the hands of any one whomsoever, who shall not retaine them vpon any pretext, cause, or excuse whatsoever.

3 All Clergi-men of our Prouince of Brittainie, as well they that do acknowledge our authoritie, as others that shall submit themselues with our said cousin, which haue payed their tenths to the Receiuers of either part, shall not be called in question for that is past: But we will, and our pleasure is, that they shall be fully discharged of that which they haue payed, were it of the money of the said Tenths, or for the alienation of the temporality of the Cleargie. And in regard of the arrerages which they may owe, wee will prouide for their ease and discharge, being informed of their not enioying, or spoile according to the last contract made with the Deputies of the Cleargie of our Realme. And in the meane time, we giue them respight for sixe moneths (beginning the first of March last past) for the payment of the Arrerages, without any stay, notwithstanding for the money which shall fall due since the said day. Wee will also, that the Curates of Churches which are in villages, shall be wholly discharged of all arrerages, vnto the said first day of March.

4 All they that haue beene aduanced and receiued into any Offices of Iustice, or of the Treasure, being vnder the power of our said Cousin, the which were void by death, resignation, or otherwise, since these troubles, and were exercised in those places which are reduced vnder our obedience by our said Cousin, shall be maintained in those Offices, taking letters of prouision from vs, the which shall bee deliuered vnto them, bringing in those of our said Cousin as voyde, without paying any Fine. And in regard of those which haue exercised by Commission, Offices of Iustice, or of the Treasure, in the absence or after the decease of those which remained in our seruice, their Commissions shall presently cease, yet without restitution of the Fees, commodities, and profittes receiued by them, neither shall they be called in question for iudgements or exploites of Iustice made in the execution of their said Commissions. The like we will shall be obserued for Registers and their Deputies, who shall not be subiect to restore the Fees and profittes, arising of the exercise of their said places.

5 Our said cousin, the Prelates, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Officers, and other Inhabitants of Townes, Commonalties, and Bourroughs, Captaines, Commanders of men of warre, which haue followed and assisted him, and which shall come to acknowledge our authority with him, shall not be called in question for that which hath beene committed by them during these troubles, and by reason thereof, were it for taking of armes, carrying of them, assemblies of men of warre, and people in armes, were it within townes or without, planting or entertaining of garrisons, enterprizes, seeges, taking of townes, castles, and houses of strength, fortifications, demantelling thereof, namely, of the houses and castle of Dore, and of Fort Saint George, neare vnto Montague, nor for the taking of moueables, burnings, and all other excesses which haue ensued, imprisonment of Officers and others, with all other matters whatsoever done contrarie to the lawe and his Maiesties authoritie during the present troubles: of all which things of this qualitie, though not exprest in this present Edict: Our will and intention is, that the memory shall remaine for

A for euer abolished and extinct, we do abolish it of our speciall grace, full power, and royall authority, and forbid all men whatsoever to make pursute in generall or particular, either against our cousin, the Duke of Mercœur, and any other aboue-named, their widowes, children, and heires, who (we meane) shall bee in like manner discharged: imposing therein perpetual silence to our Proctors general, and their substitutes, both present and to come, and to all our Courts of Parliament, Iudges, Officers, and all others; Neither shall it bee needfull for priuate men to obtaine any other letters, for that which doth concerne them, but these presents.

6 Notwithstanding we haue expressly reserved and excepted from the said discharges, all crimes punishable in the same party, and the damnable murder committed on the person of the deceased King, our most honored Lord and brother, as also all attempts and projects against our person.

7 In like maner our said cousin, with the Noblemen, Gentlemen, towns and commonalties, which haue assisted him, shall be discharged of all impositions, and leuies of money, as well for Magelines, store houses and others made by their Ordonances, Commissions, and warrants, during, and by reason of the present troubles.

8 And for greater assurance of our intentions, we wil and ordaine, that all Edicts, Letters-patents, and declarations made and published by vs, and our most honoured Lord and brother, with the arrests, sentences, and decrees giuen vpon them, or otherwise, as well in our Court of Parliament of Paris, as of that of Brittainie, and all others of this Realme: as also in the iurisdictions which depend thereon, be it against our said cousin, the Duke of Mercœur, the said Presidents, Councillors, and Officers of the Parliament of Reynes, which haue exercised iustice at Nantes, and all others that haue assisted him, and are aduowed by him, their widowes and heires, by reason of things happened during the warres, shall bee drawne out of the Registers, to the end the memorie may be extinct, as also all informations, proceedings, and verball processe, shall be taken out of the hands of our Officers, to the end all may be reuoked and of no effect: We forbid all Sergeants, not to execute any thing by vertue therof, and all other persons to make any pursute.

9 We forbid all our subiects in general, to reproch any one of the aboue-named facts, or to prouoke them to quarrell by iniuries or outrages: inioyning them expressly to liue quietly and louingly together, vpon pain for the delinquence, to be punished as troublers of the publike quiet.

10 The establishment of Presidents, Councelors, and other Officers, which were of our court of Parliament of Rennes, for the execution of iustice at Nantes, the iudgements, sentences and decrees, exploits and executions therof, as well in ciuill as criminall causes, informations, pursutes, proceedings, and other acts of iustice, growing from them, all letters as well in forme of grace and remission, as others of Iustice, which haue bin receiued and verified there, either of our cousin the D. of Mayenne, or of our said cousin the D. of Mercœur, shall take full effect among persons that haue willingly vndergone their authority and iurisdiction, and the same shall haue place for that which hath bin done, ordained, iudged, and decreed, by them that our said cousin hath established, to hold the iurisdictions of our presidiall seate of Rennes, Dinan, of Angiers, at Nantes, Rochfort, and else-where, and in all others which haue exercised the inferior iurisdictions.

11 All contracts, conuentions, and pactions, made in the said places, among them that haue voluntarily submitted themselues, shall be vailable: and contrariwise, that which hath bin done, ordained and decreed betwixt persons of diuers parties, which haue not voluntarily vndergone the iurisdiction, shall be reuoked and of no force, and the parties shall be restored into the same estate they were in before.

12 There shall be no question, made to a Councel erected by our said cousin the duke of Mercœur, for the direction of the treasure & verifications, nor for that which hath past and bin treated of there, for gifts and iudgements vpon the abating or leuying of mony, and other affaires whereof the decrees shall take place, and are by vs made firme, only for that which hath beene done and executed by vertue thereof for the time past, and among those that our said cousin shall bring vnto our seruice.

13 As also there shall be no question made to an assembly in forme of Estate, made by our

6. said cousin the Duke of Mercœur, establishment of Offices, assignation of Fees, orders made by them, and leuying of money by way of subuention, Imposition of Marchandize, and generally of all that which hath beene done in the said Assemblies, the which notwithstanding we will not, shall take place but vnto this day, and shall be of force, onely for that which is done, and among those, and in those places which our said cousin shall reduce to our obedience.

14 All Iudges and iurisdiccions appointed by our said cousin shall presently cease, as also of the said Councell, and all leuies, impositions vpon Marchandize, & victuals, subuentions, contribution made or to make, by vertue of his commissions and decrees, or of those that haue authority from him: Moreover, all our subiects shall returne into their iurisdiccions, vnto the places where they were established before these troubles, where wee will they shall be exercised as they haue beene accustomed.

15 And to this effect the Officers of our Parlements, and Chambers of Accompts, as also they of the generality, and of Seneschauies, presidial courts, and other iurisdiccions and charges of Iustice, and the Treasurer, shall returne into the exercise of their estates and Offices of either party, and shall enioy them in their ranks, degree, and order of reception, as they did before the said troubles, and with their prerogatiues, liberties, and wages due vnto their state: neither shall it bee needfull to haue any other declaration, letter, or order then this present Edict, the which the Registers shall inroll, to haue recourse thereunto when need shall require.

16 The Councellors receiued at Nantes, by vertue of the deceased Kings prouisions, the decree of the Councell made the 8. of October 1588. and of our Court of Parliament of Britanny, Are, and we do by these presents maintaine them in the said Estates and our said court of Parliament, is enioyned by vs to receiue and admit them, without paying any new fines, or taking any confirmation, but with the whole body of the said Court of Parliament.

17 They that haue managed the mony leuied by the ordonances of the said Assemblies in forme of Estates, shall accompt as they haue bin accustomed, and the parties shall be allowed in their accompts without difficulty, by vertue of the acquittances, and commandements of our said cousin the D. of Mercœur, and others hauing authority from him: and in regard of the accompts which haue bin made before commissioners deputed at the said assemblies, they shall not be subiect to any new examination, but the Accomptants shall remain for euer discharged, but in cases referred by the statutes and customes of the country.

18 The accompts which haue been made, and allowed at Nantes, by the Officers of the chamber of accompts which were there, and others appointed by our said cousin, or any other allowed by him, for the managing of the mony which was leuyed, or ordained by our said cousin, or of the said assembly in forme of estates, and of these which hee shall aduow, and shall submit themselves with him vnder our obedience, shall not be subiect to a new examination, and all ordonances and iudgements giuen as wel vpon the accompt, as verification of letters, shall hold without any search or information, if it be not by reuision, and in case of the ordonances. And where there shall bee found any parties razed by the said accompts, for that they haue beene payed against the ordonances and rules, we will cause all necessary validations to be made.

19 And in regard of accompts which are to make, as well by the Receiuer general, particular, Treasurers of the extraordinary, and others hauing beene appointed to manage the said mony vnder our said cousin, they shall be examined and allowed in our chamber of Accompts for the said country, and no where else. Notwithstanding the parties therein employed shall be purely and simply allowed, as well by vertue of the ordonances and rescriptions made by our said cousin, his Councell, or by the said assembly in forme of Estates, or others aduowed by them, as of the quittances and discharges: all which we haue confirmed for this effect, although the formes prescribed by the Ordonances haue not been observed.

20 And by this means all sums of mony payd by the commandement of our said cousin, as well for offices, wages, and entertainment of soldiers, pensions, victuals, artillery, voyages, fees, taxations of officers, and all other expences, as wel of war as others, yea, the ready mony which is deliuered into the hands of our said cousin, by any accomptants, shall be allowed without any difficulty: neither shall it be needfull for the accomptants to obtaine other letters

A letters and validation then these presents, and the debenter of the accompts from them who for our said cousin haue managed the mony of the extraordinary of the war of our generall receit, and of other accompts, as well of those which are already made, as of such as are yet to make, shall be recompensed with that which they may owe by any other Accompt, although the Debenters be not cleare, and there were some allowances in the said accompts, vntill the examination and conclusion of the last accompt.

21 The farmers, vnder farmers, and deputies established by our said cousin, his said Councell, the said assembly in forme of estates, or others aduowed by them, for the managing of the mony of our taxes, imposts, tickets, ports and hauens, entries of quicke cattle, Prouosty of Nantes, or others which haue paid the price of their farmes by their decrees, shall remain discharged to vs and all others, and shall not be forced to any new payment.

B 22 We will also, and our pleasure is, to the end the said officers appointed by our said cousin for the generall receit of the extraordinarie of the war, and of the foresaid assembly in forme of Estates, may satisfie the charges and assignations which are layd vpon them, as well in the precedent yeares, as in the quarter which is now in being, and satisfie themselves of that which they haue payed, and aduanced in hope to recouer the said assignations, that they may make poursuite and recouer the remainder of the said assignations, as well of the precedent yeares, as of the quarter that is in being, from the Receiuers, Farmers, and others, in whose hands the mony is yet remaining, of what nature and quality soeuer it bee, to the payment whereof they shall force the Farmers, Receiuers, and other Commissioners, as is said, by the waies accustomed for mony and affaires: prouided alwaies, that the people shall not be constrained to pay the said remainder, nor we bound to any abatements which our Farmers may pretend. Also the said accomptants shall not bee constrained by any one in their owne names to the payment of that for the which they haue giuen their rescriptions and promises, for the necessity of the affaires, but proportionably to the mony which shall be found in their hands to satisfie it.

23 During the time of the present troubles, prescriptions nor pre-emptiions shall haue no course among men of either part, vntill this present day.

24 The Inhabitants of our town of Nantes are by vs maintained and confirmed in all their priuiledges granted vnto them, to enioy them freely, as they did before the troubles.

25 Our subiects which our said cousin the D. of Mercœur shall draw vnto our obedience, shall inioy the discharge granted to the other subiects.

26 Hauing regard vnto the great debts and expences our said cousin hath bin forced to vndergo during these wars, and knowing that it is impossible for him to provide suddenly for the payment thereof: we haue giuen a yeares space vnto our said cousin, for the payment of his said debts, during which time his sureties and cautions shall not be constrained for any cause whatsoeuer.

27 Those which haue followed our said cousin, shall not be constrained to the paiement of taxes laid vpon them since the yeare 1589, vnto this present day, in townes whence they haue beene expelled, notwithstanding all Decrees, and Iudgements, to the contrarie.

E 28 All prisoners of warre which haue not agreed for their ranfome, shall be of either part set at liberty, paying moderate charges, and in regard of those that haue compounded, if they be iudged good or bad prize, they shall be bound to pay: and yet if any pretend their ranfomes to be vnreasonable, they may haue recourse before our deare cousins, the Constable and Marshalls of France, to order that according vnto reason: and to this end the prisoners shall be brought and represented. And in regard of Gouff, and the Marquis of Roche, or their cautions, their ranfomes shall be moderated: that of the Seigneur of Gouff at 4000 crownes, comprehending his charges which are yet vnpaid, which sum he shall be bound to pay within six moneths, and shall be set at liberty in giuing caution. And as for the said Marquis of Roche, or his cautions, the said ranfome shall be moderated to the like sum of 4000. crownes, comprehending also the charges which remaine vnpaid for the gard of his cautions, and notwithstanding the heires of the deceased Seigneur of Sollay, shall remaine discharged of the reprimof of the said Seigneur of Gouff, reseruing the actions to the sureties, and the defence to the contrary in that which concernes the ranfome onely.

29 The Commissaries and general gard established by the said Duke ouer the munition

1598. of his armies, their Clerks and Deputies, shall be discharged of their administration, and of that which hath beene done and executed by the commandement of our said cousin, or of those that had authority vnder him; vpon condition, that the said Garde shall giue vp his accompt, for the which they shall not be called in question, although the formes haue not beene duly obserued.

30 All breaches and acts of hostility committed during the truce, and to the prejudice of the Treaty made, shall remaine extirpated, together with the Iudgements and Decrees, if any haue beene giuen of either part, against whomsoever, whereof no question shall be made.

31 And for that he which hath had the charge of the extraordinary of the warre, hath receiued some money of the Taxes, and other publike reuenues of the generalities of Provinces and Tours, the which he hath confusedly employed in his charge, with that of the Province, and generality of Brittany: so as the expence cannot be separated: the accompt of all the said summes together, shall be made in the Chamber of accompts at Nantes, and hee shall be discharged from accompting at Paris, vpon condition, that there shall be an extract brought of the parties concerning the said generalities.

32 Those which haue assisted at the taking of the President of Rix his sons and son-in-law shall not be criminally pursued: and as for the ciuill interest, the parties shall stand respectively vpon their rights, according to the decree made in our Council, betwixt the President of Rix and Vex, whom his Maiesty doth not intend to prejudice in this regard.

33 The secret Articles which are not inserted in this present Edict, shall be in euery point inuolubly obserued, and vpon the extract thereof, or of any one of the said Articles, and signed by one of our Secretaries of State, all necessary letters shall be deliuered.

34 We command our faithfull Councillors, holding our Courts of Parliament, chambers of Accompt, Court of Aydes, Treasurers, Generals of France, and all other our Iustices, and Officers, to cause these presents to be read, published, enrolled, and inuolubly kept without breach, causing all troubles and lets to the contrary to cease: for such is our pleasure. And to the end that it may be firme and stable for euer, We haue set to our hand and Seale. Given at Angiers. In March. 1598.

Signed. HENRY.

Our King aboue all the Princes of the earth, got this commendation, to haue exceeded in wisdom, valor, and clemency. The whole Prouince, not by a politick necessity (which disposeth people to the obedience of their Soueraigne Princes) but as it were appointed by God to command ouer them, acknowledged our Henry for their Soueraigne King, protested to liue and die in the obedience which loyall and faithfull subiects owe vnto their supreme Lord. And by this milde re-union of the members with their head, of the parts with the whole, forgetting the bitterness of the fore-passed war, he dispersed the confusions and disorders, which threatened to bury him vnder the common ruines of these vnciuill troubles.

So in the end, after so many labours, which Hercules could hardly haue surmounted, so many toyles, vnder which Atlas would haue shrunk, the ciuill warre ended the minds of the French vnited, their affections mutually conioyned by a strict bond of loue, vnder the obedience of their King, and all the forces of the chiefe Kingdoms of Christendome, were ready to fall vpon the common enemy of his Estate. But you haue fought enough: the blood of your subiects, oh Princes, hath beene too outrageously spilt in your Champion fields: the furies of your armes haue wonderfully amazed your subiects. Shew your selues hereafter to be pastors and fathers of nations, which reuerence the beauty of your Diademes. Let the seas, riuers and mountaines, which be as a barre betwixt the territories of your Dominions, limit hereafter the greatnesse of your ambition. Heauen, the Iudge of controuersies, doth pronounce that sweet and sacred name of Peace. A name which cannot displease any, but such as take delight in blood, spoile, and fire: and (hauing nothing of a man but the name) breathing out nothing but impiety, licentiousnesse, and iniustice. So after a long treaty betwixt the Deputies of both Kings, in the end a peace was concluded at Veruins, as you may reade in the following Discourse.

CONTINUATION OF THE GENERAL HISTORY OF FRANCE, from the beginning of the Treaty of Veruins, in the yeere 1598. vnto these times.

Collected out of PETER MATHEVV, and other Authors that haue written of this subiect.

He ciuill warres of France being ended, all the Kings rebellious subiects, and the reuolted Prouinces reduced to his obedience, God disposed the hearts of the Kings of France and Spaine, to a generall peace, for the good of their subiects, who had beene long oppressed with the spoiles and miseries of bloody warre. God stirred vp Pope Clement the eight, who poured balme into the wounds of France, not like vnto his Predecessors (who reioyced at her afflictions, and sought to make them incurable, applying no other remedies but fire and sword) He like an other Hercules (sought to calme the stormes which troubled both Land and Sea: he shewed himselfe a common father of Christians, a Mediator of Peace, and Vnion, at such a time as necessity and the estate of their affaires made them to desire rest. To this end he lets Henry the fourth King of France and of Nauarre, vnderstand by Alexander of Medicis, Cardinal of Florence, then his Legate in France, and doth aduertise Philip the second King of Spaine, by his Nuncio: that it was now time to lay aside all passions of hatred and reuenge, to resume peaceful spirits and to ioyne together against the common enemy of Christendome, who onely made his profit of their ruines. That their subiects had beene sufficiently drunke with the blood, gall and vineger of discord, and that it was requisite to refresh them now with the sweet wine of peace.

These two Princes were too high minded, to demand a peace one of an other. There must bee a third person, to vnite these two extreames. But there must bee some one to make this entrance, and to be as it were an Interpreter of their intentions. To this end, the Pope makes choise of F. Bonauenture Calatagiron, Generall of the Order of the Franciscans or Grey Friars, to acquaint these two Kings with his holy and charitable persuasions vnto peace. Religious men had beene actors in this warre, they are now held necessary for the peace. Spirits separated from the troubles and confusions of the world, are most fit for such negotiations, being lesse transported with violent passions.

The King of Spaine did not attend to haue the Pope exhort him vnto peace. Hee had begunne his reigne by warre against the French, he would now end it by a peace with them. He was now seuentie yeeres old, being desirous to discharge himselfe of the heauy burthen of so many Kingdomes, and to leaue them quiet to his sonne. To this end, he must marry his daughter Donna Isabella, who remayning in Spaine, without a husband, might contend for the succession of the crowne, with Don Philip her brother. Hee could not giue her lesse for her dowry, then the Kingdome of Portugall, or the Low Countries, with the county

He proclaimed warre against France in the yeere. 1557.

1598. of Burgundy. By the one, he did weaken and diuide his Estates, and by the other, he gaue A his daughter meanes to contend for her portion in Spaine. For it was impossible to reigne long in Prouinces diuided by irreconcilable warre, hauing two mighty neighbours for enemies. And therefore to assure Spaine, hee must marry the Infanta: and to confirme that which he gaue vnto her in marriage, it was necessary to conclude a peace with the French King, and to banish those vaine imaginations of the conquest of an Estate, the which will alwaies grow great, by the encrease of concord: and fortified with armes and inuincible spirits, supports it selfe against any violence that shall seeke to supplant it. Beeing thus resolved of a peace, he desires to vnderstand the opinion of his counsell. This resolution to haue a peace was iust, and all things shewed a necessity inseparable with iustice. The King of Spaine (to whom this was well knowne) had no need of any other counsell, for that his B Counsellors for the most part did hold, that his Estates could not continue in peace, vnlesse that France were at warre, and that they must alwaies maintaine a diuision in that Estate, whose forces are so mighty and warlike. Yet would hee haue it resolved on in counsell, in the presence of the Prince his sonne, and the Infanta. The Prince transported with the courage of his great and high resolutions, had no other thoughts but to continue his fathers conquests.

Reasons that moved the King of Spaine to a peace.

The Prince of Spaine respects the counsell of peace.

Alas! disgraced by the Prince of Spaine.

The Infanta desirous of a peace.

At her birth she brought a peace to France and England 1546 whereby her marriage there reconciled France and Spaine 1559.

The Archduke applies all his minde to a peace.

This peace being propounded in counsell, euery one spake not what hee thought the best, but rather to please the Prince (who valued resolution more then wisdom, and the dangers of warlike enterprises, more then the assurance of a happy peace) there is no place C whereas dissembling should haue lesse credit then in a Princes Counsell. But Christopher de Moras, holding in the chiefe and essentiall vertue of a counsellor, to speake the truth, and that it belonged to none but vile and base spirits to lie: hee fortified his opinion with the best reasons hee could, to induce the young Prince to like of the proposition of Peace: the which hee knew the King held to be iust and necessary, and that in this necessity, wise men found the surest law of their conduct, and the felicity of an Estate. You may read his discourse at large in the Originall. For which liberty of speech, contrary to the Princes humor (who shewed by his countenance, that such as loued peace were not his friends) de Moras was disgraced with bitter words, and commanded not to come in his presence: but hee was restored againe into fauour by the Kings command, hauing made his excuse vnto the Prince, D for that he had spoken the truth too boldly, for the good of the peace.

The King of Spaine (to prevent all priuate passions, which doe alwaies corrupt counsellors in publike affaires, being vnwilling to haue it treated of in Spaine) commaunded the Infanta Isabella, to aduite Albertus the Archduke (then Gouverneur in the Low-countries, to whom shee was promised) to make some ouerture of an Accord, and to found the mindes of the French. Shee (who was daughter to the generous Princeesse, whom Spaine called the Queene of peace) inuited the Archduke to employ his counsell and meanes for the building of this Temple, proceeding with a good intention, and sincerity of zeale. The Archduke (who found no better rampart to defend the Low-countries, then a peace) makes shew to haue no other thought in his heart, nor any word more E ordinary in his mouth, then peace: greewing to see the misery of the warres, and that two of the greatest Princes of Christendome (whereof the one might serue as a sword, and the other as a Target against the power of the Ottomans) should bee so ready to ruine one another.

This conceit, that the Archduke, desired a peace, did purchase him the loue of those people, ouer whom hee should command in regard of his marriage; it confirmed him in the good liking of the King of Spaine, seeing that he did apply himselfe wholly vnto his humor, and did wonderfully content the Infanta, who desired to be married with a beneficial peace. All Europe aspired to this generall good. Those which were farthest off, held it iust: the neighbours profitable, and such as were interested, necessary: and this interest did not onely concerne the French and the Spanish, but all neighbour States, whom it did much import F to see a peace concluded.

The Archduke discovers the Kings disposition, by Monsieur de Sancerre, Agent at Brussels for Queene Elizabeth Dowager of France. Who comming to Monceaux presented the King with rich armes, which the Archduke had caused to bee made for him at Brussels, and and withall he gaue him charge to say vnto the King, that hee lamented to see the continuance of a warre so preiudiciall to two of the greatest Christian Princes, and so profitable to the common enemy of Christendome. That if it pleased him to harken vnto a peace, his war should be soone followed by the effect: offering all his vovs and seruice to the King of Spaine his vncle, to make him resolute to a perfect and assured peace, wherewith Sancerre acquainted his Maiesty, after the deliuey of his armes, saying, " That the Archduke was a Prince full of holy resolutions for the generall good of Christendome, who lamenting the affaires of Christian Princes, which went to ruine by their discord, had commanded him to vnderstand his Maiesties pleasure, if he would enter into any treaty of peace, the onely and iust support of Christendome. " " The first entrance to a Peace. "

B The King receiued the present graciously, and hauing a while considered of the proposition (made vnto him by Sancerre) hee answered. That hee had neuer yet tasted the sweetness of peace, desiring greatly to know what it was, not so much for his owne ease, as for the good of his subiects: and although he had alwaies loued warre, yet had he neuer refused peace: that he was not insensible of the miseries of this diuision, and had often lamented so much blood vnprofitably spilt, and the weakening of the chiefe pillars of Christendome. That he had not entred into this warre but for a iust and necessary defence, all Europe hauing scene the King of Spaine to raise the greatest forces of the world, yea and his owne subiects against him, and that there was no warre more iust, then to recouer that, which was vnjustly vsurped. Yet notwithstanding, all these considerations should not hinder his inclination to a peace. But hee could not easily belecue, that the Archduke had any such desire, hauing so many Spaniards about him, who would neuer counsel him to make any warre but in France. "

This holy resolution was imparted vnto the Archduke, and by him to the King of Spaine, who doubted that a Prince borne and bred vp in armes, hardened in the exercise of warre, and prosperous in his proceedings, would giue any eare to a peace: and although the good of his Realme, might draw him to this resolution, yet such as had counselled him to proclaim warre against him, when as his affaires were most desperate: euen when as foure or fve Dukes his subiects were in armes against him, would not aduise him now to make a D peace, when as all France was reduced vnder his obedience. He therefore commands the Archduke to proceed warily and wisely, and not to doe any thing that might be dishonorable in seeking of a peace.

The Archduke knowing that the Kings inclination to a peace, proceeding from his owne proper motion, and from the best aduice of his seruants who held a long warre to be as ruinous for France, as a long peace is hurtfull to a warlike nation) continued his first motion, sending backe Sancerre vnto the King who was then at Roan, to speake more openly and plainly vnto him, and to vnderstand his Maiesties pleasure, in what towne vpon the frontiers the Deputies of either side might assemble. This negotiation was not managed by letters, but by instructions, and by one man onely: the which was kept so secret, as on E the Kings part, no man was acquainted therewith, but Villeroy (the Oracle of the secrets of this Estate) neither would the Archduke trust any one but himselfe and the Duke of Sora, master of his horse, to the end that Spaine should not know any thing but what pleased him, when need should require. If matters had bene managed more openly, they might haue proued lesse successfull. These Princes wanted not spirits of diuision about them which blamed this peace. There were some in Spaine which maintained, that the lawes of Religion and conscience, would not allow them to lay downe armes, vntill that France were reduced vnder one Religion: and that it were dishonourable for so warlike a nation as Spaine, to demand a peace of them which had proclaimed warre against them. In France some cried out that they should make no peace with Spaine, without satisfaction for Milan, Naples, Flanders and Nauarre. Those which did second this good worke with their graue and wise Counsell, were men full of affection to the publike good, and capable of the remedies of this diuision. The President Richardot was the first to whom the Archduke imparted this secret, and the King would haue Bellieure his chiefe Counsellor of State acquainted therewith, vnto whom Sancerre imparted the order and state of the businesse. This done, he returned to the Archduke to Brussels, carrying with him a resolution of the Kings

The King of Spaine doubts of a peace.

A long peace preiudiciall to a warlike nation.

Diuers opinions of the peace.

1598. Kings pleasure: wherevpon the Archduke commanded him to conduct the Generall of the A Friars into France, being then come out of Spaine.

The Generall acquainted the King with the commandement hee had receiued from the Pope, to passe into Spaine to dispose the Catholike King to a good and holy peace, whereby the forces and wils of all Christians might bee vnited against the common enemy, who made his profit of this miserable diuision: that the King of Spaine fore-seeing it well, and lamenting this generall desolation, had said vnto him, that he desired a peace: which by his will should bee firme and durable, for the recovery of that which discord had caused the Christian Princes to loose, desiring not onely to treat a reconciliation of friendship betwixt the two crownes, but also to preuent all occasions of future warre: And to this end, B hee had giuen all his power to the Archduke his Nephew, who was a Prince desirous of peace.

The King answered: That he was desirous of a peace, neither would hee prescribe him any other conditions, then the honour and iustice of his pretensions, the which hee held so assured, as no man might call them in question. The Generall of the Franciscans assured him, that the King of Spaine would giue him all the contentment hee could expect from a iust Prince. Reason which alwaies findes place in generous mindes, and necessity whose stings (when thee is moued) are very violent, made these two Princes laie downe armes, to releue their subiects, tired with miseries and publike oppressions. These first hopes of a peace, did but beginne to appeare when as the King was aduertised of the surprize of Amiens. This was a frost which nipt all the hope of this first seed, a winde which blew away all the flowers of this yong plant. The Generall of the Friars returnes into France, to assure the King, that if it pleased him, the taking of Amiens should not hinder the peace. The King answered, that hee held himselfe wronged in this proposition, that he neither could nor would hearken vnto it: and that hee neuer did any thing by constraint: neither were matters now fit for an accord. I will not (saith hee) that they demand a peace of me in a brauery, I will neuer yeeld vnto it by force. We will talke more, when I haue recovered Amiens, Calis and Ardes: and so hee sent backe the Generall of the Friars, to the amazement of the enemy, who did admire the Kings noble resolution, which (like vnto the ancient Romans) was more admirable in Aduersity then Prosperity. C

Amiens being recovered, and the Pope fore-seeing by the continuance of the Kings victories, that it would produce no other effects but a weakening of the whole body, hee coniures the two Kings a new, by the apprehension of the publike miseries, and the pittifull Estate of Christian affaires, to agree and to resume their chiefe inclinations to peace. Hee commands his Legate to dispose them to some conference, whereby hee might discern who was to bee blamed, and who failed in his affection, for the generall good of a peace. The Legate goes to Saint Quintin: the Generall of the Friars comes thither vnto him and beseecheth him, to be a meane vnto the King, to send some man of credit, with whom they might conferre of a treaty. The King sent the President Sillery, with an expresse commandement, not to consent to any Treaty of a peace, but vpon assurance to haue those townes E yeelded vp, which were held by the King of Spaine. The Popes Legate, the President Sillery, and the Generall of the Friars met at Saint Quintin: the greatest difficulty at this first entrance, was for the restitution of places. The Generall of the Friars said, that the King of Spaine would not purchase a peace at so deere a rate. Sillery answered, that the King of Spaine did giue nothing of his owne, but did onely yeeld vp that which he could not keepe, the King hauing made prooffe by the recovery of Amiens, what he might expect of the other places. And if they desired a good and a durable peace, they must make it iust: for else it could not continue. That there was nothing more iust, then restitution, nor more honourable then to leaue that willingly which they could nor hold by force: That the King had expresse forbidden him, not to consent to any Treaty, nor to the choise of any place F for an assembly, before he had Assurance of this restitution: that he held it a wrong done vnto the dignity of so great a Prince, to the honour of his commandements, to the equity of his cause, and to his good fortune, once to hearken vnto the difficulties they made to yeeld him vp that which was his owne: That whosoever should treat with this prejudice, deserved to be punished as the authors of Treaties, that were dishonorable to their Masters. The

A iust peace is durable.

A The Generall of the friars (who could get any other resolutions at his hands) returned twice into Flanders, to let them vnderstand, that among all the reasons of the Treaty, that of restitution was inuincible: that it was in vaine to demand a peace of the French, if they did not restore all. That this restitution was the soule of the Treaty, without the which it was a fantastike body, without any naturall proportion and substance: That in the end, desiring too much, they should haue nothing: and thinking to hold all, they would loose all. The Archduke doth aduertise the King of Spaine, that there was no meane to enter into the Temple of peace, but by opening of the gates of Calais, Ardes, Dourlans, and other places (taken in warre) vnto the French King. God inspired the heart of the King of Spaine, against the opinion of his Councell of State, to yeeld vp all his pretensions for the good of a peace, rather then to leaue the world in this perpetuall discord and confusion. B Hee did consult with his Councell of conscience, vpon the necessity of this Restitution. They answered him, that hee could not liue with a quiet soule, nor die in the integrity of his Religion, if hee did not restore those places. The King of Spaine followed this aduice, aduertising the Archduke, that hee would not for that which hee had gotten from another, loose the meane to leaue a peace to his owne Estates. Vpon this resolution, the Generall of the Friars returnes into France, and passeth his word vnto the Legate and Sillery, for the Restitution: so as after an infinite toyle of two moneths, these three made all things ready for a Treaty.

C Sillery returnes to the King, leading with him the Generall of the Friars, as well to let him vnderstand from the Kings owne mouth, what he had said vnto him by his commandement, as also to haue the Generall tell the King, what he had promised, and propounded on the Archdukes behalfe. The Legate remained at Saint Quintin, as gardien of the worlds intentions of two Princes. Being assured of eithers faith, they agree vpon a place for the assembly of the Deputies, and to conclude the Treaty. The towne of Veruins (being vnmodious, and was presently furnished with all things necessary to receiue the Ambassadors. The King deputed Pomponne of Belieure Knight, Lord of Grignon, the chiefe and most ancient of his Priuy Councell, and Nicholas Brulart Knight, Lord of Sillery, Councillour D of State to his Maiesty, and President in his Court of Parliament. For the King of Spaine and the Archduke, there came John Richardot Knight, President of the Kings Priuy Councell and of his Councell of State: John Baptista Taxus Knight, Commander of the Military order of Saint James, and Councillor of State, and of the Councell of warre: and Lewis Verruchen Knight Audiencer and chiefe Secretary and Treasurer of the Charters of the Councell of State, men of great experience and approued fidelity. The Cardinall Medicis, Legate of the holy Sea, assisted by the Bishop of Mantoua, was as it were an Vmper of all difficulties in this good and holy reconciliation. The Kings Deputies arrived first, and those of the King of Spaine presently after, where hauing saluted one another with hearts full of ioy and incredible content, they promised to treat Roundly, Sincerely, and Mildely, communicating their commissions one vnto another, and reforming those errors which they found, that they might begin to treat more safely and freely. After much question and many propositions made by the Deputies of the King of Spaine for the Precedence, in the end, they yeelded vnto the French Kings, to take what place they pleased, after the Legate, and the Popes Nuncio.

At their first sitting, the Legate exhorts them to shew the fidelity and integrity in this action which their Masters desired, whereof hee assured himselfe by their experiences, as of those which had happily managed the greatest affaires of Europe, more then any other men: wishing them to consider, that hauing the honour to counsell two of the greatest Princes of the world (who submitted their wills vnto their Councells, as the most diuine thing among men, when it is purged from ambitious passions, violent thoughts and preiudicate opinions) they should omit nothing that might regard the contentment of their good intentions, and not to doubt, but that God who hath an especiall care of Kings and Kingdomes, would infuse the light of his spirit into their most secret thoughts, and threaten them with the severity of his Iustice, if they did not apply all their indeauours to his glory and the good of the Christian common-weale.

Then

1598. Then they entred into Treaty with a mildnesse fit for men of that quality & the merit of the subject. It was managed with such secrecy, as nothing was knowne before that all was concluded. The chiefe point of difficulty was, for the restitution of places. Many reasons were propounded on either side: but the Kings Deputies had great aduantages: the force of reason, the prosperity of affaires in the recovery of Amiens, and about al the fauour of the time and occasion. The King of Spaine would not die but in peace: hee desired his sonne might reigne in peace, and that his deerey beloued daughter might bee married in peace. The Archduke languished with a desire to be married: and fearing least the promise which hee had (not taking effect during the life of the King of Spaine) the conditions would bee made worse, he pressed Richardot and Taxis, not to proceed in this negotiation after the Spanish manner, but to remember that they must not prolong their consultations, nor protract an action, the praise whereof depended vpon the conclusion. So after they had balanced all matters in the Treaty, to reduce them to a iust proportion of reason, all controuersies betwixt two Kings were reconciled and ended.

The Duke of Sauoy desires to be comprehended in the treaty.

The King prefers the publicke good before his private interest.

During this treaty, the most Christian King was at Nantes: he pacified Britan, discharged the new Garrisons, and some Imposts, and placed for Gouvernour there, Cesar Monsieur his bafe sonne, now Duke of Vendosme, who was betrothed to the onely daughter of the Duke of Mercœur. He then granted the Edict of pacification to them of the reformed Religion within his Realme, as wee shal shew hereafter. A peace being concluded at Veruins, betwixt the two Kings, there was nothing yet agreed vpon for the Duke of Sauoy. It seemed the King of Spaine had forgotten him, and that he did not acknowledge him for his son-in-law. The French King held him neither for kinsman nor friend, so long as hee should detain the Marquisate of Salusses. The Marquis of Lullins (who was there Agent for the Duke) assured the Deputies, that the Duke had no other intention, but to giue the King more contentment hereafter, then forepassed occasions would giue him meanes. Vpon this assurance, he entred into the Treaty, the which by his occasion was in a manner broken off, three daies before the conclusion. For the King was resolu'd, not to thinke of any accord with the Duke, but by present effects: without deferring the satisfaction of that which was due vnto him. It was not likely (that drawing by the execution of the Treaty, out of the hands of so great and mighty a King, fixe places in Picardy, and a port of great importance in Britan, which was harder to take then the Marquisate of Salusses) the King would conclude a peace with the Duke of Sauoy, with lesse honourable conditions, then hee had done with the King of Spaine, and bring his indubitable right in question. But the Pope (fearing that this Marquisate of Salusses, would proue an Aina to fire all Italy) prevailed so with the King, as he preferred the publicke good before his owne private interest, being content (for the finishing of this building of peace) that the Dukes interest, and his right, should be put to compromise.

It was agreed, that the Pope should bee the onely Iudge of this discord, touching the restitution of the Marquisate of Salusses, and that within a yeere. So a peace was concluded, and signed by the Deputies: but it was not published till a moneth after: onely a general suspension of armes was proclaimed. The King being at Rennes in Britan, came post to Tours, and so to Amiens, for the better execution of the peace, which was comprehended in 38. Articles, as followeth.

Articles of the treaty of peace.

1 First it is concluded and agreed that the Treaty of peace made and resolu'd betwixt the said King Henry the fourth and Philip the second, in approbation of the Articles contained in the Treaty of peace made at the castle of Cambresis in the yeere of our Lord 1559. betwixt the deceased Henry the French King of famous memory, and the said Catholike King; In which Treatie of the said Deputies in their names they haue againe confirmed it in all pointes, as if it had bene incerted word by word and without any alteration, that all shall remaine in their full force, but what shalbe expressly derogated by this present Treaty.

2 That hereafter from the day of the date of this present treaty betwixt the said Kings, their children borne, or to be borne, heires and successors, their Realms, Countries and subjects, there should bee a good, firme and stable peace, that they should loue like bretheren procuring

A procuring the good, honour, and reputation one of another; And should auoide all they could, the hurt one of another, nor support, nor maintaine any person whatsoever to the preiudice one of another; And presently all acts of Hostility should cease: forgetting all things that were past, the which should bee for euer abolished and extinct: Renouncing by this Treaty all Practises, Leagues and Intelligences, which might in any sort redound to the preiudice of the one or the other, with promises neuer to attempt nor to procure the one anothers harme, nor to suffer their vassals, nor subjects to doe it directly nor indirectly. And if any of them of what qualitie or condition soeuer, should hereafter goe against it, to goe and serue by sea, or land, or otherwise aide and assist in any thing, which might in any sort preiudice either of the said Kings, the other should bee bound to oppose himselfe and to hinder it, and to punish them seuerely, as breakers of this Treaty and troublers of the publike quiet.

3 And by the meanes of this peace, and strict amity the subjects of either side whatsoever, may in keeping the lawes and customes of the country, goe and come, remaine frequent, conuerse and returne to one anothers countries trafiking, as they please aswell by sea, land, as fresh riuers: and the subjects of the one shalbe defended and maintained in anothers country as if they were his owne subjects, paying all accustomed duties in all places which by their Maiesties and their successors shalbe imposed.

4 All letters of Marke and reprisall are suspended, which might haue bene giuen for any cause whatsoever, and hereafter none to bee giuen by any one of the said Princes, to the preiudice of the others subjects, but against the principall offenders, and that onelie in case of deniall of Iustice, whereof, and of the letters of requisition, such as pursue the said letters of Reprisall shall make it appeere according to the forme of Law.

5 The townes, subjects and inhabitants of the counties of Flanders and Arthois, and of other Prouinces of the Nether-lands, together with the Realme of Spaine, shal enioy the priuiledges freedoms and liberties, which haue been granted them by the Kings of France, Predecessors, to the said most Christian King: And in like manner the townes, Inhabitants, and Subjects of the Realme of France, shall also enioy the priuiledges, freedoms and liberties, which they haue in the said Netherlands, and the Realmes of Spaine, euen as euery one of them haue heretofore enioyed, and doe enioy by vertue of the said Treaty, of the yeere 1559. and other precedent Treaties.

6 It is also agreed, in case the said Catholike King doth giue or transferre by Testament, Donation, Relinquation, or any other title whatsoever to the Noble Infanta, Madame Isabelle, his eldest daughter, or to any other, all the Prouinces of his Nether-lands, with the counties of Bourgogne and Charolois, that all the said Prouinces and Counties, are vnderstood to bee comprehended in this present Treaty, as they were in that of the yeere 1559. together with the said Lady Infanta, or hee in whose fauour the said Catholike King hath disposed thereof, neither shall it bee needfull to make any new Treaty to that effect.

7 And the subjects and seruants of either part, aswell Ecclesiasticall as Ciuill (notwithstanding they haue serued the contrary partie) shall returne into their offices and benefices which they did enioy before the end of December in the yeere of our Lord 1588. except Curats where as other haue bene Canonically aduanced: they shall also enioy all there immouable goods, rents, charged or for life, which haue been seized and detained by reason of the wars, begun about the end of the yeere 1588. to enioy it from the publication of this Edict, and in like manner all that shall hereafter fall vnto them by succession or otherwise; without making any question or demand of the fruites received, by the seizure of the said immouable goods, vnto the day of the publication of this present Treaty, nor of the goods which haue been confiscated before the said day, and the diuision which shalbe made or caused to bee made; by the Prince, his Liuerenant or Deputy in whose iurisdiction the said decree shalbe made, shalbe good and of force: And the Creditours of such debts shall neuer bee admitted to make any pursue, nor to bring any action against them to whom they haue bene giuen, nor against them which by vertue of such giuistes and confiscations, haue paid them: Notwithstanding any letters

1598. Obligatory which the said creditours may haue, the which for the effect of the said confiscation, shall by this Edict remaine voide and of no force.

8 And the returne of the said subiects and seruants of either side, to the immouable, goods and rents as before shalbe, notwithstanding all donations, grants, declaration, confiscations, and sentences giuen by contumacy, and in the absence of parties, and they not heard, by reason of the said warre; which sentences and all iudgements giuen, both ciuill and criminall shall remaine voide and of no force, as if they had neuer bene: Reforming the said subiects fullie (all lets and contradictions, ceassing) to the rights which they had at the beginning of the said warre, and that no man might bee called in question for any publike charge which he had had, either concerning the victualls, money or other-wise, during the time, and by reason of the said warre, where of hee had giuen an account before such as had then power to dispose: Provided that the said subiects and seruants bee not found charged with other crimes and offences then to haue serued the contrarie partie.

9 And yet they may not returne into the said lands, countries and seigneuries of the said Kings, before they haue obtained leaue and letters-patents, sealed vnder their Maiesties great seale, whereof they are bound to pursue the verification before their Maiesties officers.

10 Such as haue bene promoted of either side to benefices being in the collation, presentation, or disposition of the said Kings or other Lay-men, shall hold the possession, and enjoy the said benefices as if the had bene duely preferred.

11 In fauour of this peace, and to giue either King contentment one of another, it is concluded that they shall really and faithfully restore one vnto another, that which shalbe found to haue bene taken, seized and held by them, or others hauing charge from them or in their names, in one an others country: That is to say the said most Christian King, to the Catholike King the possession and enioying of the county of Charoloys, with the appertenances and dependances, to bee fully and peaceably enjoyed by him and his successors, and to hold it vnder the soueraignty of the Kings of France, and if there be any other places found, held since the said peace of 1559. by the most Christian King, or by any of his, they shall bee also restored, and all within two monthes after the day of the date of these presents.

12 And in like manner the said Catholike King shall restore vnto the most Christian King all places taken, seized and held by him, or by any other, hauing charge from him since the said Treaty at the castle-Cambresis.

13 That is Calais, Ardres, Monthulin, Dourlans, La Capelle, Chastelet in Picardy. Blauet in Britan, and all other places which the said Catholike King hath held there or else-where in the Realme of France, and are by him, or his, detained since the said Treaty.

14 In regard of Calais, Ardres, Monthulin, Dourlans, La Capelle and Chastelet in Picardie. The said place shall be deliuered by the said Catholike King or his ministers faithfully and effectually without any delay or difficulty for any pretext or occasion whatsoever, to him or them that shalbe to that end deputed by the said most Christian King, within two monthes precisely from the day of the date of these presents, in the same State they are now, without demollishing or impaying them in any sort, neither shall they pretend or demaund any re-emboursment of the fortifications made in the said places, nor for the payment of that which might bee due vnto the souldiers, that were in them: And first of all restitution should bee made of Calais and Ardres, and then of the rest, so as the whole restitution of the said places should bee accomplished within the said time of two monthes.

15 As for Blauet, the restitution shalbe also effectually made without any delay or difficulty vnder what collour or pretext soeuer, to him or them that shall bee deputed by the most Christian King, and that within three monthes from the daie of the date of these presents. And the said Catholike King may cause the fortifications to bee demollished which haue bene made by him or his at Blauet or any other place held by him in Britan if there be any.

16 Restoring the said places, the said Catholike King may cause all the Artillery, Poulders, Bullets, Victualls and other munition of warre which shalbe found in the said places to be carried away, with all the mouable goods which belongs vnto them; Provided alwaies that it shall not be lawfull for them to exact any thing of the Inhabitants of the said places nor of the champion country nor to indamage their houses, or to carry away any thing belonging to the said Inhabitants.

17 And to the end the men of warre beeing in Blauet may more speedily returne into Spaine, the said most Christian King shall cause them to bee furnished with ships and mariners wherein they may transport their Artillery, Victualls and other munition of warre, with their baggage, being at the said Blauet, and other places, which shalbe restored in Britan, giuing caution for the restitution of the said ships, and sending backe of the mariners within the time that shalbe agreed vpon.

18 Moreouer the said Deputies doe promise for assurance of the restitution of the said places, as soone as the ratification of this present Treaty, made by the most Christian King, shalbe deliuered vnto them, to giue foure Hostages such as hee shall please to choose of the said Catholike Kings subiects, who shalbe honourably intreated as shalbe besit their qualities, the which restitution beeing made and really performed the said Hostages shalbe set at liberty without any delay: Provided alwaies that restitution beeing made of the fixe places in Picardy two of the Hostages shalbe deliuered, the two other remayning vntill the restitution of Blauet.

19 And in regard of matters contained in the said Treaty of the yeere 1559. which haue not bene executed, according to the Articles thereof, the execution shalbe made and ended in that which remains to be executed, as well for the Feodale Tenure of the county of Saint Pol, the limits of the two Princes lands held in Surseance, exemptions of customs and forraigne impositions, pretended by them of the county of Bourgondie, the Bishoprike of Therouenne, Abbay of Saint John au Mont, the Duchie of Bouillon, restitution of some places pretended of either part to bee restored by vertue of the said Treaty, and all other differences which haue not bene decided, as it was then agreed: There shall bee to that end arbitratours named and deputed of either side, according vnto that which hath bene resolved by the said Treaty; who shall assemble within fixe monthes, in such places as are appointed by the same, if the parties consent, if not, they shal agree vpon some other place.

20 And for as much as in the diuision of Lands, appointed to the Diocesses of Arras, Amiens, Saint Omer, and Boullen, there are villages of France found in the Bishopricks of Arras and Saint Omer, and other villages of the countries of Arthois and Flanders in the Bishopricks of Amiens and Boullen which is often-times the cause of disorder and confusion, it hath bene agreed, that with the consent of the Pope, Commissioners of either side shalbe deputed, who shall meete within one yeere at the place appointed, to resolve vpon the exchange which may be made of the villages, to the commodity of the one and the other.

21 All prisoners of warre of either part being restrained, shalbe set at liberty, in paying their charges, and what may bee else iustly due, without paying of any rancome, vnlesse it hath bene agreed vpon; and if there be any complaint that it exceeds, it shalbe then ordered by the Prince of the country where the prisoners are detained.

22 All other prisoners, subiects to the said Kings, which through the callamity of war may bee detained in their Maiesties Gallies, shalbe speedily set at liberty without any delay, for any pretext whatsoever, neither shall they demand any thing of them for their rancome and charges.

23 And there are reserued vnto the said most Christian French King and of Nauarre, and his successors all the rights, actions, and pretentions which hee challengeth to belong vnto him by reason of the said Realmes, Countries and Seigneuries, or else-where for what cause soeuer, to the which neither hee nor his Predecessours haue not expressly renounced, to make his pursute by all friendly courtes, or by iustice, and not by armes.

24 As in the like manner are reserued vnto the said Catholike King of Spaine and

1598. and to the Noble Infanta his eldest daughter, their successors, and having cause, al right actions and pretensions which they hold to belong vnto them, by reason of the said realmes and countries, or else-where, for what cause foeuer, to the which neither they nor their predecessors haue not expressely renounced, to make their pursute by all friendly means, and by the course of Iustice, and not by armes.

25 And whereas it hath bene insisted by the deputies of the said Catholike King, that to attaine vnto a perfit peace, it is very necessary that the most excellent Prince the duke of Sauoy bee comprehended in the Treaty; the said Catholike King desyring and affecting the good and pr. seruatiō of the said Duke, as his owne, being nerely allied vnto him: The which they said they had expresse commandement to propound from the Cardinall Archduke: the which was also declared by Gaspard of Geneva, Marquis of Lullins, counsellor of State, Chamberlaine and Collonel of the said Dukes garde, his Lieutenant and Gouernour of the duchy of Aust and towne of Yure, his deputy: that the said Duke his master hath the honour to bee descended from a brother, to the great Grand-father of the said most Christian King, and from a cousin-germaine of the Queene his mother: That his intention is to giue contentment to the said King, and as his most humble kinsman to acknowledge him with all honour, seruice, and shewes of loue, to giue him better satisfaction heereafter both of him and his action; That neither time nor occasion past would giue him meanes to doe it: That hee promised the said King, that hauing made prooffe of his loue, hee would shew the like bounty and affection, that the foure last Kings, his predecessors, did shew vnto the Duke his father of famous memorie.

26 It hath bene concluded and decreed, that the said Duke shalbe receiued and comprehended in this Treaty of peace: and to witnesse the desire hee hath to giue the most Christian King contentment, hee shall restore and yeeld vp the towne and castle of Berre, within two monethes from the daie of the date of these presents, without any delay or difficulty, vpon any pretext whatsoever. And the said place shalbe deliuered by the said Duke, to him or them that shalbe deputed by the said King within the time prefix without any demollition or damage whatsoever, and without pretending or demanding any re-emboursement for the fortification made in the said towne and castle, nor for that which may bee due vnto the garrison that keepes it: and hee shall leaue all the Artillery which was in the said place when it was taken, with the bullets that shall be found of the same scantling: hauing liberty to carry away, that which he hath since brought in, if there be any.

27 It hath bene also agreed that the said Duke shall disauow and fully abandon captaine Fortune, being in the towne of Seurre, in the country of Bourgondy, and not giue vnto him nor to any other that should vsurpe the said towne against the will and pleasure of the most Christian King, directly nor indirectly, any aide, support or fauor.

28 And touching all other controuerfies remayning betwixt the said most Christian King and the said Duke: the said Deputies in their names, consent and agree, for the good of a peace, that they shalbe referred vnto Pope Clement the eight, to be decided by his Holinesse within one yeere from the day of the date of these presents, according to the answere of the said King, giuen in writing the fourth of Iune last: and whatsoever shalbe decreed by his Holinesse, shalbe duly executed of either part, without any difficulty or delay, vpon any cause or pretext whatsoever.

29 And in the meane time, vntill it shalbe otherwise decided by his Holinesse, matters shall remaine in the same estate they now are, without any alteration or innouation, and as they are held of either part: Neither shall it bee lawfull to extend themselves farther, nor to exact or impose contributions or any other thing of the iurisdiction of those places which are held by either of them.

30 And according to that which hath bene concluded, there shalbe from this day a firme peace, friendship, and good neighbourhood betwixt the said King and Duke, their children borne, and to bee borne, heires and successors, and the realmes, countries and subiects of either of them.

31 The subiects and seruantes of either parte as well Ecclesiasticall as Secular, notwith-

1598. notwithstanding that they haue serued the contrary party, shall returne fully into the fruition of all their goods, offices and benefices, as hath bene formerly said, provided alwaies that it extend not to governments.

32 As for prisoners taken in the warres, they shalbe vsed as hath bene formerly concluded betwixt the two Kings.

33 And the Articles and Treaties made heretofore betwixt the deceased most Christian Kings Henry the second in the yeere 1559. at castle Cambreis, Charles the ninth, and Henry the third and the deceased Duke of Sauoy, shalbe in all points confirmed, but in that which hath bene derogated in this present Treaty. And according therevnto the said duke of Sauoy, shal remaine a Neuter Prince, and a common friend to the said Kings: and from the day of the publication of this present Treaty, the comerce, and traffike, shalbe free and assured betwixt their countries and subiects, as hath bin contained in the said Treaty, and practized by vertue thereof. And the orders therein contained shalbe obserued, namely in regard of officers which haue serued the said kings, vnlesse it hath bin derogated by some other treaty.

34 In this peace, alliance and friendship, shalbe comprehended by the common consent of the said Kings, if they wil bee comprehended: First on the behalfe of the said most Christian King, the Pope, the Apostolike Sea, the Emperor, the Princes Electors, both Ecclesiasticall and secular, the townes, communalities, and estates, of the said sacred Empire, & namely the Cont Pallatin elector, Marquis of Brandebourg, duke of Wirtemberg, Lamgrane of Hessen, Marquis of Hanspach, the Earles of East-Frizland, and the sea towns, according to there ancient alliances. The King and Realme of Scotland, according to the ancient treaties, alliances and confederations, which are betwixt the Realmes of France and Scotland; The Kings of Poland, Denmarke and Sweden, the Duke and Seigneury of Venice, the 13. Cantons of Suisses, the Seigneuries of the three Cantons of Grisons, the Bishop and Seigneuries of the country of Valais, the Abbot & town of Saint Gal, Touhenbourg, Milans in the country of Neuf-Chastell, and other allies and confederates of the said Cantons: The Duke of Lorraine, the great Duke of Tuscane, the Duke of Mantua, the common-weale of Luques, the Bishops and Chapter of Metz, Toul and Verdun, the Abbot of Gozze, the Lords of Sedan, and the Earle of Mirande; provided alwaies that the consent which the said Catholike King giues to the comprehension of the Earles of East-Frizland, shall not preiudice the right which his Catholike Maiesty pretendeth vnto their countries: As also there shalbe a reseruatiō against the defences, rights and exemptions, of the said Eredomes, with a declaration that the said Catholike King may neither directly by himselfe or any other, molest any of them which haue bene formerly comprehended by the said most Christian King. And if the said Catholike King pretends any thing against them, hee shall pursue them by law, before competent Iudges, and not by force in any manner whatsoever.

35 And on the behalfe of the said Catholike King shalbe comprehended in this Treaty, if they please: first of all the Pope, the holy Apostolike Sea, the Emperor of Romans, the Archduke, his brethren and cousins, their realms & countries, the electors, Princes, towns & estates of the whole Empire obeying him, the Duke of Bauaria, the Duke of Cleues, the Bishop and country of Liege, the sea-townes, and the Earledomes of East-Frizland. And the said Princes do renounce all practises, promising hereafter not to make any, neither within Christendome nor without that may be preiudiciall to the said Emperor, nor to the members and Estates of the said holy Empire but shal with al their power procure the good and quiet thereof, so as the said Emperor and Estates carry themselves very respectfully and lovingly, vnto the said most Christian and Catholike Kings, and doe nothing to their preiudice: there shalbe also comprehended the Seigneuries of the Cantons of high Germaines, the Grisons, and their allies, the Kings of Polland, Sweden, Scotland, and Denmarke, the Duke and Seigneury of Venice, the Duke of Lorraine, the great Duke of Tuscane, the common-weales of Genoua, and Luques, the Duke of Parma and Placentia, the Cardinall of Farnese, his brother, the Duke of Mantoua, the Duke of Vrbino, the chiefe of the houses of Colonne and Vrsins, the Duke of Salmonet, the Lord of Monaco, the Marquis of Finall, the Marquis of Massa, the Lord of Plombin, the Earle of Sala, and the Earle Colonne, to enjoy the benefit of this peace, with expresse declaration that the said 1598. most Christian King shall neither directly nor indirectly by himselfe or any other, molest any of them, and if he pretend any thing against them he may pursue it by law, before competent Iudges, and not by force in any sort whatsoever.

36 And there shall be also comprehended in this present Treaty all others that shalbe named by the common consent of the said Kings, so as within fixe moneths after, the publication of the said Treaty they giue their letters declaratorie respectiue as it is in such case required.

37 And for the better assurance of this Treaty of peace and of all the Articles therein contained, it shalbe verified, published and inrowled, in the Court of Parliament of Paris and in all other Parliaments of the Realme of France, and in the Chamber of accounts at Paris: as also it shalbe verified, published and inrowled, in the great councill, and other counceils and chambers of accounts of the countries of the said Catholike King, and all according to the forme contained in the Treatie made in the yeere 1559. whereof the expeditions shalbe giuen of either part within three monethes after the publication of this present Treaty.

38 Which points and Articles, together withall that is contained in euery one of them, haue beene treated, concluded, and past betwixt the said Deputies in their names, the which by vertue of their authorities haue promised and doe promise vpon bond of all the present and future goods of their said masters, that they shalbe inuolubly obserued and kept, and to cause them to ratifie and to giue autentike letters one vnto the other, where as all this present Treatie shalbe incerted, and that within one month after the date of these presents, in regard of the said most Christian King, Cardinall, Archduke and Duke of Sauoy: which Cardinall shall promise to cause like letters of ratification to be giuen within three moneths by the Catholike King. They shall solemnly sweare vpon the crosse, the Holy Euangelists, the canon of the Masse, and vpon their honours, in the presence of such as they shall please to depute, to obserue and accomplish, fully, really and faithfully the contents of the said Articles, and in like manner the Catholike King shall take the same oth within three moneths after, or when he shalbe required.

ALL which Articles contained in the Treaty: and all that had beene concluded, agreed, and passed by the said Deputies in their Masters names, they promise shall bee inuolubly obserued and kept, and to cause them to ratifie them, and to deliuer one vnto an other authentike letters, signed and sealed, containing the whole Treaty, and that within one moneth after the date of those presents, in regard of the most Christian King, the Cardinal, Archduke and Duke of Sauoy: and that the Cardinall should promise, to procure within three moneths after, the like letters of ratification from the Catholike King, Archduke and Duke of Sauoy: They should solemnly sweare vpon the crosse, the holy Euangelists, the canon of the Masse, and by their honours, in the presence of such as they should depute, to obserue and fulfill Really and Faithfully, all that was contained in the said Articles: and the like oth should be taken by the Catholike King of Spaine, within three moneths after, or when it should bee required. In witnessse whereof, the Deputies subscribed the Treaty, at Veruins, the second of May. 1598.

He that desires peace cannot buy it at to deere a rate, no though he pay as much as King Antigonus did vnto the Romans. The King of Spaine, who desired a peace at what rate soeuer, found no condition in this treaty of Veruins, that might dissuade him from ratifying it: although his counsel held the restitution of townes, so happily taken, and so hard to recouer, dishonourable and preiudiciall. He prest to haue it sworne and executed, witnessing the contentment hee receiued in his soule, for the good which Christendome should receiue by the concord of these two crownes. The Archduke, who did second his desire sent Deputies to assist at the French Kings oth, the Duke of Ascot, the Cont Aremberg, the Admirall of Arragon, and Lewis de Velasco, being followed by 400. Gentlemen, Spaniards, Italians, Bourguignons and Flemings. The Cont Saint Paul, receiued them vpon the frontiers. The Ambassadors to sweare the peace, & hostages for the restitution of the places. They arrive the 18 of Iun.

The Constable feasted them at Amiens, and pacified some quarreles growne among them for place. The Marshall of Biron, with a great and goodly troupe of Noblemen and Gentlemen, appointed by the King, receiued them a quarter of a league without Saint Denis gate, conducting them vnto their lodgings which were prepared in Saint Anthons quarter. The next day they went vnto the Louvre, with all their traine, in rich and stately equipage, to kisse the Kings hands: who receiued them graciously, giuing an attentue care vnto the discourse which Richardot made vpon the merit of this action, and the common profit and necessity of a peace, the which, he said, was to be preferred before a iust war, and all hope of prosperity. The King answered, That he had desired peace, not for that he was tyred with the discommodities of war, but to giue all Christendome meanes to breathe: That his armes fell out of his hands, when as they represented vnto him the teares which fell from the Popes eyes, for their reconciliation which might greatly aduance the quiet of the Church of God: That he should neuer be taxed to be ill affected to the preservation of the peace: as he neuer wanted zeale, nor iustice to seeke it, hauing alwaies preferred it before the vndoubted assurance of all the good successe, which the happinesse of his armes, and must neuer, for the hope of any fauourable successe, refuse a good peace, and ground the expectation of the euent, vpon the apparence of present things.

The most sollempne forme of a treaty is, the oath which binds them that treat. It was not sufficient, that the Princes had signed it, and engaged their faithfull promises to maintain it: they would make the God of heauen the Iudge and witnes of their intentions, ingaging their faith in the hands of his Iustice, for an assurance of their promises. And therefore the King did sweare the obseruation of the peace, in our Ladies church at Paris, in the presence of the King of Spaines Ambassadors. The Arch-duke did sweare it in the name of the King of Spaine, in the great church at Bruxels, in the presence of the Marshall of Biron, Belieue and Brulart, Counselors to the King and his Ambassadors. The Duke of Sauoy did also sweare it at Chambery, in the presence of Guadignes, Lord of Boutheon, Knight of both Orders. The Oath was ministred in this manner: Vve promise vpon our faith and honor, and in the word of a King, and sweare vpon the crosse, the holy Euangill, and the Cannon of the Masse, for that which concerns vs: That we will obserue and accomplish fully, really, and faithfully, all and euery point and article contained in the treaty of peace, reconciliation and amitie made, concluded, and determined at Veruins, the second day of May last past, &c. and wil cause all to be obserued, maintained and kept inuolubly on our part, without any breach, or suffering it to be broken, in any sort or manner whatsoever. In witnessse whereof we haue signed these presents with our owne hands, &c.

The King would haue the sincerity of his intention knowne to all the world, and Paris a witnessse of the oath he should take, to obserue the peace as religiously, as he had made war iustly. The ceremony was performed in our Ladies church at Paris, with great pompe: Monsieur de Villeroy did read the Articles of the peace. The King did sweare the obseruation thereof, signed the Act, and embraced the Ambassadors of the King of Spaine, wishing his Brother a long life, that he might long enjoy the fruites of this peace. This ceremony was ended with great ioy and acclamations of the people. From thence the King went to dine at the Bishops pallace, where he feasted the Ambassadors, the Duke Montpensier supplying the place of Lord Steward. The feast was royall and magnificent, and all things were answerable to so great a Ceremony. That ancient custome of drinking to the health of Princes, which came from that of the Greekes, who offered to euery one of their gods a glasse of wine, and since hath beene vsed, to shew our deuoted affection to great personages, was not forgotten. The King dranke twice to the health of the King of Spaine. This ioy was continued at night at the Louvre, in dancing, and the daies following in feasting at diuers great mens houses, by the Kings command.

All this did not hinder the execution of the Treaty, neither did the Deputies forget the interest of priuate persons. The Spaniards intreated the King for the returne of some that were absent, especially for the Duke of Aumale. The King answered them, that if they restored vnto Antonio Perez his children and goods, he would giue the Duke of Aumale contentment, whereby he should enjoy the fruites of the peace. The Spaniards replied, that

Perez,

The Kings answer.

The King of Spaine did signe and sweare the peace the 12. of Iuly 1598. His Ioune did not signe it, till the treaty of Sauoy 1601. The forme of the oath.

1598. Perez, who was then out of Spaine, for matters concerning the Inquisition, might not be equalled with the Duke of Aumale, who was absent but by reason of the troubles. Every one was content, either with that which was done, or with that which reason did not allow to be done.

After that the Ambassadors of Spaine had obtained what they desired for the execution of the peace, and admired the Kings houses, and the wonders of Paris, they returned with a remembrance of his Maiesties bountie, who gaue them iewels and cupbords of plate. There remained foure principall men as hostages, for assurance of the restitution of the Townes, as it was concluded by the Treatie. All should be performed by the second of August: they began by the townes of Picardie so faithfully, as the King (without expecting the full satisfaction of the Treaty) sent backe the hostages, relying onely vpon their word.

It was also concluded by the Treatie, that the Arch-duke (who had approued the peace in the name of the King of Spaine) should also sweare the obseruation thereof in the same name, and in the presence of such as it should please the King to send: His Maiesty would not employ any other then such as had serued him so worthily in the conclusion thereof, as Belieure and Brulart, two of the chiefe of his Councell, and him whose valour in the recouerie of Amiens, had much aduanced the end of this warre. This honour was accompanied with another, that was greater and more durable vpon the chiefe of this Ambassage. The King doth neuer forget to recompence great and generous actions, he would haue the Marshall Biron as well a president of his fauours, as of the loyalty of his seruice: And therefore he erected his Barony of Biron into a Duchie, and made him Peere of France. He was receiued in the Parliament, with a generall applause and testimony of all the assistants, that these honours, although they were great, did not equall the greatnesse of his merits. Hee made a sollemne feast for this new dignity. The King went from Saint Germaine to honor him with his presence: witnessing that this was not the end nor period of the honours, wherewith he would reward the perseverance of his seruices, and the constancy of his affection. At that time there was nothing in him that was lesse to bee admired then imitated. Slander could not cause any corruption in a body inspired with the life of honour and valour (as flies breed not wormes but in dead bodies) and he that had spoken ill of him, should haue gotten no credit. He had not yet receiued that pestilent infection which corrupted his blood, and deprived him of all iudgement. Reprehension had no power ouer him, but when as he spake vnreuerently of the King. One of his friends was then the Oracle of his fortune, who told him plainly, that if he did not forbear his licentious speech, he would repent it. What can they do, answered he? The other replied: That which you feare not. And pressing him to speake more plainly, his friend (knowing that Princes are very apprehensue and sensible; and that the offences which they dissemble most, they pardon least) said vnto him halfe in choler, and halfe in iest, that the King would cut off his head. This threate was so vnlikely, as he made a iest of it. The bad intentions which beganne to seaze vpon his soule in this Ambassage of Flanders, haue verified the prediction. Nothing could make him vnhappy, but the excesse of his happinesse, which deprived him of all gouernement and modestie. If he had bene lesse fortunate, he had bin more wise. It was no strange thing, to make the sonne of the Marshall Biron, Marshall of France. An ancient house might well be honored with the title of a Duchie. A great Captaine, who had so great a share in the restauration of France, deserued the honour and title of a Peere: but this was to recompence him in the midst of his course, for all that he might expect at the end of his carriere.

The first seruice the Duke of Biron did after this new dignity, was the voyage of Flanders. He made his assembly at Peronne, from whence he went to lye at Cambray. In the mid-way, the Earle of Sore, Lieutenant generall of that country, met him, who (after he had saluted him with a long and respectiue discourse) told him, that he had commandement from his master to do him seruice in that voyage, and to accompany him vnto Bruxelles. They of Cambray feasted him in their town-house. He had the like entertainment at Valenciennes and at Mons: Being arriued at our Lady of Halle, three leagues from Bruxels, he found a Steward of the Arch-dukes, and fifty of his gard to attend him. The next day (which was the fift after his departure) he was met vpon the way to Bruxelles, by the Earle Deputies sent from the king to the Arch-duke to take his oath.

A feast made at Paris by the D. of Biron, 28. June.

A of Mansfield, the Duke of Aumale, and the Prince of Orange, with about two hundred horse, in the Arch-dukes name, and so conducted through the city vnto his lodging. Hee rested the Friday, and the next day he went to haue audience of the Arch-duke. He was accompanied by Count Mansfield: Belieure by the Duke of Aumale, and Brulart with the Prince of Orange. Thus they entred into the Arch-dukes chamber, whom they found alone without any one but the Bishop of Antwerp, and the President Richardot. The Duke of Biron began the discourse, and Belieure continued it halfe an houre after. On the Sunday following, the Duke of Biron went to the Cathedrall Church, the Arch-duke hauing sent him twenty Carosses for himselfe and his traine: There did the Arch-duke sollemnly sweare the obseruation of the peace in the name of the King of Spaine: from thence the Duke of Biron went on horse-backe to the Arch-dukes pallace, where he dined. At the Arch-dukes table sat the Duke of Biron, Belieure, Brulart, the Count Mansfield, the Duke of Aumale, the Prince of Orange, and the Bishop of Antwerp. At another table were some twentie French Gentlemen, chosen by the Duke of Biron, and eight or ten Spaniards and Wallons. After dinner the Arch-duke caused them to see a gallery full of goodly pictures of the countrie, and from thence he led them into the parke, in the midst whereof is the house whereas the Emperour Charles the fift retired himselfe, when as he resigned his Empire and other Estates. The next day the Earle of Mansfield inuited the Duke of Biron with some dozen of French Gentlemen to dinner: after dinner they put themselves in a round, euery one with a glasse full of wine in his hand, and in this order the Earle said: Seeing wee haue begun our follies in wine, it is fit wee should leaue them there: and so hee spilt the wine, and brake his glasse; the which was imitated by all the rest.

So after some daies spent in feasting, the Arch-duke hauing presented the Duke of Biron with two faire horses, gold, plate, a rich iewell, and a rapier, with girdle and hangers set with precious stones, (all which were esteemed at ten thousand crownes) hauing also giuen to Belieure and Brulart rich suites of tapistrie, and chaines of gold, and to euery one of the French Gentlemen, a rapier blade, and a paire of Spanish gloues, they returned home very well satisfied. But the Duke of Biron did not so much respect what was giuen him, as the esteeme they made of his valour, if he wold employ it for the King of Spaines seruice. Picote did first infect him with this poison, which caused a feuer, and proued incurable, (but by that shamefull effusion of his blood) whereof the King was presently aduertised by a true-hearted Frenchman, who remained at that time in the Arch-dukes Court. The Duke of Sauoy, who enjoyed the same benefit of the peace, was bound to the obseruation thereof by the like forme.

The King sent to Monsieur de la Guiche Gouvernor of Lions, that he wold willingly haue giuen him that charge, but that he feared his absence might some-what preiudice the good of his affaires, and his indisposition not suffer him to performe the voyage. Hee therefore commanded Guadagnes Seneshall of Lion, and Knight of both Orders, to vndertake this charge. The oath was taken in the Friars Church of Chambery, on Sunday the second of August, where the Duke was assisted with all his Knights of the Anunciado: and to witnesse the content which he had of this peace and reconciliation with his Maiesty, hee said vnto Guadagnes, that he held this day the happiest of all the daies of his life, and that all which remained, should be to maintaine and honour the memory thereof. That it were not onely an indiscretion, but a blindness and a madness for him to change the felicities of peace, for the miseries of warre. The Duke gaue vnto Guadagnes, and to the chiefe Gentlemen of his traine, iewels, horses, chaines of gold, and to all, so many good words, as there was not any one but did wish him more profit by this peace then he reaped. He refused not any thing that was demanded of him in the execution of the Treaty, for the deliuerie and ransom of prisoners, but onely the liberty of the Admirall Chastillons wife. He made answer to the instance which Guadagnes made in the Kings name, That the respect he bare vnto his Maiesties commandements, was so great, as to please him he would restore her goods, and giue her some more liberty, whilest that he might giue his Maiesty to vnderstand the iust causes of her restraint.

That whatsoever had bene decreed at Rome, for her absolution, was rather in fauour of his Maiesty, then for any reason, for that hee was seazed vpon bookes and writings that were 1598. were execrable and damnable. The afflictions of this Lady did moue the hearts of the chiefe Officers of this Crowne, and of many great Noblemen of the Realme, her kinsmen and allies. The King had commiseration of her: for her misfortunes, her imprisonment, losses, and disgraces deserued pitty. She was so transported with the good successe of the Kings affaires, that although she were among her enemies, yet the fire of her desires could neither be smothered vnder the ashes of affliction, nor vnder the fume of dissimulation. If she could haue done that whereof they accused her, she would haue made as soden alterations on the earth, as Henry King of Sweden did in the aire, and as admirable: as her will was absolute to desire that the King might overcome his enemies, and haue satisfaction for Nice and Salusses. Vpon the hope that this peace should giue her some content, and that the Kings commendation by his Ambassador should giue some truce to her miseries, she wrote a letter of the pittifull course of her misfortunes, whereby appeared the excellencie of her spirit, in these words: Although (saith shee) the comparison bee as different as betwixt an Elephant and a Gnat, yet are they both vegetatiue and sensitiue creatures. My fortune, and that of my house, hath alwaies followed that of France and the Kings: for as since his marriage, I haue alwaies seene my Estate declining, euen vnto the period of a total ruine, by the ill successe of his affaires: so now when as God hath powred his blessings vpon him, that he hath reuenged him of his enemies, euen by his enemies, and that against the conspiracies of the wicked, and the iudgement of the good, he doth enioy his inheritance, I will hope there shall be some change in my condition. I desire it may be good: but if it prove otherwise, I will not alter my resolution, to receiue both good and euill as from the hand of God. I haue this aduantage ouer fortune, that hereafter her iniuries how violent and soden soeuer, shall not be strange vnto me. I am inured to my afflictions, as a galley-slave to his oare. Necessity teacheth me to suffer constantly, and custome makes my sufferance easie. The King also gaue Guadagnas charge, to let the Duke vnderstand, that he had receiued three feuerall complaints from the city of Geneva, how that his troupes which he intertained thereabouts, vsed insupportable hostilities, tooke prisoners, chopt and changed them, and that his Maiestie desired the towne might reape the fruite and safety which the common good of the peace did promise them, and that the Dukes troupes might be retired, to the end all iualousie and distrust might cease. The Duke would not anwer hereunto by writing, lest (saith he) he should preiudice the pretensions which hee had to that towne, for aboue foure hundred yeares: saying onely, that he did not thinke it had bin comprised in the Treaty of peace, for that all other townes and Prouinces had bene particularly named, and not that of Geneva. That he could not free his neighbors from feare and distrust, but in retiring his troupes that were about the towne, to refresh them in Lombardy, he should take away the cause, hauing no intention to prefer war before the happiness of peace. He therefore commaunded D. Iuan de Mendoza a Spaniard, to draw his regiment, which consisted of 1200. men, out of the territories of Geneva, and to passe to Milan.

A peace being proclaimed in France, the King applies his thoughts to reforme all disorders, and to administer Iustice to all his subiects: and for the better assurance of the publicke tranquillity, he did as his predecessors had done in the like occasions: prohibiting, by the aduice of his Princes, Officers of his Crowne, and Lords of his Councell, the carriage and vse of Harguebuzes, Petronels, Pistols, and other weapons, which carried fire, vpon confiscation of Armes and horse, and two hundred Crownes fine for the first offence, and to be kept in prison vntill the money were payed: and for the second, losse of goods and life, without hope of remission. Allowing all men to stay and arrest all such as should carry such prohibited armes eight daies after the publication of the Edict. None were excepted, but the foure hundred Archers, and the foure Companies of horse, of the gards of his Maiesties person, when as they waited in quarter, the Archers of the Prouost of his household, of the Constable and Marshals of France, and they of the company of Light-horse belonging to the D. of Vendosme, who by the Edict might carry pistols when as they were in seruice. And to free his subiects from the oppression of soldiers, and to accustom them to obedience, to whom it is troublesome in the securest peace, he cut off the companies, as well of horse, as of the regiments of foot: but this restraint was onely that which they might well forbear. It is dangerous to leaue an Estate long without arms. A disarmed peace

The Dukes pretensions.

After the peace in the year 1550, and in the year 1569, the carrying of armes for- bidde the 4. of August 1578. published in the Court of Paris.

A peace is weake. The King therefore reserved the places vpon the frontiers, which remained still fortified with ordinarie gards. The gards appointed for Gouvernors and Lieutenants generall of Prouinces were suspended, and the companies of men at armes were reduced to a lesser number. Such whole spirits could not liue in the cessation of armes, and which were good Captaines, in the time of warre (like vnto Marins) but ill Citizens in peace, had leaue to go seeke the exercise thereof in Flanders and Hongary.

Peace doth change the exercise of Warre into hunting: the King made it his daily exercise. Being one day hunting in the great Forest of Fontainebleau, there was heard about halfe a league off, a great cry of hounds, and the winding of hornes, and sodenly all this noyse which seemed to be farre off, came (to his iudgement) within twenty paces of his eare. He commanded the Count Sorsons to set out, to see what it was, thinking that no man durst presume so boldly to interrupt his sports: the Earle aduancing, heard the noyse, yet could not discerne whence it came. A big blacke man presented himselfe in the thickest of the bushes, crying out, Do you vnderstand me, and then he sodenly vanished away. At those words, they which were discreet, thought it great indiscretion to stay longer there a hunting. The heard-men thereabouts say it is a spirit, which they call the great Hunter, who hunts in this Forest: others hold, that it is Saint Huberts chace, the which is also heard in other places.

Many Noblemen, and Gentlemen retired themselues now vnto their gouernements and priuate houses: the King hauing said long before, that he would force euery man to liue of his owne, and not to importune him any more. Neuer any Edict was better obserued then this speech, for euen then he resolved to employ the remainder of his reuenues in publike necessities, and not in the prodigalities of Vitellius, nor for the enriching of priuate men, saying, that he would ease the poore, and giue example vnto the rich to content themselves with little, and to liue accordingly. The Constable went to his gouernment of Languedoc, hauing obtained of the King a reuerfion of his gouernment for Henry of Montmorency his sonne. The King in his wisdome, thought he could not sufficiently grace a house which hath brought forth so many Gouvernours, Admirals, Marshals, and Constables: and which vnder the name of Montmorency comprehends that of Horne and Laudal, which hath giuen viues to Kings of France and Dukes of Brittany. The Letters patents were read and registred in the Court of Aydes, at Montpellier, the Duke of Vantadour being President, and the Bishop of Agde and Nismes assisting.

The order which the King did settle for the affaires of his house, was a president to all France, shewing the religious desire which he had to see his subiects enioy the fruites thereof. His iustice would not suffer them to be charged and surcharged with impossible duties, seeing that the violence of the war had left them nothing but their tongues to complaine, being like vnto a skinned man laid vpon a dead mans bones. Yet notwithstanding they were forced to pay the publicke charges for the fruites which they had not gathered. And therefore the King did vnto his subiects, as Constantine and Theodosius did vnto them of the Empire, by a generall discharge of the remainder of their Taxe and Tributes. He also sent, according to the resolution of the Estates held at Roan, many great personages, aswell of his Councell as of other companies, to examine the necessities of his people, to order the Taxes and Tributes, and to protect the weake from the oppression and violence of such as during the ciuill warres had seene no light of iustice, but through the flame of harguebuzes: hauing so abused the time as to enioy the priuiledge of Nobles, they would be so esteemed rather by their shew, then by the vse and seruice of the sword: and when as the Lawe (which doth chiefly bind Noblemen by reason of their tenures and titles of Nobility, to the duties of armes) hath coniuired them to succor the necessities of their Prince and countrie, they haue thrust themselues among the people, liuing idly in townes, or in the delights of their houses, so long as fire and danger was in field. Men vnworthy of the name of men, of Gentlemen, and of Frenchmen. The Commissioners forced these kind of gallants to pay, who by pretended letters of their Gentry, and abuse of the Priuiledges, had laid their Taxes vpon the people.

1598. beleech his Maieſty to reforme the diſorders of the Church. Which ſpeech was delivered A with great reuerence before his Maieſtie, by the reuerent Francis de la Gueſle Arch-biſhop of Tours, accompanied with many of the ſaid Deputies of the Clergie. The Summe whereof was:

“ That it would pleaſe his Maieſty, that the holy Councell of Trent might be receiued and published in France, with ſuch neceſſary qualifications as concerne the French liberties, the Immunities of Churches, and the priuiledges of Parlements.

“ That his Maieſty would not charge his conſcience with the nomination vnto Biſhop-pricks, Abbeyes, and other Benefices hauing charge of ſoules: for that he ſhould one day giue an accompt of the ſoules that periſhed for want of inſtruction, and for want of adminiſtration of the word and Sacraments.

“ That Clergi-men may be ſuffered to enioy their liuings quietly without charge, but only to do their duties in the ſeruiſe of God and the Church.

“ That Churches may not be prophaned, nor the Incumbents houſes ſuffered to go to ruine, but to be well and duly maintained, to the end they may not pretend any iuſt cauſe of non-refidence: and to ſeparate them from the common and licentious conuerſing with the people, for the auoiding of ſcandals which do often follow.

“ That all reuerſions of Benefices may be taken away, as well for that it is againſt the Canon law, and the holy Conſtitutions of Councils, as alſo for that it is a cauſe to ſhorten the liues of the Incumbents.

“ That the Contracts before-time paſſed betwixt their Maieſties and the Clergy, may be confirmed without breach, or ſuppoſition, for the ſubſidy granted vnto his M. by the Clergy.

“ That it would alſo pleaſe his Maieſty to prouide them conuenient remedies vpon the complaints which they had preſented vnto him.

The King with the reſpect which his predeceſſors haue alwaies borne to the firſt of the three Orders of his Realme, thinking that the honour which is done vnto the Clergie, hath a reference vnto God, and that Biſhops, although they be his vaſſals and ſubiects, are no leſſe then the Miniſters and Ambaſſadors of the liuing God, and Interpreters of his holy will, he anſwers them in this manner.

The King ſaith: I confeſſe that what you haue ſaid is true, but I am not the author of theſe innouations: theſe miſchiefs were brought in before my comming. During the Warres I haue runne to the greateſt fire to quench it: I will now do what is needfull in time of peace. I know that Religion and Iuſtice be the foundations and pillars of this Eſtate, the which is maintained by piety and iuſtice. But if they were not, I would plant them by little and little, as I do all things. With the helpe of God I will ſettle the Church in as good Eſtate as it was an hundred yeares ſince, as well for the diſcharge of my conſcience, as for your content: but Paris was not all built in one day. Let the people be as much perſwaded by your good examples to do well, as they haue bin heretofore diſſwaded. You haue exhorted me of my duty. I do admoniſh you of yours: let vs all do good. Go you one way, and I will go another: if we meet, we ſhall ſoone haue done. My predeceſſors haue giuen you Words, but I with my gray haire will giue you Deeds. I am all gray without, but I am al of gold within. I will write vnto my Councell to ſee your complaints, and will prouide for you as fauorably as I may.

The Ieſuites ſeek to be reſtored. During theſe admonitions of the Clergy, the Cardinall of Florence moued the King for the reſtitution of the Ieſuites. The 7. Article of the Treaty of peace at Veruins did ſuffer the Subiects and ſeruants of either ſide, as well Clergi-men as Lay, to returne and enioy their Offices, Benefices, and Reuenues, obtaining permiſſion and letters patents vnder the broad ſeale from the Prince. Many thought that the Ieſuites ſhould be comprehended in this Article, and that if by this peace the Spaniards were held Allies, and as it were Couſin germaines to the French, thoſe whom the Kings Aduocate had the yeare before in open Parlements tearmed Emiſſaires to the King of Spaine, ſhould now returne to their Colledges, from whence they had beene expelled by a ſentence giuen in December, in the yeare 1594. But the light of peace ſhines not vpon them. The new world which it doth produce, hauing caſt the cinders of Warre, Rancor and Reuenge into the aire, allowes them no retreat within A within the Iuriſdiction of Paris. The decrees which had baniſhed them, are grauen in Marble, the Water of Prayers, Fauors and Teares, although it pierceſt ſtones, preuailes nothing. Their enemies had taxed them with the making of certaine writings which offended the Court, whoſe authority is alwaies wronged in the offences which concerne the Princes honor. This made them reuiue the firſt reſtraints not to ſend any youth to the Schooles of their Order, as to Tournon, to Pont-au-Mouſſon, and other places, both within and without the Realme, and to declare, that ſuch as ſhould be inſtructed and taught in their Colledges, ſince the Decree made the 29. of December, 1594. ſhould not enioy the priuiledges of Vniuerſities, as incapable of the degrees thereof: Neither might they by vertue of any Degrees obtained, teach publiſhly, nor be aduanced to any Offices or Benefices, ſit for Graduates, nor receiued Aduocates in any Courts or Seates of Iuſtice. The Court had giuen B commandement to the Earle of Tournon to expell them his country, vpon a great penalte contained in the Decree, and for that he had not performed it, his goods and Iuriſdiction were put into the Kings hands, and his Office of Senefhall of Auvergne declared void. But although the Parlement of Paris may tearme it ſelfe the only Parlement of France and the Court of Peeres: that it is the fountaine, and the reſt but little riuers, yet her Decrees preſcribe no lawes to other Parlements: That of Tholouſa prohibited the Earle of Tournon to obey that of Paris. The Ieſuits are yet there, their Colledges are frequented, their returne augmented the number. The Kings Aduocate pleading vpon this ſubiect, ſaid they were the authors of ſome execrable Pamphlets which he named not. It was a booke printed in Flanders, for the apology of a miſerable Parricide, a prodigious Affaſſine, and a wicked Martyr, written with a pen of ſteele, and with inke of blood. Some ſay, the Author hath aduowed it, and iuſtified the Ieſuits. When they ſaw that this new ſtorme began to threaten them in the calm of publike tranquility, and that they had obtained letters from the Parlement of Bourdeaux, to chaſe them out of all Guienne, they had recourſe to the Kings Iuſtice, there is nothing that doth more aduance the greatnes of the Soueraign, nor act of greater reuerence, then to demand Iuſtice. Many things may be obtained from others, onely Iuſtice comes from the Prince. One equall may do good to another, but the Soueraigne onely can do iuſtice: wherefore in demanding iuſtice by their petition, they ſaid it was a right due vnto them; yea, were they the moſt guilty men in the world, it ſhould be granted them ſomuch the more freely, for that their Iuſtification concerned the good and reputation of the realme. Since that time they haue bin incountried both in verſe and proſe, and they haue defended themſelues learnedly. The more they fought to make them ſeem vnworthy of their returne, the more they defended the iuſtice and neceſſity of their re-eſtabliſhment. Ieſuites make a petition to the King.

At the ſame time was concluded the marriage of Madam Catherine Princeſſe of France and of Nauarre, the Kings onely ſiſter, with the Marquis of Pont, Duke of Bar, and Prince of Lorraine, after many iourneys made by the ſaid Prince vnto the moſt Chriſtian King: in which accord there were great difficulties, as well by reaſon of the diuerſity of Religion (the ſaid Princeſſe reſuſing to leaue the reformed, wherein ſhe had beene bred) as alſo for that ſhe could not be perſwaded to go out of France. She had beene formerly ſought by many great Princes, to whom ſhe would not conſent, for the one or the other of theſe two cauſes, and ſometimes for both together. Francis Monſieur Duke of Alançon deſired her in the yeare 1582. but the difficulty was then greater for matters of Religion. And before that, King Henry the 3. comming out of Poland did affect her: and it is thought, that if hee had ſcene her at Lions at his returne, he would haue married her: but Katherine de Medicis the Queen-mother deſcribed her to be a dwarfe (the which was moſt falſe) for ſhee was of a meane ſtature, and of a good countenance. It is true, ſhe had one legge ſomewhat ſhorter then another (which is a marke of the houſe of Albret: for ſo had Alain Lord of Albret, Father to King John, great Grand-father to the ſaid Princeſſe Katherine.) The Queen-mother did this good turne for her God-daughter, ſeeking to diſgrace the King of Nauarre, whom ſhe hated from his youth, vpon an imagination, being told by an Italian Sooth-fayer, that he ſhould ſucceed her children. Then the Duke of Lorraine (who ſince was her father-in-law) ſought her. The Prince of Condy loued her. The King of Spaine ſent to ſee her, in the yeare 1580. promiſing great aduancement to the King of Nauarre.

1599. being well instructed in the Latin tongue: and she did the more apprehend this Latine A verbe, for that some had given it forth, she would neuer be married.

According vnto that which the said Lady had promised, to suffer her selfe to bee instructed in the Catholike religion, it was resolu'd by his Maiestie, that there should be a conference bewixt some Catholike Doctours, and some Ministers of the reformed Religion, in the presence of his Sister, but they preuailed nothing for her conuersion. The King foreseeing some inconueniences, resolu'd (as well to satisfie her conscience, as to auoid scandal) to haue this instruction deferred vntill another time. And in the meane time they should proceed in the marriage. Hereupon there were some practises by the Ministers of the pretended reformed Religion, who would haue the honor (said they) that the Kings only sister B should be married by them: and that the Prince of Lorraine should seeke his spouse where she was, and that it was not conuenient she should seeke him in his Church. In truth this was plausible, and it seemed the Lady had a great interest in it. But the Prince on the other side, protested neuer to be married by a Minister: so as there was much arguing in what forme they should be married. But the King, by his accustomed wisdom, shewed the effect of his authority.

The thirtieth day of January being Sunday, in the morning, the King hauing aduertised his sister ouer night of his intention, and intreated the said Prince of Lorraine to be ready, he goes and takes his Sister at her rising, and conducts her by the hand into his Cabinet, where her future spouse was already. He commanded the worthy and reuerent Arch-bishop C of Roan his naturall brother, to marry the said Marquis, Prince, and Duke, with the sayd Princeesse and Duchesse his Sister, by words of the present. Whereunto the said Arch-bishop at the first made some refusal, saying: That the accustomed solemnities must be therein obser- ued. Whereunto he replied most learnedly: That his presence was more then all other sole- mnities, and that his Cabinet was a sacred place. And therefore hauing commanded the sayd Arch-bishop to go on, notwithstanding all difficulties, he proceeded then to the nuptiall blessing of the said parties present, that were there conioyned in marriage, euen as if they had bene in the greatest Church in Paris, which done, euery one went to his deuotion.

Afterwards the King commanded his sister to attire her selfe like a Bride: and so the feast D was solemnly celebrated. All the great Officers did assist and serue there in their degrees, with all the grace and honor the King could deuise to giue vnto the Prince of Lorraine his brother-in-law. This marriage was honored with all kinds of sports and dancing. About the end of February, the said Princeesse went with her husband into Lorraine, whereas the Duke gaue her the greatest entertainment he could deuise, embracing her as his own child. There had bene great heart-burning and discontentment, by reason of the diuersity of Religion.
 The Kings intentions were, to drowne the remembrance of the bitterness of fore-passed raignes, in the mildnes of his gouernment, and that the common feeling of so many miseries which they had suffered, and which had continued, should perswade them to grow familiar and friendly together, and to haue no more occasion to remember things past, then E his Maiesty had meaning to remember his owne wrongs. Warre is not dead in an Estate where as Consciences are diuided: it doth but sleepe, a small matter awakens it: there is nothing more apprehensue, or that doth pierce more violently into the perswasion of men, to bandy them one against another, then Religion. Euery man thinks his owne the better, and so iudgeth of it, more by his owne zeale and passion, then through knowledge and reason. The King, during the warre, had runne to those things which did most presse him, and to the dangers that did most import: he had deferred to reconcile this diuision, being grie-ued in his soule that the impiety of the Warre would not suffer him to make shew of the fruites of his pietie.

They of the reformed Religion, made many and great complaints, that the Kings Edicts F were not obserued nor kept: that they were not prouided of all things necessary for the exercise of their Religion, the Libertie of their Consciences, and the safetie of their persons and fortunes. They said moreouer, that they desired not that the order of gouernement of State should be changed to their profit, or of any forraine Prince: nor to haue the State torne in peeces, to please the ambition of some few men, but onely to enioy their Con-sciences

Complaints
 of them of the Religion.

A sciences with peace, and their liues in safety. That so many iust requests granted vnto them by the Edicts of Kings, predecessors to his Maiesty, demanded and defended by himselfe, with to great zeale and vertue, had not bene hearkened vnto vnder his raigne, when and vnder whom they should best hope: and had it not bene for the affection which they had vnto his Greatnesse, and the foundation which they laid on his good will towards them, they might lawfully and profitably haue practised the waies which they were forced to hold vnder Kings his predecessors. But they could not despaire any thing of him, whom God by the protection of his Church had brought vnto the succession of the Crowne, nor obtaine lesse then Libertie and Life, hauing spent their bloods so freely for him. They complained, that Preaching was banished from his Maiesties Court, to banish them consequently from his house, where they could not serue him without seruing of God. No good man might remaine there, but he was daily in danger of murdering, or to be hurt, without hope of comfort, or assurance of grace. That they practise daily to exclude them of the Religion from all charges and Offices in the State, Iustice, Treasurie and Pollicie, which they did neuer greatly affect, as his Maiesty can best witnesse. They beseech him to iudge, if it bee reasonable they should do wrong vnto their children, to depriue them by their dulnesse, to be Exclusion from publike charges shame

 ligion, both in his army, and in his Court, allowed the Ministry at his owne charge, and gaue them a towne of retreate in euery Bayliuicke.

His Maiesties good seruants knew not what to answer to these generall complaints, knowing that it is more troublesome to be depriued of that which is promised and allowed, then of things but hoped for, which makes troubled minds to passe from the hope of good, to the expectation of ill, from long and fruitles patience to seek for remedy: They knew well his M. was not without alarm: that he would take no delight to see a Protector, and would be iealous they should addresse themselves to any other but himselfe. This petition ended with bolder speeches then were fit for an obedient Estate, and for men which will seem moderate and staid, who desire nothing but what shall please the Prince, and who should refferre all their wils to his discretion. We cannot speake too humbly, too reuerently, to Kings. We must vse words of silk, as Parisatis said: Sir, will you take from them all desire to haue a Protector, free them of the necessity, be then one to them your self, continue ouer them this first care, this first affection; preuent their supplications by a full motion, their iust demands by a voluntary grant of necessary things: when they should see you haue care ouer them, they will not haue it of themselves. But pardon him that should tell you, that they all doubt whether you haue enough of your selfe. You know what hurts them, and what helps them: the petitions you presented for them to Kings your predecessors, for their liberties and safeties, take them now to your selfe. Doubles since that time they haue left nothing of their do-E etine, they haue done you great seruices, and should haue purchast an increase in your authority, who may both report and fully satisfie their iust demands, and without any Deputies, and with more thanks, if you please, be both Iudge and Aduocate.

Such were the discourses wherwith the King was daily importuned. The disposition of men and aboute all of men of that sort, of French-men of that Religion, is to haue actiue spirits the which are hardly stayed: To day a complaint, to morrow a petition, after that a Synod.
 This publike agitation profits them: they assemble, and dissolue not their assembly before they know where they shall assemble againe.

The end of all these assemblies, was to obtain an Edict from the King, so cleare and plain, concerning all their necessities, as they should not be constrained to lue for any other: as they did not cease vntill the King had signed it, being at Nantes, after that hee had reduced that Prouince vnto his obedience, containing a Declaration of the Edicts of Pacification, of the troubles growne in France for matter of Religion: the which was not allowed in the Court of Parliament at Paris, vntill the 25. of February this yeare 99. by reason of many oppositions and difficulties that were made. At Saint Germaine in Lay, Berthier, one of the Agents for the Clergie, made many petitions vnto his Maiesty: and did greatly

The last Edict for Religion at Nantes in April 1598.

1599. importune the Lords of the Councell to consider of it. In like sort, the Bishop of Modena, A who was then the Popes Nuncio in France, dealt in it, beseeching the King so to deale for his subiects that were gone astray, as the honour of God might remaine whole, and the Church receiue no preiudice: In so doing, his Holinesse would endure all things for the peace of France.

Berthier demanded, that his Maiestie would not suffer the Ministers of the Reformed religion, to haue any other liberty on this side the riuer of Loire, but to liue quietly, and not to be sought after. That the Catholike Religion should be generally restored in all places, and Church-men do their Offices without any danger. And thirdly, that the Clergi-men should be wholly freed from the vexations which they had suffered vntill that day, in townes and places held by them of the Religion, where they had taken away their pensions and reuenues, and in some Prouinces had forced them. His Maiesty granted the second and third Article: and as for the first, the King not being able to make any such prohibition without some trouble it was let alone.

There was also great contention in particular, betwixt the said Berthier, and some of the Reformed religion, touching the assembly of their Synods: the which they would haue free, without demanding leaue from his Maiestie: maintaining that they might go freely into forraine countries, and assist at their Synods and other Acts: and in like sort receiue strangers into theirs, the which the Marshall of Bouillon had managed with some, who perhaps had not foreseene the danger: but Berthier contested it so vehemently against the Marshall in the Kings presence, as his reasons being heard, and the importance of the thing considered, that it was a means to continue their Leagues and Intelligences with strangers, to be ready to take armes at their pleasures, the which could not be but with the ruine of the State. The King hauing heard their contestations, and finding of what importance it was, he presently caused that article touching forrain Synods, to be razed: forbidding them expressely to go to any assemblies without his permission, vpon paine to be declared traitors.

The Rector for the Vniuersity of Paris, was also a sutor vnto his Maiesties Councell, that none of the Reformed Religion, nor their Schoole-masters and Tutors, might be admitted into any Colledges of the Vniuersity: but to be excluded from all priuiledges. Whereupon there was great debate, especially for the faculty of Physicke. But it was answered, that they should not be admitted to teach: And as for Humanity and professions of Faculties, they should be admitted as the rest. And although the difficulties were great, and the conditions in some cases more beneficiall then in the first Treaties of peace: yet the common quiet of all France, shaken and almost ruined with the tragicke violence of Schismes and Diuisions, hath made all to be held Necessary that was Iust, and Iust whatsoever was Profitable. Although it were to be wished, that there were but one exercise of Religion, for that in this Vnity consists all Truth. But seeing the restauration of the Church is the worke of God, as well as the building of it, we must be content with that which may bee, and leaue the triumph and conquests of soules, to his eternall Wisedome, who alone makes and frames the heart as he pleaseth, and giues the signe vnto so many soules that are gone astray, to make them enter into saluation, being impossible for man to impose any necessity to things which God hath left in liberty, as the conscience, the which should be as free in Estates as in our thoughts.

The Church hath alwaies detested Heresies, but they neuer employed the rigour of their iudgements, but against the Arch-Hereticks, and but when they had shewed themselves obstinate in their errors: their punishments were more shamefull then cruell, more medicinall then mortall, desiring rather to see their faces blush for shame, then red with blood. Neuer Prince well-advised, did put his subiects to death to force beleefe, destroyed his Prouinces by warre, to instruct their consciences by the sword, knowing well that Religion is an act of Vnion, of Concord, and of Instruction, and Warre is nothing but Sedition and Destruction. And those which in this world haue troubled both heauen and earth, to force their subiects consciences vnto one Religion, haue in the end bin constrained and forced, to suffer them to liue free and in rest, relieving and refusing the aduice of those bad Physicians, who applyed nothing but Antimony and Phlebotomy to all diseases.

By these reasons, the King (in whose person God hath done so many miracles, and poured forth

A forth a sea of blessings) seeing that the continuance of the warre had produced no other frutes but the ruine of Iustice and Piety, which bee the two vertues which doe canonize Princes, the two pillars vpon whose firmenesse great Clovis was assured of the continuance of this Estate, he doth now confirme the Edict of Pacification of the troubles for matters of Religion, and willes that which hee may, least hee should incur the note of such as seeke to correct things that are incorrigible, and shew that the sore is greater then the remedy, that some things haue taken such deepe roote, as they cannot bee pulled vp. Time, Truth and Reason haue proued, that this Edict, was most iust, most necessary, and most profitable. Yet the Court of Parliament could not allow of this fraternitie and communication of Offices: saying, That they should not bee transported with the ambition of Honours, but content themselves with the tranquility of conscience: that it is not convenient in one estate, to haue great offices executed by men of diuers Religions, beeing a thing vniust, to haue the New intreated, as well as the Ancient. They found a great difference betwixt this Edict and the Precedent, and refused to allow it. The King sent for the chiefe of them, and spake vnto them in this manner.

You see me in my Cabinet, where I come to speake vnto you, not attired in any Royall ornaments, nor with cloake or rapier, as my predecessors: nor as a Prince that comes from receiuing of Ambassadors: but apparrelled like a father of a familie in his dublet and hose, to speake familiarly to his children. That which I haue to say vnto you, is to desire you to confirme the Edict which I haue granted to them of the Religion. That which I haue done, is for the good of the peace. I haue made it without desire to settle it with in my Realme. You ought to obey mee, if there were no consideration but my qualitie, and the bond whereby all my subiects are tied vnto mee, and you especially of my Court of Parliament. I haue restored some to their houses from whence they were expelled: and others to their credit, which was lost.

If obedience was due to my Predecessors, there is as much or more deuotion due vnto me, who haue setled the State. God hath made choise of me, to put me in possession of the Realme, which is mine owne, both by succession and acquisition. The Iudges of my Parliament should not sit in their seates but for mee. I will not bragge, but I dare boldly say, that I haue no example to imitate, but my selfe. I know there haue beene factions in the Parliament: that they haue stirred vp seditious Preachers. But I will take good order for such people, and will not attend your pleasures. In former times they haue punished them with great seuerity, that haue preached lesse seditiously then they doe now. It is the course they rooke to make the barricadoes, and by degrees to murder the deceased King. I will cut vp all these factions by the rootes: and will shorten all them that shall nourish them. I haue leaped ouer towne-walles, I will easily passe ouer barricadoes. They should not obiect vnto mee the Catholike Religion, nor the respect of the Holy Sea. I know the duetie which I owe, the one as the most Christian King, and the Honour of the name which I carry, and the other as the first sonne of the Church. Those which I thinke themselves to bee in good termes with the Pope, are deceiued. I am more then they. When I shall vndertake it, I will make you all to bee declared Heretikes for disobeying of mee.

The Maiesty of Kings is alwaies wronged by the contempt of their decrees: but the offence is alwaies greater, when it comes from them that should see them to bee obserued. Those which deny the execution of my Edicts, desire warre. I will proclaime it to morrow against the of them Religion: but I wil not make it my selfe, I wil send them: I haue made the Edict, I will haue it obserued, my will should serue for reason, the which is neuer demanded of the Prince in an obedient State. Their willes should bee put in execution, and not interpreted: And yet I say vnto you, that necessity and profit hath drawne mee vnto it. I haue done it by the aduice of all my counsell, who haue found it good and necessary for the Estate of my affaires, and the good of my seruice: to settle concord, and to disperse all the miseries which discord doth bring forth. Some haue complained, that I would make leaues of Suisses, or of other troopes. If I did, they must thinke it were to some good end, by reason of all my actions past. Witnesse that which I haue done for the recouery of Amiens, where I haue employed the money of the Edicts which you

the fault
of the Edict.

A sitie hath forced mee to make this Edict: by the same necessity I haue heretofore plaied the souldiar.

They haue talked at their pleasures, and I haue not seemed to regard it. I am now a King, and I speake as a King, I will be obeyed. There is not any one of you that finds me not good, when he hath need of me. And there is not any one but hath need once in the yeere, and yet you are bad to mee that am so good. If other Parliaments (for that they haue impugned my will) haue bene the cause that they of the Religion haue demaunded New things, I would not haue you the cause of other innouations, by your refusall. In the yeere 1594. and 95. when I sent vnto you a declaration vpon the Edict, for the prouision of Offices, I did then promise, that I would not aduance any one of the Religion, to Offices in the Court of Parliament. Since time hath altered the affaires, wee must accommodate our selues therevnto: and yet I will bee well assured of such as I shall aduance to those charges, that they shall gouerne themselves as they ought.

Take not so much of the Catholike Religion. To all these great criers, Catholikes and Ecclesiasticks, let me giue to one a thousand crownes a yeere in benefices, to another foure thousand Liuers of Rent, they will not speake a word more. I haue the same opinion of all others that shall speake against the Edict. There are some which hate the sinne for feare of punishment, but the good hate it for the loue of vertue. For Gods sake let mee know that you hate sinne for the loue of vertue, or else I will chastice them that hate it for feare of paine: and afterwards they will thanke me, as the sonne doth his father. The Preachers deliuer words in their Sermons, more to nourish, then to destroy sedition, yet no one of you saith any thing: these faults which concerne mee, are not regarded. But I will foresee that this thunder shall bring no storme, and that their predictions shall proue vaine. I will not vse their remedies, which beeing out of season, will but increase the euill. Consider that the Edict whereof I speake, is the deceased Kings Edict: it is also mine, for it was made with mee, and I doe now confirme it. I will say no more, but aduise you to imitate the example of the obedience of the Duke of Maine. Beeing perswaded to enter in some factions against my will, he answered that hee was too much bound vnto mee, and so were all my subiects, amongst the which hee would bee alwaies one that should expose his life to please mee, for that I had restored France in despite of them that sought to ruine it. And if he that was the head of the League, hath spoken in this manner, how much more ought you, whom I haue restored to the place from whence the League had expelled you, yeeld vnto my request, that which you would not doe for threats? You shall haue none of me: do that which I command you, or rather what I intreat you, you shall not doe it only for me, but for your selues, and for the good of the peace.

This speech was well vnderstood by the Parliament, and the difficulties which were found in the allowance of the Edict, were held tollerable, by reason of the Kings will, and the necessity of his affaires. Yet they continued fortie daies after, before they would resolue. The Duchesse of Barre, the Kings Sister, would not depart out of Paris, before it was confirmed. Shee had shewed her selfe burning in zeale and affection in that matter, as in all other affaires of that Nature: and it was not without reason, that after the Kings entrie into Paris, when as the Deputies of the Churches of Poitou beseeched his Maiestie for some thing depending vpon the execution of his Edicts: hee said vnto them, Adresse your selues vnto my Sister, your Estate is now fallen vnto the Distaffe. The Articles and Edict are as followeth.

Edict of Pacification.

HENRY by the grace of God &c. Amongst the Infinite blessings which it hath pleased God to bestow vpon vs, that is the most remarkable, to haue giuen vs vertue and 1599. A and courage not to yeeld to the fearefull troubles, confusions and disorders, which wee found at our comming to this Realme, the which was diuided into so many partes and factions, as the most lawfull seemed to bee the least; and to haue so fortified vs against this storme, as in the end wee haue surmounted it, and doe now touch the gate of this Estates rest: whereof the onely glorie belongs to him, and to vs the bond and thanks, that hee would vse our labour to finish this good worke: wherein it hath bene visible to all men, whether wee haue done that, which was our ducie, and in our power, yea somewhat more, the which it may bee in another season had not bene so fit for the dignity which wee hold, hauing not feared to expose our life often and freely therein. And in this great concurrence of so great and dangerous affaires, not beeing able to pacifie all at once instant, wee haue bene forced to hold this course, to attempt those first which could not bee ended but by force, and suspend the rest for a time, which ought and might bee treated by reason and Iustice: As the generall differences betwixt our good subiects, and the priuate grievances of the foundest part of the state, which wee held, might more easily be cured, the principall cause being taken away, the which was in the continuance of the ciuill warres.

This hauing by the grace of God well and happily succeeded, and all armes and Hostility ceassing, throughout the Realme, wee hope our successe wilbe no lesse in other affaires, which remaine yet to compound: And that by this meanes wee shall attaine vnto the Establishment of a good peace and tranquillity, the which hath alwaies bene the end of our vowes and intentions, and the prize which wee desire of so much paine and toyle, wherein wee haue past the course of our age. Amongst the said affaires, to the which wee haue bene forced to giue patience, and one of the chiefe, hath bene the complaints which wee haue receiued from many of our Prouinces and Catholike townes, that the exercise of the Catholike Religion was not vniuersally restored, as it ought by the Edicts heretofore made for the pacification of the troubles by reason of the Religion, as also the supplications and remonstrances, which hath bene made vnto vs, by our subiects of the pretended reformed Religion, aswell vpon the not executing of that which hath bene granted by the said Edicts, as vpon that which they desire should bee added for the exercise of their said Religion, the liberty of their consciences, and the suretie of their owne persons and fortunes: pretending to haue iust cause, to haue new and greater apprehensions, by reason of these last troubles, whereof the principall pretext and ground was made vpon the ruine. Wherefore not to ouer charge our selues with too much businesse at once, seeing that the furie of Armes cannot agree with Establishment of Lawes, how good soeuer, wee haue from time to time deferred it.

But now seeing it hath pleased Almighty God to giue vs some rest, wee haue thought we could not better imploy our time, then in that which might concerne the glory of his Holy name and seruice, and to prouide that hee may be worshipped by all our subiects: And if it hath not pleased him that they should bee all of one forme and Religion, yet at the least of one Intention, and with that order, as it might breed no trouble nor tumult amongst them; And that both wee and this Realme may enioy, the glorious title of the most Christian King, which hath bene by so many merits long since purchased: And by the same meanes to take away the cause of trouble, which may happen for matters of Religion, which is the most sensible of all others. For this occasion knowing this businesse to bee of great importance, and worthy of good consideration, hauing receiued the complaints of our Catholike subiects, giuing also leaue to them of the pretended reformed Religion, to assemble by their Deputies, and to make their remonstrances, and hauing therevpon often conferred with them, and viewed the precedent Edicts, wee haue now thought it necessarie, to giue vnto all our said subiects, a generall, plaine, and absolute Law, by the which they may bee ruled, in all differences which haue heretofore happened amongst them, and which may happen, where-with all our subiects shall haue cause to rest contented, according to the quality of the time.

The cause which makes vs to enter into this deliberation, is the onely zeale wee haue vnto the seruice of God, and that it may bee hereafter duely performed by our subiects, and 1599. and to settle, a good and durable peace amongst them. Wherein wee implore and attend A the same protection and fauour of his diuine bountie, which hee hath alwaies imparted to this Realme since the first beginning: And that of his grace, hee will make our subiects conceiue, that in the obseruation of this our Edict, consists (after their duetic vnto vs) the chiefe ground, of their vnion, concord, tranquillity and peace, and the restoring of this Estate to her first beautie, wealth and force. And we for our part, promise to cause it to be exactly obserued, without suffering any thing to bee done to the contrary.

For these causes, hauing with the aduise, with the Princes of our blood, other Princes and Officers of the crowne, with great and notable personages of our counsell of state, bee- ing neere vs, well and dilligently waied and considered all these busineses, wee haue by this perpetuall and ir-reuokable Edict, said, declared and ordained, and say, declare, and ordaine.

1 First that the memorie of all things past, of either side, from the beginning of March in the yeere of our Lord 1585. vnto our comming to the crowne, and during the precedent troubles, by reason thereof, shall remaine extinct and supprett as if they had neuer beene. And it shall not be lawfull for our Proctors generall or any other person publike or priuate at any time or for any occasion to make mention, or any purlue in any courts or iurisdiccions.

2 Wee forbid our subiects of what estate and quallitie soeuer, to reuiue the memory, to challenge, iniurie or prouoke one another, by reproaching that which is past, nor to outrage or offend one another by word no deed, for any cause or pretext whatsoeuer: But to containe themselves and to liue peaceably together like bretheren, friends and fellow citizens, vpon paine to them that shall contradict it, to bee punished as breakers of the peace, and troublers of the publike quiet.

3 Wee ordaine that the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Religion, shalbe restored in all places of this our Realme and Countries of our obedience, where the excise thereof hath beene intermitted, to bee there freely and quietly exercised without any trouble or let; Wee doe also expressely prohibit all persons of what Estate or quallitie whatsoeuer, not to molest nor trouble the Clergie in celebration of Diuine seruice, and the enioying of the tythes, fruites and reuenues of their benefices, and all other rights and duties which belong vnto them: And that all such as during the troubles had seized vpon churches, houses, goods and reuenues, belonging to the said Clergie, and detaine them stil shall leaue them the full possession and quiet enioying in such rights and liberties as they had before the were disposselt. We also expressely forbid all them of the said pretended reformed Religion, to haue any preaching or exercise of the said Religion in the Churches, houses and dwellings of the said Clergie.

4 It shalbe at the choise of the said Clergie to purchase the houses built vpon prophane places detained from them during the troubles, or to force the occupiers of the fore- said buildings to buy the ground, according to the estimation of such expert men as the parties shall make choise of, and if they cannot agree, then the Iudges of the place to provide for it, reseruing to the said occupiers there interest against whom it shall concerne. And whereas the said Clergie-men shall force the possessors to buy the ground, the money growing of the valeuation, shall not bee put into their hands, but that the said possessors shall remaine charged to make profit thereof after therate of the twentieth penny, vntill that all that shall arise in one yeere may bee employed to the benefit of the Church. And if at the time expired, the purchaser would not continew the said rent, hee shall bee discharged in consigning the money into the hands of soluable men, by the Authoritie of Iustice. And for the Holy places, aduise shall bee giuen by the Commissioners which shalbe appointed for this Edict, to bee ordered and determined by vs.

5 Notwithstanding no Clergie man, nor any other publike or priuate person, may challenge or demand the ground and places, held and employed for the reparation and fortifications of townes and places of our Realme, nor the materials employed there, but when as the said reparations and fortifications shalbe ruined by our decre.

A 6 And not to leaue any cause of troubles betwixt our subiects, wee haue, and doe allowe them of the pretended reformed Religion, to liue and remaine in all the townes and places of this our Realme, and countries of our obedience, without search vexati- on or molestation, nor forced to do any thing for matter of religion contrary to their con- sciences, nor by reason thereof to be searched in their houses and places of abroad, carrying themselves as it is contained in this our Edict.

Exercise of religion allow-

7 Wee haue also suffered all Noblemen, Gentlemen and others aswell subiects as strangers, making profession of the pretended reformed religion, hauing in our Realme and Countries of our obedience, high Iustice, or full fee of Haubert (as in Normandy) bee it in propertie or for life, in all or for a moietie or the third part, to haue in their houses of the said high Iustices, or fees which they shall bound to name before vnto our Bayliffes, and Seneshalls, euery one in his iurisdiction, for their principall dwelling, the exercise of the said Religion so long as hee shalbe there resident, and in their absence their wiues, or their families, or part thereof. And although the right of Iustice, of a full fee of Haubert bee in question yet the exercise of the said Religion may bee vied there, so as they bee in actual possession, of the said high Iustice, and notwithstanding that our Proctor Generall bee their aduerser partie. Wee doe also allow them the said exercise in their other houses and places of high Iustice, or Fees of Haubert, whilest they shalbe present, and not otherwise, aswell for themselves as for their families, and others that C will goe.

Fee of Hau-
much to say as

8 In houses of Fees where as they of the said Religion shall not haue high Iustice or Fees of Haubert, they may not haue the said exercise but for their families only. Wee doe not meane notwithstanding if there chance to come any other persons to the num- ber of thirty, beside their families, bee it by reason of some Christening, to visit their friends, or otherwise, that they shalbe molested: provided alwaies that the said houses bee not in Townes, Borroughes, or Villages, belonging vnto Catholikes, that haue high Iustice, except our selfe, in the which the said Noblemen Catholikes haue their houses. In which case they of the said Religion shall nor haue any exercise in the said Townes, Bor- roughes and Villages, but by the permission and leaue of the said Lords of high Iustice, and D not otherwise.

ligion where to bee allowed.

9 Wee doe also permit all them of the said Religion to continew the exercise thereof in all the townes, and places of our obedience, where it was by them settled and vied pub- licly at sundry times in the yeere of our Lord 1596. and in the yeere 1597. vnto the end of August, notwithstanding all Decrees and Iudgements to the contrary.

10 The said exercise may also bee re-established in all the townes and places, where it hath or ought to bee vied by the Edict of pacification, made in the yeere of our Lord 1577. and the particular Articles and conferences of Nerac and Flex: The which estab- lishment may not bee hindered in places of the Demaines giuen by the said Edict, Articles and conferences, for places of Bayliwicks, or that shalbe heereafter, al- though they haue beene, or shalbe heereafter allienated to Catholikes. Yet wee doe not meane that the said exercise shalbe restored in places of the said Demaines, which haue beene heere to held by them of the said pretended reformed Religion, in the which it hath beene allowed in consideration of their persons, or by reason of preui- ledge of fees, if the said fees bee now enioyed by men of the Catholike, Apostolike and Ro- mish Religion.

11 Moreouer in all antient Bayliwicks, Seneschaufies and Gouvernements, holding the place of Bayliwicks, the which repaire directly to Courts of Parliaments: Wee ordaine that in the suberbes of some Towne, besides those which haue beene granted them by the said Edict, priuate Articles and conferences, and where there are no Townes, in some Borough or Village, the exercise of the said pretended reformed Religion, may bee pub- licly vied by all those that will goe, although that in the said Bayliwicks, Seneschaufies and Gouvernements, there bee many places where the said exercise is at this present esta- blished: Excepting the townes in the which there is an Arch-bishop, or a Bishoppricke, yet not debarring them of the pretended reformed Religion, from demanding and name- ing of the said place of exercise in the Borroughes and Villages neere vnto the foresaid townes;

1598. townes: excepting also the places and Seigneuries belonging vnto Clergy-men, in the which we doe not meane that the second place of the Bayliwike shalbe established, hauing of our speciall grace exempted them. Our meaning is vnder the name of antient Bayliwikes to speake of those which in the time of the deceased King Henry our most honoured Lord and father-in-law, were held for Bayliwikes, Seneschauies, and Gouvernements, appealing immediately to our said courts.

12 Wee doe not meane by this present Treatie to derogate from the Edicts and accords heretofore made and confirmed, for the reduction of any Princes, Noblemen, Gentlemen and Catholike townes of our obedience, in that which concerns the exercise of the said Religion, the which Edict and Accorde shalbe entertained, imbraced and obserued for that regarde, as it shall appeare by the instructions of the Commissioners which shalbe appointed for the execution of this Edict.

13 Wee doe also expressly, forbid all of the said Religion to make any exercise thereof, aswell for the ministry, orders, discipline or publike instruction of children, and others in this our Realme and Countries of our obedience, in that which concerns Religion, but in such places as are allowed by this present Edict.

14 As also not for to vse any exercise of the said Religion in our Court and Traine, nor in our countries beyond the Mountaines, nor our Cittie of Paris, or within five leagues thereof: Notwithstanding they of the said Religion remayning in the said countries beyond the Mountaines, and in our said city, or within five leagues round about, shall not bee molested in their houses, nor fort to doe anything in regarde of their Religion, against their consciences: carrying themselves according to the contents of our present Edict.

Exercise of religion forbidden in Court.

15 They shall not also make publike exercise of the said Religion in any armie, but in those quarters whereof the chiefe Commanders are of that profession, alwaies excepting that, whereas our person shalbe lodged.

16 According to the second Article of the conference of Neras, wee doe allow them of the foresaid Religion to builde houses for the exercise thereof, in all those Townes and Places which are graunted them; Those which they haue heeretofore built shalbe restored vnto them, or the ground as it is at this present, yea in places where the said exercise is not allowed them, vnlesse they haue beene conuerted into some other kinde of building. In which case there shall bee giuen them by the possessors of the said buildings, places of the same vallew they were of before they were built, or the iust vallew thereof by the Iudgement of skilfull men, which shalbe called to view it: alwaies reseruing vnto the foresaid Proprietaries and possessors their course against whom it shall concerne.

17 Wee forbid all Preachers, Readers, and others that speake in publike, to vse any wordes, discourse, or speech, tending to excite the people to sedition; and wee haue and doe enioyne them to carrie themselves modestly, and not to say any thing, which is not to instruct and edifie their Auditours, and to maintaine the peace and tranquillity, established by vs in our said Realme, vpon the paines set downe in the precedent Edicts, expressly enioyning our Attornies Generall, and their substitutes, to informe against such as shall offend herein, and for default thereof to answer it in their owne names, and to be deprived of their offices.

18 Wee also forbid all our subiects, of what qualitie or condition soeuer, to take away by force, and against the will of their Parent the Children of the said Religion, to haue them baptized, or confirmed in the Romish Religion: And the like defence is made to them of the pretended reformed Religion, vpon paine to bee punished exemplarily.

19 They of the said pretended reformed Religion, shall not in any fort stand bound by reason of any abirations promisses, and othes which haue heretofore bin made, or Cautions giuen by them, concerning the said Religion, neither shalbe molested therefore, in any fort whatsoeuer.

20 They shall also bee bound to keepe and obserue the feastes appointed by the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Church, neither shall they worke on the said daies, nor sell

nor retails in open shops, neither shall handy-crafts men worke out of their shops in chambers and houses shut vp on the sayd feast dayes, and other dayes prohibited, vpon any trade, the noyle whereof may bee heard without, by the neighbours or passengers, whereof no search shalbe made but by the officers of iustice.

21. No bookes concerning the sayd pretended reformed religion, shalbe printed; or sold but in those townes, whereas the publike exercise of this religion is allowed, and for other bookes which shalbe printed in other townes, they shalbe visited as well by our officers as by Diuines, as it is set downe in our ordonances. Wee doe expressely forbid, the printing and sale of all bookes, and scandalous writings, vpon the paines contained in our ordonances, inioyning all our iudges to looke vnto it.

Bookes of the religion where to be printed and sold.

22. Wee ordayne there shalbe no distinction in regard of the said religion, to receaue Schollers to bee instructed in Vniuersities, Colledges and Schooles: And the diseased and poore into Hospitalles and Almes-houses,

23. They of the said pretended reformed religion, shalbe bound to keepe the lawes of the Catholike Apostolike and Romish Church receaued in this our realme: touching marriages contracted, or to be contracted in degrees of consanguinity and affinity.

24. In like maner they of the said religion shall pay their rights of entry that hath beene accustomed for the charges and offices, whereunto they shalbe aduanced, without beeing constrained to assit at any sermons contrary to their religion: And beeing called by oath, they shall not be bound to take any other, then to lift vp their hands, and promise vnto God, that they will speake the truth, and they shall not bee bound to take the dispensation of the oath, taken by them in passing the contracts and obligations.

25 We wil and command that all they of the said pretended reformed Religion, and other which haue followed there party, of what estate or quality soeuer, shalbe bound and forced by all due meanes and vnder the same paines contained in the Edicts touching that point, to pay and discharge the tythes, to curats and other Clergy-men, and to all others to whome they shall belong, according to the vse, and custome of the place.

26 Exheredations, or depriuations, made either in their life time or by testament, in hatred of religion, shall haue no place, for that which is past or to come among our subiects.

27. And the better to vnite the wills of our subiects, and to take away all future complaints, we declare all those that doe make profession of the said pretended reformed religion, capable to hold and exercise all estates, dignities, offices, and publike charges, whatsoever be they royall, seigneuriall, or in the townes of our sayd realme, and countries of our obedience, notwithstanding any oth to the contrary, and to be indifferently admitted and receiued in them. And our Court of Parliament, and other Iudges shall rest contented to make enquire of the life, religion, & conuersation of such as shalbe preferred to offices, aswell of one religion as of the other, without taking any other oath then to serue the King in the exercise of their charges, well and faithfully, and to keepe his ordonances as they haue beene alwaies obserued. And if any of the said estates, charges and offices, shalbe voyde, in regard of those that shall be in our disposition, there shalbe capable men preferred indifferently and without distinction, as a matter which concerns the vnion of our subiects. Our meaning also is that they of the pretended reformed Religion, may be admitted into all counsells, deliberations, assemblies and functions, which depend vpon the aboue-named matters, neither shall they in regard of the said religion be reiected.

28: We ordaine for the interring of such as dye of the said religion throughout all the townes and places of this realme, that there shallbe speedy prouision made for them in euery place, by our officers, and by the commissioners which we shall depute for the execution of our present Edict, of as conuenient a place as may be: and the Church-yards which they had heretofore, whereof they haue beene depriued, shalbe restored them againe, vnlesse they bee found at this present full of buildings, of what quality soeuer, in which case they shall haue others provided freely.

29: Wee doe expressly inioine our said officers, to foresee, that at the said interments, no scandal be committed, & they shalbe bound within 15. daies after request made, to prouide for them of the said religion a conuenient place for said burials without any protraction or delay, vpon paine of 500. crownes fine: defence is made vnto our officers & all others, not to 1599. exact any thing, for the conduēt of the sayd dead bodies vpon paine of concussion.

30. And vnto the end that iustice may bee administred to our subiects, without any suspition, hatred, or fauour, as beeing one of the principall meanes, to maintaine them in peace and concord: Wee haue and do ordaine that in our Court of Parliament of Paris, there shalbe a Chamber erected consisting of one President, and sixtene counsellors, the which shalbee called the Chamber of the Edict, and shall not onely take knowledge of the causes and suites, of the sayd pretended reformed religion, which shalbe within the bounds of the sayd court; But also in the limittes of our Parliaments, of Normandy, and Brittany, according to the Iurisdiction which shalbe hereafter giuen by this present Edict, and that vntill there shalbe in either of the sayd Parliaments, a Chamber erected, to doe Iustice vpon the place, wee doe also ordaine, that in former Offices of counsellors in our sayd Parliament, remaining of the last erection made by vs, there shalbe presently receiued in the sayd Parliament foure of the pretended reformed religion, sufficient and able men, the which shalbe preferred; that is the first shalbe receiued in the sayd Chamber of the Edict: and the other three in three chambers of Inquests: Moreover the first two Officers of lay counsellors, of the said court, which shalbe voyde by death, shalbe also supplied by two of the pretended reformed religion, and they beeing receiued, shalbe also distributed into the two other chambers of Inquests.

Distribution of the Counsellors of their religion into the Chambers
of Inquests.

31. Besides the Chamber heretofore erected at Castres for the Iurisdiction of our court of Parliament of Tholoufa, the which shalbe continued as it is: we haue and doe for the same considerations ordaine, that in eyther of our courts of Parliament of Grenoble, and Bourdeaux, shalbe in like manner a chamber erected, consisting of two presidents, the one Catholike, the other of the pretended reformed religion, and of twelue counsellors, whereof sixe shalbe Catholikes and sixe of the religion: The which president and catholike counsellors shalbe chosen by vs out of the body of our sayd Courts: and as for them of the said religion, there shalbe a new creation made of one president, and six counsellors for the Parliament of Bourdeaux, and of one president, and three counsellors for that of Grenoble, the which with the three counsellors of the sayd religion, which are at this present in the sayd Parliament, shalbe employed in the sayd chamber of Daulphiné. And the sayde Officers of new creation, shall haue the like stipends, honours, preheminences, and authoritie, as the rest of the sayd courts: And the Seate of the chamber of Bourdeaux, shalbe at Bourdeaux, or at Nerac, and that of Daulphiné, at Grenoble.

Chamber of Edict at Bourdeaux and Grenoble.

32. The sayd chamber of Daulphiné, shall take knowledge of the causes of them of the pretended reformed religion, of the iurisdiction of our Parliament of Prouence, neither shall it be needfull to take letters of euocation of other prouisions but in our chancerie of Daulphiné: as also, they of the sayd religion in Normandy and Brittany, shall not be bound to take letters of euocation, nor other prouisions, but in our chancerie of Paris.

33. Our subiects of the sayd religiō, of the Parliament of Bourgondy, shall at their choise plead in the chamber erected at Paris, or in that of Daulphiné: and they shall not be bound to take letters of euocation, nor other prouisions but in the said chanceries of Paris, and Daulphiné, at their owne choise.

34. All the sayd chambers erected as is sayd, shall determine and iudge foueraignely and without appeale of all causes, wherein they of the pretended reformed religion shalbe principall parties, or sureties, Plaintiues, or Defendants, in all causes, as well Ciuill as Criminall, whether the proces be by writing or verball appellations, and if it seeme good vnto the said parties, & one of them doth require it, before contestation in the cause, & in regard of the suite that is to be commenced: alwayes excepted all matters of benefices, and possessions of Tythes, the paronage of the Clergy, and all causes wherein the Rights, Duties, and Demaines of the Church, the which shallbe determined in the Courts of Parliament, without any knowledge of the said chambers of Edict. We will also that to iudge and determine Criminall suites which shall happen betwixt Clergy-men and them of the sayd pretended reformed religion, if the Clergy man be defendant, in that cause the knowledge and iudgment of the suite shall belong vnto our foueraigne courts: But whereas the Clergy-man shallbe Plaintiue, and he of the reformed religion Defendant, the knowledg and iudgment of the said Criminall cause should belong vnto the said chamber of the Edict.

The

A The said Chambers shall take knowledge in time of vacation of matters attributed by the Edicts, and ordonances, to Chambers erected in time of vacation, euery one in his iurisdiction.

35. The said Chamber of Grenoble, shalbe incorporated to the body of the said Court of Parliament, and the Presidents and Counsellors of the said pretended reformed religion, shalbe termed Presidents and Counsellors of the said Court, and held in the ranke of them, and to that end they shalbe first distributed into the other chambers, and then drawne out of them to be employed and serue in that which hath newly bene erected: with charge not-withstanding that they should assit and haue a voyce and place, in all the deliberations which should bee made, the Chambers beeing assembled: and they shall inioy the same Stipends, Authorities, and Preheminences, which the other Presidents and Counsellors doe in the same Court.

36. We will and meane, that the said Chambers of Castres, and Bourdeaux, shalbe vnited vnto the said Parliaments like unto the rest when neede shall require, and that the causes which haue moued vs to make the erection, shall cease, and haue no more place among our subiects: and to that end, the Presidents and Counsellors of the said religion, shalbe held for Presidents and Counsellors of the same Courts.

37. There shalbe also newly created in the Chamber erected for the Parliament of Bourdeaux, two substitutes of our Proctor and Aduocate Generall, whereof the Proctor shallbe a Catholike, and the other of the Religion, the which shalbe preferred to the said Offices with competent fees.

38. All the said substitutes shall not take any other quality but of substitutes, and when as the Chambers appoynted for the Parliaments of Tholoufa and Bourdeaux, shalbe vnited vnto the said Parliament, the said substitutes shalbe made Counsellors there.

39. The expeditions of the Chancerie of Bourdeaux, shalbe made in the presence of two Counsellors of the said Chamber, the one a Catholike, the other of the pretended reformed religion, in the absence of one of our Maisters of Requests. One of the Notaries, or Secretaries of the said Court of Parliament shall bee resident, whereas the said chamber shall bee erected, or else one of the Secretaries of the Chancerie, to signe the expeditions of the said Chancerie.

40. Wee will and command, that in the said Chamber of Bourdeaux, there bee two Deputies of the Registers of the Court of Parliament, one for the Ciuill, another for Criminall, the which shall execute their charges by our commissions, and shalbe called Deputies to the Register, and therefore they shall not bee reuoked by the said registers of the Parliament, not-withstanding they shall bee bound to giue an accompt of the profits thereof vnto the said Registers, which Deputies shall haue such fees, as shall bee thought fit by the said Chambers. Moreover, there shall bee Catholike Vilers or Sericants appoynted, the which shallbe taken out of the said court, or elsewhere, as we shal thinke good, besides the which there shall be two newly erected of the said religion and preferred freely, all which Vilers shalbe ordered by the said Chamber, as well in the exercise of their charges, as in the Fees they shall take. There shall also a commission bee granted, for one to pay the Fees and receiue the Fines for the said Chamber, to bee preferred at our pleasure, if the said chamber be settled in any other place, then in the said towne. And the commission heretofore granted to the payer of Fees of the chamber of Castre, shall take his full effect, and thereunto shall bee ioyned the commission for the receipt of the Fines of the said Chamber.

41. There shall prouision bee made of good and sufficient Assignations for the Fees of Officers of the Chambers erected by this Edict.

42. The presidents, Counsellors, and other Catholike Officers of the said chambers, shall bee continued as long as it shall seeme fitte for our seruice, and the good of our Subiects, and in dismissing the one, others shall bee provided in their places, before their departure, neither may they during the time of their seruice, absent themselves from the said chamber, without leaue thereof.

43. The said Chambers shalbe erected within sixe monthes, during the which (if the erection erection bee not made ) all suites begun or to begin, wherein they of the said religion A shall be parties, being of the iurisdiction of our Parlements of Paris, Rouan, Dijon, and Rennes, shall repayre vnto the chamber erected presently at Paris, by vertue of the Edict made in the yeare 1577. or else to the great counsell, at their choise: and those which shall be of Prouence, to the Parliament of Grenoble. And if the said chambers shall not be erected within three monethes after the presentation which hath beene made vnto them of our present Edict, those Parlements which shall make refusall, shall be inhibited to iudge of the causes of them of the said religion.

44 All sutes depending in the said Courts of parliament, and great counsell, of what quality soeuer, shall be sent vnto the said chambers euery one into his iurisdiction, if one of the parties of the said religion require it, within foure monethes after the erection thereof: B and as for those which shall be discontinued and are not redy to be iudged, they of the religion shall be bound to make declaration at the first intimation, and signification which shall be made vnto them of the poursuite, and the said time being past they shall be no more allowed to demand their discharge.

45 The said chambers of Grenoble, and Bourdeaux as also that of Castres, shall keepe the formes and stile of the Parlements in whose iurisdiction they are erected, and shall iudge in equall number of either religion, if the parties doe not consent to the contrary.

46 All iudges which shall haue charge for the execution of decrees and commissions of the said chambers, and of letters obtayned in the Chanceries thereof, together withal vsers C and sergents, shall execute their employts throughout our whole realme without demanding of Placet, Visu, Pareatis, vpon paine of suspension of their offices, and charges, damage and intrest to the parties, the knowledge whereof shall beeloug vnto the said chambers.

47. No euocation of causes shall be granted, the knowledge whereof is attributed vnto the said Chambers, but in cases of ordinances, which shall be sent vnto the nearest chamber erected according to our Edict: and the diuision of suites of the said chambers shall be iudged in that which is nearest, obseruing the proportion and forme of the said chambers, from whence the suits came; except the chamber of the Edict at our Parliament at Paris, where as suites deuided shall be determined in the same chamber, by iudges which shall be named by our priuie letters to that end, vnlesse the parties desire to attend the renewing of the D said chamber. And if it happen that a suite be diuided into all the chambers, it shall be sent vnto the said chamber of Paris.

48 The recusations which shall be propounded against the Presidents and counsellors of the Chambers of the Edict, may be iudged by six, to which number the parties shall be bound to restraine themselves, else they shall proceed with out regard vnto the said recusations.

49 The examination of presidents and counsellors, newly erected in the said chambers of the Edict, shall be made in our priuie counsell or by the said chambers, euery one in his limits, when as there shall be a sufficient number, and yet the accustomed oth shall be taken by them in the courts whereas the said chambers shall be erected, and vpon their refusall in our E priuie counsell, except those of the chamber of Languedoc, the which shall take their oths in the hands of our Chancellor, or in the said chamber.

50 We will and command that the reception of our officers of the said religion shall be decided in the said diuided chambers by plurality of voyces, as it is accustomed in other iudgements, neither is it needfull that their opinions exceed two parts, according to the law, the which is in this regard derogated.

51 In the said diuided chambers shall be made the propositions deliberations, and resolutions, which shall concerne the publike quiet and perticular estate and gouernment of the townes where the said chamber shall be.

52 The article of the iurisdiction of the said chambers appointed by this present Edict, shall be followed and obserued according to the forme and tenor, euén in that which concerns the execution or breach of our Edicts, when as they of the said religion shall be parties.

53 All subalternall royal officers, or others whose reception belongs to our courts of Parliament,

A Parliament, if it be of the said pretended reformed Religion, they may be examined and received into the said chambers: That is, those of the iurisdctions of the Parlements of Paris, Normandie, and Brittain, in the said chamber of Paris; Those of Daulphiné, and Prouence, in the chamber of Grenoble; Those of Bourgundie in the said chamber of Paris, or of Daulphiné, at their choise; Those of Tholousa, in the chamber of Castres: And those of the Parliament of Bourdeaux in the chamber of Guienne, neyther may any oppose themselves to their receptions, nor make themselves parties, but our Proctors generall and their substitutes, and those that doe enioy the said Offices, and yet the accustomed oath shall be taken by them in the courts of Parliament, who may take no knowledge of their receptions, and vpon refusall of the said Parlements, the said Officers shall take their oath in the said B chambers, which done they shall be bound to present by an vsier, or notarie, the act of their reception vnto the registers of the said courts of Parliament, and to leaue a copie with the said registers, who are inioyned to inrowle the said acts vpon paine of al the parties charges damage, and interest. And if the said register shall make refusall thereof, it shall be sufficient for the said Officers to report the act of the said summation performed by the said vsiers or notaries, and to cause it to be inrowled in the registers Office of their said iurisdiction, to haue re-course thereunto when neede shall require, vpon paine of nullitie of their proceedings and iudgements. And as for Officers whose reception hath not beene accustomed to be taken in our said Parliament, in case that they to whom it shall appertaine C shall refuse to proceede to the said examination and reception, the said Officers shall then repaire to the said chambers to be admitted as it shall be fit.

54 The Officers of the said pretended, reformed Religion, which shall be hereafter preferred to serue in our courts of Parliament, great Counsell, chamber of accompts, court of Aydes, and of the treasurers generall of France, and other Officers of the Treasure shall be examined and received whereas they haue beene accustomed to be: And in case of refusall, or deniall of iustice, they shall be relieved in our priuie Counsell.

55 The reception of our Officers made heretofore in the chamber erected at Castres shall be of force, notwithstanding all decrees and ordinances to the contrary. The receptions also shall be vayleable of iudges, Counsellors and other Officers of the said Religion D made in our priuie Counsell, or by Commissioners deputed by vs vpon refusall of our courts of Parliament, of Aydes, and chambers of accompts, euén as if they had been made in the said courts and chambers, and by the same Iudges to whom the reception belongs: and their fees shall be allowed by the chambers of accompts without any difficultie: If any haue beene rased out they shall be restored hauing no neede of any other commandement then this present Edict, neyther shall the said Officers be bound to shew any other reception, notwithstanding all decrees giuen to the contrary, the which shall remain void and of no force.

56 And vntill there shall be meanes to supplie the charge of iustice of the said chambers by the money which shall rise of fines, there shall be a sufficient assignation made by vs E to defray the said charges, which money shall be re-paid out of the goods of them that are condemned.

57 The Presidents and Counsellors of the said pretended reformed religion, heretofore received in our court of Parliament of Daulphiné, and in the chamber of the Edict incorporated thereunto, shall continue and haue their places there; that is the Presidents as they haue and doe inioy it, and the Counsellors according to the decrees and prouisions which they haue obtained in our priuie Counsell.

58 We declare all sentences, iudgements, proceedings, seafures, sales and decrees made and giuen against them of the said pretended reformed religion aswell liuing as dead, since the death of King Henry the second our most honored Lord and father in law, by reason of F the said religion, tumults and troubles since hapened there, together with the execution of the said iudgements and decrees, to be presently void, reuoked and disannulled, we do also ordaine that they shall be rased and taken out of the registers of all courts aswell soueraign as inferior: and we will also that all marks and monuments of the said executions, bookes, and defamatorie acts, against their persons, memory & posteritie, shall be defaced and taken away: & that the places wher upon this occasion any rasing or demollishing hath bin shall be restored restored in the estate they are into the proprietaries, to inioy and dispose thereof at their pleasures. And generally we haue made void, reuoked and disanulled, all proceedings and informations made for enterprises pretended to be Treason and others: notwithstanding the said proceedings, decrees & iudgements, contayning re-union, in-corporation, and confiscation, we will that they of the said religion, and others that haue followed there partie, and their heires, shall returne into the reall, and actuall possession of all their goods.

59 All proceedings, iudgements and decrees giuen during the troubles against them of the said religion that haue borne armes, or haue gone out of our Realme, or within it, into the townes and Countries held by them, together withal pre-emptions of instances, prescriptions as well legall, conuentionall, as customarie, and feudall seafures, excheated during the said troubles, or by lawfull lets proceeding from them, whereof the knowledge belongs to our iudges, they shall be held as not done, giuen nor happened, and so we haue and do declare them, and they shall be restored to the same estate they were in before: notwithstanding the said decrees and the executions thereof: they shall haue possession restored vnto them, in the which they were for that regard: This shall also haue place, in regard of others that haue followed the party of them of the said Religion, or that haue been absent out of the Realme, in respect of the troubles. And for the children that were vnder age of them of the said quallitie which be dead during the troubles, we restore the parties to the same estate they were in before, without paying any charges or consigning the fines. Yet we do not meane that iudgements giuen by presidiall iudges, or other inferior iudges against them of the said religion, or that haue followed their partie, shall remain void, if they haue been giuen by iudges sitting in townes held by them, or where they had free access.

60 All decrees and sentences giuen in our courts of Parliament in matters whereof the knowledge belongs to the chambers appointed by the Edict, since the yeare 1577. and the Articles of Nerac and Flex; in which courts the parties haue not proceeded willingly; that that is to say, haue propounded declinatorie endes, or that haue been giuen by default or forclusion, as well in ciuill as criminall causes, notwithstanding which allegations, they said parties haue been forced to proceed, they shall be in like manner voyd and of no force. And in regard of iudgements giuen against them of the said religion, which hath proceeded voluntarily, and not propounded any declinatorie endes, the said iudgement shall remain firme: And yet without preiudice of the executions thereof, may if they thinke good seeke reliefe by a ciuill request in the chambers appointed by this present Edict, neyther shall the time appointed by the ordinances runne on to their preiudice. And vntill that the said chambers and Chanceries shall be erected, all appellations eyther, by word or writing, made by them of the said religion before iudges, registers or their substitutes, & executioners of decrees and iudgements, shall haue like effect as if they were relieued by the Kings letters.

61 In all inquiries that shall be made for what cause soeuer, in ciuill matters, if the inquisitor or commissarie be a Catholike, the parties shall be bound to choose an assistant, and if they cannot agree there shall be one chosen by the said Inquisitor, or Commissary, who shall be of the said reformed religion: the like shall be practised when as the Commissary or Inquisitor shall be of the said religion to haue an Assistant a Catholike.

62 We will and ordayne that our iudges may take knowledge of the validitie of Testaments, in the which they of the said religion shall haue interest, if they require it, and the appellations of the said iudgement may be relieued in the said chambers appointed for the suits of them of the said religion, notwithstanding all customes to the contrary, Namely that of Brittain.

63 To preuent all questions which may arise betwixt our courts of Parliament, and the chambers of the said courts appointed by our present Edict, there shall be a good order set downe by vs betwixt the said courts and chambers, so as they of the said pretended reformed religion shall fully inioye the said Edict, which order shall be verified in our courts of Parliament and obserued without any regard to the Precedent.

64 We forbid all our soueraigne courts and others of this Realme to take knowledge and iudge of ciuill, or criminall causes belonging to them of the said religion, the which by our Edict are referred to the knowledge of the said chambers, so as the Renuoie be demanded, as it is said in the 40. Article.

A 65. We wil also by way of prouision, and vntill it shalbee otherwise decreed, that in all suites commenced or to commence, where they of the sayd religion shalbee plainetifes, or defendants, and principall parties, or suerties in ciuell causes, wherein our Officers in presidiall courts haue power to iudge definitiuely, it shalbe lawfull for them to require that two of the Chamber where the proceffe should bee Iudged, abstaine from the Iudgement thereof, who without expression of the cause are bound to abstaine, notwithstanding the ordinance by the which Iudges cannot bee excepted against without cause: they hauing requisitions by law against the others: and in criminall causes where also the sayd presidiall and other sub-alternal royall iudges determine definitiuely; the accused being of the sayd religion may require three iudges to abstaine from iudgement without expression of the cause. And the Prouosts of the Marshalls of France, vice-baylifes, vice-senethall, Lieutenants of the short roabe, and other officers of like quality, shall iudge according to the ordonances and rules heretofore giuen in regard of vagabounds: and as for them that haue families being charged with prouestall matters, if they be of the said religion, they may require three of their iudges, to abstaine from iudgement of their cause, which they shall be forced to doe without any declaration of the reason, vnlesse that in the company where the said proceffe shalbe iudged there shalbe found two in ciuill causes and three in criminall to the said religion; in which cause it shall not be lawfull to except, without expression of the cause: the which shalbee also common for Catholikes in the like forme, in regard of regulation of iudges, whereas they of the said pretended reformed religion shalbe the greater number, yet we intend not that the said presidiall courts, prouosts of Marshalls, Vice-Baylifes, Vice-senethalls, and others which iudge definitiuely, shal by verue of that which is said, take knowledge of troubles past. And as for crymes committed vpon any other subiect, then in regard of the troubles since the beginning of March in the yeare 1585. vnto the end of the yeare 1597. in case that they take knowledge thereof, we will that they may appeale from their iudgements vnto the chambers appointed by this present edict, as it shall in like manner be practized for the Catholikes, whereas they of the pretended reformed religion shalbe parties.

66. We will also and ordaine that here-after in all instructions and informations of criminall causes in the Seneshauzees of Tholosa, Carcassonne, Rouergue, Loraguis, Beziers, Montpellier, and Nismes, the Magistrate or commissary deputed for the said instruction, if he be a Catholike shalbe bound to take an assistant, who shalbe of the said pretended reformed religion, such a one as the parties shall agree vpon, if not the said Magistrate may choose one Ex Officio of the saide religion, as in like manner if the Magistrate be of the said religion, he shall be bound to take an assistant that is a Catholike.

67. When there shalbe question for the Prouosts of Marshalls or their Lieutenants to proceed criminally, against any one of the said religion, hauing a dwelling, being accused of some prouostall cryme, the sayd prouosts or their Lieutenants if they bee Catholikes shalbe bound to call an assistant of the said religion, to the instruction of the sayd Proces: which Adionct shall also assist at the iudgement of the competency, and at the definitive sentence: which competency may not be iudged but in the nearest presidiall court, in the presence of the said court and the cheefe officers that shalbe vpon the place, vpon paine of Nullity, vnlesse that the accused require to haue the competency iudged in the said chambers appointed by this present Edict: in which case touching dwellers in the Prouince of Guyenne, Languedoc, Prouence, and Daulphiné, the substitutes of our Proctors generall in the said Chambers, shall at the request of the accused, bring thether the informations made against them, to iudge if the causes be Prouostall or not, to be afterwards according to the quality of the cryme sent backe to the sayd chambers, to their ordinaries, or iudged prouostally, as they shall finde it fit to be done, obseruing the contents of our present Edict. And all the presidiall iudges, prouosts, Vice-baylifes, Vice-senethalls, which iudge definitiuely, shalbe bound to obey respectiuely the Comandements which shalbe made them by the sayd Chambers, as they haue bin accustomed to do to the said Parlements, vpon paine of priuation of their Offices.

68. The proclamations and subhaustations of inheritances, whereof they pursue a decree, shalbe made in the accustomed places and at vsuall times, if it may be, according to

to our ordinances or else in open Market, if there bee any where the Inheritances lie, and if there be not any, they shalbe made at the next market to the court where it shalbe adjudged: and it shalbe set vpon the Post in the said Market-place and at the entry of the Auditory of the sayd place, by which meanes the said Proclamations shalbe good and vaylable, and shall proceed to the interposition of the decree, without regard of Nullities which may be objected in that respect.

69. All titles, papers instructions, and documents which haue bin taken, shalbe restored of either side, to them to whome they belong, although the papers or the Castles and houses wherein they were kept, haue beene taken and seized on by expresse commission from the last King deceased, our most honored Lord and brother in-law, or from vs, or by the commandement of gouernors and Lieutenants Generall of our Prouinces, or by the authority B of commanders of the other part, or vnder any prae-text whatsoever.

70. The children of such as haue retired them-selues out of our realme, since the death of King Henry the second our most honored Lord and father-in-law, by reason of the religion and troubles, although that the said children were borne out of this our realme shalbe held for true Frenchmen and denizens, and for such we haue and doe declare them, being not needefull for them to take letters of naturality, or other prouisions from vs then this present edict, notwithstanding all ordonances to the contrary, to the which we haue, and doe derogate vpon condition that the said children borne in forraigne-countries, shalbe bound within ten yeares after the publication of this present Edict, to come and remaine within the realme.

71. They of the said pretended reformed religion and others which haue followed their party, who before the troubles had taken to farme any registers office, or other demeanes, customes, forraigne impositions and other rights belonging vnto vs, which they could not inioy by reason of the said troubles, shall remayne discharged, as we discharge them, of that which they haue not receiued of the sayd farmes, or that they haue without fraud paid elsewhere into our receipts, notwithstanding all bonds past by them.

72. All places, townes and Prouinces of our Realme, countries and Seignuries, of our obdience shall inioy the same priuiledges, liberties, freedome, faies, markets, iurisdicions, and seats of iustice, which they did before the troubles begun in march 1, 85, and other precedent, notwithstanding all letters to the contrary, and the translation of any of the said courts, being done onely in regard of the troubles, shalbe restored to the townes and places where they were before.

73. If there be any prisoners yet detayned by the authority of iustice or other-wise, yea in the Gallies, by reason of the troubles, or of the sayd religion, they shalbe enlarged and set at liberty.

74. They of the said pretended reformed religion shall not hereafter bee ouerburthened with any ordinary, or extraordinary charges, and according to the proportion of their goods and faculties, and such as shall pretend them-selues to be surcharged may seek relief from the iudges to whome the knowledge doth belong: and all our subiects of either religion shalbe indifferently discharged from all charges that shalbe imposed of either part E during the troubles, vpon them that were of the contrary party, and not consenting, and of all debts growne and not payed, and charges made without their consents; yet they shall not require the expences which haue bin imploied in the payment of the said charges.

75. Wee doe not meane that they of the said religion, and others that haue followed their party, nor Catholics which haue remaind in townes and paces held by them, and which haue contributed vnto them, shalbe pursued for the payment of any taxes, subsidies, impositions or other charges, imposed during the troubles happened before and vntill our comming to the crowne, were it by Edict or commandement from the deceased Kings or our predecessors or by the aduice or resolution of gouernors, and Estates of Prouinces, courts of Parliament and others, whereof we haue and doe discharge them: forbidding all Treasurers of France, generalls of our Finances, receauers general and particular, with all other Offices of our said Finances, to pursue or molest them directly or indirectly in any sorte whatsoever.

A 76. All commanders, Noble-men, Knights, Gentlemen, Officers, Corporations, and Commonalties, and all others which haue ayded and assisted them, their widdowes, heires, and successors, shall remaine quit and discharged of all mony which hath beene by them or their appointment taken and leuiued, aswell of the Kings mony whatsoever it bee, as of townes, commonalties and priuat Persons: of rents, reuenues, plate, sale of mouables, Clergy-mens goods and others: tymbre were it of the Kings demeanes or others fines, booties, ransomes, or mony of any other nature taken by them by reason of the troubles begun in March 1585, and other precedent troubles vntill our comming to the crowne for the which neither they, nor those that haue beene deputed by them, for the leuy of the said mony, or that haue furnished it by their appointments, shalbe either now or hereafter, molested or troubled but shall remaine quit and discharged from all administration of the said mony, bringing for their discharge within foure monethes after the publication of this present Edict, made in our court of Parliament of Paris, quittances duly made from the heads of them of the religion, or from such as haue beene by them deputed for the audit and casting vp of the accompts, or from commonalties of townes which haue had charge during the said troubles. They shall also remaine quit and discharged of all acts of hostility, leuies and conduct of men of warre coyning of mony by the commandement of the sayd heads, casting and taking of artillery and munition, making of gounpoulder and salte-peter, taking, building and demantelling of townes, castles and borrowes, enterprises vpon them, burning and ruining of Churches and houses, establishing of iustice, iudgement, and the execution thereof, were it in ciuil or criminal causes; orders made amongst them, voyages and intelligences, negotiations, treaties and contracts of our realme: and generally of all that hath beene done and negotiated during the said troubles, since the death of King Henry the second our most honored Lord and Father-in-law, by them of the said religion, and others that haue followed their party, notwithstanding that it should be particularly specified and exprest.

77. They of the said religion shall in like manner be discharged from all generall and provinciall assemblies, made and held by them aswell at Mante, as else where, vnto this present day: & also of the counsels erected by them throughout the prouinces, with the deliberations, ordonances, and orders, made in the said assembly and counsels, settling and increasing of garrisons, assemblies of men of warre, leuies and taking of our mony, were it in the hands of the receiuers generall or particular, collectors, of parishes or otherwise in what sort soeuer, stay of salte, continuation or new erection of toles and customes, and the receipt thereof, namely at Rouen, and upon the riuers of Charente, Garonne, Rofne and Dordogne, arming and combates by Sea and all other accidents and excesse to force the payment of the said toles and customes and other mony: fortifications of townes, castles and places, impositions of mony and day-labour, receipts of the said mony, disapointing of our receitours, fermours and other officers, and putting others in their places: and from all vnions, dispatches and negotiations, made both within and without the realme: and generally for all that hath bin done, resolved, written and ordayned by the said assemblies and counsells, neither shall they which haue giuen their aduise signed and executed or caused to be signed and executed the said ordonances, orders and resolutions, be now or hereafter molested, nor their widdowes, heires, nor successors, although the particularitie be not here set downe at large, and perpetuall silence shalbe imposed to proctors generall, their substitutes and to all other which may pretend any interest, notwithstanding all decrees, sentences, iudgements, informations and proceedings made to the contrary.

78. Wee do also allow and confirme the accompts haue which bin heard and examined, by the deputies of the said assembly, and we will that they together with acquitances and papers which haue bin deliuered by them that were comptable, shalbe brought into our Chambers of accompts at Paris, three moneths after the publication of this present Edict, and put into the hands of our Proctor generall, to bee deliuered vnto the keeper of the bookes and registers of our chamber, there to haue recourse vnto them when neede shall require, yet the said accompts shall not bee renewed, nor the accomptants bound to any correction, but in case of omission of receipt, or false acquitances: imposing silence to our proctor generall, for the rest which they will say is defectiue and that the formes

1599. formes haue beene well kept, we doe also prohibit all our officers of accompts aswell of A Paris, as of other Prouinces where they are established to take knowledge thereof in any sort whatsoeuer.

79 And in regard of accompts which haue not bin yet made we wil that they shalbe heard and examined by commissioners deputed by vs, who without difficulty shal passe and allow all Summes paide by the said accomptants, by vertue of the ordonances of the saide assembly.

80 All collectors, receitours, farmers, and all others shall remaine well and duly discharged of all the summes of mony which they haue paid vnto the committies of the said assemblies vnto the last day of this moneth. We will that all shalbe past and allowed in the accompts, which shalbe made plainly, and simply, in our chambers of accompts, by vertue of the acquitances which shalbe brought: and if any shalbe here-after made, or deliuered, they shall remaine voyde, and such as shall accept, or deliuer them, shalbe condemned in a fine for false employment. And if any accompts haue beene already made, vpon the which there hath beene some abatements, or charges, in that regard we haue taken them away, and wholly restored the saide parties, by vertue of these presents, hauing no farther neede of priuate letters, or any thing else, but the extract of this present Article.

81 The gouernors, capitaines, counsell, and men appointed for the recouery of mony, to pay the garrisons of places, held by them of the said religion, to whom our receiuers, and collectors of parishes haue furnished by way of loane, vpon their bills, and bonds, were it by constraint, or to obay the commandements of the treasurers generall, the necessary summes for the intertainment of the said garrisons, vnto the concurrence of that which was set downe by the order which we had caused to be made in the year 1596, and the augmentation since graunted by vs, shall be held quit, and discharged of that which hath bin payed to that effect, although by the saide bills and obligations there bee no expresse mention made, the which shalbe restored vnto them as voyde. And for satisfaction thereof the treasurers generall, in euery generality shall cause the peticular receiuers of our taxes to giue them acquitances vnto the said collectors, and the receiuers generall their acquitances, and to the particular receiuers: and for the discharge of the said receiuers general the Sums (whereof they haue kept the accompts as is said) shalbe indorced vpon the commandements giuen by the treasurers of the Espargne, vnder the name of the treasurers generall of the extraordinary of our warres, for the payment of the said garrisons, and whereas the said charge shall not amount to as much as is set downe in our said estate of the year 1596, and the augmentation, we ordaine that new commandements be made for the supplying of that which shall want and to discharge our accomptants, and the restitution of the said promises and obligations, so as hereafter nothing shall be demanded of them that haue made them, and that all letters of validation, which shalbe necessary for the discharge of accomptants, shalbe expedited by vertue of this present Article.

82 In like manner they of the said religion shall presently relinquish and desist from all practises, negotiations, and intelligences, as well within as without the realme: and the said assemblies and counsell made within the Prouinces shalbe presently dissolved, and all leagues, and associations, made or to be made, vnder what pretext soeuer, to the preiudice of our present estate, made voyd and disannulled, as we make voyde and disannull them: forbidding expressly al our subiects, hereafter to make any cottisations and leuies of mony, without our permission, fortifications, inuolwing of men, congregations and assemblies, others then are allowed by our present Edict, and without armes: the which we do expressly forbid, vpon paine of rigorous punishment, as contemners and breakers, of our commandements, and lawes.

83 All prizes which haue beene made by sea, during the troubles, by vertue of passports giuen, and those which haue beene made by land, vpon them of the contrary party, and which haue beene iudged by the iudges, and officers of the admiraltie, or by the heads of them of the said religion, or their counsell, shall remaine suppressed vnder the benefit of our present Edict, for the which no poursuit shalbe made, nor the capitaines, and others which haue made the said prizes, nor there cautions, neither the said iudges, nor officers, their widows nor heires shalbe in any sort molested or troubled, notwithstanding any decrees

A decrees of our Priuie Councell, and Parliaments and all letters of reprisall, and seizure, depending and not iudged the which we will shall be discharged. 1599.

84. Moreouer they of the said Religion, shall not bee called in question for a ny opposition, and hinderance which they haue giuen heretofore, euen since the troubles, to the execution of any decrees and iudgements, giuen for the re-establishment of the Catholike Apostolike, and Romish Religion in diuers parts of this Realme.

85. And as for that which hath beene done or taken during the troubles, not in hostile manner, or hostily, but contrary to the publike orders, or priuat commandements, of the heads, or of the communalities of Prouinces, who had the charge, poursuite may be made by the way of iustice.

86. Yet for as much as that which hath beene done contrary to order, of either part and indifferently, being excepted, and reserued in the generall Abolition, mentioned in our present Edict, and is subiect to be called in question, there is no Souldier but may be molested, whereby new troubles might growe; for this cause we will and command, that onely execrable facts shalbe exempted out of the said Abolition, as rauishing and forcing of wiues, and virgins, burning, murders, and robberies, made by prodicion, and not in hostile manner, and to practize priuat reuenges, against the law of armes, breach of passports, and sauegarde with murders, and spoyles, without commandements, in regard of them of the said Religion, and others which haue followed the party of the commanders, who haue had authority, grounded vpon priuat occasions, which haue moued them to command it.

87. We ordaine also that punishment, shalbe made of crimes, and offences, committed betwixt persons, of the same party, if it be not in acts commanded by the heads of either part, according to the necessity, law, and order of the warre. And as for leuies and exactions of mony, carrying of armes, and other exploits of warre done by priuat authority and without warrant, poursuite shalbe made by the way of iustice.

88. In townes demanteled during the troubles, the ruines therof by our permission may bee repaired and reedified at the inhabitants owne costs, and charges, and the prouisions graunted heretofore in that regard shal hold and be in force.

89. We ordaine, will, and it is our pleasure, that all Noblemen, Knights, Gentlemen and others, of what quality and condition soeuer, of the said pretended reformed Religion, and others that haue followed their party, shal haue, & effectually inioy, al and euery their goods, rights, names, reasons, and actions, notwithstanding any iudgements that haue beene giuen during the said troubles and by reason thereof: which sentences, seizures, and iudgements and all that hath thereby followed, we haue and do declare them voyde and of no force.

90. The acquisitions which they of the sayd pretended reformed Religion, and others which haue followed their party haue made by other authority, then from the deceased Kings our predecessors, of lands belonging to the Church, shalbe of no force, but we ordaine will, and our pleasure is that the said Clergy-men shall presently and without delay returne into and bee maintained in the reall, and actuall possession of the said lands, thus alienated, and not to be bound to yeeld any value for the sayd contracts of sale the which to that end wee haue reuoked as voyde: for the which the said buyers shall haue no recourse against the commanders, by whose authority the sayd goods had bin sould. And yet for the restitution of the mony by them truly and without fraud disbursed, our letters-patents shalbe graunted with permission, to them of the said Religion to impose, and to collect equally among them the summes where-vnto the sayd sales shall amount; restraining the purchaser from any action for their damage and interest for not inioying, but they shall content them-selues with the rest of the mony which they had paide for the said purchases, accomplishing the vallew of the fruits receued by them, in case it be found to haue bin sold at an vnder value.

91. And to the end that as well our Iustices and Officers, as our other subiects may bee fully aduertized of our will and intention: and to take away all ambiguities and doubts which may be made by means of precedent Edicts, for the diuersity thereof: we haue declared, and declare all other precedent Edicts, secret Articles, letters, declarations, modifications, restrictions, interpretations, decrees, and records, as well secret as others, deliberations heretofore made by vs, or the Kings our predecessors, in our courts of Parliament, or else else where concerning matters of Religion, and the troubles happened in our said realme, A to be voyde and of noe force: to the which and to the derogatories therein containd, wee haue, and do by this our Ediēt derogate: decreeing exprelly, that our pleasure is that this our Ediēt shalbe firmly and inuioleably kept and obserued, as well by our said iustices and officers, as our other subiects, without regard vnto any thing that may seeme contrary.

92 And for the better assurance of the obseruation of that which we desire, we ordaine, will, and our pleasure is, that all Gouvernours and Lieutenants generall of our Prouinces, Baylifes, seneshalls, and other ordinary iudges of the townes of our said realme, presently after the reception of this Ediēt, shall sweare to cause it to be kept and obserued every one in his iurisdiction: as also the Maiors, Sheriffes, Capitoulx, Consulls, and Iurats of townes annuall, & perpetuall: inioyning also our said Bayliffes Seneshalls, or their Lieutenants, and other Iudges, to cause the cheefe inhabitants of the said townes to sweare the intertaynement of this present Ediēt, presently after the publication thereof. Taking all them of the sayd townes into our protection and sauegard, and one to keepe and defend another: charging them respectiuelly and by publike acts to answer ciuilly for all contrauentions which shalbe done to our said Ediēt within our said townes by the inhabitants thereof, or else to deliuer the infringers into the hand of Iustice.

Such was the Ediēt in the publication with some secret articles for the resolution of many other difficulties, for the cheefe government of them of this Religion, by the which many things were graunted, whereof it is not lawfull for subiects to demand the reason, being most certaine that the Prince doth not any thing but for the good of his people. It sufficeth that they know it which deserue to know it. But the more the secrets of an estate are lookt into, the more carefully they are to be concealed. This Ediēt which heretofore hath bene the cause of ciuill diuisions is now the true ciment of peace, the which shall powre forth from all parts streames of Heauenly Blessings. But as it is made for publike and generall respects, so must it haue priuat effects, in smothering all seedes of partialities and factions: and that we may find among the French, that which the Emperour Maximine desired vnto the Romans, a forgetfulnesse of thinges past, and assurance of loue to come.

The Ediēt was made at Nantes in Aprill 1598. but it was not verified by the court of Parliament at Paris, vntill February the yeare following.

The Ediēt was sent, by the care and dilligence of the Kings Attorney Generall unto all the Baylewikes depending vpon Paris: and yet his Maiesty had deputed in euery Prouince, certaine commissioners for the execution thereof. The exercise of the Catholike Religion was restored in Rochelle, and in aboute a hundred walled townes, and a thousand Parishes and Monasteries, where the said exercise had bin interdicted aboute fiftene yeares: and in Bearne for the space of one and thirty yeares.

This yeare death strooke a great stroake among men and women, who shewed their generous resolutions against the feare and terrors thereof. Peter de Pinac the last of that name Primat of France, Arch-bishop and Earle of Lions, died in the beginning of Ianuary: whose life was so famous, as it deserues to be breefely set downe in this history. The reputation which he had gotten at the Estates at Blois, made King Henry the third (a great Prince, as well in iudging, as in recompensing of good wits) to call him to his Councell after the death of Monluc Bishop of Valentia: whereas he shewed him selfe to be of that iudgement, as hee was in short time employed in the greatest affaires in Councell. At that time the Court was in a manner all Gascon, there was no entry into the Kings fauours, nor bounty, but at the Duke of Espernons pleasure, who was the Hephsestion of our Alexander. Peter de Pinac heart could not subiect it selfe to that of John Lewis of Nogaret. He was too much his owne to be any other mans, and thought that if he must needs serue, it was enough to serue the Maister, and not subiect himselfe to the will of the Seruant.

Hee did not affect the tedious seruitude of the Court, nor did much care for that forced kind of life. Writing vnto his friends, long before the trouble of the League, hee sayd, that amidst the greatnesse and honour of charges wherein the King did employ him, hee did not leaue to desire the content of happy retreat. But things fell out other-wise then hee expected. The League burst forth in Champagne. The King sent him to pacifie the

A Duke of Guise. In this negotiation hee had a quarrell with Esperson vpon certaine words which blemished both their honours. He had written a Poeme against the Mignons, where-with the King was offended, commanding him to leaue the court: so as hee retired himselfe to his owne house, after the treaty of peace made at Nemours. But as the Kings blowes were but threats, so knowing well that this Prelate was not to lue idly in a corner of the Realme and that this great desaigne of the league (like vnto a ball of snow) did increase in many townes whereas the Kings obedience was growne cold, and that the Princes enemies to this crowne prepared to gather the Flower de Luce, he neuer ceased vntill hee had called him againe to court.

This returne was the beginning of his misery. Many others before him hauing fallen into disgrace with the Prince, haue not beene raised againe but for a greater fall. It is seene in the courts of all Princes, such Tragedies are visuall. Hee was presently called to the Helme of affaires, and was followed and respected more then any other Nobleman in court. But as wee may not iudge of the daie by the morning, nor of the felicity of man by the good daies of his life, this happinesse was but the entry to misfortune which did attend him. Hee embarked himselfe in the same ship with the Duke of Guise, the which being broken at the Estates of Blois, hee had no other meanes to saue himselfe, but through the fauour of the Baron of Lix his Nephew. Hee was giuen in ranome to Gast, who kept him seuen or eight monethes in the castle of Amboise, and then set him at liberty for thirty thousand crownes. Hee went to the Duke of Maine, and seeing that the affaires of his party tended too much to confusion and to a popular government, hee perswaded him alwaies to retaine the forme of a Monarchy, to the end he might oppose a kinde of Royaltie against the King, and not be blamed to haue broken the bonds of the Estate. So through this aduice, they made Officers of the crowne, and gaue him the scales. Hee neuer engaged himselfe vpon the promises of Spaine, but sayd alwaies, that hee was a true hearted Frenchman.

The faction of Spaine knowing him to be such, hindred Pope Sixtus the fifth from giuing him a Cardinals-hat, and they dissuaded Clement the eight, who had sayd that at the first promotion he would remember his merits. He requited them well: when as the Spaniards came to Paris to propound the coronation and marriage of the Infanta Isabella of Spaine, letting them know that the Flower de Luce could not spin. He returned to Lions, leauing the Duke of Mayenne, intending to settle his affaires, and to accommodate himself with the peace and generall good of the Realme. At his returne grew that tumult against the Duke of Nemours, the which hee vsed ill, for his wisdom did not second the occasion. Great vnderstanding failes sometimes in the perfection of iudgement and discourse. Hee saw himselfe forced to depart the city, and neuer to returne againe vntill the King made his first entry. The King (who had shewed effects of his bounty, and clemency to his greatest enemies) could not loue him, hauing this impresson in his soule, that hee was the only Instrument to crosse his fortunes. Speaking one day of the peace of Nemours, in the yeere 1586, he sayd vnto him, that in that negotiation he had giuen good testimony that hee loued him not, and that he had done him bad seruice. My Liege (answered hee) I could not doe better for the seruice of the King my maister. I had done otherwise, if I had bene your seruant, as I am now. When as the Duke of Esperson returning out of Prouence, went to visit him at his palace, amongst other speeces of the remembrance of thinges past, hee sayd vnto him, that hee did not thinke there was any one in France whose fortunes had bene so croit as theirs: the Archbishop answered him, as for mine it was neuer croit but by you.

After the reduction of the city of Lions to the Kings obedience, this great spirit, borne to action, grew discontented to see himselfe no more in the honor and reputation that hee had bene. Hee then resolved to apply his minde onely to the affaires of his charge, to choose the time most conuenient for the tranquillity of the haue wherevnto he approached. When as the Duke of Nemours had made his escape out of Pierre-anizze, hee said, that he would not vse his liberty well: he writes vnto his friend in this manner.

Remember that I haue alwaies sayd vnto you, that Monsieur de Nemours will finde himselfe much intangled with the Spaniards, who haue led Monsieur de Maine into an inextricable Laborinth, and will bring Monsieur de Nemours vnto a miserable Estate: and I dare in a

The King sent for him to the Estates at Roan: but the necessity of his affaires would not suffer him to goe. He said that he was not fit for this age, and that hee was like vnto the Adamant, which serues not for all seas. In the end of his last yeere, hee complained vnto his friends of the shortnesse of his life, saying that hee was not to liue about tenne or twelue yeeres, when as he liued not twelue daies. His Physitions disagreed vpon the cause of his griefe: he had beene long troubled with the Emoroyds, the which had so emptied his bodie, as there was no bloud found in him when hee was opened. His lights were much altered. And for that his Physition sayd vnto him, that his griefe was the goutte, he replied. Is it possible that any one should die of the goutte without a feuer? I see well what it is: seeing men vnderstand nothing, we must haue recourse vnto God. The third day of his sicknesse his body was called to the Earth, and his soule to Heauen. Hee withstood the terrors of death with as great a courage as when it was presented vnto him at the Estates of Blois. Foure or five houres before his decease a Capuchin came to visite him and to comfort him, exhorting him to free this last passage courageously, and to let him know that the issue of this life is equall. Death disrobing man of his titles and dignities, as Stage-players doe their attire: he called him simply by his name: when as he vnderstood this new manner of complemen- and that they called him Peter de Pinac without any other ceremony, hee lifted vp his head and eyes, to say vnto him that spake, what art thou? They found that this speech did somewhat amaze him, and that hee did take it as a watch-word of his departure, which was about midnight.

The Duke
Ioyeuse returnes to the Capuchin.

Motive whic
he became a Capuchin.

The Duke of Biron did see him in his sicknesse and assisted at his funerall. No man lying did better iudge of the nature of men by the consideration of their visages: hee did diuine of the Marthall Birons fortune by his countenance, and the proportion of his visage, for hauing considered it some-what curiously, hee sayd vnto his Sister after his departure; He hath the worst Physiognomy that euer I obserued in my life, as of a man that would perseuer miserably. The Archbishop of Lions had profited so little by the troubles, as had he liued longer, necessity had forced him to feele great discomforts: his Sisters Estate was engaged, the fruites of his benefices were seized on, and yet his table was as sumptuous, as in the best daies of his prosperity. The League had cost him fifty thousand crownes: the Doubloons of Spaine had left him nothing but Doubles.

Those which haue read the publike actions of this Prelate, may iudge of his Doctrine, but no man can represent the grace and force of his action, but those which haue seene them. Hee had in him a concurrence of all things necessary for an eloquent discours. A graue pleasing countenance, a goodly personage, a facility of words, and an action that did charm his Auditors. The Duke Ioyeuse, Marthall of France, being at Paris in March, hauing heard father Laurence Sermons in Saint Germain L' Auxerrois, being moued in conscience, after that he had taken his leaue of the Ladies and some of his friends, hee returned againe to the Capuchins: where being receiued by the fathers, he did a hard penance, and submitted himselfe to all the duties of a religious man. All men were amazed to see him returne the second time to his couent, being plunged (in shew) vp to eares in the delights of the world: but his conscience tied him to returne by the bond of his vow, perswading him that it were better not to vow, then not to keepe a vow made freely, and without constraint or compulsion in his maiority. The first motive of being a Capuchin came into his heart by inspiration, when as the deceased King Henry the third went on foote in procession to Chartres to haue issue, if it pleased God. Hee was then called Earle of Bouchages: he made choise of this order among all others, the better to doe his penance. And the rather, for that hee vnderstood, that he was dedicated by his deceased father, to be of the Church. When hee was first a Nouice, hee applied his study with so great a courage, as he was blamed for his great diligence, wearing the haire continually. He had his shoulders all torne with wounds.

In this Estate hee continued vntill the hottest of the late miserable warre: when as after the death of his father, his younger brother, who was a Knight of Malta and Grand-Prior of Languedoc was called Duke of Ioyeuze (for the Duke of Ioyeuze, brother-in-law to King

A Henry the third deceased, his eldest brother, who was slaine at the battaile of Contras with Saint Sauour his yongest brother, died without children) the sayd Duke of Ioyeuze being acknowledged by them of Tholouze, Narbone and others of the League, for their head, he made an enterprize vpon the towne of Villemer in Lauragais, where hauing planted the siege, for that it was held by the Royalists, euen as hee thought to haue forced the towne, the Lords of Themines, Chimbut and Miffille came to releuee it, who charged him with such aduantage, as they put al his army to rout, so as the said Duke retyring to the passage of a riuer, he was drowned with many others. By this meanes the house of Ioyeuze was reduced to the Cardinall of Ioyeuze his brother and to the Earle of Bouchage a Capuchin (whom then they called father Angelo) the Tholousains and Nobility of their party being much amazed, had recourse vnto the Cardinall, whom they intreated often to take the charge of leading them: the which he would neuer accept. And in the end, at their instant sute, that in raising his house, hee would succor them by the meanes of the Earle of Bouchages his brother, who was then more then capable of such a charge: but hee was a Capuchin. This difficulty was propounded to the councill of the diuines, who concluded that by reason of the vrgent necessity they should withdraw him from thence: the which was propounded vnto himselfe, and hee refused it. But after they had laied before him the example of his owne father, who being Grand Prior of Languedoc was yet dispensed withall to marry and to raise his house, the which remained onely in him, and whereof God had approued his blessing by the effect, so many braue Noblemen being borne of that marriage, hee consented to returne vnto the world, vpon two conditions. The one was, that it should be with the consent and leaue of the Generall of the Order. The other by the dispensation of the Holy Sea, and that hee might returne againe when God should send rest to the Church and State. This obtained from the Pope and his Generall, father Angelo is againe of the world, and doth all acts of a worldling, of a captaine and of a souler, applying himselfe to the humors of the time. After that he had pacified many popular seditions in Tholouza, and beene a meanes to reduce it to the Kings obedience, being at Paris, hauing with the Kings good liking and pleasure married his onely Daughter to the Duke of Monpensier a Prince of the blood, hee bethought himselfe of his bond contained in his dispence, and went and yelded his obedience vnto the Holy Sea and Order, whereas hee is now one of the chiefe conductors, hauing referred all his domesticall affaires to the Cardinall his brother, and to the Duke his sonne-in-law.

His mothers reares preuailed much for his returne. Shee was more afflicted for this change, then for the death of all her other children, and neuer ceased vntill she had drawne Friar Angelo (for so she still called him) out of the deserts of Egypt, to Mount Caluarie, and that shee had seene him in the habit which hee had left. These be mighty effects of grace, which reformes that which is deformed, and conformes that which is reformed, confirms that which is conformed, transformes that which is confirmed, and makes the soule to liue more in Heauen, whether it aspires, then in the body where it breathes. The King went to visit him, and commended his resolution, saying that he did some-times thinke to speake vnto him of it: and had done it, but he doubted that he would mistake his meaning, and thinke hee did it to bee rid of him. Dying one day in a place whereas there was onely his Maieesty and three other Noblemen, he sayd vnto them, that in the world there were men of al conditions and qualities to bee found, but they should hardly assemble foure so different, and that in these foure whereof he was one, there was a sinner conuerted, a Leaguer repented, a Capuchin diuerted, and a Huguenot peruerted.

This amazement in court for the Duke of Ioyeuze, was increased by the sodaine death of Schomberg, who was taken with an Apoplexie returning from Conflans, whereas Villemer had feasted the King and all his councill. It gaue him no respite to speake French nor Dutch. Warre dying, had left no quarrell in France, but for the Marquisate of Salusses, which the King demanded as depending vpon Daulphiné, and the Duke of Sauoy sought to vnite it vnto his house, from the which he pretends the Daulphins had wrested it. The difference of this restitution must be determined by the Pope, who was named Arbitrator, by the treaty of Veruins. It is the most important sute that hath beene long time in Rome. The parties send their Ambassadors to Rome, to sue vnto the Arbitrator for iudgement.

President

1599. President Brulart goes for the King, and the Count d'Arconas for the Duke of Sauoy, and they come to Rome in the beginning of the yeere. In the meane time the Duke beleecheth his Maieſty, that hee will giue him leaue to visit him. The King answered the Duke, that hee would gladly see him: but resolving to accompany his Sister when shee should goe into Lorraine, he should not make any long aboad in any one place during the rest of the winter, and therefore hee desired him that hee would defer his voyage vnto the spring, thinking that he should not be troubled to seeke him any farther, then in the city of Lions, where hee meant to bee about the same time. They pursue the Arbitrement at Rome: the Arbitrator (the best of good Popes) shewes as great Integrity, as the parties did passion.

The Duke of Sauoy seeks to be reconciled vnto the King.

Multa furi prohibentur que tamen facta tenent.

Brauerie of the French.

Hee was free from all affection that was contrary to Iustice, and would doe nothing contrary to his conscience. Hee was carefully instructed by either party, concerning this controuersie. You may read the whole proceſſe at large in the Originall. The Duke of Sauoy (hauing kept the Marquise of Salusses some yeeres, whilest that France had turned her owne armes against her selfe) considered, that so soone as the King should overcome his other affaires, the recovery thereof would not bee the last of his enterprises, for the restauration of that to his crowne. He was therefore one of the first that sought to reconcile himselfe vnto the King: and the first propositions were made by Sebastian Zemet. The King could hardly beleue that the Duke of Sauoy would separte himselfe from the designs and counells of the King of Spaine (who had alwaies a body of an army in France) being so strictly tied vnto him. He therefore sends to Syllery, his Ambassador in Switzerland, to enter into conference vpon this matter with the Dukes Ambassadour there, and to sound his intention. The Duke had sent the Marquis of Aix into Spaine, to know how he should treat with the King. At the same time they surprized a Pacquet comming from Spaine, the which being deciphered, they found the Duke desired to treat in good earnest: for his Ambassadour writing from Madril, sent him word, that touching the forme of the accord, for the which hee desired to haue counsell, the King of Spaines Ministers would neuer tell it, but with many conditions, and secretly, although it were a thing which they desired, that they might retire their forces, and employ them in Flanders, whereas all things went to wracke. That if his Highnesse, whom it did import, could finde the meanes to effect it, hee was assured in the end they would find it good, as they had done many other designs, rejected by them in the beginning, and afterwards allowed, according to the successe. Many conferences were made concerning this cause, before the peace of Veruins, but nothing could be concluded. His Holinesse being made Iudge and Arbitrator of all controuersies, betwixt his Maieſty and the Duke, the parties produce all their pretensions. The Ambassadour of France demanded restitution of the possession, saying: That it ought to bee iudged before the Propriety, and that the possession of about a hundred yeeres, should serue for a good title to France, if they had nothing else. The Dukes Ambassadour answered, That power may giue possession without right, and that his Master had preferred his interest with the possession.

After many difficulties and much dispute, the French men that were resident within Rome, gaue it out, that they had pleaded too much: that there was no reason the Pope should ouerthrow the right of a great King, to please a petty Prince: that they must end this quarrell with the Cannon in the plaines of Piedmont. As these men braued it in words, the others published their reasons in writing, shewing that the rule of the law, which will haue the dispossessed restored to his possession, is not practised among Princes, nor for principalities. The French insist vpon the contrary, and vrge an end of this businesse with great vehemency, desiring rather to be presently dispatcht, then to languish in the tediousnesse of the remedy. The Spaniards delayed the decision of this proceſſe all they could, holding the dispute more auailable to them then the resolution, and the disease more profitable then the cure.

The time appointed for the Arbitrement was almost spent in tedious difficulties, as vnplesing vnto the Pope as to the French. And although he had no lesse zeale to maintaine concord, then hee had shewed affection and care to suppress discord, yet would hee gladly haue beene freed of this Iudgement, for the bad effects which hee did apprehend, and whereof the coniectures were easie by the consideration of things past. Hee desired not that that the Iudgement which hee should pronounce, should giue any cause to the one or the other, to complaine of his Iustice, being troubled what hee should pronounce, for that it was a thing without example, and was dangerous to determine of that which had beene decided. In these two extremes, either to iudge the possession of the Marquise to the King, or to ioyne to the Petitory to content the Duke: he findes a meanes to haue the Marquise sequestred into his hands as a Nouiter, to remaine in deposito, vntill it should be adiudged vnto the one or the other. To this end F. Bonauenture Calatagiron, Generall of the Friars, and newly made Patriarch of Constantinople, was sent into France with Roncas the Dukes Secretary: vnto whom the King not onely granted (against the aduite of his counsell) that the Marquise should remaine in deposito in the Popes power, as one who had no pretension nor title vnto it: but also a prolongation of the Arbitrement for two moneths. The Duke was well pleased, that this sequestration should maintaine the hope of his possession. The French desired rather a definitive sentence, then a sequestration, for although they had no cause to doubt of the Depositors fidelity: yet through too much trust, men doe often fall into great inconueniences. The Kings Ambassadour freed them of those apprehensions, and managed this Sequestration to politickely, as they found it in better estate, then the Kings counsell did expect. Hee carried himselfe herein like a man of great Iudgement, neither could he serue his Maister meanely, in a subiect of so great import. The Duke grew in some ieaousie of Arconas, for that hee was a Milanois, beleueing that he did rather follow the Spaniards intentions, then his; wherupon he called him backe to Turin, vnder colour to send him into Spaine. He that succeeded Arconas in that charge, marred, al recieuing the Instructions that were given him too lightly, and deliuering them too indiscreetly, for visiting the Cardinals, which hee thought did fauour the intentions of the King of Spaine, and the Duke his Maister, he drew nothing from them, but that the issue of this businesse would not be as he expected. The rest of the Cardinals which had other designs, blamed the Dukes counsell, who had engaged him in the expectation of a iudgement both doubtfull and of small honour: that the best hee could hope for, was the hatred of a great Prince, who would alwaies remember this iniury: and that they had caused him to plead so long for his owne. The French vsed other subtilties, to make him counsell the Duke to breake off the Arbitrement. And for that this engagement in an others hands, was not plesing vnto them, they held it little for the reputation of France, to follow such tedious formes by the way of Iustice, seeing there was a more speedy course by the way of Armes.

They gaue it out, that the Depository would hold things in that Estate, as when it pleased him hee would make it knowne, that the thing engaged belonged vnto himselfe: that he had good correspondency with the King, and that his intention was to make one of his Nephewes Marquis of Salusses, and Feudatarie of France. This feare, or rather indiscretion of the Ambassador, imbarqued him so farre in this ieaousie, as hee holds the Iudge for suspect, and sends to his Maister, that he should dislike of the Depositor, as much as of the King. And although the Popes intention was not to be corrupted, yet he beleueed it to be true by the Popes coldnesse, and hee did not onely beleue it, but thinking it a basenesse to dissemble it, and treason not to speake it, hee told the Pope, That his Maisters Highnesse did expect an assured Iudgement from his Holinesse, to bee maintained in possession of the Marquise, as a thing which he held of his Predecessors, whereof hee had beene spoiled by the violence of the stronger, and had recovered it by the good hap of an occasion. The Pope said vnto him, that hee desired not to leaue these two Princes long in this dispute, nor to breake the course of happinesse which their subiects promised themselves by the continuance of the peace. But the Ambassador, who was transported, added: That if his Holinesse gaue sentence in fauour of his Maister, hee should dispose of the thing adiudged, and finde him as full of affection as any other, to second his intentions, when it should please him to haue the Marquise for one of his Nephewes. The Pope who marcht vp-rightly, being offended at an offer so contrary to the integrity of his intention, said vnto the Ambassador, that hee neuer had any such thought, and to free him from all feare, hee would desist from the Iudgement, and deale no more neither with the Arbitrement nor Sequestration.

All men thought at Rome, that the Arbitrement was broken, and the consent for the A Sequestration reuoked: the French cared not, and the Duke was content that things should passe by other formes then those of the Consistory. The Ambassador of Spaine resyding at Rome would not haue the Duke of Sauoy do his businesse alone, nor the controuersie for the Marquisate of Salusses, to remain at his disposition: the King his Maister was interested therein, it was reasonable he should be the first Mououer of all his motions. He therefore intreated the Pope, not to leaue things imperfect, and not to refuse to end a worke so happily begun for the generall good of all Christendome, greatly interested in the concord of two Kings, who could not long continue, if all occasions of warre, that might grow vpon this question for the Marquisate of Salusses, were not taken away. The Duke had already B found in many occasions, that the counsels of Spaine were not alwaies put in execution to his content: that he fastned his hopes to a rotten cable, trusting to their resolutions: and that their deceites (though couered with goodly shewes of loue and affection) were so much the more odious vnto him, for that hee which deceiues vnder the name of friendship, is more to bee blamed, then he that is deceived. He therefore propounded to do his businesse without them, and from many great discontents, hee tooke a resolution to goe into France: so as from that time hee neuer slept quietly, vntill hee were assured of the Kings word.

The Duchesse of Beaufort had alwaies fauoured his intentions, and desired to assure her selfe of such a Prince, who offered vnto her all his meanes to support her fortune, hauing sent vnto her the goodliest Iewell that was in the cabinet of Madam Marquerite his Mother. Shee also considering, that whatsoeuer is done by men, may bee vndone by them again: that Princes fauours are inconstant, and that humane things haue nothing firme nor constant, no more then the Sea; she willingly gaue eare to the promises which he made her for the good of her hopes. He could not haue found a better solicitor: but death tooke her awaay. She parted from Fontainebleau in the beginning of the weeke before Easter, to come to Paris, and there to passe the feasts. The Diuiners, whom idlenesse and curiosity entertaines commonly at the Court, said, that a child should hinder her from attaining to that wherevnto she did aspire. She had heard some thing, and in this apprehension, shee tooke her leaue of the King at her departure, as if shee had bene assured neuer to see him more, D recommending her children vnto him, the finishing of her house at Monceaux, and the rewarding of her seruants. This recommendation of her children did chiefly concerne the Duke of Vendosme, whom shee loued deere, and whom shee intended to bring vp in the most perfect institution of vertue.

Being at Paris, she went on the Wednesday to Saint Antonies Church to here the Mu-sicke, where she was seized with extreame paines, which neuer left her vntill that life had left her. They killed the Infant in her, and tormented her with such cruel convulsions, as they drew her mouth to the nape of her neck. She was first lodged at Zamets house, nere Saint Antonies gate: but being fallen into this extremity, she was carried to the lodging of Madame de Sourdis her Aunt, in the cloister of Saint Germain l'Auxerrois, where on the Saterday she ended her life. Vpon the first aduertisment of her sicknesse, the King went from Fontainebleau to see her. The Marshall d' Ornano met him, and beseeched him to returne, for that sight could not prolong the life of the sicke, and would but increase his griefe. Presently after arriued Belieure, who brought the newes of her death, into whose Carosse the King went, to euaporate more at ease his sighes, the which hope of recovery had somewhat restrained. Words are not able to charme such sensible blowes: and it is an error to thinke, that griefe is driuen away by exorcismes, that it regards words, or is stayed by discourse. Yet this first violence of the Kings affliction, was calmed by the wife and graue admonitions of this Nestor, who said, that France had acknowledged him for her Hercules, and as hee had bene like vnto him in many labours equally glorious and admirable, so now he should bee vnlike him, in that hee did abandon the Argonautes, for the griefe hee had for the death of Hias, whom hee loued.

This death did much trouble the court, for the sorrow and lamentation which the King made for her. Her beauty & good behauiour had moued the King to loue her, for the long absence of Q. Marguerite (whose place she was in hope to possesse absolutely) She left him 3 children:

A children: Cesar Monsieur Duke of Vendosme, Alexander Monsieur, who was named Earle of Armagnac, and at this time is appointed Grand Prior of France: and one Daughter.
She was more lamented of priuate persons, then of the publike, who found her hopes more insupportable then her carriage. Shee offended few, and bound many vnto her. A great personage said: That she was of such an humor, that seeing the King must needs loue, hee could not loue an obiekt, whose loue would be lesse preiudiciall to himselfe, nor to his people, so as she continued in the first condition of her birth.

This great beauty, neare vnto the which the most esteemed beauties had no light, (as great bodies seeme small in respect of greater) vanished in an instant. This flower against the order of others which last vnto the seuenth day, and sometime twice as long, did wither, dry, and fell downe dead within two or three houres. She died too soone for them that had made triall, that her fauour was a step vnto the Kings: many did write vpon her death, which shewed that she had offended few, and bound many vnto her. Death took her at such time when as those that do desire to be reputed faire after their death, should desire to dye before the failing of their beauty. For whenas they dye old, and that there remains nothing in the vessell but lees, they remember no more what they haue bene, and speake no more of them, but as of a torch which falls to ashes, when as all that intertaind it is molten and consumed: or as flowers which the more pleasing, liuely, and well growing they bee, displease and stinke the more, when they are gathered, withered, and haue lost their colour.
She was one of the three beauties, which being seene together, they said of the first, that shee was faire: of the other, that she had bene: and of the younger, that she would be.

The Duke of Sauoy was much grieued for her death. But as Domesticall afflictions, which chance to Princes, although they be separated from the publike, are not lesse feeling and violent; his griefe to see his affaires so crost on all sides, was augmented by the death of D. Philippin his bastard brother, whom Creguy slue in combat: It is a great paine to purchase honor, a greater to preferue it, but greatest of all to recover it when it is lost. Speaking of honour, I meane the reputation of goodly and vertuous actions, whereof honour is the recompence, and the sweetest nourishment. Of those things which do blemish the lustre of honour, the first and most base is, to speake or do any thing for feare of death. The second is, to endure and suffer a word of contempt, iniury or affront. The third is a lye. This rigorous obseruation of the point of Honour, doth now countenance a combat, as memorable for the condition of the persons, the forme and circumstance of the combat, and the cause of the quarrell, as any other of this age. Quarrells haue not alwaies reasonable grounds: this had nothing but despight, which D. Philippin had conceiued, being told him that Creguy had vanted he had gotten his scarfe, at the taking of the little Fort, built by the Duke of Sauoy, neare vnto Chamouffet, to fauour the passage of his army. D. Philippin some moneths after, thinking that this was spoken to the preiudice of his honour, sent him a challenge. Creguy comes to the place appointed by the appeale: but the appellant was kept backe by the Dukes commandement. The Earle of Brandix (who seemed also to haue E a desire to fight) sent word to Des Dignieres Generall of the army, that if he had any mind to see the combat betwixt D. Philippin and Creguy his sonne-in-law, he should not returne without his part of the sport, but he should find one to exchange a thrust with him. Hereupon Creguy was taken prisoner going to succor Charbonniers. During his imprisonment the quarrell grew to that point, as if he had bene at liberty, it had bene ended at Turin.
After that the Treaty of peace had sent him home into Daulphiné, D. Philippin sent to challenge him at Grenoble, and they met neare vnto the Fort of Barrault, where the appellant was thrust through the thigh. This combat, which had bene sufficient to haue ended this quarrell, was the cause of another, for it was told the Duke, that Creguy had vanted, that he had of the blood of Sauoy. Wherewith he was offended, and gaue D. Philippin to vnder-stand, that he would esteeme him no more as he had done, nor euer see him more, if he were not reuenged of those words. Whereupon, another challenge was sent, the which was accepted as chearefully as the first.

The prohibition which the King had made of single combats, vpon paines not onely preiudiciall to their Estates, but shamefull to their reputations, would not suffer them to fight in Daulphiné: that the example of the Gouernours Sonne-in-law should not draw others to the contempt of the Law. It was therefore resolved, that they should fight in the Duke of Sauoy's country, vnder Saint Andrew, a place belonging vnto the Countesse of Antremont, vpon the banke of the riuer of Rhosne, on foot, and in their shirts, which is the most resolute kind of combat. That they should fight with rapier and dagger: That the Baron of Attignac should second D. Philippin, and la Buisse should second Crequy. That none but they should come into the field, and they should not part the Combatants, vntill that one of their deaths had ended the combat. That there should bee twelue Gentlemen on Daulphiné side, and as many on that of Sauoy, who should be ready to receiue the bodie of the vanquished, or to resist any violence that should be offered vnto the victor. That the twelue of Sauoy, should be so farre from the place of combat, as they of Daulphiné might passe the water, and come at the same instant to the place of fight. It was long disputed whether the Seconds should fight: for la Buisse said, that he would not be one, vnlesse he might giue or take, and that he which goes in such actions to be a simple spectator, wants affection or courage. But the Combatants thought it good that the Seconds should not meddle with the decision of their fortunes.

The day appointed beeing come, all came vnto the place. De Morges passed the Rhosne, and scoured vp and downe the fields, to see if there were no ambush nor greater assembly then was set downe in the Accord. The Seconds visited the armes of the two Champions, and searched them, if they had any Charmes or Inchantments about them. La Buisse did importune D. Philippin much to part, saying, that hee had a desire either to driue it off till night, or to defer the triall til the next day. He told D. Philippin by the way, all the braueries he could of Crequies valour, to the end he might daunt him: and seeing Crequy as farre off in the meadow, he cried vnto him, he is ours: but Philippin carrying an eye without trouble, and a heart without feare, said vnto him: why haue you so bad an opinion of me? Not so, replied La Buisse, I know you are braue and generous, but you haue to do with one of the most furious men at armes in France, and that makes me foretell your losse. La Buisse forgot nothing in this action, that might shew the office of a friend. And it is well knowne, that if Crequy had not returned, la Buisse would haue stayed to haue slaine D. Philippin and D. Attignac, or to haue beene slaine by them. Du Belier his brother, knowing his humor, and that he had too much courage and honour, to returne without his friend, was vpon the banke of Rhosne, attending the issue of the combat, meaning to passe through the riuier on horse-backe, and to haue had his part of the glory or perill of this action. When as D. Philippin entred the field, he had his iudgement so cleare, as obseruing his enemies gard, and the aduantage which he had, turning his backe to the Sunne, he sayd, Monsieur de la Buisse, diuide the Sunne: and seeking himselfe to make the partition, he thrust at Crequy with such violence, as the lookers on doubted of the issue of the combat, seeing him still in his daunger. This first fury did but thrust Crequy out of the meddow, and Philippin out of breath. Crequy beeing resolved to thrust, not according vnto the iudgement of choller, but of occasion, attended vntill this fury were past, thrusting him into the body with such force, as he ouerthrew him, and nayled him to the ground. Hee then willed him to aske his life of him: but he was not in case to humble himselfe to that demand, neither was it in Crequies power to giue it him: for his wounds were mortall, and all those that were of his side cried to him: Dispatch him; neither did Attignacs request preuaile any thing. Crequy repassed the Rhosne with the twelue Gentlemen which came to fetch him, leauing D. Philippin vpon the place. The Duke repented him of the commandement which he had giuen, or it may be his religion (by the aduice of his Confessor) counselled him to reuoke a commandement, in the execution whereof there was hazard of two liues, and the losse of two soules. He sent a post to forbid them to fight, but he arriued too late. Crequy thanked God for his victory, and would not suffer his friends to vse their accustomed congratulations, intreating them to speake no more of it, although the glory were great, to haue vanquished his enemy in a forraigne country. D. Philippin was carried to his lodging. The Religious of Pierre Chastell refused to bury him according to the holy Constitutions of the Church-gouernment, which holds them that die in this sort desperate and murderers of themselves, and makes the paine to continue after death, that the shame which follows them to the graue, might diuert them from this liberty.

The Estate of the Kings at-taires in Suisse.

As the Kings enemies at Rome laboured that he could haue no reason of the Marquise of Salusses, so there wanted no practises to trouble his affaires in Suisse. It is a long time since the King of Spaine discovered his ielousie for the general alliance of the Crowne of France with the thirteene Cantons, hauing long practised to haue his share. Our Kings hauing alwaies hindred it, he could neuer get any footing there, as King of Spaine, but hee hath had an hereditary alliance for the reuenues of the house of Austria. So in the raigne of King Charles the ninth, when as the King of Spaine demanded to be receiued into alliance, Belieure Ambassador of France seeing the Catholike Cantons almost perswaded to prefer new amities before auncient, layd before them the great succors they had receiued of the Crowne of France for the sealing of their liberty: whereas contrariwise the house of Austria had done all they could to suppress them. That they should be wary, not to trust in the alliance of a house offended, in the which the wound did yet bleed, by the death of three Princes defeated by their armes. That he was not ignorant, that the King of Spaine, as defended from the house of Austria, had hereditary desseignes vpon them, by reason whereof the greatnesse and prosperity of his affaires should be suspect vnto them: for as wee ought neuer to feare nor suspect the prosperitie of friends, so must we alwaies doubt that of enemies. These admonitions were of such force, as for that time the Ambassadors of Spaine returned as they came.

But since the troubles of the last ciuill warre in France, the King found himselfe charged with so many affaires within the Realme, as he could not possibly prouide for all abroad. His owne subiects did so trouble him, as he could not possibly prouide for all abroad. His owne subiects did so trouble him as he could not answer the hopes of his allies. This was a goodly occasion for the King of Spaine to worke his will with the Suisses, and to winne the game, seeing that no man played against him. And as mercenary friendship vanissheth, when as money failes, the French Crownes appearing no more in Suisse, the enemy caused his Ducats to bee disperfed among the petty Cantons, so as they choaked all the first seedes of the Flower-de-luce. Then might you see in France, Suisses against Suisses, and Cantons against Cantons, the one shewing their duties vnto the King as his allies, the other armed against his seruice, as hirelings to the King of Spaine. When as they see that they were not payed their pensions, and that their Captaines and Colonels received nothing of that which was due vnto them, the fiue petty Cantons tyed themselves more straightly to the King of Spaine: and Colonel Pfister, who had great credit among them, taught them not to cast their eyes but vpon the Sunne which riseth at the Indies. The greater Cantons continued still firme in the Kings friendship. The wisdome of Brulart shewed it selfe in this bad season, as good Pylots are best knowne in the greatest tempests: for hee entertained the Kings seruice beyond all hope, in the greatest of his troubles, when as the King had for a scepter, his Lance, for his Louvre, a Tent; and for his credit, hope, and the lawfull right of a Kingdome. It may iustly be said, that he did great seruice to France in this charge, and the wisest haue wondred, how he could maintaine the affections of this people, when they were entertained onely with the words of his wisdome, and how he could so long continue this hope amidst the common despaire of the affaires of France. But when as the Suisses did see that all France was reduced vnder the Kings obedience, their patience was turned into complaints, and they gaue it out, that if they had not effects in words, where-with they had beene fed so long, as they saw the King could giue them nothing else, they had courage enough to come and demand it themselves. During the seege of Amiens there was a Captaine of one of the petty Cantons, who seeking to make his profite of the time, and of the extremity of the Kings affaires, propounded a bold counsell to get their pay.

The petty Catholike Cantons allied to Spaine.

Monsieur de Salusse Ambassador in Saule.

The Realme was yet so full of trechery, the King so ill serued of part of his subiects, the forces of Spaine so great, and so farre entred into France, as if they had done what he propounded, our Cesar had not sent them backe with so good a composition as in former times: he had done what he could to giue them money. The Court of Parliament had confirmed certaine Edicts, the profit whereof was appointed to content them: as that of reu- mon of the Registers to the Reuenues; that of the sealing of Lether, and Companies of Handi-crafts men. Whilst that the Captaines and Colonels laboured for the execution, the 1599. the Ambassador entertained the rest with good words and great hopes, which serues much A to temper the impatience of the most violent, and the languishing wearinesse of attendants. He imparted vnto them the Kings counsels for the re-establishment of his affaires, and the payment of that which was due vnto them.

The King sent them money: but as there was not so much as they expected, and that the greatest part was appointed for such as had serued in the last occasions: so it did but increase their discontents and complaints of the rest, so as in the beginning of this year, Morfontaine the Kings Ambassador left his charge to come into France. Such as thought to make their profit of this retreat, gaue it out, that it was forced: but it was freely of himselfe, who thought it expedient for the Kings affaires to make offer of this voyage, and to charge himselfe with their demands: but the Suisses stayed not long to demand his return, B after the which he died, and was solemnly buried at Solleure in a rich Tombe. The King doth busband the Peace well. He employes all his thoughts for the profite of his subjects, to restore them to those commodities wherof Warre had deprived them. And therefore considering that a great multitude of his people remained vnprofitable, for that they were not employed in trades and occupations most necessarie for traffike: for that the works which should be made within the Realme by Frenchmen, were bought and sold by strangers, namely, silkes, and cloth of gold and siluer: he did therefore forbid by an Edict, the entrie into his Realme of all Stuffs, made of Silke, Gold or Siluer, pure or mixt, vpon paine of confiscation: to the end the French might be employed in the making of all those marchandizes, which were forbidden to be brought in.

As the Marchants of Tours did sollicite these prohibitions, so they of Lions made great sute to hinder it. They alledged, that prohibiting the entrie of Marchandize made by hand, they must of necessity be made in France, the which being well planted, would yeeld sufficient commodity to nourish 500000. Frenchmen, and the gold and siluer, which goes out of the realme in specie, in great abundance, should continue there still. Those of Lions did shew, that this prohibition made the King to loose halfe his Custome at Lions: that it would ruine the Faires; and this ruine would draw after it the ruine of the city, the which had bin built for the commerce and traffick of all Europe, and was neuer seene more flourishing then since strangers frequented it, by meanes whereof, it did for a time so abound with money, as our Kings haue found great succours in the necessity of their affaires, and sometimes were indebted fixe or seuen millions of Gold, as well to the Inhabitants, as to Marchant strangers. That the whole State was interested in her preferuation, being one of the bulwarkes of the weakest part, and lying open to the enterprises of his enemies. That many strangers, being ready since the peace, to come and make their Banke at Lions, were held backe vpon the brute of the prohibition of strange wares, and if the city should continue dis-inhabited of Marchants of that quality, it would be dangerous to leaue it in the hands of poore Artisans, who are insolent in time of peace, impatient in troubles, and alwaies desirous of innouations, hauing nothing more vnpleasing vnto them then the present. Notwithstanding all these reasons, the King would haue the Edict passe, and the Duchesse of Beaufort was greatly affected to it. The deceased King would haue done it, and it was found reasonable by his Councell: but in the end, time did let them know, that it was no time to vse such prohibitions, and that before they hinder the entrie of forraigne stufes made of silke, they must haue wherewithall to make it within the Realme. And therefore this Edict was reuoked at the Quenes entrie into Lions.

with a diuell.

This yeare there was a notable imposture, which ministred matter of discourse to the Kings Councell, to Preachers in their pulpits, and to the Court of Parliament. A young mayd of Romorantin, named Martha Brosnier, hauing curiously read ouer the discourse of the diuell of Laon, she was so transported with the imagination of that which shee read, as imitating the motions of her folly, she seemed to haue the Fits and Passions of one that were possessed with the diuell, although nothing be so hard to counterfeit as the diuell. James Brosnier her father, a man of himselfe busie and factious, desirous of new things, hauing obserued in his daughter furious motions, with such a stupidity & feare, as it did moue commiseration and dread in the most resolute, & feare in the weaker, he seemed to beleue that which he wold haue the people beleue, who came running to see this new diuell, publishing euery

A euery where, that his Daughter was possessed with an euill spirit. He presented her to the Theologall of Orleance, who beleueed something: and seeing that his desaigne grew into credit, he led her to the most famous places of all the Diocesse for deuotion: to all the people beleueed certainly that she was possessed: the which must be verified by the iudgement of the Church. But the Bishop of Angiers, a graue and wise man, discouered her to be a counterfeiter, and sent her away, threatening to punish her, if she returned into his Diocesse. The Officiall of Orleance did also find out her imposture, forbidding the Clergie of the Diocesse to exorcise her, vpon paine of suspension. After that she had runne fifteene moneths vpe and downe the country, and being growne perfect in her counterfeit trickes and diuinish motions, her father thinking she knew enough, and that it was now time to present her B vpon the great Theater of France, he conducts her to Paris, and leads her to all the Churches to gather almes: The people cry out presently to haue the diuell coniuered, holding it an impiety to suffer one of Gods creatures to be so tyrannically tormented by the diuell. The Bishop assembles the learnedst Diuines and Phisitions of the Vniuersitie of Paris, to haue their aduise about the coniuering of this Diuell: the Phisitions say plainly, that it was but counterfeit. A Capuchin grieved to see the incredulity of the Phisitions, said with some passion. If any one beleuee not: if he will but stay her, the diuell will carry him away. Marescot fearing not to be carried away by this kind of Diuell, answered, that he would abide the hazard: and setting his knee vpon Martha's brest, and his hand to her necke, he commaunded her to be quiet, whereupon she stirred not, saying, that her Diuell was gone.

the Court, the 24. of May,

The Court of Parliament seeing that all the people did run after Martha, and fearing that superstition (which goes before, and is alwaies the fore-runner of impiety) should diuide their opinions and affections, and cause some dangerous sedition, they commanded that Martha should be deliuered into the hands of the Lieutenant Criminall. The Clergy sayd, that those that were possessed, did not belong vnto the temporall iurisdiction, and that the Church had power to iudge thereof. Yet she is committed to prison. They haue recourfe vnto the King, who commaunds that the Parliament be obeyed. So as by a decree of the great Chamber, and the Tournelle, the Lieutenant of the short Robe was inioyned to conduct Martha with her sisters, and James Brosnier her father to Romorantin, forbidding her to depart out of the towne, without leaue from the Iudge of the place. And so the Diuell was condemned by a sentence.

Another Diuell possessed the soule of a miserable wretch, who made an execrable attempt against the Kings person. A Capuchin of Milan, called father Honorio, gaue intelligence thereof, and the party that was described in his letter, was found and apprehended at Paris. The King did thanke this good religious man by expresse letters, and did witnesse by his Ambassador resident at Rome, that he wold preserve the remembrance of so good a turne, to make it knowne vnto all his Order, that he had bound him vnto him. God would not call a Prince so necessary for the Earth, so soone into Heauen, before he had settled his people in that rest, which their long paines and calamities had deserued. It was the Kings one E ly care to settle euery thing in his order, with the aduice of the Princes of his house, and the Lords of his Councell. They found that the subjects could not fully enioy the benefite of the peace, nor be eased of their charges, so long as the Crowne was indebted, and that that which should serue to maintaine his royall Estate, was not sufficient to pay the rents and pensions, which amounted to two millions of gold: the fees of Officers came to eighteene thousand crownes, and many other charges, which were not discharged for lesse. This extreame necessity made them to seek out many Rights and Duties belonging to the Crown, the which had bene morgaged and aliened during the last troubles, which suffered all that could not be amended.

An attempt

The Kings desires to settle his affaires.

Heere, fees of Officers, Pensions, Garrisons, and men at armes, cost the King yearly almost fixe millions of crownes.

This was most apparent in Languedoc, whether the King sent de Maiisse, one of his Councell of State, and Refuge a Councellor of the court of Parliament at Paris. And although it be a hard thing to draw a multitude compounded of mutinies and factions vnto reason, yet through their perswasions, the country did grant vnto the King the summe of two hundred thousand crownes, to be payed in foure yeares, with an increase of the Gabelle or Custome vpon Salt vnto two crownes, which came to fifty thousand crownes a yeare at the least, more then the King receiued. So as the assured succours from that part, encreased 1599. increased the Kings treasure 150. thousand crownes yearly. But it increased much more A by the continuance of the imposition of a Soultz vpon the Livre, the only remedy to supply the Kings affaires, the ground whereof is necessity, which makes that seeme iust which is profitable to the Common-weale. The Commissioners appointed to establish this Leuie of a Solz vpon the pound French, were not receiued without opposition, nor executed without murmuring, vsuall in such innouations. There was no towne which found not it selfe ouer-burthened, to shew that they were not able to beare any more. This body was grown so weak with this long disease, as euery litle thing, how light soeuer, did seeme to op-presse it. But they complained not alone of this Imposition: other Subsidies were the cause of more ordinary grieuances, and grounded vpon more reason. Traffick is one of the Ele- B ments of a Realme: when that cealeth the subiect feelles it presently: nothing hath so much hurt it, as the augmentation of Customs and Imposts, nothing hath made it so contem-tible, as the couetousnesse of such as had the charge to gather it, and no man hath more felt the discommodity of it, then the Marchants of Lions, who complained chiefly, for that they had erected a new Custome-house in the towne of Vienne, which staied all marchan-dize that came out of the Leuant. These complaints were so common, and so often re-iterated to the Gouvernor of Lions, as he thought it good to send some one, when as the 12.

townes in Dauphiné should assemble their Estates, to intreat them to take away this Custome, which made the Marchants to keepe from Lions, least they should come neare vnto these Gulphes. The Deputy made an excellent speech vnto the States of the Prouince assembled at Grenoble: the which I haue thought good to insert. C

If things (said he) which are vniuersally good, are better and more perfect, then those which are good but to some, the good of peace must bee esteemed so much the better, and the more perfect, for that it is common and generall to all men, for that it hath restored to France her soule, and made it a new body. But this good is not so dispersed ouer the whole body, but there remains some members tyred, the which during the fainting and generall convulsion, did not feele the mischiefe so violently as at this present. For although the Prouinces be discharged of souldiers, and that euery one finds both in towne and contrei that order and safetie which he desired, yet the liberty of Trafficke being not restored, and marchandize lesse fauoured in peace, then in the violence of iniustice, and the D liberty of warre, this good remains vnperfect, if I may not say vnprofitable. Wherefore the towne of Lyons finding it selfe deprived of the fruites of this peace by continuall lets in the liberty of their trafficke, would not let passe the Assembly of your Estates, without coniu-ring you by the common and inseparable interest to the good of both Prouinces, to seeke with her the perfection thereof. Shee hath giuen you heretofore to vnderstand the increase of this mischiefe, you know the excesse, I am now onely come to intreate you to seeke for the remedie. This mischiefe is the continuation of a Subsidie imposed vpon the riuier of Rhosne, and the passage by land from Vienne. The cause was first the publike good, which since hath degenerated into a private interest; the effects, the ruine of Trafficke, the remedy to obtaine abolition from the King. E

This Impost was first erected for the Reduction of the Towne of Vienne, and for considerations which were so much the more iust, because they regarded the Kings seruice, the which precedeth all others, and for the common good of either Prouince. And although the Towne of Lions did then fore-see the daungerous consequence of this erection, with the ruines and discommodities of the Leuie, yet did shee the more willingly consent thereunto, for that shee thought the yeares, whereunto the continuance thereof was limited, would passe insensibly, and that they should sooner see the end, then any occasion to complaine. Moreouer, the Princes will, being a Soueraigne Law, they could not take that ill which pleased that great King, whose valour exceeds admiration; and admiration surmounts all prayse, hauing drawne France out of the bonds of Tyrannie, as Perseus did Andromeda, and hath in his heroicall actions made vse of his seruants goods to assure them the possession, as Scipio in opening the publike treasures, was the cause they were shut againe.

But as things which in the beginning seeme sweete and easie, in time grow sharpe and intollerable: This Impost passing from one extreame vnto another, is growne a shelle

Time augment on di-nuisheth e-uery thing.

A Shelle against the which no man strikes but he suffers shipwracke. It hath had its birth and growing like vnto that of the Crocodile, and in few daies is growne a terror to them that go by water, and the ruine of Marchants which trauell by land. The yeares of her continuance are past, and now it begins to grow perpetuall, hauing like vnto the ancient Customes, her Fermers and Committies, and retaines nothing of the cause of her first institution and ordonance, but the pretext and the apparent semblance.

The Fermers are so rough and seuer, in exacting, not that which is ordained, but many times what please them: that as it is the nature of men to loue that which profits them, and to abhorre that which hurts them, the Marchants flie from it as from a shelle, and speake of it as of a snare which strangles them. They cause them to languish whole weekes before they compound for the payment, and cease not vntill they haue seene the bottome of their packes and purses, so as that which in a lesse corrupted age, and not so couetous as ours is, was giuen rather by way of a gift or present, then of a dutie of necessitie, in acknowledgement of the publike protection, and the safetie of the passage, is now exacted by heretofore vnheard of extortions, and punishable confusions.

Thus the Towne of Lyons sees it selfe bereaued of the benefite and commoditie of trading, in the preservation whereof Dauphiné hath a sensible interest, these two Prouinces being like two neighbours which are not diuided but by a gutter which runneth through the midst of the streete. And this commerce is the chiefest support of this Towne, from whence as a from a Spring, which long peace may make perpetuall, flow infinite benefites to all other Prouinces, but most abundantly to her neighbours, wherefore those which haue considered the situation thereof, as in the Center of Europe, that for seuen leagues crossing the Ocean and Mediterranean seas, impart vnto it all the Marchandize which may be brought from any part which hath bene discovered by man, to distribute them to other Prouinces, they haue reason to call it the Magazin and Store-house of Europe, as Strabo saith, that it is seated in the middest of Gaule like vnto a Cittadell.

But since that the passage of Rhosne hath bene decreed, and that the Marchants had rather aduenture any other hazard then to passe by this iniustice, hauing bene so famous and flourishing, wee shall see her become a desert, if the libertie of Trafficke be not restored.

All marchants that were wont to come from the Leuant to Marseilles, haue abandoned their auncient passage, and sought other longer courses but more safe, as by the Countie of Auignon, Sauoy, Bresse, Geneva, and the Franche Countie, to passe into Germany, and others by Languedoc, Viuretz, Forests, Auvergne, Ma-ringues, to passe by the riuier of Allier, into that of Loyre, and from thence to Or-leance, and so forward.

So as breaking (as they doe) the ordinarie course of the Leuant Trade, they cut the veynes which bring bloud to nourish the bodie, the which in short time we shall see consumed to skinn and bones, and the calamities so to increase, as besides the grieffe, to bee no more the eye of Gaule, as Athens was of Greece, shee shall haue nothing perfect remaining, but the remembrance of her first felicitie, and the cogitation of her by-past flourishing estate.

Wherefore shee coniures you to ioine your prayers and poursuites with hers: To beseech the King to pull this thorne out of the foote of Lyons, and this moate out of the eye of Dauphiné: shee hopes to obtaine it by the wise resolutions of this assembly, consisting of men who can iudge of the importance of this petition, and are not ignorant, that as publike buildings are made of the best stufte, and erected of another forme and fashion then priuate edifices, so publike poursuites for a generalitie, require different and contrarious resolutions to those, which are necessarie and commodious for priuate affaires.

Thinke not my masters, that Lyons is so badly instructed in the knowledge of obedience (which is the best and most happy possession of the subiects) that she meanes to contradict the Kings intentions, or to diminish his Tributes. Shee knowes well that in an obedient Estate, whereas the iust commandements of a good Prince make the subiects prompt to obedience, such thoughts are criminall. The burthens which the people beare although they be grievous and insupportable are called Holy, and alwaies reputed iust. They are in the Estate as sayles in a ship, not to charge and ouerload it, but to conduct and assure it. Tributes are the sinewes of an Empire, wee must beware that in leuying them, it fall not in peeces. But that which we demand doth not preiudice the Kings reuenues, which draweth nothing from this Custome. Priuate men onely should loose by it, and should learne, that they must not make their profit of publike commodities. The interested are such good men, as they will neuer hinder the lesser good from yeelding to the greater. They be Noblemen which haue neuer preferred their priuate considerations before the publike profite: They enter into the Kings Council as the Auncients did into Temples, and whose interest are like vnto riuers, they which haue not one and the selfe same Spring, and the same course, and yet in the end they come into that great Sea of publike profit, where as they loose their name, and haue the same tast and fauour with the same sea. They themselues which haue meanes to find more lawfull assignations to recompence their seruices, will not onely excuse, but commend this poursuite, which informes them of the abuse which is committed vnder the tytle of the Kings commandements, and they shall see that wee haue had the courage not to suffer our selues to be drawne headlong into this seruitude, from the which there is no issue, for that it is a violent preiudice to suffer things which are established and get footing more by sufferance and permission, then by reason, and that the posteritie of Princes is but too constant to maintaine these ruinous inuentions.

The Kings bountie and iustice shall make vs hope well of this poursuite, and beleue that as hee is full of pietie and clemencie, (the true character of that Soueraigne Power of heauen, which hath placed him ouer vs here on earth) so he will not suffer these two Prouinces to be deprived of the fruites which they haue promised vnto themselves, hauing not yet tasted the perfect good of peace, for the purchasing whereof they had as much as any other contributed their goods and affections, and haue not bene the least instruments for the restauration of this Estate.

This discourse full of reason and truth, had not the power to make them of Dauphiné redresse the complaints of Lyons, but onely to beseech his Maiestie to moderate the cause. His affaires would not suffer him to giue that ease, which Iustice and his Maiesties clemency desired. Whilst that the Commissioners trauell throughout the Prouinces, about the execution of the Kings Edicts, aswel for the good of the peace, as to supply the necessity of his Exchequer, he passeth the greatest heat of Summer at Blois. There the King of Spaine gaue him to vnderstand by his Ambassador, that he had great reason to complaine of the French (especially of the Lord La Noue) who against the conditions of the Treaty of Veruins, were gone to serue Count Maurice, and the States of the Low-countries: and if the publike faith did not maintaine these reciprocall bonds, the peace would be more iniurious then war, being impossible to auoid the deceits of hostility, of him who shewes himselfe a friend, and is an enemy in effect. The King hauing protested that his intention was to haue the contents of the Treaty truly obserued, he commanded La Noue and all his subiects, to returne home within fixe weekes, vpon paine of losse of life, forbidding others to go thither vpon the like penalty. The Archdukes sent the Prince of Orange to visit the King, and to giue him intelligence of their arriual into the Low-countries: and Andrew the Cardinall hauing resigned vp his charge, takes his way thorough France, to see the King.

About this time, the yeare (granted for the Arbitrement of the Marquisat of Salusses) was expired, with the prolongation of 3. moneths: yet would not the King attempt any thing, but commanded his seruants only to stand vpon their gards, whilst that hee approached nearer to the Duke of Sauoy, to know what hee would say. of the King

A standing of an army which the King of Spaine had caused to imbarke in Portugal, staide his voyage, vntill he might see what way it would take. But this great army which had no reputation but a faire off, and was not knowne by reason of the distance, proued in the end but faine vessels, the which were encountred by the States, and beaten neare vnto Dunkerke. Nothing did hinder the Kings exercises and sports at Blois and Males-herbes, where he spent his time with the Marquis of Vernueil: in the meane time his good seruants watched both within and without the Realme, for the good of his affaires: all labored in diuers actions, but with one will, and to one end, to make the State as flourishing as it had bin, and the Maiesty of the Prince to be respected, as it is, Sacred and Holy.

Out of this number of good seruants and Officers of the Crowne, death took away Philip de Hurault, Earle of Chiuerny, and Chancellor of France. Hee had bene at the first Controller of K. Henry the thirds house, being D. of Aniou, and King of Poland, and by him made Keeper of the Seales, in the life of the Cardinal of Biraque, and after his death Chancellor, & by him dismissed to his house at the States of Blois, when as the seals were giuen to Montbieu Aduocat in the Court of Parliament. In this change he made triall, that Princes Officers are in his hands, as Counters be in an Auditors, who raise them to the greatest and highest number, and sodenly brings them down to the lowest. And although it be not spoken why the King commanded him to retire, yet assoone as they saw him disgraced, the friends of his fortune, and the seruants of his fauours abandoned him. He continued awhile like an old cast ship which lyes in the harbor and serues to no vse. He returned to his charge, and serued the King stoutly, in the most troublefome and dangerous time of his affaires. Afterwards he had many crosses. There were so great complaints exhibited against him in the assembly at Roan, as he was in danger to haue lost the keeping of the Seals, or not to haue a Cardinals Hat demanded of the Pope for him. He did not affect the second, and the first he preuented, considering that they could not take away any thing, nor diminish his great dignities, but with shame and disgrace.

Pompone de Belieure succeeded him, after his death he restored the Seales (the sacred instruments of Soueraigne Iustice) to their honour. All corrupt practises which made friends to the preiudice of the Common-weale, were banished. There is no other fauour

D then that of Iustice, no other expedition but in publike, and by order. Nothing is settled extraordinarily but by the Kings expresse commandement, or for the good of his seruice, which may not be deferred vnto the sealing day, and that in the view of all the Officers of the Chancery. Nothing is presented which hath not bin examined and held iust by the Masters of Requests that were present. The King hauing receiued newes of the Chancellors death, he commanded Villeroy to dispatch his letters before he demanded the place: which done, he presented himself to take his oth betwixt his Maiesties hands, kneeling vpon a cushion of veluet, the which the Chancellor and Constable only do, and no other Officers of the Crown. His Maiesty would not bind him, but to do what he had alwaies done, for the good of his seruice and of his Crowne. To conclude, hee was not

E preferred to this high dignity before any one that exceeded him in ranke of seruice, or in merit and experience, hauing vnder-gone the chiefe charges within the Realme, and happily performed abrode important and weighty Ambassages for the King. This yeare took away some Princeesses in France: amongst others Madamoiselle the onely daughter of the Prince of Condé, the which he had by his first wife the Princeesse of Nevers and Marquis of Lifle. Her obsequies were made at S. Germain dez Prez with great pompe, as it was fit for a Princeesse of the blood. Loyse de Budos, the Constables wife died also (a litle before the Duchesse of Beaufort) hauing left one son and one daughter, whereby the famous house of Montmorency is renewed, the which was like to fall to the distaffe. The Marquisse of Belle-Ile (widow to the Marquis the eldest son to the Duke and Marshal of France, a yonger daughter of the house of Longueuille, hauing passed 5. yeares of her widowhood, and brought vp her son in all vertue and piety) departed secretly out of Britany, not aduertising any one of her kindred, and went to professe her selfe a Nunne, in the Monasterie of the Feuillantines at Tholoufa. Her brother and her husbands brethren posted after to diuert her, but she was already in the Couent, and resolved to end

pacification.

The Commissioners which were employed for the execution of the Edict of pacification, found some difficulties in those places, whereas the Bishops and Pastours of the Catholike Church, had neither temple nor place of retreat: yet the Masse was restored in those places where it had bene banished fifteen or twenty yeares: and the preaching appointed only in those places that were allowed by the Edict. They found in all places actiue and violent spirits, very hard to be dealt withall, which inuented idle quarels, when as they wanted iust cause of complaint. The Commissioners exhort either partie as well to concord as to pietie, and alwaies to containe their wils within the bounds of obedience, and not of rebellion, and to forget the factious names of Papists and Huguenots, the which haue bene no lesse fatall to France, then those of Guelphes and Gibellins in Italy. They aduised the Preachers to take heed that their discourses were not streames of sedition, as they are sometimes of Eloquence: for they that make profession to teach the word of God, may do as much harme in fauouring a Sedition, as they shall gather profit of his Ministry when he shall preach Peace. The Commissioners did admonish the Magistrates and chiefe of Iustice, to preuent the first motiues of sedition: which getting credit with the simple, is the cause of great disorders.

Warre ruins
both State and Religion.

So the Edict was executed throughout the Realm, and the most sauage began to live louingly together, burying the remembrance of things past. Things done cannot be recalled. We must grow more wise hereafter by the consideration of what is past: we must haue our eyes open, to distinguish the causes from the pretexts, and discover the euill which is hidden vnder a shew of good, holding for an infallible Maxime, that there is no iust occasion to arme against his Prince, nor to trouble the quiet of his country: we haue bin so abused, as we haue taken the mask for the face, slander for innocencie, and falshod for truth: and vnder these false impressions, we haue left an assured peace for a doubtfull: we haue beleueed those Empericks of State, who desirous to continue our languishing, and to prolong our diseases, haue from that Principle of truth, that euill war ruins both Estat: and Religion, drawne this proposition: That France cannot liue in peace with two Religions. The which hath cost the liues of those that haue maintained it, and the ruine of others that haue beleueed it. Being then reconciled for that which is past, and well aduised for that which is to come, hauing escaped shipwrack beyond our own hopes, let vs remaine in the port of this concord, where the King doth guide vs, after so many storms and tempests, we shalbe there assured. The sea doth no harm to ships that gaue good anchors: Obedience is the anchor which doth assure our ship against the fury of wind and waues. It is that which giues life and motion to all the members of the body: and there is not a more certaine signe of the life of an Estate, then obedience. It is the eye of the body, which liues last and dies first: it shold be the heart, which liues first and dies last. This yeare the Princeesse of Antoinette, daughter to the D. of Lorraine, was conducted by the Earle of Vaudemont her brother, to the D. of Iuilliers, who had married her: she was attended with a goodly traine, and came to Collen, where she was honorably receiued by the Senate: and after some dayes, she went downe the riuer to Duisseldorp. The nuptial joy was great and stately, although it were somewhat disturbed by the insolency of the armies, aliuell of the States, as of the Admiral. The mariage of Sibille sister to the D. of Iuilliers, and of the Marquis of Bourgondy, brother to Anawen of Austria the Cardinal, caused a peace in the country of Cleues, and al the Spanish pretensions went to smoke.

When as after the death of the Duchesse of Beaufort, they saw the King falling into a new shipwrack, from the which he was lately escaped, and that loue (mourning yet for his first Venus) led him to another, you might heare the sighes of the most modest, the murmuring of the most turbulent, and generally, prefaces of some approaching storme. This was the onely drop of oyle which did pierce through the glorious actions of this Prince: who superior to all other in corage and valor, & alwaies equal to himself, made himselfe subiect to this passion. Truth will not suffer me to suppress that which cannot be

A behiden It is good to coneele that which is doubtfull in his actions: that hath no other Iudge but God: but to keepe secret that which is known and seen of all men, is a basenes. It imports to know things truly, which not being written, shall passe to posterity according to their passions, which shall begin and continue the tradition. Ancient Historics (as full of simple truth, as void of affectation) haue not coneeled the loues of Princes, whose vertues they haue written. Of all the follies of men, there is none more excusable, nor of the which fewer do excuse themselves, then of loue. All fight vnder this banner. If then it was necessary for the King to loue, hee could not loue any thing more worthy of his loue. But when as death did see that the louer grew blind in the thing he loued and that this blindnes had brought France into confused darknesse, he separated them.

B Vpon this consideration, the Court of Parlement finding, that there is nothing that doth more preferue France from falling into fore-past miseries, or more assure the present, and continues their prosperities hereafter, then the Kings issue: therefore they beseeched his Maiestie to marrie, and to giue to himselfe a Sonne and a Successour to his Realme, there beeing no army more powerfull, either by sea or land, to assure an Empire, then many children. La Guesle the Kings Attorney general, made the speech. He represented vnto his Maiesty, how much he was bound to God. He discovered the publike diseases of his Estate: shewed the remedies: and in the end let him see, that the inioying of all the felicities which peace (purchased by his victorious armes) could promise him, was weakly grounded: France was not assured to see it durable, the which depended on the lawful birth of a Daulphin. That although by the law of State (a sacred and immutable law, and an originary law of the Crowne) the succession belongs to the nearest kinsman, yet France is too full of those turbulent spirits, which in the calme of peace, watch carefully for occasions of war, which in the midst of rest, breath after troubles: and freed from the perill of armes, hold still (like mad men) their hearts and their courages armed to moue new contentions another day against the law and order of the Realme: whereof the King himselfe had made such tryall of their bad intentions, as without the vertue of heauen infused into him, his Right had bin vanquished by force.

M. De Li Guesle
speech vnto
the King.

That although his Maiesty by his wisdom, accompanied with a singular bounty and charitable affection to the quiet of his subiects, hath declared his successour to the Crowne, yet France hath alwaies obserued, that when the Crowne did leape from one branch of a Family vnto another, and that the Son did not succed the Father, it was disquieted with new factions, and the fields bathed with the blood of her Citizens, and the fire of ciuill warre so kindled, as two ages was scarce able to quench it.

That to take away these iust feares and apprehensions of these publike calamities, the succession must not change the branch, for where there is no change, there is no stirre, and the children succeeding in the fathers realme, it seemes that he that raigned, is rather growne young againe then changed: there is nothing new, the Crowne continues in the same house, the fathers face is noted in that of his sonne. That the shining of the Sun is pleasing, as a calme sea, or the earth couered with his Greene tapistrie. But there is nothing so goodly nor so delightfull to the eye, as the sight of children newly borne in a family that wanted this aduantage. That to attaine vnto this happines, they must begin by the dissolution of the marriage betwixt his Maiesty and the Queene, Duchesse of Valois, being no lesse easie then that of Charlemagne with Irmengrade, and Theodora daughter and sister to Didier, King of Lombards: for indisposition and sterility of Lewis the 7. with Elenour Duchesse of Guienne for some discontentments set downe in the Historie, and couered with the pretext of Consanguinity, of Lewis the 12. with Joane of France daughter to King Lewis the 11. constrained by force, and want of consent.

That they shold not be troubled to seek lawfull causes of this dissolution, for besides the want of issue, in the which consists the second end of matrimony, and the preferuation of the State, they shold not need to inuent the degree of consanguinity, beeing knowne to all men, that the King and Queene are in the third degree, a blemish which hath alwaies accompanied the marriage since the solemnization thereof, and the which was not taken away by the brieve of Pope Gregory the 13. for that the necessary and effen-

1599. essentiall formes were not obserued. After that he had shewed the necessity and profit of this separation, he beseecheth the King to chooe his second wife, in a chiefe and Soueraigne Family, and which had beene hertofore honored with the like happines, and to consider that so great a Realme flourishing in Princes and many Noblemen, and ancient houses, cannot easily submit themselues to the command of those which by both sides shall not be of the bloud Royal or Soueraigne, halfe Princes, halfe simple Gentlemen. And if at any time we must respect the distinction of births and races, it must be when as they that come, are borne to command ouer others.

That they could not giue Heires to a Realme of too worthy a House: and if he be not equall by the fathers side, yet at the least, that he come neere vnto it: for men being by nature high minded, do not willingly submit themselues to them whom they thinke to be inferiour to their fathers, vnto whose command they haue beene inured.

The King was well pleased with this discourse, and aduertised Queene Marguerite thereof by L. Anglois, one of the Masters of Requests of his Maiesties household, to vnderstand her resolution touching the nullity of her marriage. Shee (who vpon the like demand during the life of the Duchesse of Beaufort had made refusal for some reasons) returned him answer, that she would deliuer her mind vnto Berthier, Agent for the Clergie, and Intendant of her affaires. The Kings intentions were imparted vnto him, and he sent vnto her, who returned with this answer vnto the King and his Councell: That shee desired nothing more then the Kings contentment, and the quiet of the Realme: and withal, she sent a priuate letter vnto his Maiesty, beseeching him, To grace her with his protection, under the shadow whereof she would passe the remainder of her yeares. The sayd Queene sent a petition vnto the Pope, containing, That her brother King Charles the 9. and the Queene her mother had married her against her will, to which marriage her heart had neuer consented: That the King and shee being in the third degree of consanguinitie, she beseeched his Holinesse to declare the marriage voyde. The King made the like request. This busines was managed very seriously by the Cardinall of Ossat, and by the Lord of Sillery, the Kings Ambassador at Rome (who at the same time pursued the Iudgement for the Marquisat of Saluces:) they beseeched his Holines in his Maiesties name: That for that which should concerne the nullity of the sayd marriage, hee desired no other fauour then that of iustice. This busines was imparted by the Pope to the Consistory, and many reasons set down to proue the nullity of the marriage. All the difficulty was, that Pope Clement the 8 thought it some-what itrange, that he should declare that marriage voyd, which Pope Gregory the thirteenth had approoued, and who by his absolute authoritie had taken away all lets and hindrances. All which was answered at large. And although it were true, that Queene Marguerite had continued long with the King: yet this cohabitation was alwaies forced, and the same feare which was in the beginning of the marriage, had continued during the life of her breethren and the Queene her mother: and the time was to be regarded to long as the feare continued: for marriages contracted by force and constraint, without consent are voyde, and time doth not extinguish the nullitie: if hee that is forced hath not liberty to do that freely, which they haue made him do by force. In the end, it was resolved on in the Consistory, that a Commission should be granted to certaine Prelats, to take iust knowledge of the cause vpon the place, and to iudge of the nullitie of the sayd marriage. His Holinesse sent his Commission vnto the Cardinall Ioyeuz, to the Bishop of Modena, his Nuncio in France, and to the Archb. of Arles, a learned Italian Prelate, and well practised in those affaires, who being assembled at Paris, after that they had obserued all solemnities that were requisite, and caused information to be taken of his Maiesties age, hauing viewed the requisition of the three Estates of France, containing the great interest they had therein. All being wel examined and considered, they declared the sayd marriage voyd, and set the parties at liberty to marry where they pleased. The K. sent d'Alincourt, Gouvernor of Pontoise & Knight of his Orders, to thank the Pope for his good iustice: and the Earle of Beaumont to Queene Marguerite, to let her vnderstand, that the Popes Delegats had giuen vp their sentence. And seeing that God had suffred that the bond of their coniunction was dissol-ued, the which his diuine Iustice had done as well for their particular quiet, as for the publike good of the Realme, hee desired no lesse to cherish and loue her then before, resolving to haue more care of that which did concerne him, then he had had, and to let her vnderstand, that hereafter he would not be a brother to her onely in name, but she should find effects worthy of the trust which she had reposed in the sincerity of his affection. She made answer vnto the King. That although it were easie to receiue comfort for the losse of any worldly thing, yet the onely respect of the merit of so perfect a King and so valiant, did by the priuation thereof cut off all consolation, being the marke of the generosity of such a spirit, to make her grieve immortall as hers should be, if the fauor which it pleased his Maiesty to doe her by the assurance of countenance and protection, did not banish it.

At the same time she tasted the effects of the Kings liberality by the increase of her pensions, lyuing happily at Veflon neere to Aurillac, in the tranquillity and silence of her fortune. This change is no let, but she shalbe alwaies one of the first Princesses of Europe. No man can take from her that which Heauen and Nature haue giuen her. It is a Theater, which although it hath beene beaten with lightning, is still admired. And to speake the truth without affection or flattery, she her selfe hath ruined the greatness of her fortune, in that she would be what she is.

This marriage is no sooner dissolued, but they treat of an other. In the blessings whereof the French promise vnto themselves the increase and continuance of those of Heauen. The great Duke of Tuscany did carefully keep Mary of Medicis his Neece to increase the honour of his house by some great alliance. It was in a season when as the Soueraigne houses of Europe had no Daughters ready to marry, or there was some disparity for their Age, or Religion. Great and important considerations, which Princes should not passe ouer lightly. It seemes, that the eternall wisdom, which concludes the marriages of Princes in Heauen, and blesteth them on earth, would not marry this Princess vnto the Emperor, but referred her for the good of a greater Empire, not being pleased that France should seeke the means to continue the crowne in the Kings posterity, any where else but at Florence, one of the eyes of Italy, and in the house of Medicis, which goeth equally with the first in Italy. The history of which house you may read at large in the Originall. Cosmo surnamed by Pius the first, the Great Duke of Tuscany, had by Madame Econor of Toledo, daughter to the Viceroy of Naples, Francis, Ferdinand, Peter, Garcia, Isabella and Econor. Francis married Ioane of Austria daughter to the Emperor Ferdinand. Of this marriage came two daughters, Eleonor and Mary: the first is married to the Duke of Mantoua, the happinesse and good fortune of the other is referred to be Queene of France. And the King being now set at liberty, first all his thoughts vpon her marriage.

The Duke of Sauoy had sent many of his Ministers into France, to treat vpon the difference for the Marquisate of Saluces, without expecting the Popes sentence. All the voyages which Jacob, the President Rocheville, the Marquis of Lullins, the Cheualier Breton and Roncas his Secretary had made, brought him no other fruit then to haue obserued the State of the Court, peered a little into the Kings defeignes, the which is alwaies the first of an Ambassadors instructions, and noted the countenance of some spirits impatient of rest and desirous of change. And although the Patriarke of Constantinople had by his perswasions drawne more from the King then the Duke of Sauoy hoped for, and made knowne how much a discours full of affection and perswasion may preuaile, there being nothing that doth more subtilly steale away the opinions of men then the eloquence of Mercury, yet could he neuer change the resolution which the king had taken to haue the Marquisate againe. He was at Lions where as sicknesse staid him for a time: the King hauing commanded the Gouvernor of Lions to lodge him, feast him, and supply all his wants: Roncas attended vntill he was recovered, to conduct and accompany him according to the order which the Duke had giuen him. But as things went on more slowly then he desired, hee thought that this pursuit required a greater presence and action: that he himselfe must doe his owne Ambassage, promising more vnto vnto himselfe by his only shadow, then by all the soliciting of seruants. Hee therefore A prepared himselfe to goe to the King, although the chiefe of his counsell dissuaded him. The onely thought of this voiage made him irreconcilable to the King of Spaine, although it had not past the tearmes of a simple proposition, so did he make shew to bee desirous to breake wholly with him: he had in shew great occasions to complaine of his friendship and succors, who did but entertaine his griefe, and made the cure desperate. It is good for a Prince to know the humor of many nations. Hee knew the Spaniards well: their maner of liuing, the ruinous conditions which they lay vpon them whom they assist: the length and languishing of their promises were odious vnto him. He did consider the Iniustice, and Inequality in the Portion of the Infanta his wife, who of so many scepters & crownes which the King her father had, receiued but sixscore thousand B crownes of yeerely pension, whereas the eldest had the Low-countries, and the Franche county in marriage. He could not forget, that at the treaty of Veruins, hee had bene in a maner forgotten, and that a peace was almost concluded before they thought of him. He beleeued that if the Spaniard would, the question for the Marquisate of Saluces had bene ended, the which might haue bene left to him in exchange of Calais, Dorlans, Ardres, and other places. That the King of Spaine did thinke (that to preuent that all these discontentments should not carry this Prince to some dangerous party) it was necessary to tie him vnto the crowne of Spaine by some strong bond. They therefore demand the first Prince and the first Infanta, vnder colour to bring them vp after a royall C maner, and in a court whereas they might one day hope to reigne. The Duke was discontented with this demand, perceiuing well that it proceeded more from distrust, then affection. His counsell aduised him to giue this content vnto the King of Spaine, that hee could not lodge his children better, and that that was the vniting and very cement of perfect friendship. Yet hee resolved to keepe his children, and to send the Count La Motte to make his excuse, that the present estate of his affaires would not suffer him to send them, nor to provide them a traine and furniture fit for the voiage.

The King of Spaine to take away all excuse, giues order to haue money provided for him at Milan, and perswades the Duke to send the Count La Motte as Gouverneur and conductor of the Prince. The Duke takes the money, and keepe the ware, saying that D the ayre of Spaine was not proper for his children, that their indisposition and the tendernesse of their age, would not suffer him to hazard them so soone in so long a voiage. This refusal offended the King of Spaine, and makes the Duke to resolve vpon that which he held most profitable. From that time he could no more looke on a Spaniard. He then left the Spanish Ambassadour at Turin and came to Chambery: when as hee did see any one a farre off in his counsell of the Spanish faction, he lookes on him with such a disdainfull eye, as hee shewes himselfe no more in his presence: he skornes the Spanish fashion, and commends the French, saying, That there is no such felicity as to conquer ones selfe, and to yeeld himselfe absolutely vnto himselfe.

Spaine often-ded with the Duke.

The King was long before hee would yeeld vnto the Dukes comming into France, E saying, That it was not necessary he should passe the mountaines without the Marquisate of Saluces. But the Cheualier Breton and Roncas did presse the King, that he would be pleased to giue their Maister leaue to see him, assuring him that he would giue him all content. The first was framed to the fashion of that court, and did beleue that when they should see a Prince great in Iudgement, admirable in liberality, and indued with many excellent qualities, they would grant him all without any difficulty. Many dissuaded the Duke from this voiage, laying before him the dangers in trusting a great enemy, wanting no examples, whereof one in such remarkable accidents were sufficient to make him to change his minde, and to ground his iudgement vpon experience.

Roncas returned from the court, hee found the Duke at Hautecombe, and brings him F letters from the King, fuller of desire to see him, then of any hope that this enteruiew should yeeld him any great profit. This letter well considered, was not sufficient to make the way for such a passage, shewing that although the King desired his comming, it was alwaies without preiudice, to haue reason of the Marquisate. It was imparted

A imparted to the counsell: whereof some said, that this voyage would giue an offence which Spaine would neuer pardon: others sayd, that the end of this game would bee the losse of the friendship of the King of Spaine, which would be profitable to the Duke and necessary for his children. The Duke answers, that the Marriner is ill aduised that strikes often against the same rocke where he hath many times suffred shipwracke. That the hatred of Spaine would make the conditions of the treaty more easie and beneficiall, and would lay open that which none but himselfe could expresse, carrying in his breast certaine designs which he could not trust to any but himselfe. There was no reason of force to make him change this opinion. Hee sayd, that as soone as hee had seene the King hee should be content. They had much adoe to perswade him to send (not an B Ambassadour, but a simple post) vnto the King of Spaine, not to aske his aduice, but to carry him assurance of his going into France: the which he undertooke when as they could not beleue it in Court, thinking that he had changed his resolution.

When as all doubts were taken away, the King gaue order for his receiuing, commanding the Gouverneur of Lions, to prepare the Archbishops lodging for his owne person, and the next houses for the Noblemen of his Court: That he should accompany him in the best sort he could to any thing that hee desired to see within the towne. That he should goe and meete him in the mid-way of the last post, with all the Nobility of his Government: that they of the towne should attend him at the gate when he should enter, and that the Prouost of Marchants should tel him, that he had commandment to doe him the same honor that was to bee done to his Maiesty, and visiting him C in his lodging, to present vnto him the goodliest and rarest fruites that might be found in the country, and that they should feast him, and defray him with all his traine. This was executed with such order and state, as the Duke hath said often since, that this entertainment had bound him. The Earles of the great Church of Lions were in doubt whether they should receiue this Prince as they had done the Duke Emanuel Philibert his father. The Dukes of Sauoy, as Earles of Villards and Soueraignes of that county in the country of Bresse, haue had place as Chanoins of Honour in that Church, the which is presented vnto them the first time they enter. The same honour should haue D bene offered vnto the Duke passing by Lions, as had bene giuen vnto his father when hee came after the peace in the yeere 1559. if things had bene in the same Estate, or if they had not found a greater difference. The Chapter of this Church had great reason to intreat the Prince as they had done his Predecessors, seeing the King would haue him receiued like vnto his Maiesty, and giue him that testimony of honour, the effect whereof did honour them as much that gaue it, as he could finde himselfe honored that receiued it. But for that through the Kings conquest the county of Villards was no more vnder his obedience; that things were yet in suspence of war or peace; that Princes are alwaies offended with the communication of such honours; they resolved not to doe any thing therein, but what it should please the King to appoint. They aske the E Gouvernors aduice: wherevpon La Faye, one of the Earles of that Church, was sent to court, to know the Kings pleasure touching this difficulty.

The King demanded of him, what a Chanoin of honour was, and if the Duke of Sauoyes reception had bene like vnto his. La Faye answered, that the great and famous Churches of Europe had Chanoines of honour, who were either Soueraine Princes, (in whose domynions they were founded) or forraigne Princes, who by their piety haue bound the Church to this acknowledgement of honour. That the place of a Chanoin of honour, is neither for the office, nor for the charge, but onely for reuerence and privilege: for as the Prince who is a Chanoin of honour, is not bound to any other thing, but to sweare the protection and preferuation of the rights of the Church, so hee reapes F no other profit, but is partaker of their prayers which they make there.

That this honour should bee of small import, if the greatnesse of Princes which had desired it, did not make it great in a great Church, the which being one of the chiefe of France as wel in Antiquity as in Dignity, the reputation thereof hath bene spread in far nations, who haue founded their Churches after this modell. That this honour had bene 1599. beene giuen in ancient time to the most Christian Kings, to the Dukes of Sauoy Earles A of Villards, to the Dukes of Bourgondy, Dukes of Berry, and Dauphins of Viennois, which haue beene receiued Cannons of Honour in that Church, but those receptions did differ from that of the Kings.

The King asked the opinion of his counsell in that case, and by their aduice hee answered, that the Duke of Sauoy holding no more the countie of Villards, should not pretend the rights that depended thereon: that comming into France, to reconcile himselfe vnto his Maiesty, hee would make so small an aboad in Lions as hee did not thinke that he would stay for so simple a ceremony. That if he should demand that place of Chanoine of Honour as they had giuen it to his deceased father, the Chapter B should excuse themselves, vntill they knew the Kings pleasure, to doe their duties at his returne.

The Duke was much offended with the refusall of that was due to him, and the which they had giuen vnto his deceased father. Neither did he dissemble his discontent, for he would not goe into this Church, although hee were lodged in the Archbishops palace, nor passe ouer the place, which is before the principall doore: and when as the Deane with the whole body of the Church went to salure him, he sayd that hee had alwaies honored that company, as hauing the Honour to be of it. Being receiued into Lions according to the Kings order and command, hee had many presages of discontentment in his voyage. His seruants in court aduertised him that if he came without C other designe then to offer the Marquisate of Saluces, he would repent his comming. One sayd vnto him that he should not get any great matter of the King, seeing hee was not pleased that the Cathedrall Church at Lions should afford him a little honour and ceremony. A man at armes of the company of the Marquis d'Vrfe, was put in prison vpon a false aduice that came from Geneva, that he followed the Duke with an intent to doe a bad act at Paris. It was strange in court that the King had not sent any other vnto him then the Controuler generall of the Postes. But nothing troubled him more, then when as Varenne (among other discourses which the Duke offered, to sound their opinions touching his voyage) sayd vnto him, he should be welcome so as here- stored the Marquisate. A speech which toucht the Duke vnto the quicke, who esteemed D not all the Estates of his patrimony, as the Marquisate alone. It is true that they loue that better which they haue gotten, then that which hath beene purchased by their Predecessors. Hee went by post from Lions to Roane: from thence hee went by water to Orleans, whether the King sent the Duke of Nemours to receiue him. Betwixt Orleans and Fontainebleau he was met first by the Marshall Brion, and then by the Duke Montpensier, being followed by many Noblemen.

The 13. of December at night (a memorable day for the Kings birth) he arose when he knew his traine to bee a sleepe, and departs secretly to get to Fontainebleau before his people were awake. Varenne who had commandement from the King to come before and aduertise him, had much ado to follow him, and if the Duke had found E horses ready at the first post, they had not carried the first newes of his arriual.

The King and his nobles were auncient in red, the Duke and his traine in blacke,

He found the King comming from Maffie, with all the Noblemen of his court, attired all in red, and ready to goe to horse-backe to meete him: they did walke long together after their first imbracings and excuses. Then the Duke told him the occasions of his voyage, the which he had kept secret from his counsell: but he could draw nothing from the King by this first parle, but he should haue him his friend in yeelding him his Marquisate. It is a difficult thing to feed a King that hath a white beard with words. The King sayd alwaies that hee desired nothing but his owne. And the Duke of Sauoy being in the Loure spake as boldly if he had bin in his Cittadel at Thuring; that no power in the world should euer make him yeeld to this restitution. A free and courageous F speech in an others country, not amongst his owne people, but to Villeroi the Kings chiefe and most confident Secretary of State. From Fontainebleau hee went to Paris with a goodly traine, he was lodged in the Loure and spent the Christmas in Nemours house. He admired this great court, where he sees the chiefe Noblemen of the realme, and

A and noted that L'Escliquier who had so much troubled him, was not so great in court as in Dauphiné. The Dukes presence did increase his reputation, hee gouerned his actions in such sort, as he freed them from the skorne and mockery of the court. His wisdom, his discretion, and his courtesie, made them to forget the tales which were yet told of the good Duke Charles his grand-father. They did obserue in his actions courtesie and courage, bounty, discretion and policy. This yeere ended with all sorts of pleasures and sports, familiarities and proofes of true friendship, so as many beleued that the two hearts and the two courts of these Princes were but one, but there was alwaies some marke of constraint, and amidst these embrasings there alwaies past some gird or quip. The King who is sodaine in his answers, gaue him alwaies some touch to B thinke on. There was too great difference betwixt their humors to make along & good harmony. But whilest the Court abounds in pleasure & delights, the Duke Mercure is in Hungary, in the midst of many discommodities, which hee holds pleasing for Gods cause: but before he goes he giues them occasion to talke of him in the court of Parliament. Hee had a cause pleaded there, and his Aduocate gaue him the quality of a Prince: Seruin the Kings Aduocate (holding it a base preuocation to bee silent at that which ought to bee spoken for the Kings seruice and the Law of State) did shew that that quality did not belong to any, but to Princes of the blood. The Duchesse of Mer- cure (who was then in presence) said that they could not take from her husband a quali- C ty that was due vnto him by the right of his birth, and that the King held him so.

The Duke Mercure, holding that which the Kings Aduocate had sayd, in discharge of his duty for a brauadoe and a contempt, went the same day vnto his house, and gaue him iniurious words. The King beeing aduertised thereof, held it a bold act. The court esteemed the iniury done vnto them, and desired the more to repaire it, for that the honour of the Kings seruice was wronged, and that it had beene done in sight of the Parliament of the capital city of the Realm, & in his house that was wronged, the which should be to euery man an inuiolable Sanctuary. The court decreed that he should bee personally adorned, and had proceeded further if the Kings commandement had not staied them. It was a great vertue in the President Lizet, when hee decreed that the quali- D ty of Prince (which the Cardinall of Lorraine tooke) should bee raised out of his Aduocates pleadings. The Cardinall complained vnto the King: but the President Lizet answered with such courage and constancy before the King, beeing in counsell, that the Cardinall was no Prince, nor equall to Princes, and if you will saith hee vse it, shew vs the place of your principality. A free speech which purchased the old man much reputation, and yet within two yeeres after hee made him resigne his place vnder an other pretext. There was no Nobleman in France that vsed the benefit of the peace more worthily then the Duke Mercure, for disdayning the idleness of the court and the ease of his house, he employed himselfe to succor the Christians, against the greatest E enemy of their Religion. Hee leads with him the count of Chaligny his brother, with some gentlemen at his owne charge, resoluing to employ his goods as well as his life in this holy warre, hauing vowed to serue Christendome two yeeres at his owne charge. He shewed himselfe a great capitaine as well to defend as to assaile, hauing kept the enemy with an army of a hundred and fifty thousand men from besieging of Strigonia: this was in his first voyage, before whose returne the Emperour desired to see him, and in- treated him to take his way by Prague.

In the beginning of the yeere, the Duke of Sauoy sent the King two great Basins, and two Ewers of Christall, the rarest peeces of the Cabinet of Beaurix of Portugal his grand-mother, and of Lady Catherine the Infanta of Spaine and his wife, the which could not be valued neither for the matter, nor for the workmanship: and the King re- turned vnto the Duke a Jewell of Diamonds, in the midst whereof there was one Dia- mond Transparent, which discovered his Maiesties portrait, the which hee esteemed so much, as hauing lost it once in dancing, hee gaue five hundred crownes to him that found it. The Duke was not to be imitated in his bounty, and when as they thought that he had giuen all, he inuited the King and the court to a dancing, where he shewed him- selfe selfe in Jewels, as they were esteemed to bee worth about 600. thousand crownes. Hee A gaue presents to all the court, who accepted them with the Kings permission: Onely the Duke of Biron refused the horses that hee sent vnto him: but the King had nothing the better opinion of their intelligences, nor the Duke lesse assurance of his affection by this refusall, for it was chiefly for his sake, that the Duke of Sauoy had made his voi-age, to draw him wholly from the Kings seruice. It was that great occasion which he carried secret in his brest, and would not reueale vnto his counsell, when they dissuaded his going into France: the Marquise of Saluces was the pretext of his voyage, but the finishing of this great conspiracy was the true cause. It was a goodly soile well set out, but couered with a false stone.

La Fin was imploied as a Truchman of the wills of the conspirators and confede- B rates. The first time that hee had any speech with the Duke of Sauoy, was the night after the feasts of Christmas, when he was brought into the Dukes chamber in Nemours house, by Seignor iacob, without the priuity of any other. The Duke of Nemours (comming to giue the Duke the good night) was intreated not to enter, for that the Duke would take his rest. They would not haue him acquainted with any thing, fearing least hee should aduertise the King, hauing obserued what he sayd the first day of the Dukes arrivall, that nothing should draw him from the Kings seruice, and that excepted, hee would doe any thing for his highnesse. There was not any night but La C Fin spent a good part of it, to acquaint him with the State of the faction. Those that were of this intelligence, met at the most remote Churches, to acquaint one another with that which past. Nothing was sayd in the Kings counsell, but the Duke of Sauoy was presently aduertised thereof, by them that were at his deuotion. But he had not yet spoken with the Duke of Biron of their desaigne, but by a third person: it was necessary they should ioyne to knit the knot of their vnion. They had both sought the occasion, but there was still some obstacle, or some spie that hindred them. They incountred a fit oportunitie at Conflans, being all alone, the King hauing commanded the Duke of Biron to entertaine the Duke of Sauoy vntill his returne: they lost no time, in plying it but in three or foure words of trust, and assured intelligence, referring the rest to the mediation of La Fin. Their discours was broken off, by the comming of the count Soif- D sons, and the Duke of Montpensier.

The D. of Sauoy's policy.

The Dukes proceeding therein, was very cunning and iudicious, for often-times hee would begin a discourse of the valour and courage of the Duke of Biron, to sound the Kings opinion, who did not alwaies giue him the glory of those goodly executions, whereof hee vaunted. The Duke did still aduertise the Duke of Biron of any thing the King had sayd of him, that might any way alter him, which made him to breake forth in the bitterest words he could, against al respect of the Kings seruice, being very sensible of any thing that was spoken against the reputation of his valour, in regard whereof he esteemed nothing: and when hee entred into the History of his life, hee would speake contemptibly of all the world, not sparing the King himselfe, whose valour and ex- E perience in military actions, hath obscured others, and forced them to confesse, that he hath not bene aduanced to the Royall Throne by the benefit of fortune, but by the merit of his vertue. The Duke of Biron committed great errors against the rules of such as haue a desire to raise and aduance their fortunes. No man must euer enter into comparifon of valour and sufficiency with his Prince: hee may not dispute of his ad-uice, contradict his opinion, nor affect to seeme more aduised, more iudicious, nor more capable. Many haue bene cast away vpon this shelve. The Duke of Biron was of this humor. The excessse of his courage made him to disallow with disdain, all that was not done or inuented by himselfe. He sayd some-times vnto the King, that hee would not haue them write in the History of France, that other then hee had done such and such a thing.

These words were spoken and heard at the siege of Amiens.

The second day of the yeere, the King went to Saint Germaine in Laie, leading the Duke with him, to shew him his buildings, his Grotts or Caues & his Chafes, and with-all hee shewed him his other houses, and all the goodliest places about Paris. In the meane

A meane-time hee dissembled his discontent, with so great wisdom, as he seemed alwaies 1600.
one, at the table, at hunting, at play, and at dancing: the King though hee refused what he demanded, yet did he still shew him new fights, to recompence the fained repentance of his voyage.

After that hee had seene all that was rare about Paris, the King would shew him his Court of Parliament, for all that he had seene was nothing in respect of the admirable greatnesse of that reuerent Court, whereof in former times, many Emperours, Kings and Princes, comming to Paris, had more admired the Iustice that was administred there, then any thing else that they had seene. The King aduertised the chiefe President Achilles de Harley, that he would goe see and heare them. They prepared the lodging of the golden chamber, whereas the King and Duke might see and not bee seene. There was a most tragicall cause pleaded, whereof the first president made choise: The subiect was of one John Prost a practitioner of the Law, who had bene murdered at Paris, and the authors could not bee discovered. His mother accused a Baker where he was lodged, vpon some apparant presumptions of certaine money which she had sent vnto him. Wherevpon the Baker was condemned to be racked with all extremity, after the which hee was enlarged for a time, putting in Caution for his appearance againe in Court. It happened afterwards that three Gascons were taken for robbing of a house, and condemned the next day to be hanged. At their execution, the last of the three said, that the Baker was innocent for that whereof he had bene accused of, for the murder of John Prost, and that it was hee with his companion La Sale that had slaine him, thinking that he had money: and that after they had slaine him, they did cast him into the priuy, whereas he was yet. The which was found true. Wherevpon the Baker being declared innocent, hee presents his petition vnto the Court, and demands reparation of honor, with his charges, damage and interest against the mother. The mother defends her selfe, and saith, that her accusations were not calumnious. Maister Anne Robert pleaded for the Baker; and for the mother Maister Anthony Arnault; and for the Kings interest Maister Seruin his Maiesties Aduocate Generall.

The King

liament.

D ANNE ROBERT Aduocate in the Court, pleading for the Baker being Plaintife, sayd thus.

MAY IT PLEASE YEE.

THE ancient Poets taking pleasure to discourse of many combats happened at the battaile of Troy, report that Telephus (the sonne of Hercules) receiued in an incounter a fore wound with a Lance by Achilles: who seeing his paine to encrease daily, fled to Apollos Oracle for counsell, who answered, that nothing could giue him ease or cure, but the same Lance where-with he had bene wounded. A Lance called Pelias of Mount Pelion, in the top whereof Chiron gathered it, to present to Achilles: so as in Telephus accident, the remedy and the cure, came from the same Lance, which gaue the wound and did the harme.

The Plaintife with some like consideration, hath reason to say, that hauing bene by the authority of a sentence, miserably tormented, and exposed to the rigour of the rack and torture, by the wilfull slander and importune rashnesse of a woman, hee hath recourse vnto the same Lance of Achilles which did wound him: seeing that he doth now appeale vnto the Authority and Iustice of the same Court, which hath heretofore gi-uen the first sentence of condemnation against him, hoping that by the exemplary punishment of the rashnesse and slander of this woman, the soueraigne Iustice of this Parliament, guided by the conduct of an Achilles, which doth preside and hold the chiefe place, shall giue cure to his wounds, and bring consolation to his griefes.

The estate of the cause that is now in question, and to bee iudged, is not whether the

Plaintife were fallſely and ſlanderouſly accuſed or no : for the accident of two murderers hath auerted and diſcovered the ſlander without any doubt . But the queſtion is, if this Defendrefſe (after ſo falſe and calumnious an accuſation) ſhall paſſe unpuniſhed : and whether her pretended excuſes ſhalbe received and countenanced by Juſtice. For one of the chiefe points which ſhee pleads for her excuſe is, that the criminall Proceſſe hauing paſt through the hands of the moſt famous Iudges of Europe, if they haue beene deceiued (ſaith this woman) if by preſumptions and probable coniectures, they haue found cauſe to condemne this man vnto the racke, if ſo many worthy Iudges haue bin ſurpriſed, will you not excuſe the ſimplicity of a woman, and the extreme ſorrow of an afflicted mother for the death of her ſonne, hauing had no hatred nor malice, in this accuſation. It is a great abuſe to meaſure the actions of Iudges, with the actions of parties : the pourſute and proceeding of parties is meerely voluntary : no man is forced to plead or accuſe : the Plaintife ſhould be well aduiſed before hee begin, and not to draw any man into the danger of a capitall condemnation, if he be not firſt aſſured, that hee who hee calls into queſtion hath done the deed and is Author of the crime : but the charge of a Iudge is tied to a neceſſary duty, bound to certaine Maxims, and ſubieſt to rules, eſtabliſhed by the Lawes to condemne neceſſarily vpon preſumptions and proofes, and vpon the teſtimony of witneſſes, examined at the inſtance of the party. Antiquity doth teach vs, that Tireſias that great Southſaier, foretold things to come by the flying of birds, not that he did ſee the birds, for he was blind, but (ſay the Poets) hee had alwaies his daughter Manto nere vnto him, who told him in what manner the birds did ſlee, and thereby he diuined. Juſtice may rightly be compared to this excellent blinde man, and the compariſon cannot ſeeme bad, ſeeing that the Egyptians thought good to paint their Iudges with their eyes blind-fold. For Iudges cannot rightly ſee nor know what doth paſſe. Juſtice decrees nothing but according to the report and teſtimony of parties and witneſſes. If any inconuenience happen in the condemnation, the miſchiefe is to bee imputed to the parties, and not to the Iudges or Juſtice.

Iuſtice doth iudge of that which appears.

Slander is the cauſe of falſe
iudgement.

They report that the Greekes hauing put Palamedes to death, his father Nauplius to be reuenged, obſerued the time when as the Greekes after the ſack of Troy, returned by ſea, in a great tempeſt. Nauplius being vpon a Rock in full ſea, held a burning torch in his hand, as if that place had beene a ſafe port for the deſcent of ſhips : the Greekes abuſed with this light, ran againſt the Rock, and ſuffered ſhipwracke. In this miſfortune if there were cauſe to complaine, it was againſt the malicious inuention of Nauplius; but as for the Pilots and ſuch as gouerned the ſhips, they were not to be blamed, in following the direction of a Lanthorne in a darke night, being viſually ſet at ſafe Ports. So in accidents like vnto this in queſtion, all the harme, all the complaints, and all the wrong, is to be imputed to the accuſed, which kindles the fire of ſlander, and from whom proceeds the praetiſes and ſubornation of witneſſes, and the ſearch and diſguiſing of preſumptions and circumſtances. Who doubts but the complaints and malicious teares of this woman were falſe directions, and ſufficient inductions to circumuent the wiſdome of the beſt Iudges, who in the middeſt of the night, that is to ſay, in the darkeſſe of hidden crimes, haue followed the ordinary formes of Juſtice.

It was with reaſon that a Greeke Author diſcourſing of the criminall proceſſe of Oreſtes, who to reuenge the death of his father, ſlue Clitemneſtra his mother : ſaid, that when he was brought before the Parliament of Arriopage, Minerua Goddeſſe of wiſdome was Preſident in Iudgement. The Ancients by ſuch fictions would teach vs, that in the iudgment of criminall cauſes, if a celeſtiall power doth not aſſiſt, there doth many times inconueniences happen, but the fault muſt then bee imputed to the accuſer, who giues the firſt cauſe, by an information framed expreſly to afflict and condemne an innocent. Appian in his Hiſtory reports of Iulius Ceſar, that ſeeing a mutiny in his campe, he comanded the authors thereof to be apprehended. A ſoldiar was brought before him as one of theſe mutines, & yet it was preſently auerted that he was none. Ceſar cauſed him that brought him to bee ſeuerly puniſhed, iudging that although hee did it not maliciously, yet he deſerued puniſhment, for that he had drawn an innocent ſoldiar in in danger of his life. We read that Martian hauing found a dead body in the night, and through piety (which was then greatly recommended among Chriſtians) ſeeking to bury him, was taken, led before the Juſtice, & condemned vpon ſuſpicion : but at the ſame inſtant, when as they carried him to execution, it chanced happily that the murderere was taken and executed, hauing confeſſed the fact, to the great happineſſe of Martian, who was deliuered, and within few yeeres after choſen Emperor. As alſo the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory doth teach vs, that Saint Athanaſius was accuſed to haue ſlaine Arsenicus, and was ready to be condemned, if by good hap Arsenicus had not beene found, being hidden by the enemies of Athanaſius. A late writer curious in the ſearch of the ſingularities of the Hiſtory of Venice, reports an aduerture ſome what like vnto this : Fuſcarus ſonne to the Duke of Venice, had a capitall quarrell with an other Venetian Gentleman called Hermolaus Donat. This Gentleman was found dead, and the Author of this murder not knowne. Fuſcarus vpon ſuſpition of their quarrell, was called in queſtion, condemned and ſent into exile where hee died for grieſe, to ſee himſelfe baniſhed from his country. Within three monethes after his death, a theiſe was executed, who amongſt other crimes, confeſſed, that it was he and not Fuſcarus, which had ſlaine that Venetian Gentleman. In ſuch and the like inconueniences, were it reaſon to giue abſolute impunity, to him that was the calumniator? bee it that malice or indiſcretion hath drawne him to this ſlander? Scipio ſayd, that a Generall of an army muſt bee well aduiſed what he doth, for in matters of warres there is no meanes to erre twiſe, the firſt fault being ſufficient to ruine an army. Euen ſo in Juſtice, it muſt be very exact, when there is any queſtion of a capitall accuſation, for ſeeing that the life depends thereon, there is no meanes to erre twiſe, the firſt being irreparable. It is an approued diſtinction of all thoſe that haue treated of the puniſhment of falſe accuſations, whether an informer be induced to accuſe ſlanderouſly and wickedly, or by indiſcretion and without mallice.

The one differs from the other, ſo haue they diuers effects : the one hath ſome excuſe, the other is puniſhed ſeuerely : the one ciuilly, the other criminally : for where there is mallice and ſlander, the Law of God doth puniſh the calumniator with the like paine, Lege Talionis : and at Rome the calumniator in crimes that were not capitall, was beaten with a hot iron, and branded in the fore-head, for a ſigne and perpetuall marke of his ſlander. And the Emperour Macrinus did puniſh thoſe accuſers which did faile in their proofes with death. Pliny ſpeaking of ſuch men, called them abhominable ſacrifices, which ſhould be offered vp to the publike quiet. And the good Emperour Traian did ſo deteſt calumniators, as hee cauſed them to be put into a ſhip without ſayle or tackling, abandoning them to the mercy of that mercileſſe element, which would haue no pity of them, no more then they had had of many poore innocents.

The puniſh-
ment of falſe
accuſations.

But as for the ſlander which proceeds from indiſcretion without mallice, the ſeuerity in truth ſhould not be ſo great, yet is it fit there ſhould bee ſome puniſhment. No ſeuerer or capitall puniſhment, but at the leaſt pecuniary and ciuill, of damages and fine. If ſhee were not excuſable as a mother, forced to accuſe by extreme grieſe without mallice : what racke? what puniſhment? what torments were ſufficient to puniſh her, which hath drawne an innocent man in queſtion, and in danger to be broken vpon the wheele? The Poets ſaine, that the Goddeſſe Ceres by the ſuppoſition of Tantalus, did cate Pelops ſhoulder. This Goddeſſe finding her owne error, although vnaduſedly, condemned her ſelfe to make Pelops ſhoulder of Iuory. You are the cauſe of the cruell torments which the Plaintife hath ſuffered vpon the racke, but you ſay it was by indiſcretion, and without mallice. At the leaſt by an award of damages and fine, make ſome pecuniary recompence, to releue the miſery of this poore man, and to helpe him to ſuſtain the remainder of his daies, languiſhing after ſo many torments. And if this woman represents vnto you the pity and grieſe of a mother, imagine I pray you the miſerable ſighes of this innocent, in the middeſt of the cruelty of moſt violent tortures, hauing no other ſeeling but his paine and grieſe. In one houre a thouſand deaths without dying, a body tormented, ſtretched, halfe torne in peeces, his ſinewes dried

1599. and strained, his members broken, and his whole body in a pittifull Estate, being bound, A and miserably rackt. And to speake truth, it had bene a great happinesse for this poore man to haue died, for what remaines, is no more a perfect body, but peeces displaced and disioyned, members broken, lame and feeble, hauing his body reduced to that miserable estate, as hereafter he shall hardly by his labour get a liuing for himself, his wife and five children. It is the clamor & sighes of these poore yong Infants, whole crie pierceth vp to heauen, and their complaints come vnto you, to moue you vnto pitty. He in the mean-time seeing himselfe miserable in his body, and his family reduced to beggery, liues and dies altogether. It is a paine which still encreaseth, a griefe which euer doubles, and a death which hath neuer end.

The picture of Slander.

That great Painter Apelles meaning to paint Slander, set him forth in a mourning B weed, hauing two wiues, one of either side, Ignorance and Suspicion: what reason were there to take for payment and available satisfaction the indiscretion of the Defendresse, and the excuse of Ignorance (an ordinary companion to Slander) and to pardon so notable a fault, vnder pretext of an afflicted mothers griefe, for the death of her son:
and hereafter when any murder is committed, shall it be lawfull for a father, a brother, or a nere kinsman, with all impunity, vnder a pretext of iustice, to accuse whom he pleas-eth, and to bring in question of his life, or of some cruel torments, and in the end to bee quit excusing himselfe vpon his griefe, or ignorance? The rules of Iustice and Law do not allow it. Titus Linius sayd excellently, that the Law was inexorable, deafe without C pitty, and without passion. Why doth that worthy Author say, that the Law is deafe, but for that it doth neuer giue eare vnto the vaine discourse of pitty and commiseration? The property of Iustice is to be strict and seuer. The Surgion that is pittifull, and doth not lanch deepe, makes the wound incurable. An indulgent and ouer-mild father, makes the child incorrigible: So a mercifull Iudge doth nourish and increase vice, and betraines the lawes and Maiesty of Iustice.

The Law in-exorable.

This cause doth therefore import the publike, for examples sake: for although the Plaintife hath no other quality but of a simple Bourges and handy-crafts-man, yet to obtaine reason in Iustice, and to hope for reparation of the wrong which hath bene done him, he thinks himselfe great enough, seeing he hath the happinesse to liue vnder D the peacefull gouernment of the best King in the world, who hauing heaped all happinesse vpon France, maintaines equally in his protection, and vnder the safe-guard of his Maiesty, the life and health of all his subiects, poore and rich, great and small. The Ancients held, that Themis, which is the Goddesse of Iustice, was the daughter of the Sunne: and as the Sunne may bee seene in a glasse by them which cannot behold his beames; So the Maiesty of our great King, the true and comfortable sunne of this monarchy, the eye and heart of France, would giue authority to this famous Parliament, as the true seate of his greatnesse, to the end that therein, as in a looking-glasse, we might admire the beauty, light and beames of his iustice. An Historian saith, that the Emperour Augustus had fiery eyes, Igneos oculos, inferring thereby that hee had such E glistering eyes and such a piercing sight, as it was impossible, or very hard to looke sted-fastly on him. And wee in like sort must content our selues that it is lawfull for vs to admire the beauty of this soueraigne Court, and to beleue that our weake sight is not strong enough to enioy fully the presence of our great Prince, sitting in his seat of Iustice, nor to indure the glistering beames of the Maiesty of our great French Augustus, whom God hauing led through so many dangers, as it were by the hand, to the height of all greatnesse, and hauing endued him with the valour of Cesar, the fortune of Alexander, the bounty of Traian, we can with no more vnto him but the happinesse, the many yeeres, and the continuall prosperity of Augustus, to the end that all we his subiects may liue happy and content vnder the reigne of so great a King, and the assured Iustice of this famous Parliament.

So the Plaintife hauing recourse to this soueraigne Iustice, as to the last Port of health, beseecheth the Court to allow of his Request, and that hee may bee absolued of the slanderous accusation laide against him, that the inolement of his imprisonment

A prisonment may be razed, and hee discharged of all condemnations which heretofore haue bene giuen; and moreover that the defendresse may be condemned to a pecuniary reparation, such as it shall please the court to decree, and to all charges, domages and interest.

ANTHONY ARNAVD for the Defendresse, sayd.

B MAY IT PLEASE YEE.

YOV shall vnderstand in this cause, how true it is: That ordinary afflictions speake Afflictions with iudgement, and that extreme calamities doe quench or confound the spirit. The Plaintife, hath represented his griefes vnto you in an eloquent discourse, full of Arte and the force of eloquence: and contrariwise of our part, you shall heare nothing but the sobbs and sighs, of a mother transported with griefe, and reduced to all sorts of dispaire. I would to God the torments whereof you speake, and all the cruelties that may be imagined, had bene executed vpon mee poore mother, who haue one foote already in the graue: And that the death of my sonne (and the kinde of death, more miserable C then the death it selfe) had not ministred the mournfull subiect of this miserable cause:
so as on what side soeuer you turne, there is nothing to bee seene but teares and desolation. But there is this great difference: that the griefe of the aduerser party (if there yet remains any) may bee mollesed in time, by a thousand remedies which excellent wits haue inuented during many ages, to ease the discommodities of the body. But contrariwise the extreame affliction (which findes no words of force to represent it) for the losse of a sonne, of an onely sonne, the only support and comfort of the trembling age of an old mother, hath neuer found consolation in all the most excellent discourses in the world, being the onely phisicke of the minde. The griefe is so violent as it exceedes all D remedy, and bleeds a fresh euery day. The older it growes the more greuous it is. It doth houerly master the resistance which it found in the beginning, and doth continually vanquish the forces of the body with them of the minde.

It is a strange thing that my poore sonne hauing bene thus cruelly massacred, you who see him retorne no more into your house, instead of aduertising me thereof, went into his Chamber to take his money, you transported it out of your owne house, and hid it in your brother-in-lawes. And which is worse, being examined by the Iustice, you denied it constantly, and often, vntill that your sonne (to young to concele the truth) discovered the place where you had laied it. All this is iustified by the Proceffe, the which remaines in the hands of the Kings councill.

E So as it was not in you that these murderers were not vn timered, but the peering eye of Diuine Iustice, which neuer sleeps: for a robbery committed two months after hath brought them to the execution. It appeeres by the informations, that the very day of the murder, these two murderers went vnto your lodging, and brake open my sonnes cofer, if you had fled vnto Iustice, they might haue been instantly apprehended.
Alas! peraduenture my poore child was not then fully dead. How many are left for dead which are not so? How many haue bene taken out of the cofin, yea out of the grave, which haue suruiued their funeralls fifty yeeres?

At the least you cannot deny but you were the cause to moderate their punishment: what know I what they would haue sayd vpon the wheele? you neuer attempted F any thing against mee, but when as they which shue my sonne could no more accuse you? What did then hinder you? why you did not speedely aduertise the Iustices? At the least it was feare to restore the money which you had taken, in committing a do-mesticall theft: the which was alwaies, punished with death; and when in the Lawes of Hospitality (the which are Holy among all Nations) were also violated. Whom should

1600. should I sooner challenge for the death of my sonne, then him, who had his spoiles: A Nature hath hidden in the earth both gold, siluer and iron, but the malice of man hath drawne them all forth, that it might want no instruments for Murthers, nor reward for murderers. No man sheds blood, to die his hands therein; there must bee some other violent passion to thrust him on: Couetousnesse is the most ordinary. All coniectures, all presumptions, were and are found true, that my sonne had beene slaine by some one that desired his money, whom then might I better call in question then him who was found seized thereon?

Desire and couetousnesse the cause of murthers.

If treading vnder foote the Murther of my sonne (as some mothers doe) I had onely demanded his goods of you, you could not haue auoided an infamous & rigorous condemnation. But for that I haue sought reuenge of the murther, I am this day in danger to be condemned, what recompence? Cains Antonius was accused for the conspiracy of Catelin: whereof he was found innocent, but his arraignment was intermixt with other thefts, which he had in former times committed in Macedonia, for the which hee was condemned. And yet the one of his accusations had nothing common with the other. In this cause murther and theft haue great affinity. How many be there in this great city, which beeing murdered like to this poore yong-man, should remaine three moneths vnknowne, if their Host wanting them, did not presently aduertise the Iustice. Suffer them to take their money without punishment, that is to say, declare him innocent that hath hidden it, and you shall helpe to hide the murtherers.

It is a strange thing that in the head city of this Realme, and in the face of the Parliament, there should bee such furious Tigers found, to murther men as boldly as in the most hideous forest in the world. The more these wicked spirits are determined to contemne the Lawes, the more must you endeavour to force them to feare them. All that may serue to punish such detestable crimes, must bee earnestly imbraced. Nothing can so much aduance it, as to aduertise the Iustice speedily: whilest it is fresh, these wicked spirits are terrefied and amazed. If al be like vnto the Plaintiffe, a poore man may be rotten before they know he is dead. There be some that are incident to the suspicion of a crime, although they be very innocent, as he that is found nere vnto a man that is newly murdered. He may happily be put to the Racke, this is a meere mischance, or rather D (laying a side all fatality obserued in this case by the Heathen Lawiers) let vs say with the Doctours of the Church, that it is a secret iudgement of God, the which we must admire, and not curiously serch into. The thunder is worshiped euen by them that are stricken with it: punishments ordained by Iustice are the chastisements of Gods hand, whose powre is represented here below by the Prince, and his by his Magistrates. The Philosopher Crator, sayd, that he which suffers il without desert, is much eased in this accident of fortune: but in this fact which is now in question, the Plaintiffs theft and not his misfortune, hath with great reason made this suspicion to fall vpon him. Do you not consider that the paine which you haue suffered, is the cause you shalbe this day absolved? Without it your theft could not remaine unpunished: your demand of damage and interest, belongs only to them that are merely innocent, if you bee accused of two faults, and are found guilty of one, you must implore the mercy of the Iudge and not blame his rigour. It was then impossible to free you from the Racke, by all the Maximes of Lawiers, and their Interpreters, followed by a decree which needs no other defence then reason. And not to stray from this cause, shall I let you plainly see, that you need not be so fearefull to come to the Racke. If these murtherers had not beene tortured for the robbery for the which they were executed, they could not haue beene condemned for want of prooffe. The one of them confest it vpon the Racke. As the Racke tormented you, so the Racke releued you, hauing discovered your innocency in regard of the murther. And in easing you, it hath brought before mine eyes my murdered sonne, who presents himself euery night vnto me with stretched out armes, whilest the murtherers kill him.

So as one and the selfe same thing hath filled mee with heauinesse, and with ioy. Content your selfe then with your good fortune, and insult no more ouer my misery: doe

A do you not feare that they will lesse pittie you, and the paine you haue endured, when they shall see you haue none of me, nor of my distresse. I will not say vnto my Masters that it is cruell and barbarous to adde afflictions to the afflicted, why should I say so? seeing that al the condemnations which my aduers party demands against me, can adde no more calamity, then small brookes do vnto the sea? It is the only comfort which remains in my miserie, that it can haue no increase. I will not therefore spend any time to cite the texts of Lawiers, which hold the violent passions of so miserable a mother excusable. They be lawes which are borne with vs, whereof no man can be ignorant, seeing we haue suckt it with our mothers milk, and which we cannot abrogate but in spoiling our humanity. I will not strue to represent vnto you that affection to the children, or to the B Parents, (euen as the loue of good subiects to their Prince) consists not in any mediocrity or temper, but in excessse, that excessse which in other motiues of the mind is vicious, is herein the full of all perfection. Why should I come to these excuses, seeing that if I were to begin my accusation, I would do no lesse then I haue done: I had rather bee condemned to all sorts of damages, interests and reparations, then to repent me of the poursute I haue made for the death of my sonne.

A mothers
palsion excusable.

A goodly pretext for those Mothers, which do euery day sell the deare blood of their children, when they shall heare that I haue bin condemned, shall they not then haue reason to say that they feare damage and interest, if they open their mouths? Dion obserues, that they were reduced to that point at Rome, hauing so much discountenanced accusations, as they were forced to promise Impunity to him that should conuict another of a greater crime then his owne. C alumnators and false accusers are to bee feared vnder bad Princes, which intrich themselves with the confiscations of their subiects, and not vnder the iust and flourishing gouernment of our great King, which hath erected so many cuerlasting trophees of his clemency and bounty, equalling at this time by the glorious effects of iustice (which shines throughout all this great and mighty Estate) the victories and the stately triumphs of feareful warre: shewing by the effects, that the same vertue, and the same magnanimity carries great Princes and excellent Captaines into the midst of the most bloody and furious battailes, and doth conduct them also to the holy D and sacred actions of most happy and blessed peace.

We haue then no need amongst vs of these Talion punishments, the which were as soone abrogated, as they were enacted. If they were in force, not two crimes among an hundred should be punished: at the beginning we must necessarily follow coniectures and presumptions, if they may lead vs to the certaine knowledge of the truth: they condemn the culpable, if not they forbear: God onely walks in light, and men in darknesse. But I beseech you to consider what power I haue had in all this criminall proceeding. The Plaintiffe begins his action against me, because I am the most weake. If hee durst challenge the Iudges, he would do it much more willingly, all the instruction of the Proceste comes from the criminall party. It is not I, but the Kings Attourney generall. E Alas! I brought nothing but my sighes: therein consists my crime. Oh I may well doubt of my sonne to lose my teares, seeing it is not lawfull for me to weepe: it were more then a second losse of my sonne to lose my teares.

Taliens law wholly abrogated.

The Plaintiffes intent is to haue againe for his damage and interest, the mony which Iustice hath forced him to yeeld. I haue it not, I haue employed it in praying vnto God for my sonne who was murdered, and had no time to thinke of his soule, which was a double cruelty. Houses shake before they fall. The smoake fore-tels the fire that will consume vs. A tempest is discovered a farre off, but the murdering hand of man strikes sodenly, when we least thinke of it. If you condemne me in damages and interests you may iudge that remembering his paines, how rigorously he will intreate mee. I haue nothing left to pay it: that little which I had was employed in the education of my sonne, holding it to bee the richest and chiefest treasure that I could desire: O detestful hope! By vertue of your sentence he will confine me into a prison; but I regard it not, so as he make choise of a darke and an hidious one, that it may soone shorten my miserable life, the which shall neuer find ease but in death: for I am resolu'd to passe 1600. passe the remainder of my daies, like vnto those Mothers which accompany their children vnto the graue. All that makes me to desire liberty, is to the end that I might liue among the rockes, in deserts, and the most solitary woods, and that I might neuer see mothers that make much of their children. Alas my sonne, my poore sonne! I shall call on thee night and day, although thou answerest me not. If this extreame miserie doth not satisfie the Plaintiffe, let him feare, and apprehend the wrath of God and a second punishment. Let him not abuse the grace which he hath done him, in making manifest the truth of this murder. Let him liue happily to see his innocency knowne: and I alwaies vnhappie to haue lost my poore child. I conclude, that it would please the Court to absolue me from his request.

The defense
drecte conclusion.

After this the Kings Solicitor generall, master Servin, did rise to plead and conclude for the Attorney generall, vpon that which the Aduocates had deliuered for the parties: the opinions of the hearers were in such suspence, as they knew not which way to incline. He that had first heard of the plaintiffe, sayd, that he had reason: but as Iudges must alwaies referue one eare for the defender, being impossible to iudge definitiue. ly vpon the discourse of one party: when the second had pleaded, there was such equality and concurrence of reasons found, as it seemed they had both a good cause. The Kings Solicitors discourse, was the powder to separate the truth from that which had some apparence of truth: but let vs heare this other Demosthenes of France, whose pleading followeth.

L. SERVIN the Kings Attorney Generall, sayd thus:

MAY IT PLEASE YEE.

IF it be true, according to the worthy saying of Statius Caelius (vsed by Apuleius) defending himselfe against an accusation of impietie: That Innocencie is the true eloquence. It might satisfie the intention of the poore Plaintiffs, and might promise them an honorable issue, for that a poore and vntainted life speaking for them, surmounts in the opinion of good men, the richest eloquence of them that are guilty. For he may well defend, that can purge himselfe from crimes, hauing done nothing but what he dare publicly auow. But if it be more true that the art of speaking be vertue and wisdom, as the Stoickes haue defined it: signifying thereby, that the vertuous and wise haue subiect enough to talke: It is most certaine that God which giueth wisdom, and out of whose mouth proceedes all knowledge and vnderstanding, hauing not endued the Plaintiffs with such graces, seeing they haue neither the knowledge nor word, which is drawne out of the holy Scriptures, nor the perswasive speech of humane wisdom, hauing not the refined discourse of Reason, they had great need of the assistance of their Aduocate: who as he doth not yeeld in Eloquence and knowledge to any one of his profession, hath made prooffe by this present action, how well he can defend the innocent, the which is so much the more commendable, for that Dionysius Halicarnassens (a great Iudge of Orators) did hold Plato worthy to be blamed, for that he had written the Apologie of Socrates in a flat and cold stile.

On the one side, Maister Anne Robert hath liuely represented vnto you, the miserable estate of the Baker and his wife, lately accused, and now Plaintiffs: how they haue beene pursued in the Chasteler, iudged, appealed and condemned by sentence, the husband put to the torture, and the Racke presented to the wife and to the maide: and to conclude, all the family in distresse, by the accusation of a horrible murder, pretended to be committed vpon the person of his guest: a crime which God hath made knowne by the reuelation of the murder, that the hearts and hands of these poore people were innocent. By reason whereof they demand reparation of honor, with damage and Interest against the accuser. You haue on the other side, heard Maister Anthonie Arnaud, for the mother of the deceased John Prost, miserably murdered, beeing before Plaintiffe,

A tute, and now accused of slander, who may well defend her selfe, by the simple colour of pietie, which cries and is intercessor for her, for her, I say: A mother whole affliction is such, as there is no tongue but the mothers, or rather the voice of God, that can well expresse it: neither can any Aduocate or Orator how excellent soeuer, vnlesse he be possessed with a diuine spirit, represent the passions of a mother: witness the Prophet, when he deliueres what God had sayd: Can the mother forget her child, but she must haue pittie of the fruit of her wombe? and if she should forget it, I will not forsake him saith the Lord. It is God, our common father, God who is charity it selfe: for so he is called by one of his Apostles: God of whom the Greeke Poet Aratus (honoured by the allegation of S. Paul) sayd, That we are his offspring. God of whom the same Apostle doth teach vs, That he is father of heauen and earth. It is he by whom all mothers haue their affection to their children: it is he by whom the Defendresse (a miserable mother) was encouraged to seeke and pursue reuenge for the blood of her child. Behold persons of diuers qualities in our cause, who pretend their innocencies by different reasons. The Baker and his wife demand reparation, being ignorant of the murder of Prost: and the mother (of Prost murdered) seeks to be freed from the imputation of slander. But there is yet an encounter in this controuersie, which regards the authority of things iudged, wherein the publicke hath an interest. To deliuer what is fit vpon euery one of these qualities, it seems expedient to obserue what hath past in the accusation and proceeding: the first iudgement in the decree, the execution and what followed since.

That which appeares by the proceffe iudged, is, that the deceased John Prost, sonne to the Accuser, hauing beene lodged for a time in the Bakers house: about the beginning of February 1599. Katherine Cordier the wife of the Baker, sent for a Lock-smith by her husbands sonne, and caused him to open the chamber of Prost, being absent, the which she hath confessed after much disguising of the boyes name, whom since she knew to be her sonne in law. After this ouerture, there was another made in the view of two vknown men, who brought the keys which the sayd Prost had giuen them; the which is a second charge: for these two men entred into the chamber in the presence of the hostesse, and tooke what they pleased of that which Prost had left: and yet afterwards there was a third opening made by the Lock-smith, which was brought by the sonne of the Baker, and by his wiues commandement: This being thus aduowed and iustified by the sonne, the chamber being opened the fourth time by a Commissarie of the Chasteler, there was some money found belonging to Prost, but not all, for that the Baker and his wife had taken and promised some to their maide, if she sayd nothing. Moreouer, Prosts apprell being in his coffer, and among the rest a doubler, the hostesse being examined, sayd that Prost had none other. In the end, the Proceffe hauing beene made perfect by interrogatories and confrontations; One of the chiefe allegations made by the husband and the wife for their iustification, was, that the accuser, although a mother, did not loue Prost her sonne, whereof he had oftentimes complained. By a sentence giuen by the Prouost of Paris, it was decreed, that the Baker, his wife and seruant, should be put to the Racke. They appeale. There followed a second decree in regard of the Baker: and as for his wife and seruant, it was ordained they should haue the Racke presented vnto them, the which was done. And after the deniall of the Baker, his wife and mayd, there followed another sentence allowing the reception of the ordinary Proceffe, and yet restrained that in case no greater proofes beeing found on the ordinat Racke, the accused should preuaile, yet they should haue no Charges, Damage, nor Interest adiudged vnto them. In Iune following, God hauing suffered that two thecues, whereof the one called John Bazana had murdered this Prost, were apprehended by the iustice and by the testimony of Bazana, the act was confessed. So as the Baker and his wife pretend themselves freed by this testimony, and demand an honorable reparation, with some recompence from the mother of him that was murdered, saying, that the accusation beeing false, shee ought to be iudged a slanderer. Wherein it seemes that innocencie presents it selfe at the feete of Iustice; and cries out for them, as Dauid in the seuenth Psalm, intituled Siggaion, that is to say: The ignorance of Dauid, the which is his defence against the slanders

flanders of Semei, where he exclaimed in denying and forswearing the Impostures of A his aduersarie, and in saying, that he knew not what it was, he spake these words. If I haue committed such a fact, if there be iniquitie in my hands, that I may fall before mine enemies Excellent words and deliuered in the kind of an oath. In like case, a pore Host plaintiffe, complains and may say with Agur the Sonne of Iake: Truly I am more brutish then any man whatsoeuer, I haue no vnderstanding, neither haue I learned any wisdom, nor attained to the knowledge of holy things. The wit of man will maintaine the infirmities thereof, but who will support a grieued mind? The Accuser at the first seemed iust in her cause, but the Accused come to purge themselves, and haue found out the truth. The words of slanderers (saith the wise King) are ambushes of blood, but the mouth of Truth shall deliuer them. You see an Host and Hostesse accused of Inhospitality, of Infidelity, and of the murther of their Guest, a crime so farre from the manners and hearts of the French, as if Euripides sayd among the Grecians:

That it was not for the Achaeans to murder their guests.

We may say with the Plaintiffes, with as much or more reason, That it is not vsuall among the French to murder their guests: for among ciuill people, our Coeltick nation hath bin most renowned for Hospitality, a vertue proper to the French, and recommended by many strangers; yea by Parthenius a Greeke Author in his booke of the Affecti- C ons of Loue, where he saith in the Historie of Eurippus, that at what time the Gauls made roades into Ionia, the Celtes received their guests willingly, and intreated them courteously. The which is confirmed by Salustianus a Priest of Marceilles, in his booke Of the prouidence of God, where among the vertues of our Nation, he termes them Francos hospitales. It was therefore a great crime, vnfit for the Plaintiffs: a crime for Barbarians, Pagans, and Infidels, worthy of extraordinary punishment, and so much the more punishable, for that it had bin committed in Paris, the chiefe city of the Realme, the seat of our Kings, the Place of foueraign Iustice, whereas the most holy and reuerend Senate of the world is resident: the Court of Peers, and the great Parliament of our great King.

Pro. 8. 18.

The Husband accused in this Parliament, and not onely accused, but iudged and tormented in body and mind, comes this day in Iudgement as a man reuiued againe, by his innocency, he brings his wife with him, and sayth against the Accuser That he which slandereth his neighbor, is like vnto a false witnesse, which is as a hammer, a sword, and a sharpe arrow. Although he be borne poore and miserable, yet is he of a pure and innocent life. That his soule and that of his Wiues are no lesse pretious before God then the richest: that they haue not wronged any man: that they haue liued content in their pouerty (Po- uerty which is a singular gift of God, and vnknowne of men) and yet they beeing poore and innocent haue beene afflicted: a thousand feares haue seized on them, and the life both of the husband and wife haue beene in danger. The Sonne hath beene heard against the Father, all the family defamed, fearing to loose their credit, and to see no more good daies: to haue no means to get their liuing, nor to shew themselves. The troublesome griefe of a mournfull prison, deprivied of light, and cast into an obscure dungeon fit for Murderers: to liue often times, and to dye as often. The Racke giuen vnto the husband, and presented to the wife: all danger, all griefe: their eyes dried vp, their minds oppressed, apprehension of Nakednesse, Hungar, and Death, yea and of at- tringominious death. They demand this day, that which the men vniustly tormented in the Iustice of Athens demanded: that the Altar of Mercy might be adorned with a monu- ment, carrying a declaration of their innocencie. They do mortouer pretend reparati- on against the Accuser, and this demand is not new nor strange, there are many Pre- sidents of the like, among the which there is one very famous in the Declamations of Marcus Seneca the Rethorician.

A Father hauing two Sonnes, goes into a farre country with one of them, the son returnes alone: his brother accuseth him of Parricide: he is condemned. but by reason of some festiuall daies the execution is deferred: the Father returnes, the Brother con- demned

A demned, accuseth his brother of false witnesse: obtaines iudgement, causeth him to bee bound, and detaines him according vnto the Law, which sayd, that a false witnesse shold be prisoner to him whom he had falsely accused. The innocent Brother sayd, that the Accuser was the cause of Parricide in the person of his Father, and had committed one in that of his brother: the Minister of Iustice had giuen notice vnto the condemned Brother of the coming of his Father: the expected punishment was more grieuous then death. It was more troublefome for the condemned man to apprehend it, then to endure it: he layd before his eyes all kinds of Death. And what can I lesse do (sayd the innocent) then keepe him in my bonds, that might haue taken away my life? In another famous example, we see another controuersie in the same Author. A Father hauing two Sons, deliuers the one into the others hands, vpon suspicion of Parricide, whereof his Mother-in-law accused him. The accused Brother is cast into an vnrig'd ship: God pre- ferues him from danger: he fells into the hands of Pyrats, and is made their Captain. The Father makes a voyage by sea; he is taken by the Sonne, whom he had so ill intreated, and the Son sends him home into his country. Cestius Pius an eloquent man sayth for the innocent brother. That Innocency is a strong fort, and a faithfull safegard in danger. The Sea compassed in the ship, the waues tost it, the tempest draue it, yet innocencie did assure him: O Sea more iust then their Iudgement! O waues more mild then the Fa- ther! what a soule haue you cast into the Port! and you haue not onely saued the Son, but you haue deliuered him into the hands of Pyrats: it was diuinely decreed that the Father should vndertake a voyage; that the Iudge should be taken to repent him of his Iudgement. A Mother-in-law might accuse, yea and cause her husbands sonne to bee condemned of Parricide, but she could not make him a Parricide, no not in condemn- ing him. The Sonne hereupon sayd vnto the Father. Behold my innocency, O father, in the sea, which you would not know in your house. And then turning vnto the Iudges, he sayd: I had rather haue mine innocency iustified vnto you, then vnto my Father. Hereupon Ari- stotle sayth, that by the law of Greece they gaue the right side to the accused: and by the Romaine Lawes, Iudges are taught to be more inclined to absolue then to condemne.

If this be requisit in ciuill causes, how much more in criminal? And the mother which was the Accuser, whom the Demanders say was ill-affected to her Sonne when he liued, could she without feare of punishment slander the Complaynants, charging them with the vncertaine suspicion of a murther committed vpon the person of her Son, so much hated, or at the least not much beloued of her. That if the Demanders bee not exempt from faults, whereunto all men are subiect: yet they may iustifie themselves free from the crime imposed vpon them by the Accuser, beeing this day purged by a testimonie which God hath caused to be giuen by a Man, the which is so much the more credible, for that he deposed it neare vnto his death, not speaking to discharge himselfe, but ac- cusing himselfe and confessing the Murther. These (in summe) be the griefs which the Demanders can propound. It beeing hard, yea impossible in such cases to speake words that may equall the sorrow.

Contrariwise, the Defendresse a poore mother, saith, or cries out in that sort, as it is not well possible to represent her passion: but we must paint it out, as Timanthes did counterfeit Iphigenia, with her face covered, a low voice, and a languishing speech. We cannot make you vnderstand what she hath suffered, and doth yet suffer. Shee hath lamented her absent Sonne, euen when as she accused the Complaynants: she thought him to be dead: her feare was grounded vpon presumptions, the which not onely shee felt, but the last Iudges haue held to be pregnant. A voyce was heard from an high, the mother weeping for her Sonne, and would not be comforted. Doubtlesse no kind of affliction or commiseration is like vnto that of a Woman, but amongst women, none so great as that of a Mother. So as GOD hath compared the remembrance which hee hath of Man to that of a Mother. And in truth, mothers haue more then a fatherly remem- brance. Our Defendresse in this case is assisted by the suffrages of Nature: shee sighes vpon earth, and fillles heauen with her complaints: her lamentable cries, and her abundance of teares, are her onely defences: the which are so much the better, for that they 1600. they are naturall. A mother who knowes not whither to go, who finds no place to rest A in, who seekes her child as if he were yet liuing: who would haue endured his wounds, and dies twice for that shee died not before her sonne: the implores heauen in lamenting her misery, and desires her end: her sighes moue all men to compassion. Griefe hath teazed vpon her soule, and her vnderstanding is nothing else but sorrow. Nothing is more constant then the loue of the Father to his child, and especially of Fathers that haue the instinct of Nature. But mothers haue their affections more violent. If any thing happen vnto their children, it breedes a great alteration in them. Witnesse the iudgement of Salomon, seeking betwixt two women, to know the right Mother. So you may see the passion of David when he called his Sonne, My sonne Absolon, my sonne: he B was much troubled. But Mothers are much more, feeling the same paine they suffered at their birth. And that which afflicts the Defendresse much more, is that the Complainants obiekt against her, that she loued not her child. That without doubt is insupportable to a Mother. The latter times are miserable, foretold by the Prophets: That Inhumanity, Inciuitie, Astorgie (that is to say, want of loue in the Parents vnto their children, and of children vnto their Parents) shold enter into the hearts of men. What say I of Men, who are no men, seeing they prooue inhumane, cruell, brutish, and vnnatural!

But can it be, that two such contrary passions should iumpe in our Defendresse: Could she hate her son, and not seeing him any more, complaine that he was dead? Could she accuse his Host and Hostesse, if she loued him not? Iosephus in his first booke of the lewish warre, reporting the accusation of Herod against his children, sayth, that Saturninus would not condemne the accused, saying: That it was not lawfull for him who had no children to giue sentence of death against another mans children. A speech worthy of a graue Romaine, but had bene better spoken by one borne in Iudaea: for in former times the Iudges giuen by God vnto the people, were chosen out of the fathers of Families, who had, or had had children, and who by this meanes knew best the iust affections of fathers loue. The Historie addes, that an old man at armes of Herods called Tyron, was so transported seeing a cruel father, as he became almost mad, going from place to place, exclaiming, that Iustice was troden vnder foot, Truth was perished, Nature confounded, and alwas full of iniquity: with such like speeches as passion made him to utter. D So strange this good old man held this malice, not beleeuing that such neere kinsmen should conspire against their owne blood. And therefore it is not to be presumed that our Defendresse being a mother, was otherwise then well affected to her sonne: and what greater prooue of her loue can be giuen, then her accusation against the Complainants? And who can represent the tender affection of Fathers and Mothers, which seale the resemblance of bodies and minds, in the little admirable scale of the Infant, the mothers beeing much more affectionate to that which proceedes from them then the Fathers? What then may be sayd of the obiection made vnto the Defendresse? Doublelesse false allegations must concur with naturall, as Paulus the Lawyer sayth of Confessions: and it is not lawfull for Iudges, especially for such as are Fathers to beleue that a Mother would hate her sonne to the death: especially this poore woman, who making her complaint of the murder, did note one notable circumstance, saying, that her Sonne had complained vnto her, that the Demanders were froward Hosts. The which shewes a wit in her complaint, and the loue which shee bare to her deare Sonne: remembring the first yeares of his infancie, beeing young and the onely child of his Mother. A Sonne whome shee (beeing his Mother) seeing no more, cryed out with the Mother of Lamuel, VVhat my Sonne, what the Spaine of my wombe, what the Sonne of my vowes?

This poore mother was perplexed: shee fought her sonne, and found him not. A sonne which was but simple, and might easily be wrangled, for he went alone: hee had money, he left it in his chamber, which was a bayte for theues: his Host and Hostesse layd hand on it, they suffered men to enter into his chamber: men whom they knew not. What might the mother thinke of this? Had she not reason to say, that they had slaine him. Truly it was sayd in the booke of Wisdom, That the iustice of the righteous shall

A shall deliuer them. It is also written. That the disloyall shall be taken for their iniustice, and the wicked shall be the ransom of the iust, and the disloyall for the righteous. May not then this poore woman thinke with reason, that you are not to haue any regard to the demanders, vnder collour of their base condition, seeing that for a peece of bread they would haue committed the deed, hauing taken their guests money who trusted them. These bee the reasons by the which the poore Mother may iustifie her selfe, that she hath not attempted any accusation, for the which she should be charged with slander.

Let vs now come vnto the Iudges. They need no other excuse, nor defence of their decree, then the authority of soueraigne iudgements: yet we may say, for the truth which they had of the proofes, if not full and cleare as the Noone day, yet they were such as the presumptions were vehement. If the accused suffred, it came from themselves, for they obserued not the precept which teacheth man: Above all to keepe his heart pure, from whence life proceedes. They haue applied their hearts to desire an other mans goods, resembling those that erre: either through want of instruction, or by their great indiscretion, or hauing their hearts peeced with the dart of couetousnesse. And therefore it is no wonder if they haue not appeared in iudgement with a constant countenance. For blessings are vpon the head of the iust; but extorsions stoppe the mouth of the guilty. Do you not see, that God was not with the accused? they were confounded in their owne speeches. Life and death are in the power of the tongue, he that loves it shall eate the fruites thereof. They haue saide too much, charging the Mother, C of hatred to her Sonne. And who will not beleue but the Iudges (seeing the Proceffe) made their prayers vnto God to open their vnderstandings. The doubt which they had of the circumstances of the charge, hath bene fortified by examples, the which are the first encounters that come vnto the mind. In this Citty, a Woman dwelling neere to S. Oportene, was slaine with a hammer, which two theeues had taken in a smiths shop. The Smith being condemned, he was put to the Racke. Afterwards the theeues were apprehended for other crimes, and freed the Smith who was already executed. Iudges in coniecturall causes, erre against their wills: being bound to follow the probable, for that which may happen, or hath happened. Sometimes there are bad Hosts, and murderers. It is dangerous said Phedrus to beleue, but it is more dangerous not to beleue.

D There is no reason then to heare the complaints of the accused, against the Iudges: Witnesse that which that wise King hath written, whose words are like vnto deepe springs which cannot be dried, and from whence we draw profit for all affayres, and especially for iudgements. To condemne the iust is not good, nor to strike Princes that haue carried themselves iustly. An excellent sentence, and a greening with our cause. He called Iudges, Princes: and in another place they are termed Gods. That if God making his iustice to shine, hath since discovered the Murder, yet hath not the Baker nor his wife any cause to complaine of the Court. The eye of God infuseth his knowledge into the spirits of men, in such measure as he pleaseth, giuing vnto some a neerer light, and (as Synecius Bishop of Cyrene said) more approaching vnto things which hee doth reueale, to others farther off. We take moisture from the water, heate from the Fire: firmenes of the body from the earth, and spirit from the aire: but iustice comes from God, who is the only fountaine of all good. We haue not this iustice in vs, be it for the good of our selues, or for the perpetual & constant duty which we owe vnto our neighbours, to doe every man right. God onely knoweth all things, and all is hidden from vs, but what he pleaieth. There is none but he, which knoweth hidden things. It is he whose admirable name is above all other names. It is he whom Daniel calleth a Certaine, (by the word Palmoni,) of whome the admirable name of Iesus the Sauour of the world, was not reuealed, before that he was made man. That Sonne of Iustice whose glory is incomprehensible. It is he, who by his light doth open the Iudges eyes when it pleaseth him: to the end they should take care of the innocent, and looke vnto his estate,

It is written in the booke of the wise King: That euen as in the water one face is opposite to another, so doth the heart of man vnto man, so as often times the Iudge discovereth the truth of a crime, by the countenance, as well as by the mouth of the accused. And to that

1600. that purpose the same King saith. That Councell in the heart of man is like to a deepe water, the which a wise man shall draw forth. But this doth not often happen, but vnto the King: of whom the wise man saith. There is no prophesying but in the Kings lips, and his mouth shall not stray from Iustice. God giues this priuiledge to a iust King. There are many thoughts in the heart of man, but the onely Councell of our Lord God is firme. And therefore St. Augustine in his booke of the City of God in the Chapter which he hath expressly made, touching the errors of humane iudgments, makes a complaint of the perplexities wherunto Iudges are reduced: when to saue an innocent they are forced to condemne the accused vnto the racke, and for an vncertaine fact, they cause him to suffer a certaine pain. The which he excusing saith: That a wise Iudge doing not things with a will to hurt, but by necessity to iudge that which he knoweth not, must cry vnto God: deliuer me from my extremities and cares. The which he speakes not to blame the racke: for he knowes it to be necessary. But if it be not (as we cannot rightly say) done by malice, yet it is a great misery. And doubtlesse if it bee a mischief, yet it is ordayned, by good lawes practised in all countryes, whereas iustice is well administred, whereof there are so many Statutes, not only in this realme, but in the Estates of Italy, & in the neighbour Countries, as in Piedmont, in Sauoy, and other parts of Christendome, as there is no reason to doubt thereof. Neither is it lawfull to argue the Iudges of rigor in this cause, for besides the presumptions which might moue them, who knowes whether the accused had committed some other crime, whereof God would suffer this accusation, (whereof they now complaine) should be the punishment: There are some generations which thinke to be free, and yet they are not clesed from their filthines. And what is he that can say, I haue purged my heart, I am clesed from my sinne. If thou sayest, wee did not know it, he that weighes the heart shall not be vnderstand it and reward euery man according to his workes. In another place the wise man saith that, He which walketh innocently shall be saued, but the peruerse walking by two wayes shall fall. Aristotle speaking of the Iudges of Greece, sayd that they were accustomed before sentence, to sweare that they should iudge, by the best advice they could conceaue. The which Demosthenes in his Oration against Aristocrates hath sayd by the most iust advice. In which case although the Areopagites did sometimes iudge against the law, yet could they not be reprehended to haue gone against the oath taken by them to iudge well, whether it were in the Senate, or in the assembly which they call Helias: no man being able to answer but for his own conscience. And for this reason by the lawes of Charlemaine, and of Lewis the gentle: It was not lawfull to blaspheme, that is to say, to accuse of false iudgment and to blame the Earles, (which was the title of Iudges in France) if it did not appeare that they did iudge either by enuy, or by some bad occasion. To conclude, the Iudges which those great Princes called Fideles: were held for good, and without blemish, when they were onely guided by the zeale of true iustice. So the Demanders do not complaine of the Iudges, but of the accuser, against whom if she had framed her accusation maliciously, she were then subiect to that which was decreed by the Capitularie, which saith, That they which haue accused innocents, either before the Prince, or before the Iudge, if they were spirituall men, they are to be degraded, if they be lay men, they must be condemned to the like punishment, which they should haue suffered that were accused. But this is to be vnderstood of accusations wherein there is malice, in which case the false Accusers, deserue that which the accused suffered: for the slanderer resembles the wicked; which are represented by the wise man. watching secretly for the innocent, and persecuting him without a cause. In which case such as slander to vex, and to get money: by the Constitutions of the Romaine Emperors, were punished with the same punishments. It is therefore no reason that the Complainants should trouble the defendresse for the accusation, seeing it was not with any intent of slander: but the must take their troubles as an accident sent of God. We must not vse the inhumanity of Gneus Piso although he were an vpriight man, but hauing not the true rule of reason, hee tooke rigor for a resolution of severity, who beeing aduertised that two Souldiers going forth together, the one was returned without his companion, hee condemned him as 1600. A murderer of him that was absent: and as the condemned man was in the hands of the Executioner at the place of Iustice, his companion (whom they held to bee dead) returned: This rigorous Iudge hearing that the officer had protracted the execution, he caused him to bee apprehended, and to be brought vnto the Scaffold, and with him the companion, taking for a pretext that hee was the cause of this mischief by his absence, and to him hee added the officer, iudging him worthy of punishment, for that he had brought backe the first condemned, whom hee should haue presently executed according to the sentence. It is not fit in all causes to stand so strictly vpon iudgments as Alexander the Great did, who had rather pay a fine for Atreus then remit it: for sometimes a tempter of humanity is commendable, as in this case: Imitating the example of Prince Titus, the sonne of Vespasian, when he deliuered Iosephus out of prison, saying vnto the Emperour his father, after that hee had commanded the prisoner to bee vnbound: It is reason O Father, that with his bonds the dishonor should be taken from Iosephus, for hee shall be as if in the beginning hee had not bene bound. But if wee waite him, wee must cutte the chaine, for so they vse them that are vniustly bound. A speech of a worthy Prince, witnessed by the History of Iosephus, worthy to bee spoken before a great King, and well approued of by the Emperour: As true lippes please Kings and they loue him that speakes iust things with a pure heart.

And therefore to make an end of the plaints misery with that of Iosephus, the Court if it please, hauing in some sort regard vnto their request, shall let them at Liberty, declaring them innocents of the crime of hospitality violated, and of the murther whereof they haue bene accused, without adiuudging vnto them (notwithstanding) any Reparation, Charges, Damages, and interest against the Accuser, seeing she hath not, nor cannot be iudged a slanderer. So either party obtaining what they may hope for by reason, things iudged shall remaine in their authority, and, God who holds the Kings heart in his hand as little brookes of running water, inclining to his will, shall make him raigne happily, and his posterity after him, as all good Frenchmen and true Christians do with by a happy marriage, so as our great Henry the fourth, sitting in the throne of Iustice, or represented by the Councillors, maintaining his Countries shall disperse all danger by his looke: and euery one will say with Salomon, the beloued of God. That the sett of the King which iudgeth the poore iustly shall be firme for euer. The sentence of the Court vpon these pleadings pronounced by the first President, on Monday the 17. of Ianuary, was conformable to the conclusion; taken by the Aduocate for the Kings Atturney Generall. The King and the Duke tooke great pleasure to heare them; Both gaue their opinions, on them that had best pleaded, but about all, they commended the equity of the Court, which dismissed the parties free from further sute. The King at the Dukes request granted a pardon to a poore woman an Adulteresse that was condemned to die, whose Adulterer had beene executed for that hee had abused her beeing a house-hold seruant, and so had shee beene in like sort, but that she was found with Child. This Pardon was granted by the King vnto the Duke, notwithstanding any opposition made by the Court and the Kings Councell, shewing the Kings consequence thereof. His Maiesty would haue it passe of his absolute authority, Yet vpon condition that she should liue in perpetuall prison and nourished at her husbands charge. All these good receptions; all these exercises; all these pastimes, did not make the Duke forget the care of his affaires, hee had said vnto Monsieur de Ville-roy. That hee was not come to yeeld up the Marquisate. The King on the other side being at Fountainbleau sayd vnto him, That hee should be alwayes his friend, but hee would haue his Marquisate. The Duke was aduertised that the King had sayd priuately in his Cabinet. That the Duke was a braue and gallant Prince, yet hee kept his Marquisate. These words made him presume that the report which the Cheualier Breton and Roncas had made vnto him (that the King was desirous to see him, and that they should agree) was not true, for whensoever the Duke spake to the King in priuate touching that business, hee desired him to referre it to their Councillors.

And though this was a very important business, yet the King had one which did presse him him neerer, which was his marriage. Being aduertised (as we haue formerly shewed, by A Silery) his Ambassader at Rome, that the Pope had granted his desire touching the nullity of his marriage, hee sent Alincourt (gouernnor of Pontoise) to thanke him, and to aske his aduice vpon the alliance he desired to contract with the house of Florence. Hee came to Lyons, to passe to Auignion by the riuer of Rhosne, and so to Antibio whether the state of Genoa sent him a Galley well appoynted to conduct him to their City, where hee was receaued with all the honors, fit for the greatnesse of the Prince that sent him, and worthy of the credit and reputation which the name of Villeroy carries among the friends of this Crowne. They did cast lots there where hee should bee lodged, which fell to the Pallace of Grimaldy, where hee was defrayed two dayes, at the charges of the State. The Ambassador of Spaine went to visit him. He went to the Senate, was seated in the Dukes place, and saw the order they held in their Councils and deliberations, where they granted him liberty for two Galley-slaues Frenchmen, that were in the Gallies of the Seigneury, the one was a Parisian & the other a Linois, which they esteemed a fit fauour to gratifie a Prince. He went on his voyage in post to Rome, the Ambassador met him with a great number of French Gentlemen, he lodged him in his house, and the second day of his arriuall he had audience of the Pope. He continued in Rome vntill Easter: during his aboad, he did see the Viceroy of Naples make his entry into Rome, comming to do homage vnto the Pope for the realme of Naples, presenting vnto him a white Steede, for an acknowledgment of the fee, for the inuestiture of Naples, for that it is one of the Realmes which holds in fee and doth homage vnto the Church of Rome, & for that reason (besides the 8000. Ounces of gold which they owe yearly, they are bound to take armes for the defence of the Church. They had their part also of the fruites of the Holy yeare, during which time many Frenchmen and others of the religion went to see for curiosities sake, without any feare of the Inquisition, whose iurisdiction doth cease in the yeare of Iubile: many great peronages from diuers parts of Europe went to this Iubile, among the cheefe was the Duke of Bar, who went in a disguised habit, to get absolution, for that he had bene married against the rules of the Church, and without dispensation of the degrees of consanguinity that were betwixt him and the Kings Sister, for which cause the Bishop of Lorraine refused him the Holy Sacrament, and held him for excommunicate. The King assisted this Princes humility and submission with his letters of fauour to diuers Cardinalls. The Duke of Sauoy was not pleased with the long delays of the Court, he complained that he was intreated with too great rigour. The Duke thought to find a King of Complements: And the King a Duke more easie to restore that which hee held. The Duke couered his discontent with silence and discretion. In the end they agree to treat of their affaires and differences by Deputies: For the King, were named the Constable, the Chancellor, the Marshall Biron, the Marquis Rhoisy and Ville-roy. For the Duke, Bely his Chancellor, the Marquis of Lullins, Jacob the Earle of Moret, and Alimes. The Kings Deputies demand restitution of the Marquisate of Saluces, in the same estate it was in when the Duke surprized it. The Dukes first proposition was to haue the King renounce the protection of Geneua, the which E was not (said they) comprehended in the Treaty of Peace, in speciall words, as other townes. This did much offend the King and his Councell. The Duke intreated the Popes Nuntio to make this proposition, (who hauing his soule as free from craft and dissimulation as it was full of zeale and integrity) found meanes to speake vnto the King without trouble or alteration. He said that there was a meanes to vnite the extremities of their wills: for the same reason which required the Duke to restore the Marquisate, did not hinder his maiesty from the enioying of that which did belong vnto him. It is true (said the King). There the Nuntio replied. The towne of Geneua belongs vnto the Duke, and nothing hinders him from settling the authority which his Predecessors had there, but the power of your protection.

Is it not then reaso that if you wil haue him restore the Marquisate which is yours, you should suffer him to inioy the towne of Geneua which is his? the King to be speedily freed

A freed of this argument, answered, that things were different, that he had not made the protectio of Geneua. It was a treaty wherunto he was bound by faith, for the reuerence hee did beare vnto his Predecessors, who had made themelues Protectors of that common weale, from whom they had receiued seruice in their necessities. And hee would neuer oppose himselfe against the firmnesse of their promises. The Nuntio saies presently vnto the King. As you will not leaue the protection of Geneua, for that it was made with your Predecessors, in like sort the Duke is not bound to yeelde you the Marquisate of Saluces, for that hee tooke it not from you, but from the deceased King. Our difference replied the King, although (for my part) it consists of many poynts, is reduced onely to that which concernes the Marquisate of Saluces. The vsurper must restore: the Duke of Sauoy hath vsurped my Marquisate, there is nothing that doth free him from restitution. I hold nothing of his, and therefore must not restore him any thing. I will neuer hinder him for hauing reason of Geneua, so as hee get it without armes: for when he shall come thether with force, I will alwayes resolute of that which I ought. He thinks that if I should abandon that towne, hee might force them to acknowledge him: but I should purchase in abandoning them much blame, it beeing against the honor of this crowne and the firmnesse of a Kings word.

The Duke had reason to affect this place: he might make a great Bul-warke thereof against the Suiſſes, to recouer that which they did hold from the ancient house of Sauoy, and to make all things difficult for the French, among the Cantons: This proposition of Geneua was razed out of the Dukes articles, and no more spoken of in the Assembly of the Deputies. They did presse the restitution of the Marquisate, or the exchange of the countreyes of Bresse, Pigneroll, and Sauillan, with some vallies for the passage of Piedmont. The Deputies assembled but once. The Duke fore seeing what the issue would bee, and hauing vnderstood that the Chancellor speaking of the restitution of Exchange, had said that they must passe that way or by the sword: hee let the King vnderstand that too many delt in the businesse, and that it should bee sooner ended, if but one did faithfully report the intentions of eyther part. The Patriark of Constantinople was employed therein, but the Duke disliked thereof.

He resolved to free himselfe of these difficulties, and to runne the hazard and shame D of the refusall. Then hee presented his first proposition of the Empire and Duchie of Millan: giuing him very plausible reasons, if they had bene as easie in the execution as in the discourse: shewing that for all the fruites of the conquest, hee desired nothing: but to hold the Marquisate of Saluces. Whereunto the King answered; That hee was neither of that age, nor his affaires in that estate, that King Francis his were, when hee aspired to the Empire. That there was not a Duke of Saxony nor a Landgraue prisoner, to giue him the Title of Protector of Germany: and of the Princes prisoners, as vnto King Henry the second. If a King of France should bee ambitious of any thing greater then his Crowne, it might bee an Empire, but not in the estate that it is now: the title of an Emperour beeing little more then that of a Duke of Vergennes, but as it was vnder Augustus, when as Rome (which commands but seauen E hilles) had reduced all the world vnder one Empire, or at the least as it was vnder Charlemaine.

As for the Duchy of Millan, the King said that the enterprife was tedious, and the issue vncertaine, as of all other desseins, and for the meanes which the Duke discovered vnto him, there was nothing so easie which the King of Spaine might not make difficult, hauing both Land and Sea at his command to hinder him. Besides it was the nature of actions of war, still to produce vncexpected difficulties. You alone (added the King) cannot succour me, I know not how my men wil agree with yours. And if things should succeed according to your desire, I know not what should become of the fruites of the conquest. I haue inough to doe in my Realme without thinking of others. The Peace is but in the flower, the vent of such a desseine would wither it. I will haue no war with the King of Spaine, vnles he be weary of Peace. Brother you haue no need of my counsel, but affection commands vs sometimes to giue it to him that doth not aske it.

1600 " I would counsell you to liue in good termes with him. If there were any troubles be- A
 " twixt you, I would not meddle but to reconcile you. I haue too much care of the honor " of my word, to breake a peace so iust and so necessary, without a precedent injury. It " did it, I should make my selfe the Argument of all the complaints of Christendome, the " discourse of other Princes, the cause of a forraine warre, and the renewing of infinite ca" lamities. It were an indiscretion for me, vpon a vaine and imaginary hope, to loose the " assurance to recouer mine owne, where with I content my selfe without seeking an " others. The desires which are infinite, are vnworthy of a iust Prince, they are proper to " tyrants, who raigne without Law, and liue without feare: If I had any will to that " which you propound, there should not need so many words, but hauing no will to it, it " is in vaine for me to speake of it.

" None of these words could content the Duke, but dissembling his discontent, he an- B
 " swered. If I should reape no other good by my voyage but to haue seene to great a " Prince, whose valour and greatnesse is greater then the report, I should not be grieved.
 " True it is, that the estate of my affayres should not haue perswaded mee to haue come
 " without the assurance of my Ambassador, that I should receiue more of your Maiesties
 " freewill, then I could expect of the Popes sentence, and that you would not so much " presse the Restitution, but would bee satisfified with a more gentle composition. I haue
 " offered you the meanes, which lead to so great and so worthy effects, as the Marquisate
 " of Salusses is nothing in comparison of them. You find difficulties therein. There is no " great enterprize, can be without them, but being well resolu'd, it is halfe executed. A
 " courage like vnto yours, finds nothing difficult, and all Europe admires your actions, C " hauing made that which was impossible possible. And seeing that I must attribut it, not
 " vnto the violence of reason, but to my unhappinesse, that I cannot perswade a thing,
 " which in his glory and profit carries his owne perswasion. I beseech your Maiesty to " intreat me, as your most humble seruant and kinsman, who desires no greater happi-
 " nesse for his then to be yours.

The Duke

the restitution of the Marquisate
for one of his foones.

" They are already by the laws of nature, they are by my will: and shalbe more by the " fauours of your bounty. For one Marquisate, you bind many Princes, and by the inue-
 " sting of one of my children, all the house of Sauoy shall be bound vnto you: your Ma-
 " iesty will say, that you make not such large gifts: but you must consider if you please, D
 " that many vertues are common to men, but this belongs onely to Kings. As it is more
 " royall to giue then to take: and they wrong the greatnesse of their courage, if they " should not giue great things: and to giue a thing that is litigious and doubtful, you shall " purchase an immortall right of souerainty. He added many reasons for the execu" tion of the enterprize, and with such vehemence, as he seemed to haue some secret to " make Mountaines remoue and dry vpruiers. The King considered that there was no " profit but for the Duke, and that the fruite which (at the least) he promised himselfe in " keeping the Marquisate of Salusses, would be more certaine to him, then the conquest " of Milan vnto the King. If the Duke of Sauoy could haue ingaged the King, he knew " well how to crosse him in the execution. All the danger he could apprehend, was the " King of Spaines indignation: but he might as easily returne into fauour without spea- E
 " king a word, as he came away without bidding him farewell, for what should haue hin-
 " dred him, when as the French had bin far ingaged in Italy, to haue ioyned with the Spa" niards to expell them, and to breake the Bridge of his assistance, whereby he had made
 " them to passe.

The Duke of Savoy perplexed

" The Duke seeing that he could not obtaine any thing of the King, but that he must " make a double recompence for the Marquisate he continued a while in doubt of his re-
 " turne, as he alwaies repented him of his comming. The King desirous to free him of all
 " cause of distrust and apprehension, that should force his will, to promise that which hee " would neuer hold, sent him word, that he should not trouble himselfe with the resolu" tion of his Councell: for he should neuer be forced but by the right of armes, and that " he should alwaies haue time to thinke of it, and to returne to Turin with his will as free,
 " as when he came to Paris.

The

A The Duke not able to see clearly with his owne eyes, nor to distinguish of these difficulties, aduised thereof in his Councell. But as the eyes troubled with those disca-ses which the Physicians terme Hypostragma and lètere, haue the operation of the sight so troubled, as they cannot well iudge of collours, all objects seeming vnto them Yellow or Red. Euen so when Princes counsels are subiect to any passion, they giue counsell accordingly; nothing presenting it selfe vnto them, but through the false sight of opinion and choller, which doth alwaies make the bodies seeme bigger then they are. B
 So in the council of this Prince, those which desired war, said That neither the Restitution of the Marquisate, nor the Exchange of Brese, might be accepted, and that a good warre should be more honourable, then a shamefull composition: others hauing no other passion then peace, aduised him vnto it at what price soeuer, fearing, that if the King should not receiue that satisfaction from them which he expected, he would stay them. The Duke grew into choller, and would haue departed without taking his leaue. The most adu-ced of his counsell told him, that his departure in that sort, would make him a skorne to all the Princes of Italy; Spaine would laugh at him; France would be scandalized, that al Europe would hold him the cause of this warre, and in this warre of a world of miseries.
 That there needed no other Herrald to proclaim warre against him; which would be in the middest and in the foure corners of his Estate, before that he passed the riuier of Rhoane. That he shewed the greatnesse of his courage to vanquish all these difficulties, and wisdom to dissemble his discontents. That wisdom should make the entry to a C businesse, seeing that repentance is frutelesse in the end. That if he had not foreseene the end of his voyage, he should by his constancy mitigate the feeling, and represent vnto himselfe, that to come into a goodly plaine all couered with flowers, hee was forced to passe ouer a narrow and vn-euen planke. The Duke answered, I will neuer passe it. Leaving his council in suspence, that he would make as dishonorable a departure, as his arriual had beene honorable, yet through the prayers and perswasions of some of the Kings good seruants, the Duke resolu'd to depart as he came. But it was not without complaining that they intreated him with too much rigour: that there was no curtesie in France for him: that friendships were rare, finding least in them where he thought it did most abound: that they did force him to formes that were too preiudicall, and D that they had made him to hope for things which they now refused him, and that his Ambassador had deceiued him. The King knowing that Cheualier Breton had let the Duke of Sauoy his Maister vnderstand, that his Maiesty desired he should come vnto him: Hee sayd vnto him that he was mistaken, and that he did neuer speake it.

The Duke
would depart without taking his leaue.

The Dukes
complaints.

" True it is, that he had said, that he hoped the Duke should not returne, but they should be agreed. The Duke seeing that wisdom must moderate the rigour of Necessity, he tooke another course, and resolues, seeing he could get nothing else, to make his profit of the time, and of his abode: that hee might haue meanes to vnite that which hee had disioyned with Spaine. Fore-seeing they would soone giue him leaue to be gone, for already they sayd in iest, in the Anti-chamber, That they must find him away by an Edie. He had therefore found a fauorable pretext for his stay. He was (or made shew to be) in loue with one of the rarest beauties in the court, and seemed not to care for all other affaires in respect of her. There were two solemne feasts at Paris, which followed one another. Saint Germaines Fayre and Shrouetide. It was giuen out, that hee would see them before his departure. In the meane time hee makes no hast, although he did not much aduance in his affaires. There were daily new propositions, and the last were more vnpleasing vnto him then the first.

The pretext of
stay.

" The Kings seruants were of opinion, that they should giue this Prince as little cause as might be to distast him of his voyage, and to giue him time to consider whether he should consent to the exchange or the restitution: for that it was a thing (as he sayd) which hee could not doe without conference with his Councell, and the aduice of his Vassalls. The King hauing had the opinion of the Princes of his blood and others, and of the cheefe Officers of the Crowne, would no longer forbear to acquaint him with his resolution, commanding Sebastian Zamet (one of his Maiesties confident servants) to tell it him, the which hee did so artificially, as before hee left the Duke, he drew from him a writing of the principall conditions of the treaty, by the which were drawne the Articles of the Restitution of the Marquisate or of the Exchange. But to the end the Duke should not thinke that the King should Precipitate his Councells, he gaue him three months time to chooise either of the two conditions of the treaty, either by Restitution or the Exchange. Whereupon the Duke signed the Articles following.
 seruants

Articles of the Treaty of Paris.

1. That the Duke of Sauoy should restore the Marquisate of Salusses vnto his Maiesty, by the first day of the month of Iune next following, to vse and inioy it as the kings his Predecessors had done, when it was in their hands, without any delay or difficulty, grounded vpon any colour or pretext whatsoever.

2. And his sayd Maiesty doth promise and graunt vnto the sayd Duke, not to giue the Charge and Government of that Country, to any one that he shall haue occasion to hold for enemy.

3. In like sort, to employ Suisses in the Garde of the Townes and Places thereof, except in the Castles, where his Maiesty will place French Captaines and Souldiers, or such as he shall thinke good.

4. Notwithstanding, his Maiesty doth not meane to be bound to continue the Suisses in the said townes, but for the time that the compromise shall continue, made in the Person of his Holinesse, hereafter declared and specified.

5. Or else the said Duke shall yeeld and deliuer to his Maiesty, for a recompence of the Marquisate of Salusses, by the first day of Iune next ensuing, all the Country of Bresse, lying from the riuer of Saone vnto that of Dain, which riuer of Dain shall remaine in common betwixt his Maiesty and the sayd Duke, either of them to inioy it of his side, comprehending in the said Country the Towne and Citradell of Bourg, and other places that depend thereon, Barcelonette with his Vicariate, or Deputiship, vnto Argemiere, the Vale of Sture; that of Perouse, with all that depends thereon; with the Towne and Castle of Pignerol with his territory, vpon condition that his Maiesty shall transport vnto him all his right and interest to the sayd Marquisate, provided notwithstanding that hee suffer the Inhabitants of the sayd Marquisate, which haue serued his Maiesty, or shall serue him hereafter, to inioy their goods freely and safely. And in like sort, those which haue serued or shall serue the sayd Duke, shall in like maner enioy their goods, as well in the sayd Marquisate, as in any other places that shall be deliuered to his Maiesty by the said Duke, without any alteration before the said delay nor after, to the preiudice of the one or the other, according to the rule which shall bee set downe by his Maiesty and the Duke.

6. Moreover the towne of Cental, Emont, Rogues, Peruieres, Castle Dauphin and others held by the said Duke, belonging vnto his Maiesty, and in like maner those which his Maiesty holds in Bresse, Sauoy, Barcelonette and others belonging vnto the sayd Duke, shall respectiue be restored, at such time as the Marquisate shall be yeelded vp: and in case of exchange, those of Bresse and Barcelonette, shall remaine to this Maiesty, as hath bin said, and the rest shall be restored on either side.

7. All which places shall be restored in the same estate they are at this present, neither his Maiesty nor the said duke, to be bound to pay nor satisfie the charges made of either part, in the fortification and repaying of the said places.

8. In like sort the fort of Beeche-Dauphin built by the said Duke during the wars, shall be demanded at the same time.

9. The Inuentories duely certified of all the peeces of Artillery, Powder, Bullets, and other munitions of warre, which were in the townes and places of the said Marquisate, when the Duke entred it, shall be faithfully deliuered vnto his Maiesty when as the Duke shall choise the one or the other of the said two offers, where-vpon his Maiesty shall declare his will for the restitution thereof, the which shall be performed by the Duke, as well in their kindes, as in mony, according to the price, which shall be concluded betwixt his Maiesty and the Duke.

10. All Sucres, Iudgements, and Sentences giuen in iustice, on either side before this present

A present accord, (when the parties haue consented voluntary-) shall stand and take effect, whether Restitution bee made or an exchange of the Marquisate: yet it shall be lawfull for the parties to releue them-selues by prouision according to the order of the lawes.

11. That no serch should be made of any impositions, contributions and leuies of mony or victuals in the said country, against such as had appointed, receiued or disposed thereof on either part, vnto this present treaty.

12. And to the end that the inhabitants of the townes and country which are to be restored, may not be ouer-charged nor vniustly vexed, with leuies of mony, during the respite granted vnto the said Duke, to make choise of, and to effect one of the said two offers, vnder colour of payment, as well of Arreages of the said impositions imposed before, and since the peace of Veruins, as for the pay and entertainment of Captaines and men of warre, appointed for the gard of the sayd Marquisate. It is decreed, that there shall be no leuy of mony made vpon the inhabitants of the said townes and countries, conformable to that which was agreed vpon, as well by the treaty of Veruins, as by the orders and accords, made since, for the paiement of the said arreages and mony, by the Deputies of his Maiesty and the said Duke, in the beginning of the yeare, for the ordinary entertainment of garrisons, appointed for the gard of the said townes and places, and of officers employed in the estates of the said garrisons without any new impositions of either part. And we declare all that shall be done and attempted to the contrary, subiect to restitution and reparation.

13. And whereas the said Duke hath requested his Maiesty to allow and confirme the feoffment made by him, in the Marquisate, in case he shall choise to restore it: his Maiesty doth declare that being informed of the quality of the Feoffments, he would haue that respect to gratifie the Duke, as his seruice would permit him, without being bound to restore that which had beene payde for the said Feoffments, but as it shall stand with his good pleasure.

14. And for asmuch as the said Duke, hath intreated his Maiesty, to giue him time to confer with his vassals and subiects of both parties, before that he accept of the one or the other, his Maiesty desiring to witnesse vnto him, as well in this, as in all other occasions his good will: doth graunt vnto the sayd Duke his choise, so as hee choise and effect the one or the other of the two offers, by the first day of Iune aboue named, without diminishing or altering of any thing, or vsing of any euasion, delay, or difficulty, grounded vpon any colour or occasion whatsoever.

15. Whereunto the said Duke hath bound his faith and word, and his Maiesty doth the like for accomplishment and execution of all things, granted by these present Articles which depend thereon.

16. In like sort it hath beene agreed betwixt his Maiesty and the said Duke, that they shall consent, as they do at this present, after the restitution shall bee really and fully accomplished. If the said Duke makes choise thereof, that our Holy Father Pope Clement the eight shall Iudge of all Controuersies that are betwixt his Maiesty and the said Duke, according to that which hath beene agreed vpon by the treaty of Veruins, and that within three yeeres.

17. Promising to accomplish and performe, faithfully on either part, what-so-euer shall bee decreed by his Holynesse within the time prefixed, without any delay or difficulty, for what cause or pretext so-euer, as it is concluded by the treaty of Veruins.

18. And for the greater assurance of the execution of the treaty, and euery point and Article therein containned, the said King and Duke of Sauoy, humbly beseech his Holinesse, that as by his good and fatherly exhortations they are entred into this way of accord, that it would please him as a common Father, to continue the care which he hath formerly shewed to nourish Peace, and to assure a firme friendship betwixt them, and in all occasions that should be offered to interpose his authority for the full and reall execution of things promised of either part, as it is containned in this present treaty.

Made at Paris, the 27. day of February. 1600. Signed Henry and Emmanuel, and sealed with his Maiesties seale and the Duke of Sauoyes.

The Duke of Sauoyes departure.

discontent.

Three or foure daies after this treaty, the Duke tooke his leaue of the King, who being followed by all the court conducted him to Pont Charenton, and gaue him the Baron of Lux to attend on him out of the realme, with commandement to the Gouvernours of Champagne and Bourgondy, where he should passe to receive him as his Maiefty.

Whilest he was neere the King hee shewed such outward content, and concealed his greefe so cunningly, as his owne people did iudge that nothing could better please him, but being retyred, his countenance bewraied his discontent and the repentance of his voyage. The farther he went from the King, the neerer he approached to Spaine: being resolute to reconcile himselfe, and to that end he presently dispatched Bely his Chamberlor. Being in Carosse, hee said some-times, that hee had bene deceived, that the words which they had giuen to perswade him to come into France, were ill interpreted: and that as soone as he should come to Chambery, he would send to beseech the King to prolong the time, in the which hee would make choyse of the Restitution or the Exchange.

The Baron of Lux obserued his discourses, and aduertised the King of the Dukes intention, wholly inclined to warre, rather then to performe any part of the treatie. Being vpon Saint Iulians bridge, the Baron of Lux, hauing commandement from the King not to go any farther, tooke his leaue of the Duke, and assuring himselfe that his words should bee as pleasing vnto him, as hee seemed to haue bene content with his conduct, hee beseeched him not to transport his heart out of France as hee did his body, but to cherish the friendship of so great a King deere, who loued him as his brother. That he feared, that such as had shewed so great discontent, for the voyage, which his Heighnesse had made into France, would reape the profit which he him-selfe might enioy. That he would hold their counsell not onely suspect; but dangerous: as passionate men, whose perswasions were sugred poyson: who being more jealous of his Greatnesse, then desirous of his quiet, would not cease vntil they had diuerted him from the execution of his promises. That if it pleased him to thinke of what was past, and compare it with the present, hee should finde that peace was the inexpugnable rampart of his Estates: and that it was a great misery for a Prince, to submit him-selfe to another's discretion, beseeching him to beleue that the counsell which he gaue him, was the same which he would giue him, if it had pleased God that he had bin borne his Vassall or one of his counsell.

I take (answered the Duke) that which you say vnto me as of a worthy Nobleman, and thanke you: I acknowledge my selfe so much bound vnto the King, as I would sacrifice my life in exchange of the duty which I owe him: and doe promise neuer to giue him any occasion, to esteeme me other then his most humble seruant and louing Kinsman. Men are knowne by their words, as mettall by the sound, and flowers by the sinell: but commonly Princes words serue but to disguise their inward conceptions, houlding dissimulation for a great vertue. Such was the issue of the Duke of Sauoyes voyage. The yeare shall not passe before hee tast the fruits. His presence did procure him the condition of exchange, the which the King would not haue graunted to his Ambassadors. But hee continued not long in this opinion, to performe the one or the other. Going out of the Cittadell at Bourg, they found that sorrow troubled his soule, to leaue a place, esteemed one of the strongest in Europe. His outward shew bewraied his inward discontent. This Prince who could well couer his passions, could not conceale the greefe of this exchange, no more then the discomodity of the restitution. Being arriued at Bourg, hee sent one post vnto the King, to thanke him for the honor he had receiued in his voyage, and for the good entertaynement which Pradin had giuen him in Champagne, and the Baron of Lux in Bourgondy. He wrot by the same post to the Gouvernour of Lions, imparting vnto him the contentment which he receiued by the treaty of Paris, and that he went to Chambery, and soone after the feasts into Piedmont, there to resoluue what the King should expect of him.

But he staid not long before he gaue eare to their perswasions, who sought to deprive him of all happinesse, which hee might promise vnto him-selfe by his voyage, assuring him that the comming of the Cont de Farnes would giue him meanes to free himselfe from the necessity of the exchange and restitution. Hee dissembled the discontent of his voyage with great art, yet still he did vent out some vapour which made the most iudicious to beleue, that hee would bee glad to preiudice the King in any thing with the hazard of his owne.

The commons of France hauing not yet recovered their ruines growne by ciuil wars and now growing vnder the heuy burthen of taxes and subsidies, and complayning of the abuse of officers in the collection thereof: They were humble suitors vnto his Maiesty to set downe a generall order concerning the taxes, and to reforme the abuses; wherupon the king made this Edict which followes, for the releefe of his poore subiects.

Henry by the grace of God, &c. As soone as it pleased God to settle peace in this realme: wee haue cast our eyes with pity vpon our people growne poore and almost ruined by the wounds and calamity of long warre; and haue employed all our care to finde out the meane, to abate the taxes, and other impositions which are leuiued on them with an intent to make them inioy the fruits which peace is accustomed to produce vnder a good King, when as war is ended: being more desirous to pourehase the name of Father of the people doing them good, then to leaue any remembrance to posterity of other more glorious title which our perills and dangers might make vs meritt: but being not able to effect it so speedily as their miseries required by reason of the excessive charges of this estate, which could not be diminished but by little and little, nor the ordinary reuenues to furnish it restored to their value, but in giuing some time to the peace established in the realme, by the speciall grace and blessing of God, to change the face of this great desolation which warre hath left: we haue vpon the complaints often made vnto vs in our counsell of the abuses, in quality, and exactions which are committed in the leuy and perception of the said taxes, deputed commissioners, men of quality and knowne integrity, to informe and punish the offenders, proceed to the reforming thereof, and to giue vs aduice of the meanes which they shall thinke most fit and conuenient to suppress these disorders hereafter, being by their report informed that our subiects haue suffered much oppression, by reason of the said abuses, and disorders, namely that equality had not bin obserued by the Esleuz in the diuision of Parishes: & much lesse by the seffors in the taxes of priuat men, whom they haue gratified, surcharged, or exempted at their pleasures, according to their passions and interest; and also by reason of the many tedious and chargeable suites growing amongst them: and the violence, exactions, and thefts, committed by Sergeants employed for the recouery of the taxes, which desiring to preuent aswell by good orders, as diminution of the charges, vntil that God shall giue vs grace, to make them feeble more abundantly of our Fatherly bounty. We haue with the aduice of our counsell, and of our full power and royall authority, ordained and decreed, and our pleasure is,

1. That our subiects shal fully inioy the discharge of all that which they owe vs of the remainder of the taxes and other impositions laid vpon them in precedent yeares, vnto the yeare, 1598. forbidding our receiuers and others to force them, wee will also that if any bonds haue bin drawn from them by our receiuers, or by ther assignes, in fraud of the said discharges, that they shalbe declared void and not called in question by our iudges, yet we mean not to discharge them toward their creditors, for mony which they haue borrowed to pay the said yeares remitted, or of bonds into the which any priuat men haue entred for them to the receiuers if they haue accompted, as of mony receiued, so as the said bonds were made without fraud.

2. And we ordaine that hereafter, the Esleuz shall make the diuision of the parishes of their election, within 15. daies after the commissions receiued, proceeding therein with all equality and iustice, iudging without passion of the comodity, or discomodity of the said Parishes, and if any shal do other-wise by corruption or fauor, they shalbe deprived of their offices and punished exemplarily.

3. And to the end they may be the better instructed, what every Parish should beare A and by that meanes without excuse, if there be any inequality, in their diuisions, they shall be bound to make their visitations every yeare, in due time from one place to another, and not goe two yeares together into the same Parishes, informing themselves of the ability of the number of plowes, and traffice which is made in the said Parishes, together with all other commodities, and discommodities which may make them rich or poore.

4. As also the names of such as are exempt, and the cause of their exemption, they shall also learne if there be any inequality in the taxes of Priuat men, and if they finde it so, they shall take the aduise of 3. or 4. of the honestest men of the Parrish, who are best acquainted with their estates, to be in the assembly of the officers of the election, where they shall tax them which did exempt themselves vnduly, & moderate, or augment the taxes of others, as they shall thinke fit, according to the report of the said honest men. B

5. Which taxes shall be inserted, to the commissions which the Esleuz shall send to the Parishes of there iurisdiction, adding that such a one, who pretending himselfe vnduly to be exempt, shall pay so much, as an other which was not taxed according to his meanes so much: and if those that are taxed shall call the seassors into question, they shall not be admitted, so as the tax doe not exceed the Summe of twenty shillings.

6. And to auoide the tediousnesse and charge of the same sure concerning taxes, wee will that the parties shall be heard before the Esleuz in their owne persons, without the helpe of Aduocate or Proctor, the said causes to be iudged according to the rule of the three precedent yeares, and with the aduise of 3. or 4. of the chiefe of the Parrish. C

7. The said Esleuz shall take but one fee, for the signing of euery commission, although it containe debts of diuers natures, and whereas they were accustomed to take of little Parishes as much as of greater, wherewith they were many times more charged then with the tax it selfe, the whole summe for the said fee of signing, for al the parishes of any election shall be put together, and then diuided amongst them after a Soulz vpon the Liuer, hauing regard vnto the great tax.

8. The registers of elections shall not take the fees which are given them, but content themselves with 15. Soulz for a Parrish, although the number of commissions and the nature of debts were greater, and if it bee lesse, they shall content them-selues with there fee, after the rate of two Soulz, and six deniers, vpon paine of concussion. D

9. The Hamlets which haue bin diuided from the bodies of Parishes, shall be vnited by the Esleuz vpon the first diuision: and to take away the causes which haue moued the said Hamlets to pursue this seperation, they shall ad in their commission and diuision of the summe which is to bee leuied vpon the whole Parrish, that such a Hamlet shall pay so much: and yet the said Hamlet shall not bee answerable for the tax of the Parishes, no the Parrishes for the Hamlet.

10. And to take away the abuses which are committed by the seassors, wee ordaine that they shall not take them lesse then they were the yeare before, vnlesse they haue had some notable losse in their estates, the which shall be duly examined by three of the Esleuz, and if they doe other wise, their tax shall be augmented, and moreover E they shall pay the said summe in way of a fine, for the first time, and if they continew, they shall be punished at the discretion of the Esleuz, whome wee inioyne to proceed therein with all severity.

11. We will also that the said seassors shall be collectors, in the yeare of their charge, by which meanes the poore shall not be charged aboue their abilities, and that none of the Parrish, if he bee able to pay, shall be exempted from the sayd charge of collectors, but bound to execute it, euery one in his turne.

12. There shall be foure collectors, chosen euery yeare, for great Parrishes, taxed at three hundred crownes and aboue, and for lesser, two, who shall make the said collection together or apart, as they please, but yet they shall be answerable one for another. F

13. The sayd Collectors shall not bee discharged, vntill the Proctor of the Parrish bee heard, and by three of the Esleuz, who shall signe the time of the said Iudgement, whereof the Register shall make mention, vpon payne of Nullity.

1600.

A And notwithstanding any discharge, the sayd Collectours shall receiue the money, vntill there be others in their places, and shall recouer their dammage and Interest, against the Inhabitants that shall forbear to name them.

14 And to the end there may be a sufficient number of the Esleuz, to iudge of the sayd causes, and others which depend of their Iurisdiction, they shall be actually resident, where their elections are, vpon payne of the losse of their Fees, for the time they are absent, and if they continue it without a iust cause, they shall be deprived of their offices, whereof the Treasurers shall take information to giue vs aduice.

15 If there be any inequality in the Seafment, the which is disauowed by the Inhabitants, the sayd Seafors may be sued by them that shall complaine.

B 16 To know at the inspection of the Rolles, whether the tax haue bin well layed or not, the condition of him that is seast shall be added to his name, as of Iudge, Notary, Sergeant, Marchant, or Labourer, whether he labours for himselfe, or for another, and with how many Plowes, and so of all others.

17 The names of Exempts (if there be any) shall be set at the foote of the Roule, with the cause of their exemption: and for default thereof, we enioyne the Esleuz to amerse the Seafors, and to punish them exemplarily, if they find they haue willingly made the sayd omissions.

C 18 The sayd Seafors shall not make any seafment but in a free place, where no man shall asist, but they shall haue the charge: forbidding the Lords of the Fee, to proceed in their house, or to be present, nor in any sort to force the will of the sayd Seafors, constraining them to do that otherwise then they ought, vpon paine of losse of their fees, and Rights of high Iustice. And for that the sayd Seafors, haue often complained, that the Registers augment and diminish the Seafments of the Inhabitants at their pleasure, wherein it is easie to deceiue them, for that most of them can neither reade nor write:
We will, that it shall be lawfull for the Seafors during the yeare of their charge, to appoint some fit men for the execution thereof, paying vnto the sayd Registers the Fees, which were given them by the Edict of their creation.

D 19 The sayd Seafors shall comprehend, among them that are contributaries, the Farmers of Clergi-men, of Gentlemen, and other priuiledged persons, aswell by reason of their goods, as of the profits they may raise in the sayd Fermes. And for that some of the priuiledged persons commit fraudes, and giue their Lands to men, who enioy them vpon secret Rents, making shew notwithstanding that they are their household seruants, so as the richest of the Parish take vpon them this name and qualitie, to exempt themselves from paying of the sayd Taxes, to the preiudice of the other inhabitants, we do expressely forbid them, to commit any such fraude, vpon paine to looke the priuiledge of holding their Land by them, and to pay like summes which the Farmers should haue payd, if they had let their Lands for a rent, for the which the Reuenues ther-of shall be bound.

E 20 And generally al they shall be ceased by them which are to contribute by reason of their meanes, wherefoeuer they be, moueable or immoueable Trafficke and Indu-trie, according to our Edict made in Ianuary, 1598. and if they exempt any, they shall be answerable, and pay in discharge of the other Inhabitants of the parish, the summes wherein the sayd pretended exempts should haue bin ceased, inioyning also the Esleuz to amerse them, and to punish them exemplarily.

21 And for that some haue residing places where the Taxes are reall, hauing notwithstanding most part of their goods in places where they are personall, and yet are not ceased, by reason they haue no dwelling there, and by that meanes exempt themselues, from a great part of the charge which they should beare: We will that hereafter they shall be ceased in the sayd places for the goods which they possesse, and the profits arising of their lands, shall be affected for payment of their Taxes.

22 Many to exempt themselves from the payment of Taxes, haue accustomed to publish before S. Remy, that they will go dwell in another parish, and then return when the seafment is made, so as many times they are not seast in the one nor the other, or Xxxx
else

1600. else there, where being little knowne, and hauing no goods, they are taxed at much lesse. A then they ought: others beeing vpon the confines of diuers Elections or Generalities, build some little cottage out of the place, out of their ordinarie abode, and in another election where they reside, and are taxed there also at some small summe, and yet they go and come to the place of their right abode, where they haue part of their family, cattle, and all other commodities, to make profit of: notwithstanding the Seassors dare not taxe them, for that they maintaine themselves to be dwelling in another Parish. To preuent the which, we enioyne the sayd Seassors, to taxe the first in the place of their auncient abode, vntill they haue remained a yeare and a day in the place where as they meant to retire: And for the rest, they shalbe alwaies taxed in the place of their true abode, notwithstanding that they bee taxed, whereas they haue malitiously retired themselves, vnlesse they haue giuen their Lands of their first dwelling to Farmers, who pay the Taxe in their places, by reason of the profits which they may make, as is accustomed in the ceassing of these that are of that quality.

23 After that the diuision of the great Taxe is made, all others for what leauie fouer shalbe ordered after the same rate, of a Soule vpon the Livre, without any alteration, the which if the sayd Esleuz, or Seassors shall infringe, they shall be bound to pay all damage and interest to them that shall complaine.

24 The Collectours shall make receipts vpon the Roules signed by the Esleuz, and shall hold it in their hands when as they gather the Seassments, to crosse and indorse at the same time the payment which hath bin made, vpon payne of falshood. C

25 The corruption of time hath beene the cause that many vnder the pretext of bearing armes during the troubles, haue vsurped the name of Gentlemen, to exempt themselves vnduly from the contribution of Taxes: to preuent the which, we forbid all men to take vpon them the title of Squire, and to thrust themselves into the Body of the Nobility, if they be not issued from Grandfather and Father, which hath made profession of armes, or serued the publike in some honorable charges, such as by the lawes and customes of the Land may giue a beginning of Nobilitie to posteritie, hauing committed no vile act: and that they haue also followed them in this commendable kind of life, vpon payne to be degraded with dishonour from the title which they haue presumed to vsurpe vnduly.

26 In regard of Bastards, although their fathers were noble, yet shall they not challenge the title of Gentlemen, vnlesse they obtaine letters of Nobility from vs. grounded vpon some great consideration of their merits, or of their fathers.

27 Such as haue caried armes, and bin inrolled in companies of men at armes, or of foot, as Captaines, Lieutenants, or Ensignes, by the space of 20. yeres, wherof they shall make good prooffe, and haue not during the sayd time nor since, committed any vnworthy act, shalbe exempted so long as they shal continue in the sayd seruice, and no longer vntill that hauing serued 25. yeres in the sayd charges, they haue obtained our letters, verified in our Courts of Ayds, to be dispensed of the seruice, and to enioy the sayd exemption during their liues, as a reward of their vertue and merit.

28 And hereafter we inioyne all Captaines of Companies of men at armes to fill them with Gentlemen, or with such as haue serued 10. yeres at the least in foot companies, as Captains, Lieutenants, or Ensignes. And if they intertaine any other of base quality, they shall not enioy the exemption, vntill they haue serued 10. whole yeres in the sayd companies, and so long as they continue in the sayd seruice, and do no base act.

29 The Commissaries, Controulers, and pay-masters of the sayd companies, shalbe reduced to a moderat number, and shall enioy the exemption. But as for inferior Officers, as Smiths, Surgeons, and such like, they shal not enioy it but so long as they follow the sayd companies, and being returned to their houses, they shalbe taxed like to the other Inhabitants.

30 As for Colonels, Captaines, Lieutenants, and Ensignes, of Companies of intertained Regiments, they shalbe also chosen out of the Nobilitie, or else old experienced soldiers, hauing followed armes ten yeres at the least, and giuen some notable proof of their

A their valour, the which appearing, they shalbe exempt so long as they do seruice, vnlesse they be dispensed withall by vs, as is sayd.

31 The Prouost Marshals, and their Lieutenants of the short Roabe, shall enioy it, and as for their Archers, to the summe of tenne shillings only, which shalbe deducted out of all their Taxes: But as for the rest of the Prouosts Officers, as Seassors, the Kings Proctour, Commissarie, Controuler of Musters, Pay-master, and Register, they shall bee comprehended and brought in for the whole, like vnto others that are contributarie.

32 Beeing also necessarie to reduce the exemption of many Officers, which haue no dignitie, to a certaine summe, to take from the rich all meanes and desire to abuse B it, who hunt after the sayd Offices, and for the most part do no seruice: Wee will, that hereafter the Exemptions granted to Officers hereafter named, in whom the Commissioners haue found greatest abuse, shalbe reduced: That is, for the Riders of the great Horses, beeing fixe and twentie in number, and doing their actuall seruice, and giuing their attendance at Court three moneths at the least in the yeare, to the summe of fortie shillings. The Post-masters to the like summe, with permission to either of them, to hire thirtie Acres of another mans Land, without preiudice to their Priuiledges. The Archers of Townes to twentie shillings. The Guards of our Forrests to tenne shillings: and Salt-peeter men to the like summe of tenne shillings, the which shall C bee abated out of their Taxations, and they shall pay the ouer-plus, like vnto others that are contributarie.

33 And for that Collectours may find some difficultie, to cause such as pretend themselves to be exempt to pay their Taxations, who many times are feared and respected in the place where they dwell, after that the Seassments, haue beene signified vnto them by the sayd Collectours, if they refuse or delay to pay, the Recei- uers of the Taxe shall be bound to make the poursuite, at their charge that are taxed, and the said Collectors shall be discharged for so much.

34 The Receiuers of Taxes, and other our Reuenues, shall not giue their war- rants against any one priuate man for the whole summe, at which the Parish hath bin D taxed, but in cases excepted, that is, of Rebellion iudged by the Esleuz, or not to haue named a Collectour, or else that the sayd Collectours haue not beene found sufficient, in all which cases, Wee will (to the end that Sergeants commit not the like abuses, as they haue done heretofore, taking money of rich men to exempt them, in whose places they commit poore men to prison, who after they haue endured much, are relea- sed without paying any thing) that the sayd Warrants signed by an Esleuz, and a Re- ceiuier, shall containe the names and sur-names of three or foure of the richest and best able Inhabitants of the Parish, or more if it shall bee needfull, hauing regard vnto the greatnesse of the summe that is due: To whome and to no other the sayd Sergeants shall be bound to addresse themselves, vpon paine of exemplarie punishment, and re- E stitution of all damage and interest to them that shall complaine of such grievous Impositions.

35 To take away the meanes from Sergeants, to exact greater Fees of Colle- ctours, and other Inhabitants of Parishes, then is allowed them by the Ordonances: Such as shall be hereafter employed by the Receiuers, for the recouerie of Taxes and other our money, shall not receiue their Fees, but from the hands of the sayd Re- ceiuers, and not from the Collectours and Inhabitants of the Parishes: The which wee do expressly forbidde vpon payne of death, and the money thus aduanced, they shall receiue againe, vpon the first payment the Collectours shall make. And to lessen the sayd Fee for the ease and further satisfaction of our subiects, wee inioyne our sayd F Receiuers to giue their Warrants for many Parishes lying together, to one Ser- geant, who shall execute and performe them at one voyage: wherein if they sayle, the excesse of the Taxe shall bee layd vpon them without any hope of recouerie. Wee enioyne the Esleuz to haue a care thereof, vpon paine to be answerable in their owne priuate names.

37 The inhabitants of many parishes of this Realme haue bin forced to sell their Commons at an vnder-value, to pay the Taxes and other great summes of mony which were leuyed with violence during the troubles, and oftentimes by them which had the assignations: We will and ordaine, that although the sayd sales were made without any B clause of redemption, it shall be lawfull for the inhabitants to redeeme them, restoring the price which was actually payed by the purchasers, within foure yeares after the publication of these presents.

38 We enioyne the substitutes of our Proctors generall in the Elections of this Realme, to receiue the complaints made by our subiects, to informe themselves, instruct and iudge the proceffe against the offenders with care and diligence, not forcing the Plaintiffs to make themselves parties, nor to be at the charge of the suite: and to the end it may be the better knowne if they haue well discharged themselves, or haue vsed partialitie, they shall be bound to giue an act signed vnder their hands, to the parties that shall require it, of the day of complaint which hath beene made.

39 We will also that the priuat orders made by the Commissioners, where they haue C held it necessary, shall be kept, vnlesse they be contrary to this present order, and other our ordonances, and of our predecessors: but if our Courts of Aydes find it fit to make any change, then to giue vs aduice, that we may prouide accordingly.

40 And for that we are aduertised, that many haue appealed from iudgements giuen by the Commissioners, some complaining of criminall proceeding and condemnations made against them, others to haue bin ouer-taxed or made contributaries, pretending themselves to be exempt: Our intencion being to haue iustice done to euery man, and that what hath bin done by the sayd Commissioners for the good of our subiects may be kept. We ordaine, that as for appellations in case of Seafures, they shal not be receiued, D against the Taxes made by them for one yeare, yet may they moderate them in the following years, if it be thought reasonable, they which haue interest being called & heard. In like maner they shall not be receiued in criminall causes, in the which they had liberty to iudge Soueraignely, hauing called our Officers of those places vnto them: and in regard of Appeales in all other causes, we haue reserued the knowledge thereof to vs and our Councell, and for certaine causes do send them vnto our Courts of Aydes, euery one into their Iurisdiction. We haue also giuen them the Iudgment of Sutes, instructed by such as the said Commissioners haue substituted by vertue of the authority which we gaue them, be it in causes concerning the Nobility, criminall or others: charging their E honors and consciences, to follow the ordonances, and this present order in their Iudgements, and to proceed with the greatest ease of the party that may be. Wee command our faithfull Councillors holding our Courts of Aydes, Treasurers general of France, and all others to whom it shal belong, to cause this present Edict to be read, published, and inrolled, and to be inuiolably obserued, in euery point, causing all troubles and lets to the contrary to cease: for such is our pleasure: and to the end it may be firme and stable for euer, we haue caused our Seale to be set to these presents.

Signed. HENRY.

THE Lords of Sillery and Alincourt by the Popes aduice, and the Kings commande- F ment, went from Rome to Florence, to treat a marriage betwixt the King, and the noble Princeesse Mary of Medicis, the which had bin propounded before. This demand was so pleasing vnto the great Duke, as he made no difficulty. The Articles of which Treaty are as followeth.

First,

A First, the sayd great Duke, doth promise in the name and faith of marriage of the sayd Princeesse, and with her will and consent, as shee hath declared vnto the sayd most Christian King, who in like manner doth promise by the sayd Lord of Sillerie to take for his loyall Spouse the sayd Princeesse, as soone as might be, according to the Lawes and holy Constitutions of the Church, and doth presently promise, to appoint some man of qualitie with sufficient Authoritie in his name, and as Proctor to his sayd Ma- iestie, to wed by words of present the sayd Princeesse, vntill by the presence of the parties, the marriage might be confirmed and solemnized in the face of our mother the holy Church. In fauour whereof the great Duke, aswel for the singular affection which hee beares to the Princeesse his Neece, as for the greatnesse and dignitie of the House, into the which shee is receiued, doth promise to giue in dowrie to the sayd Princeesse, B the summe of fixe hundred thousand crownes of Gold, euery one beeing seuen Livres, foure Deniers of the money of Florence, whereof the sayd King hath already receiued two hundred and fifty thousand crownes payed into the hands of his Treasurers. And as for the three hundred and fifty thousand crownes remaining, they shall also be payd in ready money, in the towne of Marseille or Lyons, when as the sayd marriage shall be confirmed and solemnized in the Church, as hath beene declared in the pre- mises.

The sayd great Duke doth also promise to cause the sayd Princeesse to be conducted C and honourably accompanied at his owne cost and charges, and as is besitting a Princeesse of that qualitie, honour, and dignitie, vnto the Towne of Marseille: and moreouer to giue her Jewels and other pretious moouables, fit for the dignitie of the sayd Princeesse, and the House from the which she is descended.

In regard whereof, it hath beene accorded, that the sayd Princeesse shall renounce the succession of her father and mother in the best forme that may be for the contentment and satisfaction of the sayd Duke her Vncle: And to this end the sayd Princeesse shall haue authoritie, and the sayd renunciation shalbe confirmed by the sayd King, when it shalbe required. And at this present the sayd Princeesse acknowledging freely, that in regard of the sayd Dowrie and Jewels which shall be giuen her, shee is bounti- D fully satisfied for all that which might belong vnto her for her Portion, in the succession of her father and mother, and that of her owne free-will shee doth renounce, to the profit and commoditie of the sayd great Duke, and of his descendants males, or of those which shall haue interest by reason of the sayd great Duke, of what degree or qualitie soeuer, to all Rights, Names, Reasons, and Actions, which shee may haue, or in any sort pretend, to the sayd Successions, whereof as much as need shall require, the sayd Princeesse shall make Session and Transport to the sayd great Duke and to his Descendants.

And to assure the sayd Summe of fixe hundred thousand Crownes giuen in Dow- rie, be it in case of Restitution or otherwise, It hath beene agreed vpon and confir- E med, that certaine Lands shall be assigned, granted, and giuen in Mortgage, for the assurance, confirmation, and restitution of the sayd Summe of fixe hundred thousand Crownes, which no Obligation shall make void: so as by this meanes the sayd money may be deliuered vnto the sayd great Duke, or to them that shall haue charge from his Highnesse, to be restored to the sayd Princeesse or to her Heires, as shalbe sayd hereafter: with the interest after siue in the hundred, the which shall beginne to haue course, and to stand firme and effectuell from the day that the sayd money shall be restored.

The sayd most Christian King shall assigne vnto the sayd Princeesse for her Ioynter, twenty thousand Crownes by the yeare, which shall be payed out of Lands with Iu- risdiction, whereof the chiefe place shall haue the Title of a Duchie, and the rest next vnto it: which places thus assigned to the sayd Princeesse, shee shall enioy by her selfe or by her Officers with the sayd Iurisdiction: And she shall haue the gift of all Offices falling void, as the Queenes of France haue accustomed: alwaies provided, that the said Offices be giuen to naturall French-men. And the sayd Princeesse shal begin to enter into posses-

1600. possession of the sayd lands, as soone as her Dowrie or Ioynter shall haue place, to enjoy it during her life, whether that she remaine within the Realme of France, or retire else-where. The sayd King shall also giue vnto the sayd Princeesse, Jewels befitting the dignitie of the Queenes of France, the which shall remaine proper vnto her selfe, as things belonging to her, and not otherwise. And for the intertainment of the sayd Princeesse, future Queene of France, during her marriage with the sayd King, there shall be Officers and seruants appointed for the seruice of the sayd Princeesse, in such number and qualitie as shall be conuenient: and for her charges there shall bee a conuenient summe appoynted, the which shall be payed euery three moneths out of the Treasurie, according to the order which hath bene obserued by the Queenes. And in case of the dissolution of the sayd Marriage, by the death of the sayd Princeesse without any children, the sayd King shall restore vnto the sayd Duke, or to him that shall haue charge from him, the Jewels which haue bene giuen her, according to an Inuentorie that shall be made, vnlesse shee hath otherwise disposed thereof: and withall 400000. Crownes, which are two third parts of the 600000. Crownes giuen in Dowrie, vnlesse his Maiestie be desirous to enjoy the whole summe during his life: In which case the sayd summe of 600000. Crownes shall be fully restored after his Maiesties death. And if the sayd Princeesse leaue any children, issued of the sayd marriage, the sayd children shall succcede in all the goods, moouable and immoouable which shall be left by her, and that may belong vnto her, the which shall bee diuided according to the vse and custome of France. But in case the dissolution of the Marriage bee by the death of the King, the sayd future Queene suruiuing him, whether shee haue children or not of the sayd Marriage, the sayd Princeesse shall haue againe all the money, dowrie, and Jewels brought by her: and moreover, those which shall be giuen her by the sayd King, excepting alwayes the Jewels of the Crowne, the which are left as it were in Guard with the Queenes of France. And in this case the sayd future Spouse shall also enjoy her Dowrie, and all about mentioned, whether she remaine in France, or make her residence else-where at her pleasure.

All which Articles and Conuentions haue bene treated and concluded in the name of the sayd King, by the sayd Lord of Sillery, and by the sayd Duke as well in his owne name, as for the sayd Princeesse, the sayd parties promising faithfully to keepe and obserue them in euery poynt, without any contradiction directly or indirectly: and they haue promised to furnish all letters, prouisions, and expeditions necessarie for the accomplishment thereof. And so they signed

Sillery and Ferdinand Duke of Tuscane.

A greater portion then that of the Lady Elizabeth married into Spaine, who had but 400000. crownes in dowrie. The Queen mother had but 30000. crownes of Lewis D. of Vrbin her father: but her mothers inheritance, among the which was the Earledome of Laragois, was valued at a million of Gold, and the Pope in consideration of the greatness of the House, whereunto she matched, gaue her an hundred thousand crowns and many Jewels. She had for her Ioynter but a thousand pounds a yeare.

The contract was past in the pallace of Pittie, the five and twentieth day of Aprill, in the presence of Charles Anthony Putei Arch-bishop of Pisa, and Virginio Duke of Bracciano. All Florence shewed great ioy thereat, and the Princeesse was presently declared Queene of France. She dined publicly vnder a cloth of Estate, the great Duke sitting farre beneath her. The Duke of Bracciano gaue her water, and Sillery the Kings Ambassador the towell. The rest of the day was spent in all kind of sports. Soone after Monsieur Alinecourt went to carry these good newes vnto the King, with the Queens picture, which the great Duchesse sent him. The King sent Frontenac to serue the Queene as her chiefe Steward, who presented vnto her his Maiesties first Letter, and withall he sent his Portrait to the great Duke. The King resolved to effect the promises of Marriage, as soone as the Duke of Sauoy had performed his, touching the Restitution or the Exchange of the Marquisate of Salusses, and to go to Anignon to receive the Queene: but the Duke was much perplexed what he should do.

After

A After the Duke of Sauoy departure the King went to passe the Lent at Fontainebleau, where there was a great conference betwixt the bishop of Eureux and Philip de Moray Lord of Plessis Marly, Gouverneur of Saumur, Intendent of the house and crowne of Nauarre: in the presence of the King, Princes and Officers of his Crowne, Councillors of State, Prelats and other Noblemen of marke. It was touching a booke which Monsieur du Plessis had published of the Institution of the Lords Supper, and against the Masse, wherein the Bishop did taxe him to haue falsified many Authorities. Whereupon Du Plessis presented a petition vnto the King, that his Maiesty would bee pleased to appoint Commissioners to examine euery passage of Scripture cited in his booke.

B The King yielded to this conference, that the truth might bee made cleere against the darkenesse of slander, referring the care thereof to his Chancellor. The Commissioners appointed for the Catholikes were Augustin Thuanus President of the Court Parliament at Paris: Pithou, Aduocate in the Court, and Fenre schoole-maister to the Prince of Condé, in whose absence came Martin the Kings Philition. And for the other, the President of Calignon, Chancellor of Nauarre, in whose place entred de Fresnes Canay, President of the Chamber of Languedoc, and Causaubon, his Maiesties reader of the Greeke tongue. All singular men in learning and tongues.

This conference beganne the fourth day of May, in the Hall at Fontainebleau in the midst whereof was a Table of a reasonable length. At the one end sat the King, on his right hand the bishop of Eureux, and on the left, right against him Du Plessis, Pasquier, Vassaut and Merger, Secretaries of the conference were at the lower end of the same Table. Somewhat higher on the Kings right hand sat the Chancellor and the Commissioners. Behind the King stood the Archbishop of Lions, and the bishops of Neuers, Beauvais and Chastres. On the Kings left hand, were the foure Secretaries of State. Behind them which conferred, were the Dukes of Vaudemont, of Nemours, of Mercure, of Mayenne, of Neuers, of Elbeuf, of Aiguillon and Ionuille, the Officers of the Crowne, Councillors of State, and other Noblemen of quality. After that all were commanded to keepe silence, his Maiesty hauing said, that the dispute was not betwixt party and party, but particular betwixt the two conferences, not for any question of right and Doctrine, but for the literall truth of some passages: and that he desired they should treat with al mildnesse and moderation, without any bitternesse or passion, but that of the truth. Declaring moreover that hee did not meane that this dispute, should in any thing alter or disquiet the peace of his subiects, as the Chancellor did then declare vnto them at large by the Kings commandement.

My masters, said hee, all things worke to worke good in them that are good, if in the businesse which presents it selfe, wee bring spirits of peace and charity, the God of peace and charity, will assist our good intentions with his graces. The question is now vpon that which Monsieur du Plessis hath giuen the bishop of Eureux, to vnderstand that he will verifie before the King, and such Commissioners as hee shall please to depute, all the passages quoted in his bookes. Wherevnto the sayd bishop had answered, that hee would binde himselfe to shew five hundred falshoods in his booke against the Masse: That his Maiestie hath suffered this conference, which is made betwixt two learned men, not to enter into disputation, touching pointes which concerne Doctrine, and matter of Religion, the which his Maiesty would not indure without permission from the Pope: But onely to make cleere the literall truth or falshood of the sayd Allegations. And as it is not meant that there shall be any question made here touching controuersies of Religion, in like manner, his Maiesty declares vnto you his firme and certaine resolution, for the obseruation of his Edict of Nantes, made for the preservation of the quiet and publicke peace. Hee wills and commands that this conference may be made without contention, and with all the moderation that is requisite in a matter of so great importance: So as the good vniou and correspondency which is so necessary for the generall good of this Estate, and for euery one of vs in peticular, may not bee in any thing altered, but rather increased by the mildnesse and modesty which shall be 1600. shalbe vsed on either part, and that wee may finish this disputation with a good resolution to carry our selues and to liue peaceably together, like good brethren, friends and fellow citizens, as his Maiesty now commands vs by his Edi&ct, whereof he hath cuen now renewed his commandement vnto vs. These words were confirmed by the King, who commanded the Bishop of Eureux to speake and to begin the conference, the which he did in these termes.

Sir I present my selfe here to obey your Maiesties commandements, and to appeere at the assignation which Monsieur du Plessis hath giuen mee. The offer which I haue made was to shew him 500. false Allegations in his booke against the Masse. Your Maiesty according to your singular wisdom hath very wel concluded that this offer might wel be accepted without offending either spirituall or temporal lawes, which forbid all priuate persons to dispute publicly of Religion. For here the question is not to call in doubte the faith of the Antient fathers of the Church, or to examine if they haue written wel or il, but whether Monsieur du Plessis hath cited them truly or not. Heretofore Hunneric King of the Vandales hauing called the Catholikes of Africa to enter into disputation with the Arrians, Eugenius Archbishop of Carthage answered him, that he might not accept of that combat without the consent of other bishops, and namely of the Church of Rome, which was the head of all the Churches. If I at this day forbear to make the like difficulty, it is not that I carry lesse respect to the Apostolike sea then that holy Bishop did, above twelue hundred yeere since: But for that the question now is for some priuate passages of Monsieur Du Plessis booke, and not of the general Doctrine of the Church; wherevnto the modesty your Maiesty hath pleased to vse in this action hath imboldened mee. For you would not take the Incense as the King of Iuda did, who was stroken with a Leprosie, that is to say, you seeke not to vsurpe any Priestly Authority, nor to make your selfe a Iudge or to appoint Iudges in Ecclesiastical causes: But only to call learned witnesses and worthy of credit, which may testifie the truth of this conference, and in case of difficulty, vpon the version of words and edition of examples, giue their aduise: imitating therein the piety of those good Emperors, Constantin, Valentinian, and Theodosius, the first and second, who would neuer attribute vnto themselves the Iudgement of controuersies of the faith, but did alwaies referre the decision to them whom God had appointed Pastors and Rectors of his Church. And therefore vnder the Authority of his commandements, I will enter cheerefully into this conference, hauing first protested that I am not prickt forward by any spleene against Monsieur Du Plessis, whom I respect and honour for his good parts, neither doe I pretend to charge him with any fals-hood in his booke, but onely them vpon whose faith and instructions he hath relied, as it shall appeere by the mildnesse and modesty, I promised your Maiesty to vse towards his person.

Discourse of Monsieur Du Plessis at the conference.

Du Plessis declared, that hee was come thether, seeing it had so pleased his Maiesty, to answer for his booke, which ambition had not caused him to write, but should rather haue diuerted him, to preserue his good fauour: But zeale to serue (during his reigne) for a holy reformation in the Church, after which many good men haue so long sighed. If it might any way serue, hee should hold himselfe happy, though it were with his great losse; If not that hee would haue burnt it, yea with his owne hand. Yet his hope was, that when hee should be equally examined, all men should finde that hee had carried himselfe faithfully and dilligently, al though it were not to be held strange, if in five thousand passages or more, they haue found some wherein his eye, his memory or his Iudgement hath wauered: yet so, as they did not impugne the truth of that whereof hee treated.

Oh sayd hee, that the bookes of the Doctours of the Roman Church, which haue written within these hundred yeeres, were examined with this rigour, how many should you finde that could indure this triall? Finally he protested with his Maiesties leave, that this act was perticular, and could not preiudice the truth of the Doctrine of the reformed Churches of that Realme, which had beene before him, and should bee after him. And so they entred into the matter.

1600. After the first daies conference, Monsieur du Plessis fel very very sicke, as as they could proceed no further. The King did write the same day, vnto the Duke of Elpernon, what had past in this conference, and shewed by his letter what his iudgement was. My friend, he Diocesse of Eureux hath vanquished that of Saumur. Wherewith Monsieur du Plessis was discontented, so as in a discourse which he (or some of his friends) had printed soone after, touching this conference, he termed this letter A puer of fire, and that the Bishop of Eureux Flic, was made an Elephant.

Some moneths after this conference at Fontainebleau, Canay, one of the Commissioners and President in the Chamber of the Edi&ct at Castres, a man learned in Philosophy and the tongues, and well read in the History of the Church, left his profession of the reformed Religion, and became a Romish Catholike. Many thought that Causabon the other Commissioner would haue followed the same course: But he left not the world long in this opinion, hauing written vnto the Synode of Ministers assembled at Gargeau, that he was not so wretchedly instructed in piety, as for want of knowledge of the truth hee should suffer himselfe to bee carried away with euery humor of Doctrine. As the Synode reioyced at the constancy of Causabon, they grew in chollor against the change of Canay, who answering the first letter, they added this exclamation against the second, Oh miserable man who hath purchased with the losse of firme felicity, the disguised wretchednesse of this world, the which shall hereafter perish both in his life and sight, vnlesse that in the end with a feeling hee acknowledge that he hath not with reason lost his Iudgement, but rather without reason is become foolish. God of his mercy take pity of him, and giue him grace so to weepe for that which hee hath committed, that he commit no more that which he must weepe for.

The King had particular aduice that the Duke of Sauoy was irresolute what to doe, and that he had sent vnto the Pope, and to diuers Princes and common-weales in Italy, to let them vnderstand that hee had beene forced to the Treaty of Paris, and how much it did import them if this treaty were effected: but he found not their intentions to iumpe with his, neither had he the answer which he expected. His Maiesty had alto intelligence of his deepe dissembling, saying sometimes; That hee would not restore the Marquisate, but by force; sometimes, That he had rather de iure Bresse then the Marquisate; and most commonly he would say, That he would restore the Marquisate; and that with a double desaigne. The one was that the King (thinking he proceeded faithfully) would grant him some delay for the Restitution of the Marquisate, during the which, and before that the King should leauy an army, winter should come, the which would hinder the French from attempting of any thing against him this yeere. The other was, to the end that the King of Spaine and his counsell (who apprehended aboue all, the restitution of the Marquisate, for the neighbourhood of the French, to the Duchy of Milan) should grant vnto Bely the Dukes Chancellor and his Ambassador in Spaine (whither hee had sent him expressly to pacifie the Spaniards, who were offended with the Dukes voyage into France) succours of men, and money in case the King would force him: or else that hee might draw some recompence from the Spaniard for the exchange of Bresse with the Marquisate. Bely complained to the counsell of Spaine, of the little time which they remained for the Restitution of the Marquisate to the French, to whom they answered, That armies were not so soone leauied in France; that he should assure the Duke his Maister, that the Count Fuentes should bee at Milan by August (whereas two millions of gold attended him) with so many men and other prouision, as whosoeuer should seeke to force him, should haue inough to doe to defend himselfe.

The King beeing well aduertised of all these practises; The first of Iune beeing past, by the which the Duke according to the Treaty of Paris should restore the Marquisate, his Maiesty came to Lions; where the Duke intreated him by his letters to giue him some daies of respite, and that hee would satisfie him by his Ambassadors. Wherevpon the King yeelded. Then the Archbishop of Tarantaise, the Marquis of Lullins and Roncas his Ambassadors came to Lions, the sixteenth of Iuly. Who said vnto the King.

The King answered them. That the Duke had written many letters vnto him from Chambery and Thurin, aduertising him that hee was very well pleased with the accord which he had made at Paris, promising to effect it, as hee was bound to doe. As for his demand of the inuestiture of the Marquifate for one of his sonnes, there was no likelihood he should vse any such bounty, hauing so small cause. To conclude, he was much discontented with the difficulties which the Duke made vpon their accord, the which if he did not performe by the first day of August, hee should prepare to defend himselfe. Roncas the Dukes confident seruant returnes to his highnesse, to let him vnderstand the Kings discontent and resolution, but especially to giue him time to thinke of his affaires. At that time Fosseuse returning out of Piedmont, assured the King, that he had heard the Duke of Sauoy sweare, that hee would neuer yeeld vp the Marquifate, and if the King did attempt to make warre against him, hee would shew him sport for forty yeeres, with such like words which were vnpleasing to the King. Roncas returnes speedily, bringing newes that the Duke was content, seeing the King would haue it so, to restore the Marquifate of Saluces, according to the Treaty of Paris. The King seemed well pleased with this resolution, giuing the charge to Brulart and Ianin to treat with the Dukes Ambassadors, how the restitution of the Marquifate should bee made. The Articles were agreed vpon, and beeing ready to signe them, Roncas said vnto the Ambassadors, that his master might take it ill, if they should signe them before hee had seene them: that there were strange humors about his highnesse, and that it would bee more easie for him to get him to approue the Articles when they were not signed, Roncas takes vpon him to carry the Articles, the King hauing giuen him leaue to go, and know his masters last resolution, shewing that he was determined not to suffer himselfe to bee entertained any longer with words, but in steed of returning, he sent backe a letter whereby they found that the Duke did nothing but dissemble, and entertaine the King with delays, vntill that the Count Fuentes came out of Spaine, and that hee had assembled his forces and provided for his safety.

But the Archbishop of Tarantaise and Lullins entering againe into conference with the sayd President Sillery and Ianin, they propounded foure difficulties.

- 1 Vpon the restitution of places in the Marquifate, by the Duke, and of Pont de Vaux in Bresse by the King, at the same time.
- 2 Vpon the restitution of the Baillicke of Gex.
- 3 Vpon the restitution of the artillery and munition that was within Carmagnola.
- 4 Vpon the nomination of a Gouvernor in the Marquifate.

All which beeing resolued, the Dukes Ambassadors beseech the King to giue them time to aduertise their master thereof, the King answered them that if by the sixteenth of August all his places in the Marquifate were not restored vnto him, that he would seeke to recouer that by force which he could not haue by reason. Before the Kings departure from Paris, the diuill had perswaded a wretched woman called Micole Mignon, to poyson him, who had some meanes during the fore-passed warres, hauing had the fauor to talke priuately with the King who is as full of bounty, as the libertie of armes, in time of warre, giues such familiarities: and Princes some-times frame themselves vnto it. Beeing kept backe from the Kings presence, with whom he would needs speake in priuate, being full of indignation and hauing resolued this cruel attempt against the King, shee addresseth her selfe to the Count Soissons a Prince of the bloud and Lord Steward of France, that hee might giue her husband some place in the Kings kitchin, and so in going to see her husband, shee should haue meanes to effect her damnable enterprife. In the

At the end she had access to him, that shee was resolued to doe an act, which should make him the greatest Prince, and her the most contented woman in the world. He desired to vnderstand of her the meanes in particular, whereat hee was much amazed. And for that it was a matter of importance hee wished her to come againe the next day, for that it deferred to bee well considered of. The Count of Soissons goes presently vnto the King, and telles him what hee had heard of this woman, beseeching him to giue him some confident man, who beeing shut vp in his cabinet might heare the same, when as shee should come at the time appointed. The King commanded Lomeny Secretary of his cabinet to goe. Shee returnes full of courage and resolution to effect this wicked deaigne. Shee speakes more, and protests to doe worse then shee had done the day before. Hee preft her to tell who had counselled her, and why shee attempted so dangerous a thing. He could draw nothing from her but that it proceeded from the deuill, from whom comes all damnable inspirations, and whose actions are murders, sacriledges and impieties: When shee had all sayd, shee was apprehended by the Prouost, and led vnto the Court. Beeing examined, shee denied the accusation and reproched the accuser as audaciously, as she had shewed her selfe furiously resolued to the execution. Lomeny was produced against her, and her conscience (although very desperately wicked) could not deny that which shee had before time deposed, but confessed the truth, and was condemned to bee burned quick.

aliue.

It is miraculous what hath past in diuers conspiracies against the King, and how Diuinely God hath deliuered him. It was one of the causes, which made the Duke of Sauoy seeme so resolued to hold the accord which he had made with the King at Paris for the Marquifate of Saluces, hauing vnderstood that the King had beene so often threatened by the attempts of such murderers, presuming that it was not possible but some one would hit: and about the same time there was one taken, come out of Piedmont to kill the King, whereof their was great rumor and suspicion. And three others which had vnderaken to kill him, when as he was in Sauoy, whereof they had certaine intelligence, with their portraites, the which were well knowne. And as they would haue taken them, his Maiefty would not suffer them saying. Let those wicked wretches alone, God will punish them without my doing.

Foure enterprises against
the King.

The sixteenth of August the King was aduertised, that the Duke had refused the last conditions agreed vpon by his Ambassadors, wherevpon hee countermanded the Count Passage, whom hee had sent with five hundred men to command in the Marquifate of Saluces, and to enter the towne and castle of Carmagnole, which the Duke should yeeld vp the sixteenth of August, according to the last accord. And withall the eleuenth of that month he published a declaration how hee was forced to take armes against the Duke of Sauoy, to haue reason for the Marquifate of Saluces, surprized by him, and vsurped vpon the crowne of France, in a time of peace, during the life of the deceased King, Henry the third, Predecessor to his Maiefty, and a benefactor to the sayd Dukes father: giuing all men to vnderstand, that hee was vnwillingly drawne to this remedy, for the singular desire hee had to reigne in peace, and to liue in loue and friendship with all his neighbours, hauing done as much to auoide it, as his honour, and the duty of a Prince which loues the publike quiet, and the good of his Estate, did require: taking into his protection and defence, all Clergy-men, and places, which should not fauour, nor serue for a retreat or assistance vnto the said Dukes armies: and all Inhabitants of townes, which should open their gates vnto his Maiefty and to his seruants: Meaning, that no actes of Hostility should bee vsed, but against such as should carry armes, and fauour the sayd Duke of Sauoy and his adherents. Forbidding all sacrilege, rauishing of women and maides, and burning of houses, places and castles vpon paine of death. Commanding all Frenchmen his subiects, beeing in seruice with the sayd Duke, to retire themselves and returne into his Realme within fifteene daies after this Proclamation made in his armies, vpon paine to be declared and punished as guilty of high treason.

The Kings
preparations for warre.

The King finding that all the Dukes temporisings and delays proceeded from a bad intent, was forced at one and the same instant, against the precepts of warre, to proclaim warre, and to prepare for meanes to make it. Hee gaue out Commissions for the leauing of foote in the neighbour Prouinces. Hee sent the Duke of Guise into Prouence, to looke to his Gouvernement, hauing intelligence that the Duke practised some surprises. The Marshall of Biron had charge to draw downe all his forces out of Burgundy, hee caused bullets to bee made in Niuernois, Dauphiné and Burgundy, and sent out Commissions for to leauy Pioners. The Marquis of Rosny great master of the Artillery, was sent to Paris, who returned within fifteene daies to his Maiesty, with incredible speed, so as in lesse then three weekes, the King had men, money, canon and munition. Hee sent Monsieur De Vie his Ambassador speedily into Suifferland with money, to preuent and disapoint the Dukes practises, and to assure a leauy of Suiffes at need.

The King who knowes that in warre, nothing doth so much aduance the execution as the presence of the head: beeing resolute to assaile the Duke on two partes, by Bresse and Sauoy, hee parted from Lions the same day that hee proclaimed warre, and came to Grenoble to goe to the enterprize of Montmelian in Sauoy, and to bee ready at all occasions. The Marshall of Biron vnderooke the surprize and taking of Bourg in Bresse, the which was assoone knowne as conceiued. The Marquis of Lullins the Dukes Ambassador beeing at Lions, aduertised the Count of Mont-maior Governor of Bresse, and Bouvens, capitaine of the Cittadell of Bourg of the enterprize, and that they should stand vpon their guards. A Gentleman of Bresse which had beene amongst the Marshall of Biron's troupes, seene the petards, and numbred the souldiars in passing the bridge at Macon, went before, to giue notice to Bouvens capitaine of the Cittadell, that the Marshall was within a league of him. But neglecting all these aduertisements, & trusting to the force of their wals and gates, they found, that the Marshall of Biron with twelue hundred men onely and two petards, forced the first and second port of the towne, and entred it without any resistance, or the losse of one souldiar. The troupes entred without disorder, and marched directly to the place before the Cittadell, and came not away, til ten of the clock, whilest that they did capitulate with two hundred Suiffes, which had shut themselves into a Bastion, whom they suffered to depart free with what was theirs: and also to attend if Bouvens would fall out off the Cittadell, as hee made shew. The Marshall of Biron left the Barron of Lux at Bourg, and went with fise canons to finish the conquest of all that which lies on this side the riuer of Rosne, taking at the same time Pont d'In, Poncin, Saint Denis, Saint Rumbert, Beley and Pierre Chastel. Some yeelded at the reputation of his presence, others would see the canon. There was no garrison in all the country, but at Seizel. A strang humor of an enemy, not onely to make warre vpon bad grounds, and to imbarke himselfe in a rotten ship, but also to refuse peace, and yet to haue no man in his country, to make warre. Those which made any resistance, shewed themselves in the end more valiant in tongue then with the sword. So as the King beeing at Grenoble, receiued in one day and in lesse then sixe houres, newes of two memorable exploits: the taking of Bourg with seuen ensignes, and one corner which the Marshall sent him, and the taking of the towne of Montmelian by Les Diquieres. Creguy offered a scalado to the curtaine of the towne of Montmelian towards the castle, and the petard to the port of Arban with such fury, as the souldiars retired themselves into the Church, and the Inhabitants into the Cittadell, leauing their houses to the discretion of all that warre allows in a towne that is either forced, or surprisid. The King commanded Grillon to lodge with the Regiment of his gardes in the suburbs of Chambery, all which was done, without any great resistance.

The souldiars did not defend themselves without feare and amazement, and the people were so lulled a sleepe with this opinion of peace, as nothing was more hatefull vnto them then the remembrance of warre, holding all care of armes to bee vaine and vnprofitable.

The Duke of Sauoy troubled in mind.

A The Duke past his time amongst the Ladies at Thurin, attending the pleasing effects which his Diuines had promised him, as wee haue said. Hee is aduertized that the King is in Armes, his Country in prey, the meanes to defend himselfe farre off, and Hannibal at the foote of the Alpes: That onely Montmelian is left him on this side the mountaines; That his chiefe towne had acknowledged the King for Soueraigne Lord, and that all his subiects yeelded willingly to his obedience. Yet hee continued his sports; And esteeming little the losse of all his Estates, so as hee might saue Montmelian, hee holds it but losse of time for his enemies; that hee would make them abandon what they had taken, and of their victories they should carry backe nothing but Trophies of straw, to conclude hee seemed for a time (as one would say) to consent to any thing, which the King did.

B But when hee came in the end to consider of the abuses and deceits of his South-laiers, to whom hee had giuen to much credit; That so many proiects laied with the Marshall of Biron tooke no effect; that his Ambassadors had commandment to retire (yet full of griefe that their masters inconstancy, had drawne his Estate into apparant ruine and to much incensed the Kings patience) that his country was in prey, that the great meanes of resistance which were promised him, from beyond the Pirenean mountaines were yet farre off: Hee awakes at the thunder of the canon: Hee castes his eyes and thoughts on all sides, and findes no Mediatour capable to repaire that which hee had ruined; no friends to support his quarrell, no neighbours which C sturre for him. Euery one blames him, euery one cries out that hee is in the wrong, he is the sole instrument and cause of his owne misery, and hee alone must seeke the remedie.

The Patriarke of Constantinople is at Turin, a man of a great spirit, and much practiced in affaires of this world. The King sees and heares him willingly. Yea; but the Duke had suspected him at the Treaty of Paris. Hee hath commandment from the Pope not to depart from thence, before his highnesse had performed his promises. Hee thought that hee was there onely to obserue his intentions, and to presse the effects of his words. Hee had well obserued that the Duke did not shew him to good a countenance, nor did so willingly see him as when hee past for the Treaty of Veruins. Hee is offended at this contempt, and it may bee wilbe reuenged when opportunity serues. Hee knows also that the Duke did not like of them that did conferre with him; and that hee had encouraged the King to continew the course of his victories and not to trust vnto the deceits of the Sauoyard. What likely-hood was there then in so vrgent a businesse, to imploy a great Prelate incensed, a great spirit offended?

Yet must hee coniure this French tempest, and by some meanes stay the exploites of so rude an Officer. The Patriarke's qualitie bindes him to mediate the reconciliation of Princes diuided in Christendome; and his presence, to bring water and not Oyle to the combustions which deuoured the Dukes Estates. Hee intreates and coniures him to goe vnto the King. They say that (in despite of the bad reception hee had had at Thurin, or well acquainted with the Dukes intentions) he sent a small noate vnto the King, aduising him to continue the course of his armes, and not to desist for any propositions or offers made by the Duke, who sought but to deceiue him, and withall hee accepted of the charge.

The Patriarke came vnto Grenoble the fifteenth of August, and spake vnto the King coming from Euentong: Hee giues him to vnderstand how much the Pope would bee discontented with this warre: hee coniures him in his name to resolute to a peace, and to returne for that effect to the Treaty of Paris: for that in demanding his owne, both the Pope and all the Potentates would fauour his demand: but in seeking to restore the ancient inheritance of the Duke of Sauoy, hee had no reason to hope for any fauour. The King answered him, that hee was infinitely greued the Pope should bee any way discontented with his taking armes, the which hee did not vndertake vntill it was apparent to all the world, that the Duke deluded him. That beeing the person whom 1600. whom his Maieſtie did moſt honour, and to whom he acknowledged himſelfe ſo much A bound, as hee could not deny him any thing, yet hee held him ſo full of luſtice, as hee would neuer aduiſe him to any thing that ſhould bee againſt reaſon and the dignity of his crowne. That the Duke hauing reſused to performe the Articles of the Treaty at Paris, he was not bound to obſerue them.

The Patriarke laied before him the miſeries which this warre would bring, the ruine and deſolation of the people, and the aduantage which the common enemy of Chriſtendom ſhould get by it. The King answered him in this manner. You exhort me like vnto a great Diuine and one of the chiefe Prelats of the Church, to deſiſt from this warre, to auoide the miſchiefe that may fall vpon Chriſtendome. I know not ſo much B Diuinity as you doe, yet am I not ignorant, that I haue a ſoule to ſaue, and that one day I muſt giue an account of my actions, and that God will impute the miſeries that ſhall happen by this warre, vnto him that giues the occaſion. Let the Duke of Sauoy lay his hand vpon his heart, and iudge if it bee not his obſtinacy and couetouſneſſe to hold that which belongs to an other, which is the cauſe of all the oppreſſion which his poore ſubiects doe now ſuffer. He hath preſumed with two great contempt of mee, to hold that which is mine by cunning, againſt my will. Hee that detaines an other mans vniuſtly, may iuſtly bee deſtroyed of his owne. Hee that denies vnto the ſtronger that which belongs vnto him, abandons vnto him by the ſame meanes all that hee hath: as it is no honor for him to bee obſtinate to warre, for the deſire he hath to hold an other mans eſtate, ſo ſhal he reape no other profit then the ruine of his owne I cannot com- C ceale it reuerend Patriarke, that although I haue euer found all integrity in your Negotiations, yet am I troubled how I ſhall carry my ſelfe with you, touching that which you propound, for in truth I hold you for a very good man, a moſt vertuous Prelate, and a wiſe Negotiator.

The Duke demaunds two Legats.

On the other ſide I can let you ſee in writing how the ſayd Duke hath giuen Authority to Jacob and the Preſident Rochette to treat with mee, with a declaration that neither you nor his Ambaſſadors, that are within my Realme, are priuie to his intentions. Hee hath made them propound, that I ſhould moue the Pope to depute two Legats, one of them ſhould cauſe reſtitution to bee made of that which I hold on this ſide the D mountaines, and the other ſhould make him reſtore that which he detaines from mee on that ſide the Alpes. I find his manner of proceeding to be very bad. To conclude reuerend Patriarke, I will beſeech the Pope to take my anſwere in good part, who holds that I cannot bee urged by any reaſon to lay aſide thoſe armes which the Duke hath forced me to take, hauing runne head-long without any neceſſity into this warre, in the which I am engaged againſt my will. I meane not to bee irreconcilable to him, but I will tell you that hee hath carried himſelfe in ſuch ſort towards mee, as I will no more relie vpon his words. After ſo many breaches, hee muſt finde ſome other meanes to warrant that hee ſaith, or ſome others then my ſelfe to belecue him. His former carriage makes mee iudge what the future may be. It is euident that in a full peace, he viſited the Marquiſate of Saluces from the deſeased King his benefactor, alledging no other reaſon, but that hee would keepe it more ſafely for him, then the Huguenots, who would vſurpe it, promiſing to doe as hee pleaſed. I can ſhew his letter written vnto the E King. But when there is any queſtion to keepe his promiſe, hee then no more remembers it. Iudge alſo how I can bee aſſured of the loue of this Prince, who during the miſeries of France, ſought to vſurpe Dauphiné and Prouence, where with his friends hee hath cauſed infinite ruines, and where hee pretended no other right but neighbour- hood and conueniency, and to make himſelfe great with his neighbours loſſe, ſo as his Ambaſſador in Switzerland in an open diet at Bade (excusing his maſters couetouſneſſe to the thirteene Cantons) ſayd that his children which were many, were iſſued F from Kings and Emperours, and that it was naturall for fathers to ſeek all meanes to make their children great, and to thinke of it in time, ſeeing that no man knowes what time he hath to thinke of it. The which ſhould giue occaſion to all his neighbours, to fore-caſt how they ſhall keepe their eſtates vntill his children bee provided for. The warre

The Dukes letter to the deſeased King.

He excuſeth the taking of the Marquiſate.

A warre which I make ſhall not trouble the quiet of Chriſtendome, I am ready to deſiſt, when hee ſhall doe mee right, for many iuſt pretenſions which I haue vpon his E- ſtates and countries, the which hee detaines from me, to the preiudice of my crowne. Let no man doubt of my reſolution to obſerue the Treaty of Veruins, but it doth not binde mee to quit mine owne. The Patriarke ſeeing that hee would allow no other reaſons then his owne, beſeeched the King to grant a ceaſſation of armes, but his re- queſt was not granted, the King being vnwilling his army ſhould reſt, vntill it had taken Montmelian and Bourg, being dangerous to remaine in an enemies country, and not to bee aſſured of the chiefe places of ſtrength, the loſſe whereof ſtrikes terror into the reſt. The King ſent the Patriarke to Lions, to treat with his counsell more amply of his propoſition.

The Spaniſh Ambaſſador conſidered the courſe of this warre, yet he made no ſhew that the King his maſter deſired for all this to alter the publike peace, notwithſtand- ing hee could not forbear to ſay, that beſides the naturall affection which hee bare to the Duke of Sauoy and to his children: hee held it the dutie of a mighty Prince, to lend his helping hand to them that were vniuſtly oppreſſed, yet hee made no proteſtation which might make them doubt of the obſeruation of the Treaty. The King alſo ſayd that hee would cheriſh the loue of the King of Spaine, ſo long as hee ſhould make account of his, but he would neuer trouble himſelfe with ſo difficult a thing as to keepe a friend by force. Hee commanded the Marquis of Lullins to retire, for if an Ambaſſador be alwaies ſuſpected during an aſſured peace, there is no reaſon to truſt him in time of warre.

The King being reſolute not to looſe any time in a ſeaſon which was ſo precious, parted from Grenoble, dined at Baraut, viſited his troupes which were at Montmelian, and from thence went to the Marches, viewed Chambery, and being come vnto the ſuburbs, hee commanded Villeroy, to ſpeake vnto Jacob, who commanded in the towne, and to lay before him the danger whereinto he thruſt himſelfe with all the Inhabitants, if they attended force in ſo weake a place. That the King deſirous to preuent the ruine of ſo many poore innocent creatures, offered mercy, and ſought to vanquiſh them D by mildneſſe, before he imploied any other meanes. Jacob, accompanied with the Preſident Rochette, thanked the King, and beſeeched his Maieſty to ſuffer them to aduertise his highneſſe in what Eſtate they were. The King granted them three daies to reſolue and to ſend to the Duke, but the people not attending his reſolution, being deſirous to free themſelues from the apprehenſions of the miſery which follows them that are obſtinate, forced him to enter into parlie, ſo as the towne was yeelded to the Kings ob- edience. Thoſe within the caſtle promiſed to yeeld within ſix daies, if they were not ſuccored with ſufficient forces to raiſe the ſiege. The King left La Buiſſe a Gentleman of Dauphiné there for Gouverneur. Hauing effected ſo great a matter with ſo ſmall forces, hee was well pleaſed to ſee his army augmented, by the troupes which La Guiche E Gouverneur of Lions brought vnto him, being about three hundred horſe, of the Nobility of his gouernment, and of his company of men at armes. Being maſter of the field, he reſolued to haue the chiefe fort, he ſeized vpon the two approaches of Tarentaiſe and Morienne.

The King offers mercy to the inhabitants of Chambery.

Chambery yeelded the 21. of Auguſt.

He parted from Chambery the 26. of Auguſt, lodged at Saint Peter d' Albigny, and the next day came to Conſlans, where he found that Des Diguieres had by maine force drawne two canons to the top of a mountaine, battred a pauiſon, and made a ſmall breach in a curtaine. The place was ſufficient to haue aſſured women, but they that were within it ſhewed not themſelues men, being one thouſand five hundred in number, amongſt the which there were a hundred all armed, and three hundred more which carried Cuiraffes. They had ſcarſe made fifty ſhot but they yeelded through feare, and demanded no other compoſition but their liues, thinking themſelues very happy to redeeme their liues with the loſſe of their armes, horſes and baggage, the which the King gaue them out of his bounty, well ſatiſfied with the place, their enſignes, and the promiſe which they made him not to carry armes for twelue daies.

The King comes to Conſlans, and battens it.

The distinction of Charbonnières.

As Conflans commands the passage of Tarentaise, so Charbonnières holds that of Marin-ence, being seated at the entry of the mountaines, which makes the valley ioyning to Mont-Cenis. This place stands vpon a rocke, at the foot whereof runnes the riuer of Arc, inaccessible of all sides, but onely a narrow way to goe vnto the Port; This Tower of Charbonnières serues them as a dongeon and is al that remains of the first fort and retreat of the Earles of Sauoy. Beralde Duke of Saxonic, the first Earle of Maunne made it his palace in time of peace, and his fort for the warre. It is also remarkable for the birth of Thomas sonne to Humbert the third Earle of Sauoy, and Prince of Piedmont. The towne of Aiguebelle is at the foot of this rocke, the King caused it to be surpris'd by the Seigneurs of Crequy and Morges, not giuing them of the castle any leisure to burne it.

His Maiesty knowing that this place was well furnished to resist an army, caused his troups to march, and then hee battred the tower with nine canons, and two small peeeces, from the breake of day vntill noone. The besieged (having endured sixe hundred thirty and seuen canon shot, without any hope of succours) did capitulate the tenth of September, to depart with their baggage, and their marches out: the King sent their ensignes to the Marquise of Vernuel being then at Lions, the which are now in the great Church of Saint Iohn, and so they departed to the number of two hundred. The King returned to Grenoble, to purge himselfe by the aduice of his physition, commanding Des Diguieres to passe with the army into Tarentaise, the which hee did, the enemies quitting the passage of Briançon, retyring themselues into a rocke which was inaccessible of all parts, the which did so bridle the passage, as it might stay any force: Des Diguieres hauing intelligence that the port being but two foote wide, was not wel rampared, and that the place was better furnished with peasants then with souldiers, he planned two canons against it, the which in sixe volles made a breach, the souldiers grabled vp courageously to the top of the mountaine, to enter in at this hole, the captaine with in it was hurt with a shot, and all the rest were taken prisoners. The army lodged at Monstiers the Metropolitaine of the whole country, hauing conquered the vallies and mountaines of Maurienne and Tarentaise, where they found nothing so difficult, as the season, being more troubled with the weather, then with men: onely Montmelian remained, which was held inpregnable.

The King desirous to haue the causes of this warre knowne to all the world; commanded his Ambassadors to aduertise his friends thereof. The Spanish Ambassador in Suitzerland was not mute in this occasion which ministred matter for all the world to talke of. His discours was, that the French King (hauing taken armes when as euery one thought to enioy the sweetnest of peace) put all the world in ialousie, bound those that were neerest to runne to quench this fire, and in oposing themselues to the oppression of the Duke, preuent the designs of the seruitude of Italy. That to this end the Count of Fuentes, had commandement from the King of Spaine his maister, to leauy men to assure the Duchy of Milan, and to intreat that valiant nation of the Suisses to grant him a leauy of six thousand men. Monsieur de Vic the Kings Ambassador, made it known in an open assembly of all the Cantons, that the King had had more patience, then the iniury done vnto his crowne did permit, being vnwilling to take armes vntill that al Europe had iudged, that the Duke of Sauoy proceeded not sincerely, and that hee vrged his Maiesty to repell by force the iniury of the detention of the Marquise of Sarvrg, yet could he not keepe the petty Cantons from granting a leauy vnto the Duke, the which notwithstanding was by him made vnprofitable. Vnto may not here omit a particular accident. Amongst the chiefe gentlemen which La Guiche Gouvernor of Lions had drawne out of his government to serue the King in his army of Sauoy, were Chazeul and du Bourg both well knowne for their valour and experience in armes. The King made good esteeme of them, and gaue a Commission to the last, to raise a regiment of a thousand men. Being gone to make this leauy (Enuy which doth alwaies oppose it selfe to the merits of vertue, and which is incurable in the beginning of prosperity) was greued that a gentleman which had followed the League, should be chosen among

A among so many others to serue the King in this warre, and forged an imposture sufficient to ruine him if it had incountred a Prince as apt to choller as hee is to Iustice and Clemency. They cast abroad tickets in the Kings chamber and with-drawing chamber, that these two Gentleman, hauing failed in an enterprise vpon his Maiesties person at the passage of the riuer neere vnto Chamouffier, had referred the execution thereof to Morters, and that his Maiesty should remember that vpon the way to Chamouffier, one of them (his courage fainting) drew backe from the King to talke with a knight which marched on the one side. This was enough to kindle the Kings choller, and to make it passe like vnto a thunder-bolt, which breakes and wounds before wee see the lightning or heare the cracke. But this Prince (who all his life had followed the precept, which the Emperour Basilius gaue vnto his sonne, not to giue eare to slanderous and enuious reports) found that this billet proceeded from a wicked and malicious passion, for that he remembered well, that to speake, with du Bourg, hee had caused Chazeul to change his place, whereof mention was made in the billet. He shewed it to La Guiche gouernor of Lions, who presently conceiued that it was an imposture: He called Chazeul vnto him, more to confirme the good opinion he had of his Loyalty, then to shew him that this note were able to giue him any signe of ialousie or distrust. And for that the bruite of this trechery could not bee kept secret, hee caused a letter to be written to Du Bourg, commanding him not to discontinue the leauy of his regiment, for any thing he should heare spoken against his Loyalty, whereof hee would haue no other prooffe but his courage, and the execution of that which he commanded him. Du Bourg being at Lions, and hearing there were things spoken of him which he neuer thought, he takes post and comes to the King as he rose from dinner, being enuironed by all the chiefe Noblemen of his Court. As soone as he perceiued him he asked why he was come. Sir answered Du Bourg, it is sayd at Lions that Espinasse would kill you, Du Bourg brings you his head. The King replied, that hee held him to honest a man to haue such a thought, and that such as had giuen this intelligence where wicked impostors. They did see that I ment to imploy you, as I will alwaies when any occasion is offered for my seruice. They could produce no other effects of their enuy but in writing of this billet, but they haue not found mee so tractable and credulous as they thought. Princes Courts were neuer without them, but hee hath fewest that doth least beleue them, I doe not as Kings my Predecessors, who kept in minde, while they liued what two or three had could them. No man knowes my Realme better then my selfe. I haue found three factions. That of the deceased King hath troubled me. Of three I haue made one: there is no more any distinction. I am King of the one as well as of the other, and hold them all for my subiects. I make no difference among them for their affection to my seruice, but I know how to make choise of them that are capable of charges, and for your regard you shall neuer be forgotten when any is offered. Du Bourg hauing thanked the King for the confidence it pleased him to haue of his Loyalty, seemed notwithstanding much afflicted for this slander. The King sayd vnto him, that hee had already told Chazeul that it pittied him to see him afflicted for a thing which hee had neuer beleued, and which he held incredible: he asked him if he suspected any one, assuring him that if he did name him, he would of his absolute power put him to the racke, and if any one should accuse them, he would alwaies hold the accusation scandalous, being farre from the thought of gentlemen of their sort: and if he should beleue billets; there were no safety for good men in his Court. But the King ads (to increase the hearts griefe of these spiteful spirits) goe and raise your Regiment, and beleue mee that if you bring speedily the number of men which you haue promised, you shall punish them more rigorously then Iustice would if they were knowne: for there is no such torment to an enemy as to doe well. That which was sayd of these two was very false, but that which was sayd of two others was very true. The King had intelligence that two disperate men, by one motion and diuers meanes had an enterprise vpon his person. The aduise was accompanied with a discription and the Portraits of these wretches. One of them was knowne, and scene two or three times neere vnto the King. One to whom the castle of

whom Villeroi had giuen a copy of the Portraits, to watch and obserue this villaine, A seeing him one day neerer vnto the King then he should be, wished his Maiefty to take heed. Hee contemned this aduice, saying that his life depended of God, and not of the practises of his enemies. He would not suffer them to apprehend him, saying, Let him alone he is a wicked man. Such villaines shall not goe unpunished, God wil punish them without my doing. The castle of Montmelian was held one of the strongest places in Christendome, and those which haue seene the protrait, with the order of the Kings campe and the forme of his battery, haue wondred that it did so sodainly yeeld. The King himselfe sayd it was impregnable. It is seated vpon the top of a mountaine, the ditches be precipices on euery side, the defences sue great bastions well flanked: there is but one passage to it from the towne, but so vneasie as it not to be wonne; being ditcht, trencht and flanked with aduantage: but there is no fortresse that may not bee termed strong if it be not assailed, and they measure the strength or weakenesse of a place more by the quality of him that doth besiege it then by her owne forces. The King (whose reputation assured a happy end) resolved to besiege it, being informed of the Estate of the place, and confirmed in his resolution by Des Diguieres, who sayd these words vnto him. That he would submit himselfe to pay the charges of the army if that fort were not taken within one month.

It was vnfurnished of munition, and many ruines neglected, did blemish that ancient reputation, by the which it was held one of the strongest places in Christendome. The C captain and soldiers had equally need of courage. It is better to haue sheepe commanded by a Lion, then Lions commanded by a sheepe. The Earle of Brandis of the house of the Earles of Montmaior had the government. The execution of a councill is neuer better performed then by him that giues it. Des Diguieres had bene the chiefe Author to make the Army passe out of Maurienne, into Tarentaise. The King therefore iudging that he could not be better serued by any other in his Army of Sauoy, he commits the charge vnto him of the execution of that which he had aduised.

The French Army marched to besiege the castle of Montmelian, which the Lord of Crequey (commanding in the towne since the taking thereof) had blockt vp as well as hee could. His Maiefty being arriued, he sommoned the Count of Brandis D to yeeld, and to receiue his commandements, threatening him with the furie of fortie canons: the Earle answered, That hee would neuer yeeld the place but to his Soueraigne Lord the Duke of Sauoy, and if they did besiege him, Montmelian should bee the Sepulchre of the French. Some thinke that this insolent answer proceeded onely from feare.

In the meane time the Marquis Rosny, great maister of the Artillery, lost no time to plant his batteries, drawing vp seuen canons by the force of mens hands, to command the castle, and to batter it at randon: then in the same plaine, at the foote of the hill hee caused two batteries to bee made by de Bordes (Lieutenant generall of the Artillery) as well against the Bastion of Mauvoisin, as other places which they held easiest to bee E battered, especially that which was before the Bastion Bouillars, the which might also batter an old tower or dongeon, being foure-square, and almost ruined; hauing bene battered in former time by the army of King Francis the first.

The two batteries one the other side of the water plaid vpon the base Court, and into the portall of the dongeon at randon, vpon those that should issue forth, or offer themselves to defend the breach, the which did more amaze the besieged then any thing else, who being well furnished with artillery and other munition, spared not their shot, the which notwithstanding could not hinder the lodging of the Kings Artillery. Whilest the planted the canon, the King went to view the passages of the mount- F taines by the which the Duke of Sauoy might enter on this side. He was then at Thurin and did not bouge, seeming carelesse of the ruine of his Estates: yet some time some of his most trusty seruants would say. The King of France takes townes in Sauoy, but pitiencie His highnesse will take as many in France and better: these words being reported, made the King to suspect some bad desaigne considering the aduertisement they had of three murderers

Bruits in Italy

The Duke of Sessa request
vnto the Pope.Cardinal Aldobrandino sent Legat to the French King.He came to Thurin in September & is receiued by
the Duke.

A Murderers, whereof one was come expressely out of Piedmont to murder the King: yet he feared not them but rather la Fin, who was very inward with the Marshall of Biron, and that they would seeke to effect the desseignes which they had plotted at Paris, when as the Duke of Sauoy was there, whereof the King had had some intelligence, but hee could not beleue it. His Maiesty who loued the Marshall of Biron well, wished him to dismisse la Fin, that his company was dangerous, and that in the end he would deceiue him. But the Marshall was no more capable of counsell: two great and violent passions, Ambition and Reuenge had so distempered his iudgement, as he was no more himself, the which grew vpon occasions which fell out in this warre of Sauoy. The first was des- pight and iealousie, to see all the authority of command, all the honor of enterprises, all the conduct of executions giuen to Des Diguieres, for that he knew the countrey, and the enemies forces better then any other. He was discontented for that hee was not at the siege of Montmelian, as he had bene at the siege of Amiens. The other was the re- fusall which the King made vnto him, to dispose of the Cittadel of Bourg, when it shold be taken, which refusall was grounded vpon great considerations. The first, that it was not reasonable to trust a place of that importance to him that was suspected to haue in- telligence with his enemy. The second, that Gouvernors of Prouinces which command in chiefe, ought not to haue the gard of places and fortresses. The third was, that the King ment to commit the place (as one of the Keyes of his Realme towards Italy) to one that depended immediatly on his Maiesty. But we must ioine this discourse to his pro- cesse, and to the discouery of his conspiracies, the which he thought to be very se- cret, for that they were not knowne nor divulged.

All Italy being amazed to see the King at the foot of the Alpes, and the three for- tresses which remained in Bresse and Sauoy so streightly beleeged, as they must needes fall into the power of the victorious French, sayd, That the Marquisat was the pretext, but Naples and Milan was the cause of the warre. The Duke of Sessa the King of Spaines Ambassadour at Rome, represented vnto the Pope the infinite ruines and desolations which would follow by the continuance of this war, and the victorious successe which the Turke had vpon the frontiers of Austria, being ready to make a great breach vpon D the Christians, whilest the Princes which he feared most were at warre, and the most warlike people of Europe killed one another. He therefore beseecheth him to send his Nephew vnto the King, to stay the course of his Armes, and to resume the execution of the Treaty of Paris. The Pope (to whom the diuision of Christian Princes hath al- waies bene displeasing (desiring more then any of his Predecessors to assure the publike quiet) grants this famous Ambassage of Cardinal Aldobrandino his Nephew, who young of age, but not of wisdom and iudgement, would not depart out of Rome be- fore the Duke of Sessa had giuen his word vnto the Pope, that he would cause the King of Spaine to approue, and the Duke to obserue whatsoeuer he should treat with this assurance he past to Milan, getting the like promise from the Count of Fuentes vnder E his hand, being there ready with the King of Spaines forces to succour the Duke of Sauoy, to whom he sayd: That he made this voyage for the onely respect of the King of Spaine, and if the Duke of Sauoy onely had bene interessed, he would not haue ab- sented himselfe so long from the Consistory, he was not therefore resolved to proceed any farther, if he did not assure him to make the Duke obserue all that he did treat, and to retire his forces if he made any difficulty. The Count who sought but to saue that which was on the other side of the Alpes, to serue as a rampier for Milan, promised him, as a passage might be reserved for the Spaniards to go into Flanders. It was a great wis- dome in this young Cardinal not to treat of so important a busines, but vpon good cau- tions. The Cardinal being thus assured, leaues his traine at Alexandria, and comes to F Thurin, faining his intention to be, to finish his pilgrimage to our Lady at Mont De- uis, and to see him in passing. The Duke enters into complaint of the losse of his Estates, and swears to seeke all means to haue his reuenge. The Legat seemes cold, hee repre- sents vnto him the necessity of Peace, and the good of Concord, and he lets him know that he should desire to kepe his friends which are the true Scepters of Princes. He adds moreouer, 1600. moreover, that he was forrie for the bad estate of his affaires, the which if hee A might repaire, he would willingly go to Chambery. The Duke intreats him to take the paine, giues him a blanke, and assures him, that he wil neuer haue any wil nor resolution to contradict that which he should conclude in this negotiation: with this promise (and an assurance that he should not attempt any thing more then the succoring of Montmelian) he passed the Alpes. And for that he feared that the King in his great aduantage would not harken to a peace, and much lesse grant any truce, and that this inequality would make all reasons vnequal, he would not aduise the Duke to send his Ambassadors, vntill he first knew the Kings mind. He therefore commands Hermínio his Secretary to aduertise him of his comming, & of the desire he had to serue his Maiesty, not for the continuance of the war, but for a confirmation of a Peace. The King vpon this aduice staies at Annessy, to giue audience to Hermínio, who was presented vnto him by the Patriarke, who said vnto him, that the Legat his master was sent by the Pope to quench the fire of war. The King excused himself, vpon the disaduantage he should receiue, and the preiudice it would bring to his affaires, in retiring when he should aduance, and to neglect the commodities and occasions which were offered vnto him in this enterprise by the consideration of time and place. But he assured him that the Cardinall should be very welcome for the respect of his Holines, for the particular of his person, and for the iubicat of his Legation, although his enemies had giuen it out, that it was made in the Dukes fauor. That he did attribute all to piety, wisdom, and a fatherly care in his Holines: who should alwaies find as much will in him to maintaine peace, as he had bin grieued to come to armes, refusing neuer any treaty, so as it might be with honor and safety, beeing resolute neuer to indure any iniury from the Duke of Sauoy nor his adherents. Hermínio made some other propositions, the answer whereof, the King referred to Chambery, whither the King appointed to come within foure or fiue dayes: The King went from Annessy to Beaufort, to view the passages of the mountain, by the which the Duke might come, he sent the Duke Biron to discover that of our Lady of Gorge, and others altogether inaccessible, but onely for Beares and Camels. The King went vp the mountaine, as far as the pace of Cornet, where he dined vnder a rocke, to defend himselfe from snow: after he had viewed the passage which may serue the enemy, hee parted D from Beaufort, and took his lodging at Gilly neere to Conflans, where hee was informed of the true estate of the beseege, who had no hope but in themselves, beeing impossible for the Duke of Sauoy to succor them. But what doth the Duke whilst the King rules in his Counties, and that Des Diguières spoiles all the vallies of Morienne and Tarentaise? Hee which had bin the Kings Agent with the Duke, hauing taken his leaue, came to his Maiesty at Grenoble, telling him that the Duke talked of nothing but fighting: he answered, that he should find him ready to shew him sport. The Spaniards who would make him apprehend the voyage of Paris, sayd, that they might not breake the body of their troupes, nor diuide their forces, appointed for the defence of Piedmont. The Duke would haue sent 3000. Spaniards to defend the valley of Tarentaise, but they would not march, not for feare, but by order of their Commander, which kept them backe. D'Albigni had much ado to make them stay at the Fort of little S. Bernard, on that side of the valley of Aost, which if they had done, the Duke might haue attempted something in Prouence and Dauphiné to haue diuerted the Kings forces.

But it hath bin alwaies obserued that such as haue trusted to the succors of Spaine, haue tried to their grieve, that they desire rather to intertaine the disease, then to aduance the cure. It is a militaric Maxime among them, to make one Body of an army, but especially, not to do any thing without direction, so as oftentimes great opportunities are lost in attending, for if the Councils be far off, they come alwaies after the effects. The King E hauing provided for the passages returns to Montmelian, he sent word to the Earle of Brandis, that if hee would forbear to shoote that day, hee would also cause his batterie to cease. They told the King that the Earle granted it as willingly, as if he had no resolution to refuse any thing to so great a Prince. The King was not ignorant of the estate of the beseege, for besides that at the taking of the Towne, hee had taken Notes and Inuentories

The Cardinal sends Hermínio his Secretary to the King.

The King passes the pace of Cornet the 12. of October.

The Duke refuses to fight

A Maxime of the Spaniards.

The King returns to Montmelian.

A Inuentories of the munition that was in the castell, there alwaies escaped some one or uer the wall which brought newes, and described the place in as miserable an estate as they could, as well to excuse their flight as to tell the truth. A Cannon shot from one of the Kings batteries, pierced the wall within a foote of the caue, whereas all the powder and munition of warre did lye, the which had ended the batterie, if it had gone a little further. The Earle of Brandis seeing that nothing came from without that might incertaine hope, and iudging that nothing was lesse beleeving a Captaine, then rashnes, did not contemne the perswasions which necessity and the aduice of his friends gaue him to thinke of the souldiers health, seeing that of the place was desperate. The King summons him againe, not to be obstinate: they found him so well disposed thereunto, B as presently they did iudge whereunto things would tend. The Earle calls together the Captaines and Gentlemen that were with him, to determine of some whole some expedient, not to offend the seruice of their Prince, nor to incense the power of a great King, and to provide for the common health of them all. If he were resolu'd to hold it out, he should not aske counsell but of such as were of the same resolution, being easie to iudge, that amazement will alwaies carry them to opinions contrary to duty, and that from a fearefull man you shall neuer draw good counsell. Euery thing is vnpleasant to a man that feares. Being therefore assembled, he spake vnto them after this manner: "My masters, when I consider that we hold this place for our Prince to defend it for him with the price and perill of our liues: I do not find, that either feare of danger or C despaire of succors, or rigour of afflictions can discharge vs: but when I consider the state wherein we are, the extremities which presse vs, the great distance of our hopes, and the weaknesse of our force, I say that in the end we must submit our willes to that which may be, and that it should be an ouer-weening, to will that which is impossible. It is not the custome of a Gouvernor in a place beseege, to publish the wants he finds, for commonly a good shew couers defects, to the end that his wauering daunt not the courage of his souldiers. In like manner I haue concealed as much as I could the necessities which enuiron vs: but seeing you see them, and feele them no lesse then my selfe, iudge what the issue of this seege may be: I coniure you by the duty which bindes D you to his Highnesse, by your loyalties, honors, and consciences, you consider the choice of two things, whereof if it were possible, I would desire neither the one nor the other, which is, either to indure all the attempts of the Kings army, and to yeeld vp our liues with the place, or to capitulate to yeeld it vp vpon the longest time we can obtain. If we follow the first, we cannot auoide our owne ruines, nor the losse of the place: if necessity suffers vs to make vse of the second, we may giue his Highnesse leysure to do his businesse, or to succor vs. Thinke not that any base apprehension of danger makes me to vse these words. I shall neuer in all my life find a more glorious death. All that may be done out of this place to saue a mans life, I will do it to find death, and in euery thing E elie that shalbe vnfortunate, I will euer remember, that it is not the duty of a Commander to haue care of his owne safetie, but of the preservation of his Souldiers.

Take therefore this proposition as I giue it you, and expecting your resolution, shew vnto your companions, neither feare in your courages, nor despayre in your words, and in all your resolutions, cast your eyes not so much vpon that which you desire, as vpon necessity which must giue a lawe vnto your desires, remembering that they pittie such as fall into accidents not fore-seene, and mocke at those which fall into apparant dangers.

This proposition was not applauded of them all: some representing, that there is no crime more horrible nor detestable, then to yeeld vp a strong place, without extreame and most apparant violence, remembering, That his Highnesse had honoured them with the guard of the onely Bulwarke of his Estates: they should rather all die therein, then yeeld the place to the French King, and that the apparant danger might be auoied by some favorable accident. Others of the contrarie side maintained, That accidents were doubtfull, that it were better according to the time to take an assured and easie party. That euery one knew that the most Christian King was well informed of the estate of that place: That

Brandis letter to the Duke of Sauoy.

" That his Highnesse must consider he was besieged by a Royall armie, in the which " were three Generals; the Duke of Espernon, the Marshall of Biron, and Dees Diguieres,
 " with many Princes and Noblemen. That hauing receiued no newes from his High-
 " nesse sithence his letter of the fifteenth of August, he had lost all hope of succours, and " had propounded vnto all the Captains, to try if they could get a sufficient time to giue
 " his Highnesse meanes either to succour them, or to treat of a peace.

" That holding a delay of more aduantage then such a sodaine losse, he had entred in-
 " to Treatie, hauing demanded a much longer time then they had graunted him, not" withstanding that all prouision of victuals wanted, except corne, and Rice, the which
 " with very good husbandrie could not last till the end of Nouember.

" That hee was much grieued to yeeld the place to any other then to him to whome
 " it did belong, and if he could as well dispose of all them that were with him, as of him-
 " selfe, and of other chiefe Officers, to die when as the place should change his master,
 " he would rather take that resolution, then present himselfe before his Highnesse after
 " so great a losse, in comparison whereof his owne fortunes and safetie seemed nothing
 " vnto him.

" That if his Highnesse did not succour them within the moneth, the place was lost
 " the K. hauing giuen it out, that he wold not yeeld it again notwithstanding any peace

The same day the Capitulation of Montmelian was made, the King sent the secreta" ry Herminio to goe and meete the Cardinall Aldobrandino his Master, with charge to " assure him of his Maiesties willingnes to peace, and of the desire hee had to see him to o" pen his heart, and to represent vnto him the iustice of his armes, and to let him know
 " that hee had not vnderaken them to trouble Italy or Christendome, as his enemies had " maliciously giuen out, after that they had forced him to protract his marriage, and to " take the way of Sauoy, the which was not greatly pleasing vnto him in this season, in-
 " treating him to take it in good part, if he did not answer to the particular propositions
 " propounded vnto him by Herminio vntill his arriuall, assuring himselfe that he would F
 " come with sufficient power, to conclude a good accord, without any more trouble of " doing it wise. But his Maiestie excused himselfe from any surceasing of armes. It being
 " vnreasonable to liue idly in an enemies Country, whereas the entertainment of his army,
 " cost

A cost him two hundred thousand crownes a moneth, and that he should attend the win" ter, and giue the enemy leysure to prepare himself. The Duke held this Treatie of Mont-" melian to be sudden and rash: some braue spirits about him imputed it to cowardlines,
 " rather then to treason. He made answer by Bricheras, and assured the besieged to succor
 " them: and presently after he sent another letter in these termes: "Monsieur Brandis, for " the execution of that which I haue signified vnto you, by the Cheualier Bricheras, be" hold, I am on horsebacke ready to passe the Alpes with so mighty an army, as if you will
 " giue me some litle time, more then is specified in the capitulation, you shall see the sport,
 " and bind me, mine, and all Sauoy for euer, to acknowledge you for the most faithfull,
 " the most profitable, and the worthiest subiect in my Estates; you shall be noted through" out all Christendome, which now attends your resolution, and you shall free your selfe
 " from the ignominie and reproch which you should incurr by your Capitulation. Shew
 " your selfe (I pray you) a Knight worthy of the house from whence you are descended,
 " and of the loue I haue borne you: regard herein your honour chiefly, and the conse" quence which shall grow by your resolution, it is but for a few daies, and not by " the time limited, and the Cardinall Aldobrandino, who is gone thither-ward, effects not " what he doth expect, you must not respect your hostages, it is not likely they shall mis-
 " carrie, and if the worst happen, they cannot import so much as the losse of that place.
 " Write vnto mee (if it bee possible.) In my hope from you, depends all that I am to do " with these goodly forces. If I were not assured to succour you speedily, I would not per-" swade you to breake the Capitulation. But this assurance makes me say vnto you, that " you ought not to doubt, for these reasons and infinite others which you should lay be" fore you. The Duke had added in the end of his letter, these words with his owne hand.
 " I thinke that Bricheras is already come vnto you, hee will shew me now the proofe of so many promi" ses which you haue made me, and giue me the time that I haue set downe, and you shall see the " sport where you are.

By this letter it seemed the Duke cared not much for the life of his Hostages: The " Duke of Espernon went by the Kings commandement and acquainted the Earle of " Brandis with this letter, who answered, you may say vnto his Maiestie, that I will keepe my " word, in the assurance whereof I hold my life and honor. The King tooke a new assurance in " writing, signed by him and the other Capitaines, which had signed the Capitulation.
 " Five dayes after this confirmation, the Cardinall Aldobrandino past by Montmelian, the " army standing in battell, where he was saluted by the Kings artillery, and that of the ca-
 " stell. The Duke of Espernon met him first vpon the bridge of Montmelian, and then all " the Princes and Noblemen incountred him vpon the way, and accompanied him to " Chambery, whereas the K. receiued him with great honor; who in his first audience at " the Capuchins, he sayd vnto him: "That he doubted not of the iustice of his armes, and " of the aduantage which his valour had gotten him ouer the Duke of Sauoy, but he held " him for a Prince so full of affection, to the good and quiet of Christendome, as he wold
 " neuer vse the fruites of his victorie to the ruin of the peace, and publike tranquillite, but " would suffer the Popes earnest motion vnto him to desire peace, to be of more force
 " then the perswasions of such as inuited him to continue this warre: a warre which was " neither worthy the greatnesse of his courage, nor the fruites of his armes: for if it were " made to enlarge his Empire, the Estate of Sauoy is a small thing, and if it were for the " reuenge of some wrong, hee should consider that the reuenge which is not betwixt
 " equal parties, is alwaies vniust, and hath no sparke of generosity in it. That war is vn-
 " certaine, and the end is not alwayes answerable to the beginning, and there was no
 " Prince that for the most assured opinions of Victorie, was to bee commended in refus" ing the conditions of an honourable Peace. A Peace which the Pope desired for the " good of all Christendome: for the consolation of those which trembled at the Turkes
 " approches: who feared that this diuision would ingage France in the fore-passed mis-
 " ries. A Peace which the Duke of Sauoy desired, and for the which hee promised to " yeeld himselfe more tractable then euer hee had beene. A Peace which would bring " forth meanes to succor the Christians affaires in Hongary, to root the memorie of the

The Legats
speech vnto
the King.

1600.
answer.

Turke out of the world, and free Europe from his fury. The King answered him. That he had alwaies held it for a rule of conscience to content himselfe with his owne, as well, as not to suffer an vsurpation. But he could not hope for any reason from the Duke of Sa- uoy but by armes, the which he was forced to vse to reuenge the vsurpation of his Mar- quisat, seeing neither the feeling of his owne conscience, nor the iudgement of his Hol- ines, nor the assurance of his promises made at Paris, could moue him to do that which he ought. That if his army did passe the Alpes, hee should find good seruants in Pied- mont, and that the soile was as fertill as euer it was to plant the Flower-de-luce there, and make it flourish, but when he should haue gotten all that the Duke holds on this and the other side of the mountaines, he wold alwaies leaue it in yeelding vp his Marquisat. B The effect of this Ambassage was, that Herminio went to informe the Duke, that the Cardinall his master had disposed the King to a peace; the Duke receiued these newes with ioy, and made choice of the Count d'Arconas, and the Seigneur d'Alimes for this negotiation, commanding them to do all the Legat should commaund touching the peace. The King notwithstanding sayd, that he would not thinke of any peace vntill that Montmelian were yeilded. And that his Councell was not neere him, the Constable and Chancellor beeing sent to Marfeilles to receiue the Queene. And the Duke was not so much inclined to a peace, but he did his indeuour to succour Montmelian. The 12. of Nouember he came to the valley of Aost, with ten thousand foot, foure thousand Harguebuziers on horse-backe, and 800. men at armes: hauing past the Mount Saint C Bernard, he lodged at Ema beeing himselfe in person.

The King commanded the Count Soissons to go to Moustiers, where as Des Diquieres attended the enemy, and his Maiefty went from Chambery to Montmelian, to expect the yeelding vp of the place, the which was deliuered vp the sixteenth of Nouember ac- cording to the capitulation by the Count Brandis, with great store of artillerie, bullets, and powder to shoote about 20000. Cannon shot: the Marquis of Rhosny and Cregny (who was appointed Gouvernor by the King) entred into it with 500. men. His Maiefty hauing giuen order for Montmelian, departed the next day ( without entring into the Castell) to visit his army.

He had his thoughts turned to peace, not so much for his owne inclination, nor for D the consideration of his affaires, as for the reuerence he bare vnto the Popes aduice: his zeale to the publike good, and knowledge he had of the disloyalty of his chiefe seruants. But he was sorry the Duke of Sauoy should take the paines to come so neare him and not see him, for he lay still at Ema at the foot of the Mount Saint Bernard, two leagues onely distant from Moustiers, whither he had sent the Earle of Soissons and Des Diquie- res. He came thither himselfe in person to view the feate of the Dukes lodging, and the countenance of his army, vnto a village called Villette, and caused a skirmish to bee gi- uen to fixe hundred men which were there for the gard of a bridge, which they must passe to go to Ema, it was so faintly defended, as they thought they would stand vpon their aduantage, and not abandon the riuier which serued them as a trench and ditch. E The King returned the same day to Moustiers, and went to lodge at Villars neare to the towne of Beaufort, whereas the Dukes of Montpensier and Espernon were lodged. He commanded Nereftan to go and discouer the passage of Cornet, and to see if there were any meanes to enter that way into the enemies lodging, the which he performed hap- pily, for he charged and defeated a Corps-de-gard of Milanois, which the Duke had placed vpon the descent of the passage, and presented some prisoners vnto the King. Hereuppon his Maiefty resolued to charge the enemy by two wayes at one instant, meaning to enter by the passage of Cornet, and commaunding the Earle of Soissons to charge by that of Tarentaise: but there are accidents, though naturall and ordinarie, F which cannot be foreseene, and yet stay great executions: for the same night the Dukes armie was so barricadoed with Snow, as there was no meanes nor deuice possible to approach.

The King stayed three dayes to see if the weather would alter, and make the passa- ges accessible, but it fell out otherwise, for the Snow increased. Hee returned to Chambery to Vilette.

A Chambery, from whence he sent the Earle of Soissons to Saint Katherines Fort, with an intent to follow him speedily, hauing caused two thousand foote, and two hun- dred horse, to passe along the Marquisate of Saluces by the valley of Maire, vnder the conduct of Dauriac, who tooke the Fort of Assell by Petard. 1600.

His Maiefty comming to Chambery, the Cardinall Aldobrandino presented vnto him Arconas and D'Alimes, the Dukes Deputies for the Peace, to whome hee sayd. Your Master hath nothing but words, and I shew the effects: I sayd vnto you at Paris (spea- king to Alymes) that you were welcome, so I say now, but I mean not to treat but with this Reuerend personage, speaking of the Legate. Two dayes after this, the King went to take Horfe (hauing referred the Treatie of peace to the returne of his Chancellor and Coun- cell from Marfeilles) and went with the rest of his armie to assure Saint Katherines Fort, whether in the beginning hee had sent the Lord of Sancy, to rayse a Regi- ment of foote in the Countrey, to keepe in the Garrison of the Fort, and afterwards Mounfieur de Vitry with the Regiments of the Cheuallier of Montmorency, Corces and other Troupes. Saint Katherines Fort is built vpon an high hill, which over- looks all the Countrey: it consists of fixe Bastions which are not walled, yet it is ditched and furnished with all things necessarie: It lyes two Leagues from Geneva, de- fended by fixe hundred men, whereof two parts were Suiffes. Some few dayes before the Kings arriual one of the Captaines of the beseged, went forth with his Maie- sties leaue to the Duke of Nemours, who with the Kings good leaue was retired to his Houle of Anniy, that hee might be freed from this Warre, and not hurt or preiudice his Cousin the Duke of Sauoy, the King sent presently one of his Guard to bring him to Leluisel, where he was lodged, a quarter of a League from the Fort: hauing let him vnderstand the resolution of his desseigne, the greatnesse of his forces, and the final hope they should haue of the Duke: he preuailed so, as soone after his returne to his Companions, they did capitulate to depart with their baggage and armes, their Drums sounding, and Ensignes displayed, carrying away with them a third part of the Artil- lerie, if they were not succoured within tenne dayes. The King left the Count Soissons to attend the effect of this Capitulation, and went to Lyons to meete the Queene, as D we shall shew hereafter.

The Duke of Sauoy hauing sayled at Montmelian, gaue it out, that he would succor Saint Katherines Fort. Hee had a goodly army, and those that were about him thought there were but too many to chase the French out of Sauoy. Moreouer, hee thought to haue a passage by Valais, either willingly or by force: hee had also good friends among the pettie Cantons of the Suiffes, being distastd with the seruice of this Crown, for that they were not payed what was due vnto them. De Vic the Kings Ambassadour, made all their friendship fruitlesse, employing himselfe worthily against all his practi- ses: he assisted in all their assemblies, hauing good words to content some, and patience to digest the indiscretion of others, and couragious answers against the threats and E braueries of the most difficult, yet hee could not hinder the Leue of foure thousand men, granted to the King of Spaine, by foure or fixe Cantons, for the defence of Mil- lan, with charge not to enter vpon the Kings Dominions, vpon paine of death: but he kept them from marching so soone as the enemy desired, which stay made them not onely vnprofitable, but also hurtfull, by his great expences. The fixe dayes beeing ex- pired, the Gouvernour of Saint Katherines Fort came forth with fixe hundred men, ac- cording to the Capitulation.

All the Captains of the Duke of Sauoys places excused their yeelding vpon necessitie, to accuse their Prince of indiscretion, who had reason to complaine of their valours, for they might haue done better. The Count Soissons aduertised, after the yeelding of S. Katherines Fort, that the Duke comming by the Tarentaise, aduanced with his whole army, to succour the beseged, he assembled his troupes, and resolued to meete and fight with him if hee durst hazard the day. But hee was sooner aduertised of his retreat then of his marching: The Duke had sayd at Paris, and to the Seigneur of Fesexesse at Turin, that whosoever would make warre against him, he would shew him sport. 1600. sport for forty yeares space, but he lost all Sauoy in lesse then forty dayes, and there remained nothing in Bresse but the Cittadell of Bourg. The Baron of Lux had reduced them within it to despair of all succours and constancie, and although they had great aduantages ouer him, yet they got nothing but blowes in all their Sallies. They were more in number in the Cittadell then in the Towne: There were no retrenchments to hinder their sallies, and yet Wit and Vigilancie prescribed a Law to force a number. There was a conuoy readie in the Franch County, prepared to put into the Cittadell: The entrie was easie by a way which the Baron of Lux had discovered. They sought to corrupt him: but hee was so farre from giuing care vnto this Charme, as hee fortified this place with a good and vigilant guard: so as hauing reiected the enemies offers, hee hindred the execution of their desseignes.

Hee was aduertised that Vatulier making shew to retire himselfe into the Franche Countie, and to lay down Armes, for that hee would not oppose himselfe against the Neutrallitie, had seized vpon a Castell neere vnto Bourg, called Vernay, where there was great store of victuals, and plentie of prouision appointed for the Cittadell. Hee sent speedily thither, and hindred Vatulier for drawing any thing out of that lodging, but his person and trayne. After the Marshall of Biron's returne from the Kings armie, the Baron of Lux went to giue an accompt of the Seege, whereupon the King tooke the Subiect of this Letter which hee sent vnto Bouuens, commaunding at the Cittadell of Bourg.

letter to the Governor of Bourg.

Monfieur de Bouuens hauing now more reason then euer, to hope for speedie Reduction of the place, I will let you vnderstand what esteeme I make of those which resemble you in Vertue and Valour, and testifie vnto you my bountie, by inuiting you to treat with me of a thing which in time cannot escape me, whether the warre be continued, or the peace bee made. For if your Duke could not succour the Castell of Montmelian, to whome in the Capitulation I had giuen a moneths respight to do it, how shall hee now free you from the extremitie whereunto you are reduced, being to fight with Reason, the length and discommoditie of wayes, the aduantages which the occupation of Countries, and passages of Riuers haue giuen me ouer him with my armie, which is as strong and as well ledde as his? And thus much concerning warre. In respect of Peace, with the bruite thereof the sayd Duke doth comfort and entertaine them that serue him, it is not a worke that can bee finished in few dayes, It may be you shall come to the extremitie of your victuals before it be any thing aduanced. I haue demanded reason of the sayd Duke for many pretensions well grounded, which the Crowne of France hath vpon his Countries, the which will not bee soone enough ended to draw you out of payne. Moreouer, if I should be contented to treat onely for the Marquisate of Saluces, the sayd Duke offers allreadie to leaue me Bresse, with the place you hold for part of a recompence: So as it resteth onely in mee to haue it either by warre or peace. Which being, you shall much better your condition, if you treat presently with mee, and satisfie mee, for I will giue you occasion to commend my bountie.

You haue hitherto performed as much as a Gentleman of Resolution and Honour might do, to defend that place, hauing in this dutie exceeded all others in the like charge, that I haue assayed. No man is bound to do things impossible. It is the necessitie of victualles and other things which oppresse and presse you, and which prescribe you a Law, with the small apparence there is now to hope for any succours of what kind soeuer.

Resolue then to do that which you cannot auoyde: You are aduised thereunto and inuited by a Prince, which makes profession of Glorie, and to loue and esteeme men of Honour. If you consider the priuate estate in which you are, and whereunto the publike affaires are reduced, you would not loose this oportunitie to assure your reputation, your person, family, and goods, being certaine, that if you reiect it, you cannot auoyd to make tryall of the rigours of Warre, which they deserue that attend the last extremitie should reduce them to their enemies mercie and compassion. Let me

A me then vnderstand your resolution by the returne of this Trumpet, whome I haue sent expressely here-with, and if you desire any further satisfaction of my intention concerning this Subiect, my Cousin the Duke of Biron will giue you content, being very well informed thereof, and on whom I do greatly rely, &c.

This Letter was brought by a Trumpet vnto the Marshall of Biron, who sent it vnto Bouuens, and did accompany it with one of his owne, exhorting him to resolue according vnto necessitie, and not according vnto the affection which hee bare vnto his Prince, nor that which his courage did suggest: for Constancie must bee measured according vnto Reason: and it is rather Oblinacie and Wilfulness, when it resolues to things either impossible or vnreasonable. Bouuens answered not discretely, but courageously, so as he seemed to be grieved, the French did not know his courage and vndunted valour.

Sir, when this place was put into my hand by the Duke of Sauoy, my Lord and Master, I resolved to burie my selfe in it, and to performe the dutie of an honest man. I greue at nothing but that your Maiestie will not make triall thereof by violence and force. Yet I hope to winne as much glorie in surmounting the necessities wherein your Maiestie thinks I am, as in resisting your attempts: And so I beseech you to beleue that I will alwayes remaine your Maiesties most humble, most loyall, and faithfull seruant.

C Hee wrote in like manner to the Marshall of Biron, that hee held him to bee so great a Souldier, and making profession to loue men of worth, as hee would allow of his Resolution, which was to keepe the place for him that had giuen it him in guard, vnto his last gaspe, holding it the greatest honour that could happen vnto him, to giue a testimonie vnto his Prince of that whereunto hee was borne. His constancie was commended by the King, recompenced by the Duke, and propounded for an example to others.

But the Duke exhorted them by Letters, to hold it good vntill the Treatie of Peace, whereof hee assured them: the which was the onely meanes (as wee shall shew) to free the besieged from the necessitie whereunto they were reduced, and without the D which they must needs haue fallen vnder his Maiesties subiection. Behold, all which passed of greatest import in the conquest of Sauoy and Bresse by the most Christian King. But this warre did not hinder him from thinking of his marriage; hee had bene contracted at Florence the five and twentieth of August, Monsieur de Belle-garde, Master of the Kings horse, carried the procurator to the great Duke of Tuscany. The Duke of Mantua came to Florence the second of October, and the next day arrived the Ambassador of Venice. The Pope would gladly haue had the Queene receive this blessing of her marriage at his hands, and to haue done the like honour, as hee did to the Queene of Spaine at Ferrara, the which for certaine reasons could not be effected, and therefore hee sent the Cardinall Aldobrandino his Holinesse Legate and Nephew, in whose hands E the words of present Marriage were made.

The fourth of October, the Cardinall Aldobrandino entred into Florence with great pompe and magnificence, riding vnder a Canopie, and the Duke on his left hand, and so was conducted to the Dukes Pallace. After Supper in the presence of the great Duke of Tuscany, the Dukes of Mantua and Bracciano, the Princes Joan and Anthony of Medicis, together with the Lord of Belle-garde the Kings Ambassador. Hee deliuered vnto the Queene the contentment which the Pope had of this Marriage, with a sweete kind of Grauitie and Modestie: and a Discourse full of pleasing words: hee conceived great hopes of great good to come, by the meanes of this happy coniunction, not only for the houses of the Kings of France and the Dukes of Tuscany, but also for all Christendome: and not onely for Christian kingdoms, but for all the whole world; so as the Queene moued with ioy and great hope, thanked his Holinesse for this salutation, and sayd: That God hauing so decreed it, shee assured her selfe, than the blessing of the holy Father would bring the grace of God with it, wherof she would endeavour to make her selfe worthy and capable, recommending her selfe most humbly to the prayers of his Holines and of the Church. Which words were deliuered after so maiestically a manner, as if this Princeesse had vsed alwaies to command absolutely: and so that day was spent. The 5. of October the marriage was celebrated after a Royall manner, the Legat sayd Masse, the which being ended the great Duke had a Son christened, the Seigneurie of Venice giuing it the name. The Queen parted from Florence the 16. of October, and came to Liouorne the 17. where she embarked in the great Dukes generall Galley, beeing assisted by fise of the Popes Gallies, fise of Malta, and sixe more of the said Dukes. The King hauing intelligence of her imbarcking, prouided for her reception at Marseilles, and gaue the charge of his Will to the Duke of Guise, his Maiesties Lieutenant generall in Prouence: he also sent his Constable and Chancellor with the Dukes of Nemours, Guise, and Ventador to receiue her. The Cardinals of Ioyeuze, Gondy, Guiry, and Sourdy, with many Bishops and Noblemen of the Councell. The navigation was dangerous in many places, and fearefull streights betwixt Genoua and Marseilles: yet with a resolute and chearefull countenance she seemed to scorne the tempests of the sea. The 3. of Nouember she tooke port at Marseilles, beeing accompanied by the great Duchesse of Florence, the Duchesse of Mantua her sister, D. Anthony her brother, and the Duke of Bracciano. At their comming to land, there was a great question who should haue the right hand: The Knights of Malta would fight for it with fise Gallies, against the Florentines who had seuen. Without it they had the rancke which they desired, and with their valour had maintained since they were planted at Rhodes, there were no prayers nor coniurings could make them quitte it, no not for a moment. The great Prior of Champagne vnderooke the answer, and sayd: A head stricke off can neuer be set on, and that their Generall brought his owne in danger, if he allowed any precedence for a lesse time.

The Queene leauing her Galley, entred vpon a Theater made of two great boates: whereunto ioyned a bridge, which went vnto her Pallace. The Constable receiued her, the Chancellor deliuered the Kings pleasure, 4. Consuls of Marseilles presented her the keyes of the citty, and a Canopy of cloth of siluer, vnder which shee was conducted to the Pallace. One of the most remarkable actions during her abode there, was the protestation of obedience, which was made vnto her by the Court Parliament of Prouence, in the great Hall of the Pallace, Monsieur de Vair making a most eloquent Oration.

Madame, seeing your Maiestie to arrive in this Prouence, and with you the felicitie of France, wee haue abandoned the seate of Iustice, where wee haue the honour to sit, to come and prostrate our selues at your seere, to yeeld you the noblest and most worthie Homages which are due vnto the Crowne that doth now enuiron your head, and withall to pronounce our selues bound for all the vowes which wee haue at any time made for the good of this Estate. For assuredly wee beleue that this day wee are heard, and thinke that so many wonders, which God hath wrought for the restoring of this Realme, are fully accomplished, and that our good fortunes which seemed to bee wauering, as now settled vpon a firme and irremouable foundation.

God hath giuen vs a King excellent in vertue, admirable in bountie, and incomparable in valour, who by his labours hath giuen vs quiet, by his perils, safetie; and by his victories, glorie: So as in a manner wee tearmed our selues happie, if this mournfull thought had not often troubled the course of our ioy. This care I say, which represented vnto vs, that nature hath limited the life of all men, that Solitarinesse and Liberry made our Princes life lesse pleasing, and did diminish his care to cherish and gouerne it. For the which our wifhes did euery day seeke remedie, and knew not where to hope for them, vntill that the beames of your royall countenance had pierced through the cloudes of our cares, and lightened our eyes with a liuely hope, to see our happines as durable as it is admirable.

For seeing in you so many graces wherewith Nature hath endowed you, admiring that rare beautie wherewith shee hath adorned you, considering that naturall sweetnes wherewith shee hath tempered your royall grauitie, and hearing with our eares the voyce renowned by Fame, which proclaimes the quicknesse of your spirit, the soundnesse

A soundnesse of your Iudgement, the Elegancie of your discourse, and that which doth exceede all the incomparable commendation of your holy and religious disposition: Wee perswade our selues that you are she whom the heauens had appointed by your pleasing company, to mollifie the life of our King, to prolong his dayes by his content, and to make his Raigne perpetuall by the continuance of a great and happie posteritie.

Wee beleue, that you onely are shee vpon earth worthie to make the life of the most triumphant King vpon earth, to rest in your chaste bosome, and that hee aboute all others, did merit to embrace the most vertuous and pleasing Princeesse in his victorious armes.

Whereby wee preface, that we shall soone see a number of goodly Children carrying on their Fore-heads their fathers Valour, their mothers Vertue, the greatnesse and nobilitie of the House of Fraunce, whereunto you are allyed, the happinesse and power of that of Austria, from whence you are issued, and the wisdom of that of Florence in the which you were borne.

To the beleefe of this preface, all things seeme to inuite vs: but chiefly the Heauen and Sea, for that we see plainly at the very arriual of your Maiestie, the Sea full of torments is growne calme, and the Heauen ouercast with Cloudes is cleare, as if they would with a pleasing Skie celebrate with vs the magnificence of your happy reception.

In good time then, O great Queene, are you come vnto our coasts, long may you liue happely in Fraunce, and for France: That the age which we beginne may see you in the end a happie Wife to our King: And future ages may tearme you a happie Mother of Kings. But to heape vp the measure of your glorie, remember, and remember againe, that as you are a great Queene, for that you are married to a great King, euen so you become a charitable mother of children, whose true Father he is.

And therefore beginne to take your share of this Royall care, and seeing that the Subiects happinesse is the true glorie of Princes, foster and increase by your ayde and fauour, the loue and affection which this great King doth naturally beare to the good and ease of his people, to the end they may seele you as a new Starre shining ouer them, carrying them a happie and auspicious influence of all good and plentifull prosperitie.

And wee which seeke no other happinesse in this world but in his seruice, nor honor but in his obedience, and seeing you aduanced with him in his Throne, wee consecrate vnto you all the remainder of our liues, as wee do presently our hearts and affections to remaine for euer your most humble, most faithfull, and most obedient seruants.

This discourse was pleasing vnto the Queene, who by her attention and answer did witness how much shee was pleased there-with. The Princes and Princeesses did commend it, and learned men did admire it.

Hee made the like at Aix, whither the Queene went the seuenteenth of Nouember, from whence shee parted the next day with aboute two thousand horse, and made her entrie on the nineteenth into Auignon, where shee was receiued with greater pompe and magnificence then in any other place: Shee stayed but three dayes at Auignon, and passed to Valence, Roussillon, and Vienne, and came on the Satterday, beeing the second of Decembre, to Guillotiere.

The next day approaching neere vnto Lyons, shee was met by Monsieur de la Guiche the Gouernour, with the Nobilitie of the Towne and Countrey, who hauing done their obedience in the open field, went to horse-backe and conducted her to her lodging. There Raque brought her newes of the King, and presented her in his Maiesties name with the great Royall Collar of inestimable value, the which did beautifie her other ornaments. The next day after shee entred into the towne. They had erected a Theater at La Motte couered with rich Tapistrie, in the midst whereof was a throne for the Queene, where shee receiued the honours, and heard the vowes and prayers, of all the Orders of the Towne. The Chancellor was in this action the townes Interpreter, the which is as much honoured by his birth, as Athens was by the Phocians, and Rome by the Catoes. The Clergie spake standing, all the rest kneeled, except those which spake for the Germaines, Imperiall Townes, Suisses, and Grisons. The Chancellor willed them to do as the rest, and telling them that in this action, Strangers had no priuiledge, and that they should doe as the Princes subiects did, vnder whose lawes they liued. They gaue him to vnderstand, that they were in possession to speake standing: that at the entrie of King Henry the second, they were no otherwise presented, and that the like difficultie happening at the entrie of the King now raigning, in the same Towne, his Maiestie tooke it not ill they should stand vpon these tearmes. The Constable, who thought that an action of that consequence, should not lightly be passed over, nor the truth carelessly and inrespectiue examined, as it happened often in like accidents, hee would bee informed, if at other entries the Suisses and Germaines had bene presented vnto the King in other manner and fashion then the French. The Gouvernour of Lyons reported the truth, wherewith they were satisfied and contented.

The whole Bodie of the Towne protested their obedience and affection at the Queenes feete. Balthazar of Villards President of Lyons wonne much honour, for the grace, grauitie, and eloquence of his Oration. He spake for the Court of Iustice in this manner.

Balthazar of Villards. Oration made to the Queene at Lyons.

Madame, the wonders which God would haue the world see in the birth and progresse of the life and actions of our King, haue bene the effects of his diuine Iustice, to preferue vnto our Soueraigne Prince the lawfull inheritance of Saint Lewis: but that which wee now behold with admiration of this great Alliance, is an assured and infallible testimonie of his diuine bountie, and of that which hee hath decreed for the good of the whole Realme. Time by his accustomed inconstancie, did threaten our happinesse with a great fall, wee did not enioy our quiet, but with feare to loose it: Our prosperities were but Leaues, and our Peace as a Flower. The wofull and lamentable Historie of our fore-past disorders and tumults, did set before our eyes a fearefull image of future miseries: Our goodly dayes were troubled with nights of care, which a violent imagination presented vnto vs. It was the will of God, that for a full reuolution of the happinesse of France, she should haue a second recourse to the most famous Race of the Medicis, to make our Flower-defence not onely flourishing, but fruitfull and abounding in Royall Issue, the sole and true support of an Estate. Doulphins are prefaces of a storme at Sea, but a Royall Daulphine shall be to vs a pawne of the eternitie of our health, and of the assurance and happie confirmation of our quiet. It is the holiest of our good Kings desire, it is the worthy subiect of all good and faithful-hearted French-mens vowes. Your Maiestie hath bene referred by Heauen, to continue the sacred Stemme of our Kings, and to make their succession equal to the continuance of the world. Nature hath infused into your Maiestie all her greatest and richest gifts, to make you the ornament of France, which is the ornament of Europe. Young Eagles are exposted to the Sunne-beames, to trie their naturall generositie, and your Maiestie beeing issued from the Eagle by the mothers side, hath onely been found capable to gaze vpon this Sunne, who with the beames of his Royall vertues, doth not onely lighten France, but all the world. All other eyes haue bene dazeled with the aspect of so great a light, onely yours will indure this shining, and by a sweete reflection, the shadow of your Royall countenance, will raise our hopes to the highest heauen of felicity, and shal make vs see in our dayes the most firme assurances of our peace and quiet. Receiue Madame if you please, the homage which wee yeeld vnto your Maiestie, to whom we offer our hearts as pleasing sacrifices of our most humble obedience.

She stayed 8. dayes at Lyons before she could see the King, demanding euer when he would come, and in this expectation the hours seemed years vnto her. The King after the capitulation of S. Katharins fort, took post and came the 9. of December to Lyons. The Chancellor aduertised her that he should come that day. Beeing at supper a Gentleman came

A came to tell her, that the King was within a quarter of a league of the city, and that with- in lesse then an houre shee should see him. The ioy of this good newes had taken away her appetite to any meate. The King was already entred disguised, and was gotten into the presse among certaine Gentlemen, where he might see and not be scene. After supper he retired into her chamber, & the King entred presently after: the Queene cast herselfe at his Maiesties feete, and hee tooke her vp and imbraced her, where after many kinde imbracings of mutuall loue and respect, the King went to supper. During the which, the King sent the Queene word by the Duchesse of Nemours, that he was come without a bed, hoping that shee would afford him part of hers, which should bee common vnto them from that time: To whom the Queene answered, That shee was come to please and obey his Maiesties will, as his most humble seruant. This being deliuered vnto the King, he vnclathed himselfe and entred into the Queenes chamber, whom he found in bed, and then the Ladies retired. The Cardinal Albbrandino, the Popes Legate, beeing at Chambery, the King sent to inuite him to his marriage, and to come to Lyons with the Duke of Sauoyes Deputies, where they should treat more commodiously then at Chambery. Hee made his entry the sixteenth of the month, where hee was receiued with honors fit for so great a dignity: the Prince Cony and the Duke Montpensier conducted him, going vnder a canopy carried by the Burgeses of the town, the streets were hangd, the inhabitants were in armes, and the Clergy went singing before him: and in this sort hee was conducted to Saint Johns Church. And although the marriage were perfect (the King hauing ratified it by procuracion, and by words of the present which the sayd Legate had receiued, so as there needed no other solemnity) yet would he make his subiects partakers of this publike ioy, appointing the ceremony the Sunday following, the which was celebrated before the Great Alter of Saint Johns Church, whereas the nuptiall blessing was giuen by the Legate to the married couple. After the which a Largesse of peeces of gold and siluer, marked with a special deuice were cast vnto the people. All which performed, they went to the Royal feast in the Archbishops great Hall.

1601. The Kings highness of the queene.

The Cardinals entry into Lyons.

Wee haue said, that in the end of the last yeere, the Cardinall Albbrandino, Legate to his Holinesse, made his entry into Lyons to treat a peace betwixt the King and the Duke of Sauoy. Presently after the ceremony and confirmation of the nuptial blessing of their Maiesties, they beganne the Treaty of this peace: the proposition had bene made at Chambery, but the conclusion was referred and ended at Lyons. The King had made choise among all his counsell of the President Sillery and Ianin, to deliuer his intentions vnto the Legate, who acquainted Arconas and Aymes therewith. First the Dukes Deputies demand peace of the King, in yeelding vp vnto him the Marquisate of Salusses. The King answered, That hee loved warre, but hee had neuer refused peace to them that had demanded it: that seeing the Duke desired peace, and his Holinesse perswaded him to it, for the quiet of Christendome, that hee was content to grant it, so as Duke did yeeld him his Marquisate, and pay him eight hundred thousand crownes which he had disbursed for the warres of Sauoy. The Legate found well by this demand that the peace was not so easie to bee made as hee expected: hee spake vnto the King and told him, That the Duke could not yeeld the Marquisate, and so great a summe of money, but he would giue him all Bresse in exchange: and for all the charges and other his Maiesties pretensions, hee would giue him moreover Bangey, Verromey and other Lands vnto the river of Rhosne. This proposition was accepted by the Kings Deputies, so as they yeelded vp the castles of Centall, Mont and Roque-palmier, which did not belong to the Marquisate, but to the Prouinces of Daulphiné and Prouence. The Deputies sayd, that what they offered was for all pretensions: to whom they answered, That nothing could then be concluded.

Of the peace betwixt the French King and the Duke of Sauoy.

Propositions for the peace.

These things were so wisely handled by the Kings Deputies, as the Dukes Deputies offered besides a part of the Baylyweeke of Gex, a hundred thousand crownes, so as the King did yeeld vp what hee held in Sauoy, especially the castle of Montmelian and Saint Katharins fort, in the same Estate they were. As they were vpon these termes, newes comes comes, that they of Geneva had ruined Saint Catherine's fort, and that with such animosity and diligence, as within two daies after you could scarce discern the forme of it, for this fort was built but of earth. The Legate was wonderfully discontented thereat, and complained saying, That hee would returne to Rome, without doing any thing, seeing they kept not their word with him, that hee reuoked his repunting this demolition as an affront done unto him. The Kings Deputies answered him, That the King had no need of a Peace with the Duke, but for that his Holinesse perswaded him thereunto: that it was a small cause to breake the Treaty of Peace seeing it was but a peece of earth: that the foundation should remaine unto the Duke, the which he might repare when he pleased. The King tooke the Legats words for a renewing of the warre, and gaue leaue to his army, to doe all acts of Hostility, charging the Commanders to stand vpon their gard, to defend and offend, as occasions and meanes should be presented. Wherevpon al displaying of peace, made new enterprises; iudging, that the King would not rest, hauing so great aduantages, they talked of nothing but of scouring of armes, preparing of horses, seeking of money, and to make them ready for a new warre.

The Kings answer to the Ambassadors of Spaine.

Taxis the King of Spaines Ambassadour came vnto the King, to let him vnderstand, That if a peace were not concluded, his Maister should bee forced to enter into this warre, to preserue his Nephewes Estate. To whom the King answered, That hee would line in peace with them that loued peace, but whoeuer should seeke to support the Duke in this unjust warre, hee would make them repent it. That hee would make warre like a Lion against them that played the Foxes with him, and would strike them, that should make but shew to threaten him.

The Dukes Deputies (thinking that the Kings victory was neither absolute nor perfect, so long as Bourg held good) did still temporise, not caring to presse the conclusion of this peace, no further then the extremity of this place did presse them, and in the meane time the Duke should haue leasure to attempt some thing vpon his owne or vpon that which was the Kings. And in truth if Bourg had bene releued, or the conuoy which was in the Franche County had entred, the peace had bene broken. Besides the wants and impatience of the besieged, they without vsed a policy which made them almost desperate: some men chosen for the purpose gaue them to vnderstand, that the Dukes Deputies did prolong things, vpon assurance that the Cittadell might hold good a month, and that they cared not to finish the Treaty, nor to supply the necessities of the besieged, so as this temporising, at what price and perill soeuer, might giue the Duke time to doe his businesse. This did peece so deeply and wrought such an impression in the besieged, as (despighted with the tediousnesse of the Treaty, and wearied with the languishing of the besieged) they resolved not to suffer any more, seeing the Deputies did not consider what they suffered, but how much and how long they might suffer. Vpon this vaine terror they write vnto the Deputies in these termes, My Lords, your protractions and delaies kill vs, the temporising of your Treaty, is preiudiciall to the honor of our master, and the health of his seruants that are in this place: make hast then to finish the peace, for wee cannot hold aboue two daies: it is the prefixed time of our resistance. Beleeue the bearer, who will acquaint you with the rest of our extreme necessity. Attend no other letters from vs, fare ye well &c. Yet they were not so ill as they sayd, but in matter of siege, all failes when as they want patience. This letter with the fearefull report of the horrors and inhumanities which extreame famine caused in the Cittadell of Bourg, awaked the Ambassadors from the slumber, which the ruining of Saint Catherine's fort had held them in.

Bourgs letter to the Dukes Ambassadors.

Vpon these newes they goe vnto the Cardinall, they beseech him, that the ruine of one place (whose foundation remained to the Duke) might not hinder the perfecting of this great building of peace, the which notwithstanding could not bee but necessary, and profitable. The Cardinall who knew that the Duke was much discontented with this demolition, and that the Count Fuertes army was much increased, and their mindes more inclined to warre then peace, and yet being loath to repasse the Alpes, without the glorie to haue quenched this fire, hee sayd vnto the Ambassadors that hee could not

The Treaty renewed.

A not re-enter into the Treaty of peace, if they did not giue it him in writing vnder their hands, that it was their aduice, and that they intreated him to doe it as profitable for the Duke and necessary for his Estate. The Ambassadors being to much amazed with the newes of the extreme wants of the Cittadell of Bourg, fearing it would bee lost before the peace was concluded, the which would impair the bargain, they willingly past this promise.

The Cardinall was still in choller that the demolition of Saint Catherine's fort, should send him backe to Rome, and not carry the Pope that contentment of his Legation which he expected. The King would gladly, the Pope should haue remained satisfied with the sincerity of his actions, but neither his honour nor his humour would suffer him to intreat. Hee therefore thinks it dishonorable to perswade him to peace that hath more need of it then himselfe. Hee is therefore resolved to warre, and seeing that the Legate continued still in his complaints, hee commanded the Marquis of Rhosny to goe to Paris to take order for munitions of warre. Being ready to take horse for the execution of the Kings commandment, he goes to take his leaue of the Legate, and toucheth some things of the cause of his voyage, saying, That it was the Kings resolution to make warre, seeing they could not hold themselves to a peace. That for his part hee was sorry, that so great a personage as himselfe should take the paines to passe the mountaines and bring them so neere vnto the Temple of peace, and not to enter into it: the Legate answered, That hee was much grieved that his Legation and the paine hee had taken prooued fruitlesse: that hee knew well the King in shew desired peace, but in effect warre was his delight.

Rhosny replied, that if peace were good before the demolition of the fort, it was now also good, that this accident did nothing import, seeing the ground was the Dukes, to doe withall what he pleased, and that for fifty thousand crownes hee might build another fort. The Dukes Ambassadors gaue the same reasons, coniuering him not to abandon the ship in this tempest, seeing hee had taken the helme in hand in a calme season. Herevpon the Legate asked Rhosny if he thought the King would bee pleased to recompence this demolition with money. Rhosny answered him, that hee knew nothing, but being a thing reasonable, and the King a Prince of reason, hee presumed that if hee should promise it in his Maiesties name, hee would not faile of his promise. The Legate intreated him to acquaint him with it, saying that hee was sorrie hee had delt so sooner in the businesse. Rhosny tels the King thereof, and returnes his Maiesties intention vnto the Legate, and so with a little moderation they finish this worke of peace. The Articles were drawne and agreed vpon, and the Ambassadors of Sauoy sent for to signe them, they come and tell the Legat in his care that their master had forbidden them to signe, before that he had talked with the Count of Fuentes.

The Legat who would not haue his word giuen vnto the King to remaine vnprofitable, nor send backe the Kings Deputies, or refer the assembly to an other time, intreats them not to make any shew of this charge, but to signe. They answer him that their hands and tongues were bound. The Legate doth presse them, and they intreat him to giue them leaue to conferre with Taxis the Spanish Ambassadour, to the end that their doings might bee countenanced by his councill. They repaire vnto the Oracle, they consult of two letters, the first of the eight of Ianuary, which commanded them to signe the peace, the second of the eleuenth which did forbid them. Taxis (who vnderstood the intents of the councill of Spaine; who knows that a peace is desired, so as the Marquitate might continue on the other side of the Alpes, and that there might bee a passage on this side to goe into Flanders; who weighed the conditions of peace, not by the difficulties of reasons, but by the prosperity of euents, not by the peeces, but by the whole, wherein he findes what his master desired) answereth them. That seeing his highnesse hath commanded you to signe the peace foure daies since, I see nothing happened since, that may bee sufficient or available to reuoke this commandment, nor the word which hee had giuen you to effect it. It is true that I thinke by this last letter, you are bound to stay the time which hee demands to conferre with the Count Fuentes.

Monseigneur de Rhosny renews the treaty of peace.

A peace concluded.

The Sauoy Ambassadors consult with Taxis.

1601.
He perswades them to signe
the peace.

Herevpon arriued the Patriarke of Constantinople, great in perswasions, found in A reasons, profound in counsell, and subtil in inuentions. Hee sheweth them the importance of this breach, the wrong done vnto the King, and the Legats word ingaged. That the Duke writing this letter had not considered that the first was effected, that the Estate of the businesse allowed no countermand, that that which was yesterday voluntary, is this day fastened with nayles of Diamonds to an ineuitable necessity. That the winges of the Dukes hopes were glued with the waxe of his opinions. That resolution the mother of great inconueniences, which had begun his ruine, would finish it: That God was offended with them who reiecte and contemned the conditions of peace that were iust and honorable: that it was a great indiscretion to ingage himselfe in the B perpetuall inconueniences of this warre, vpon foundations that were neither firme nor perpetuall, and to continew a great warre against a mighty enemy, vpon succors which could not be certaine, seeing it depended vpon the wil of another. That a Prince assailed by one more mighty, cannot erre more grossly in his carriage, nor commit a greater fault then to refuse peace, which cannot bee but honorable, seeing it staies the conquerors victory. The Dukes Ambassadors who feared more to erre by disobedience, then by obstinacy, stand firme vpon the necessity of the Dukes command, for the order which a Prince prescribeth to his Ambassador may not be altered. The Patriarke assures them that the Legat, who had authority from their master to command them, and they bound to obey him in all that he should iudge profitable for his affaires, should warrant C them vnder his hand from all blame which they apprehended; that hee would take the paines to goe vnto his highnesse to Thurin, to let him vnderstand that they had done nothing but what hee should haue done himselfe, and that hee would employ all the power his vnkle had, both in heauen, and in earth, to free them from danger. The Ambassadors (who seemed not to will that which they most desired, with such impatience, as the houres seemed yeeres vnto them) were content with this assurance signed by the Legat, and a moneths respite for the Duke to ratifie what they had signed.

The substance of the peace betwixt the King and the Duke of Sa-uoy.

Bourg yeeld-
ed to the King.

So the peace was concluded and proclaymed at Lions the seuenteenth day of Ianuarie, in the yeere 1601. the substance whereof was. That the Duke should yeeld vp and transport wholly vnto the King, and to his successours Kings of France, all the country D and Seigneuries of Bresse, Beauguy and Verromey, and generally all that belongs vnto him, vnto the riuier of Rhosne, to as all the riuier from Geneva should belong to the crowne of France, the which should remaine vnto the King and his successours with all the Soueraignty, iurisdiction and rights which the sayd Duke might haue ouer the said countries, reseruing nothing but the bridge of Gressin for the commodity of the passage: the which is vpon the riuier of Rhosne, betwixt Escluse and the bridge of Arlay, which by this present Treaty belongs vnto the King: and on the other side of the riuier of Rhosne, the Duke should enioy the parishes of Ella, Luyuent, and Cizerre with all the Hamlets and Territories which belong vnto them, betwixt the riuier of Varenne and the mountaine called the Grand Credo, vnto the village called La Riuere, whereas the riuier of Varenne doth passe, with Margrecombe, vnto the nereft entry into the county of Bourgongne, vpon condition that the Duke should not leauy any impositions vpon the goods and marchandise, nor any tolle vpon the riuier at Pont de Gressin, or any other places before mentioned. Moreover the Duke might not build any fort vpon any place that was reserued for the passage, but should remaine free as well for the Kings subiects, as for al that would go or come into France, and the soldiers which shal passe through the Kings country, for the Dukes seruice, or any other Prince, by the suffrage of his Gouvernours and Lieutenants generall, shall no way annoy his Maiesties subiects. And for the effecting of that aboue mentioned, the Duke should deliuer vnto the King E (or to any one deputed by him) the Cittadell of Bourg, as it then was, without any demolition, and all the Artillery, Poulder, Bullets and munition of warre, which shal be in the place at the yeelding thereof. Moreover the Duke did passe ouer vnto the King on the other side of the riuier of Rhosne, the places & villages of Aux, Chouffy, Vulley, Pont D' Arley, Cessell, Chancey and Pierre Chastel with all the soueraignty & iurisdiction he might 1601.

A might haue ouer those places, and the Inhabitants thereof. The sayd Duke did also transport and resigne vnto the King, the Barony and Baylywike of Getz, with all the appurtenances, as the Duke and his Predecessors had formerly enioyed it, without any retention. All which places and things yeilded and resigned, should remaine vnited and incorporated to the crowne of France, and should bee reputed the patrimony of the crowne, and might not be seperated for any cause whatsoeuer. Also it was agreed that the sayd Duke should truly and effectually restore vnto the King, or to any one deputed by his Maiefty, the place, towne and Chastelleny of castle Daulphin, with the Tower of Pont, and all that hath beene held by the Duke, or any of his, depending of Daulphiné, in the same Estate they then were in, without any demolition or ruine, leauing in the sayd places, all the Artillery, Poulder, Bullets and munition of warre which were then in the sayd places, the souldiars carrying away such goods as belonged vnto them, without exacting any thing of the Inhabitants. It was also agreed that the sayd Duke should demantell the fort of Beche Daulphin, the which was built during warre, and should pay for the passage reserued, a hundred thousand crownes in the city of Lions, fifty thousand ready down, when as the fort of Charbonnieres should bee yeilded vp, and other fifty thousand within six moneths after.

And in regard of the sayd cession and resignation, the King should be contented (for the good of peace) to quit and resigne vnto the Duke, his heires and successours, all the rights and pretensions which hee or the Daulphins of France had, or might haue to the Marquisate of Saluces, and all the dependances, with the townes of Cental, Mons and Roque-speruier, without retrayning any thing: leauing vnto the Duke all the Artillery, Poulder, Bullets and munition for warre, which were in the sayd places, in the yeere 1598. The King did also promise to restore vnto the Duke (or to any one that should bee deputed by him) all places that had beene taken since the yeere of our Lord 1588. from the sayd Duke, and now held by his Maiefty or his seruants, all in the same Estate they then were, and without any demolition, and in restoring of the say places, the King might transport all the Artillery, Poulder, Bullets and munition of warre that was in them, and all the goods that belonged vnto the souldiars, not exacting any thing of D the Inhabitants.

These were the chiefe points of the Treaty of peace, the which was signed by the Legat and the Deputies, and thanks giuen vnto God. The King holding his abode at Lions (after this conclusion) to bee vnprofitable, takes post and goes to Paris. The Legate goes to Auignon by the riuier of Rhosne. The King left the Constable, Villeroi and the Deputies at Lions for performance of the Treaty. At the same time Herminio was dispatched to carry newes vnto the Pope, and in passing to the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count Fuentes, he found them both at Some vpon Po to consult of the means which the Duke of Biron propounded vnto them, to resolute vpon warre rather then peace. The Duke receiues it as the most ruinous effect of all his aduentures, swearing that hee would cut off his Ambassadors heads that had signed it. The Count Fuentes E sayd that hee had not to doe with this peace, hauing so many iust occasions and such good meanes to make warre, that hee would not let forty thousand men, and forty peeces of canon remaine idle. Both seemed discontented, the one for that the King, or the King of Spaine had all the benefit of the peace; and the other for that his master should haue neede of him by the warre, and hee should keepe Piedmont in awe. The Duke complained that the counsell of Spaine had kindled a warre to consume him: they had thrust him into a storme, to make profit of his ship-wracke, and had drawne him to a preiudiciall exchange, reaping no benefit, for that the French were out of Italy, hauing them neerer neighbours in another place, nor that Milan should bee couered, or that Italy should haue the Alpes to guard it from the inundations which it had receiued in former times by the forces of France, seeing this rampart was made with the weakening of his Estates. The Count of Fuentes fore-seeing wherevnto these complaints F did tend, gaue the Duke to vnderstand, that the King of Spaine his master, had reason to complaine of this great and fruitlesse charge, being a troublesome thing to enter-

In this contention they resolute, not to signe any thing without the King of Spaines commandment, and to keepe the army still ready to march, to make himselfe to be more feared, and to be more assured. The Kings Deputies beeing aduertised that the Duke made no care to confirme what had bene concluded, they aduertised the King thereof, and sent a post vnto the Legat, being at Anignon, to know his opinion thereof. The King commands them to attend the Dukes resolution, without impatience, beeing indifferent vnto him which he made choise of, but hee should shew a weake iudgement, if hee should accept of any but of peace; for that he should not of a long time recouer that by warre, which peace should now presently bring him. The Legat was so moued with this alarum, as hee presently tooke post to goe vnto the Duke, sending Count Ottavio Tazzoni to the King, to aduertise him of his voyage; and to beseech him not to enter into any distrust of the Treaty, being so greatly interested in the obseruation thereof, as he could no longer endure this brute and suspence with patience: and that hee would be pleased to grant a prolongation of the truce and a suspension of armes for fiftene daies, besides the time limited for the ratification: Such as knew not the negotiation betwixt the Duke of Sauoy, the Count Fuertes, and the Marshall Biron, could not beleue that the Duke of Sauoy would make any difficulty to signe the Treaty, but that hee made some shew of it to haue it seeme the better. For those that were interested with him in the Treaty, did not promise to returne any more vnto the warre. It is true, that if the Duke of Biron would haue taken the Cittadell of Bourg, as the Duke would haue deliuered it vnto him, the King must haue returned with as great speed to Lions as he departed. In the meane time the Legat past all passages by post in a troublesome time, and came to Genoa, from whence hee sent to the Duke, and Count Fuertes to keepe their word with him. The Duke hearing of his arriuall at Alexandria, partes from Nice, and goes to Thurin, and both of them excuse themselves. The Count made his refusall, to take from the Duke all subiect of complaint, that they had abandoned him, and that he had means to recouer his Estates, if they had assisted him. The Duke would be recompenced for this vnequall exchange before he signed by the King of Spaine. So the Legat receiues nothing from the one but complaints, and from the other but respects, and from both words of contempt against the Treaty. Hee met with the Count Fuertes at Tortoul, and from thence went to Milan, where hee past the Shroue-tide: The Count Fuertes omitting no kind of recreation to driue away melancholy, attending the Duke of Sauoys resolution, who sent to excuse himselfe by the indisposition of his children, and promised to come to Milan, but comming not, the Legat and the Earle went to Pavia, with an opinion that the Duke would come thether. The Legat sends Tazzoni vnto him, E who returnes with excuses of his sonnes ticknesse, and his complaints of the vniust and preiudiciall conditions wherevnto he was bound.

The Legat sends backe Tazzoni to the Count Fuertes, giuing him to vnderstand that hee knew well that his legation had not bene vndertaken, but for the seruice of the King of Spaine, at the intreaty of the Duke of Sessia his Ambassador: that hee was not come for the Duke of Sauoy who mockt him, and considered not that hee had done more for him then father or mother; that hee cared not for his ratification, and much lesse to see him, or to thanke him for his paines: that he excused his affection in the infirmity of his sonne, but if he thought that hee would attend to proceed vntill that hee were cured, hee was deceiued. The Count Fuertes answeres that the effect of the Treaty depends not vpon his signing, and that hee must not send vnto him to effect it. The Legat to cut off these temporisings and delaies, and to discover where the fault was, that the peace was not signed, aduised himselfe of a subtilty, worthy of a Romaine, and of a Cardinall. Hee commands the Count Tazzoni to say vnto the Count Fuertes, that

The Legat aduertised the Duke refused to signe the peace.

The King grants a prolongation of the truce. The Duke of Biron retueth the Cittadell of Bourg, beeing vnfurnished of victuals and munition.

The Count of Fuertes excuse.

A that he was aduertised from the Duke, that all the difficulties in this businesse were framed by the Count, who restrayned the Dukes liberty, in the signing and execution of the Treaty.

Hee had scarce entred into this discourse, when as the Count Fuertes (full of choller that all the blame should be layd vpon him) went to horse, and came vnto the Legat, to whome he discovered all the secret betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and him. Many daies are spent in going and comming. In the end the King of Spaine, who desired to begin his raigne by war, would haue no peace, but vanquished by the perswasions of the Duke of Lerma, who thought peace to be more profitable for his condition, hoping to gouerne his Maister more freely in the delights of peace, then in troubles of warre, sent vnto the Count Fuertes, that seeing they restored vnto the Duke of Sauoy his Countrey, and that he might keepe the Marquisate of Saluces, he would imploy his forces elsewhere, and confirme the treaty of Lions. The Duke is forced to follow this course, there is no more army for him. There was one complement yet remayning. The Duke was delicious to see the Legat: the paines which hee had taken deferred this view and thanks. The Legat went to goe speedily to Rome.

The Duke imbarques vpon the riuer of Po, to goe visit him, and sends a Post to aduertise him of the hower of his imbarking. Here was an accident that had almost spoyled all. This messenger reports vnto the Duke that he had met the Legat, and the Count Fuertes in Carosse together vpon the way, who returned when as hee aduertised them of his comming. The Duke discontented with this returne, sends them word that hee was gone backe. The Legat enters presently into a small barke, followes after, and overtakes him, whereas the riuer of Tesin enters into Po. The Duke being aduertised, turnes head and ioynes with him. They strue who shall enter into the others boate, but the Duke leapes into the Legates, and sits downe by him: they spent some words in complements, before they entred into the treaty of peace. The Legat protested that in all this negotiation, he had nothing else in his thought, but the good of his highnesse estate, but hee was incountried with so many difficulties, & necessities, which ouer-ruled his affection, as hee was forced to preferre profitable and necessary things, before that which was goodly in shew. The Duke thanked him for the paine he had taken, but so coldly, as the Legat found well, that he held not himselfe beholding to him. The one tooke his way to Thurin, and the other to Pavia, and so to passe to Rome. The Duke had signed, but he was not yet well resolved to obserue the peace. The feare least Bourg should be lost before the conclusion of the treaty, made his Ambassadors to resolute: the Assurance which Bouuens now gaue the Duke, that he would incounter all extremities, both of famine and force, made him vnwilling to performe the treaty, sending Bely his Chancellor to Rome, to make his excuse, that he signed it not. The Pope tooke it ill, that a Chancellor, a man of peace, should intreat him to vndoe that which the Legat his Nephew had done, and sent him backe with his answer. But for all this the Duke seeks to smother this peace in the cradell, and grounds his last hope vpon Bouuens, to whome he sends the countersigne, without the which he was bound not to yeeld it. This token was but counterfet. D'Hostel played an other part, he made this his colour, to haue meanes to enter into the Cittadell, and to giue this countersigne to Bouuens for his warrant; and therby to assure him that if he had meanes to hold good a moneth, he should disclame the signing of the ratification, and make a shew of disobedience, and he should be releued. D'Hostel went into the Cittadell, and found that misery would not suffer them to vnt of resistance as they had done, that things were no more in the Estate that Bouuens had represented them; and that their necessities were so extreame, as there was no meanes to suffer them any longer, being prest without by the Kings army, and with-in by cold and hunger, which made the Duke more tractable to yeeld that which hee could not hold, sending the ratification in the beginning of March, and at the same time the Cittadell was deliuered into the Kings power.

The generall censures of this peace were diuers. The King was pleased that the profit was apparant, and assured for his Estates: hauing for one Marquisate, more Earles and Marquises 1601. Marquises, then there are Gentlemen in the Marquifate of Saluces, inlarging his frontiers about thirty leagues, and so restrained the Dukes estate on this side the mountaines, as he hath left two third partes, lost eight hundred Gentlemen, and a fort which he himselfe (writing vnto Bourneis) esteemed more then all the Marquifate, with Prouinces as fertill as any be in France. It is true that the Honour to keepe that which was the cause of the warre remayned to the Duke, and by this meanes of a peace hee hath no more neede of Spaniards nor of the Count of Fuentes, who did him alwaies some Spanish affront, and is free from all feare of the French, who kept Piedmont in awe while they had a retreat there. The Duke who neuer went out of the gates of Thurin without six Companies of horse for his gard, and entertayned Garrisons which cost him more then the reuenues of the Countries exchanged, may now sleepe, and goe and come in safety. This Moneth of March Louise of Lorraine, Dowager of France, Widow to Henry the third King of France and Poland died: her death was better knowne by the losse of such a light, then by the mourning of her Heires, or the Honour of her Funeralls, for the Duke of Mercure her Brother to whome she left her goods and the execution of her will was then in Hungary. The Duchesse of Mercure attended on her vntill she died, and layed her body in the Couent of S. Claire, vntill she might be enterred with greater pompe. She desired to be layed in one Tombe with the King, whose body attendes vntill that the piety of the liuing, may remember the condition of the dead, the which giues cause of amazement, that the Earth which neuer sayles for the life of Princes, should now want for their interment.

The desire of this Princeesse was not performed, although the will of the dead ought to be religiously obserued, the best part of her life had bin a troublesome carier of affliction, more fertill in thornes then in Roses: but it is the way of Heauen, which hath bene beaten by all the happy, and there is noe reason to make a new for them that came last, how great and mighty soeuer they be. King Henry the 3 going into Poland saw her so fayre, as at his returne (when as death had made him forget the Princeesse of Conde, in whose remembrance he did sometimes forget the greatnesse & grauity of a king) he remembered her, and by the aduise of the Duchesse of Lorraine his Sister, who saide that there was not any woman in the world more fit for his humor then this Princeesse, he demanded her, and had her to wife. Gast was sent vnto her, and found her comming from Saint Nicholas, whether shee had gone in Pilgrimage on foote. The Queene of Nauarre did much disswade this Alliance, apprehending to march after a daughter to the Earle of vaudemont: for this cause the king would not haue her go on day after her who should thinke her selfe honored the next day to be the first after her; so as there was noe intermission betwixt her comming, making sure and marriage. Sixe weekes after her marriage they found her to be with child, but soone after shee had a mischance, and had a false birth being a Sonne. This caused her to haue a laundise for a time, and an indisposition for euer, which made the King and realme out of hope to see her a Mother. This barrennesse made the Queenes life barren of all content. It is true that the three or foure first yeares were spent in all delights. The King made no voyage without her noe feast where she was not; he could not be to any other being wholly to her, his delights were vnto her desires. Before his marriage he had loued Chasteau-neuf one of the Queene-Mothers maydes, the fire had bene so violent as the ashes were yet hotte, and had bene sufficient to kindle a new flame, if the Queenes wisdom had not caused them to be cast into the winde, when this great beauty appeared the rest lost much of their light. The Queene was somewhat troubled: but when as the Queene-Mother told her that shee had indured much more, her grieue was somewhat allwaged though not altogether taken away. She dessembled vntill that she saw this virgin come one day to daunce attired, by emulation, like her selfe, at what time she tould the Queene Mother that shee could indure it no longer: she who loued her dearly, wrought so as this Star was eclipsed, and appeared no more, she left the Kings hart, as well as the court, and in dispiight married at her owne will.

This Princeesse who had neuer bene bred vp but in her Fathers Court, grew sodenly very

A very skilfull in all the complements of Court. The King instructed her himselfe in all the perfections which the world admires. Neuer Queene before her did better vnderstand what did belong to Queenes. She had past through all the honours which are due to Kings Wiues. She was crowned Queene, she had set twice in the assembly of the Estates of the realme: She receiued all sorts of Ambassadors, with more or lesse respect, according vnto the dignity of the Prince from whence they were sent, and shewed in her discourse wisdom, gouernment, and much iudgement. She wone the Queene-Mothers heart so absolutely as none but she did possesse it; there was such a conformity betwixt them, as what pleased the one could not displease the other. There was also a great intelligence betwixt her and the Duke of Alançon, who honored her as much as if hee had bene farre inferior vnto her: It was thought that if the King had died vpon a disease in his care, whereof the Physicians where in some doubt, hee would haue married her, vnlesse the Pope had denied a dispensation. Also when hee was dead, it seemed she would no more vse her eyes but to weepe. They held her to be very disdainefull, neither did she regard the Princes and Princeesses of the blood as she ought, louing none but them of her owne house. The Kings great heat of loue began to grow cold. His hart was like a tree planred on the high way, whose fruite is free for all passengers: He committed much excessse and gaue him-selfe to the pleasures of the Court, which did then abound: hee was not pleased to see her richly attired, nor to be seene in companies. Hee made two voyages to Lyons without her, his nature still affecting new things. She who loued the Princes of her house, and was greeued to see them sequestred from the Kings fauours, which the Dukes of Joyeuse and Espernon did wholly inioy. They were all in court, and did possesse the Kings heart absolutely. Then she began to take the course of Piety and deuotion, which she had rather discontinued then forgotten, hauing sucked deuotion from the bosome of piety. The king on the other side began to frequent reformed Cloysters. She was rather seene in Churches then at the Loure. This Sphere of deuotion did alwaies turne, neither could any occasion either within or without the Court stay the course thereof. She began to neglect that great beauty, which at her coming had made her amiable, and admirable, and gaue her the price of all the beauties of the West. The Roses and the Lillies of her liuely hewe were withered, more through the rigor of affliction then for age. And though the Kings affections were much diminished, yet they had neuer but one bed, neither did they lie a sunder but fixe or seuen moneths, by the aduise of the Physicians, vpon an infirmity of the Kings which was contagious. She was much afflicted for the death of the duke of Guise, from which time afflictions neuer left her, for presently after followed that great insurrection of all the townes in France, the which wasted the Kings treasure, and reduced him to necessities that were vknowne, and incredible, shee was forced to send all her maides of honor to their houses, shee remayned alone with foure Ladies, with the which she retired to Chenonceau after the Kings departure from Tours to beseege Paris. There shee had newes that a Monke had hurt the King at Saint Cloud, and resolved to goe and see him; but she was carried backe to Chenonceau whereas the Earle of Fiesque and then Dinet her Preacher told her that the King was dead, the newes of his wounding had already prepared her to this accident, for as soone as the King was hurt, hee wrote these few words vnto her with a trembling and dying hand. My friend you haue heard how I haue bene miserably hurt, I hope it wilbe nothing, pray to God for me, farwell my friend. Not-with-standing vpon the newes of his Death she fell downe in a fount, and then began to die in this death. She caused foure of her maides of Honor to returne, who found a wonderful alteration betwixt the visage of the Loure and that of Chenonceau: for the necessities were so extreme, as most of them liued of their owne purses. She had no dowry, and the liberal-ty she receiued from the King was lesse then her necessity: hee was much wronged by her during the raigne of the deceased King. She could not dissemble the hatred she bare him when he was at Tours, where she shewed him so cold a countenance, & gaue him so bad a reception, as foreseeing the mildnes of his nature, he said that he would thinke of it, and that she should repent it. But being king of France hee would not reuenge the wronges done unto the King of Nauarre, no more then Lewis the 12. would those of A the Duke of Orleans: for he releued her necessities as much as his affaires would permit him, and gaue her after the death of Queene Elizabeth the dowry which shee inioyed, and had giuen her more but for the Dutcheſſe of Beaufort, who loued her not, for that they had reported some words of contempt which she had vsed on her. She bore a singular affection to the Princes of her house. And although that friendships grounded vpon vertue are better then those which grow from nature, as being more voluntary, yet she did not esteeme any friendship but that of her own blood: which made them say that she had intelligence with the Princes of her house against the King: but she shewed that her actions were free from it, refusing to see any of them after the death of the King her husband, for the which shee was so afflicted, as the violence of her hearts griefe did ruine the vigour of her body, by a continuall defluxion vpon her lights, and coldnesse of her braine. She could neuer vse the soueraine remedy of the most inuerrate vicers of the mind, forgetfulnesse: she alwaies represented vnto her selfe, how she could possibly liue, seeing the spirit of her life was dead; for euen then shee began to die, all the rest of her life was but torment and languishing. She went to the King to Mantes, where after she had implored iustice, alwaies assisting at the throne of God, she cast her selfe at the Kings feete to haue a Iult and lawfull reuenge for the death of the King her Lord. Du Buisson of the cheefe of her counsell made a learned and eloquent speech touching the iust affliction of this Princeſſe. La Gueſſe the Kings Proctor made another able to moue the hearts of the most barbarous Scythizans. After the end of the Kings masse, when as this Princeſſe heard the Psalm which the deceased King did vsually cause to be songe, C her griefe renewed with such violence as they held her for dead. The King ran to helpe her, and kneeled downe to lift her vp. All the time of her widowhood which was spent at Chenonceau, & at Molins, was rather the life of a priuat Lady then of a Queene or of a religious woman then of a widow. The best part of the day was employed in prayer, and that which remayed after the howers of eating, and of Buisines where spent for some workes for the decoration of alters, there being few Churches in France where she hath not sent of her worke. And although she were often visited by Princes, Princeſſes and great noble men, yet she neuer neglected one minuit of her deuotion. To conclud she was a sweet vessell of piety, and as a viol full of excellent Balme, or some Odoriferous lyquor, whilst it is whole it giues noe sent but to them that are neare it, but being broken it delights them that are farre of. So this vessell of most Odoriferous vertue, beeing broken by death, hath powered forth her sweete sents ouer all the Earth.

The same yeare also, Madam Francis of Orleans, Princeſſe of Conde, Mother to the Count of Soissons, died in her house of Grenelles at Paris, the Funerall Pompe was celebrated in the Abbey of Saint Germain des pres. About the end of this yeare the Princeſſe of Condy died of a great and languishing sicknesse, as shee went to her house at Bonnestable in Perche, to change the aire by the aduice of her Physicians, but she changed her life, leauing one onely Daughter, the which the Count of Soissons married. Afterwards the Dutcheſſe of Eguillon died, being Daughter to the Duke of Nevers deceased, who left great cause of Mourning to the Duke of Esquillon, eldest Sonne E to the Duke of Maine, and the rather for that she died in child-bed, and the child also with her. The King in fourty daies had conquered all Sauoy, with in fourty after he married, treated of a peace, made the Queene in case to be a Mother, went in post from Lyons and came to Paris, who bare his long absence impatiently. His returne gaue the world to vnderstand how quiet and constant the affaires of France were, that a King which went a hundred Leagues with twelue onely in his traine, was well assured of his subjects, and feared not his neighbours.

The Queene followed by small iornies, and came to Fontainebleau, where shee staid not long, but came to Parris about S. Germaines fayre, her first lodging was at Gondies house her first Gentleman of Honnor, being in the suburbs of S. Germaine. The next was at Zamets, superintendant of her house, and then she came to the Louvre. The Parisiens

A Parisiens prepared them-selues and besought the King to giue them leaue to make her a stately entry: but his Maieſty would haue the charges of this entry referued for a more durable worke. All the Princes of the blood, with the chiefe Ladies of the Court and Citty presented them-selues to kisse her hands, and to do their duties vnto her Maieſty. She made much of all them that the King fauored, and resolved to loue what he loued, framing her will in such sort vnto his, as she held his will for an vnwritten Law.

This yeare the Pope granted a Tubile and pardons to all the French that should goe visit the Church of Saint Croix in Orleans, doing the workes of Christian charity. An infinite number of people went thither from all parts of France, the King and Queene went thither with the first, and gaue meanes to helpe to build this Church, which had bin ruined during the fury of the first ciuill warres. The King layd the first stone of this building. An act worthy of a Christian King, the true successor of the piety of Saint Lewis his Predecessor. But whilst he gaines pardons, his enemies watch to surprize the best places of his realme. He was disarmed vnder the assurance of the Peace. The army of strangers was still whole together, and became fearefull to all Italy. All the Princes were troubled thereat, and although they be not well vnited together, yet when there is any question of danger, they haue good correspondency. At Rome they said it was for Geneva, and that the Marquise of Aix was gone to intreate the Pope to fauour him with his blessing, and to fortifie him with his meanes. Many other discourses were made touching this army, but time discovered that it was entayned for Marceilles. There is nothing so holy, but mony will violate, nor so strong but it will force. The Count of Fuentes vpon promise of great recompence, had practised an enterprize very easie to execute, if the bargaine had held. It was a doing during the treaty of Peace with the Duke of Sauoy, who sent Don Sanchio de Salina to Milan to the Count of Fuentes, with two of them which made this snatch, whereof the one gaue aduice to the President Du Vair. He which had promised to deliuer the tower of the Port for an entry to the enemy, discovered him-selſe to the Duke of Guise. La Goye (a gentleman of Prouence) was sent vnto the King, to beseech him to giue him leaue to encounter them with the like practise. The King who desires not to gaine by trechery, said that hee was content to keepe his owne, and to let the world know who did first trouble the peace. At that time another enterprize was discovered vpon the towne of Metz. The King sent the President Janin thither, the accused were brought to the prison of the Pallace at Parris. The proofes being weak, some were enlarged, vpon condition they should appeare when they were called for, his maieſty commanding they should informe more amply against the rest, banishing two from the townes of Metz, Thoul and Verdun. This great army finding no employment in France, made worke for the hangman in Italy, by the discovery of many conspiracies.

Rocheport being Ambassador in Spaine, certaine French Gentlemen (among the which his Nephew was) had a quarrell with some Spaniards, who did iniury them, and cast their Clothes into the water, they being a swimming. The Spaniards had the worst, and some were hurt and slaine. Their kinsmen demanded iustice of the King, (who commanded his officers to doe it) but the Ambassadors lodging was forced, and the Gentlemen drawne forth to prison, notwithstanding any thing that he could say or doe to maintaine the liberty of his place, the which is inuolable euen among enemies. The King was so offended with this iniury, as he commanded his Ambassador to returne, giuing the King of Spaine to vnderstand, that he assured himselfe, that hee would do him reason, when he had well considered what cause he had to complaine. Wherevpon all Trafficke was forbidden betwixt these two Realmes. The Pope fearing that this violence done vnto the Ambassador of France, could not passe without some feeling, and that this Coale might kindle the fire of Warre betwixt these two great Kings: hee sent into Spaine to haue the prisoners, the which were sent vnto him: and the Pope deliuered them presently vnto the Lord of Betunes the Kings Ambassador at Rome; and so the Peace was continued.

The Ambassadors of Venice were better intreated in France. That great and wise

Senate holding themselves bound by the lawes of friendship, to deplore the misfortune, A and to reioyce at the prosperitie of their friends, hauing beene long troubled for the afflictions of France, they send a great and solempne Ambassage to congratulate the frute of the Kings victories, and the beginning of his Marriage. The Ambassadors were chosen out of the Procurators of Saint Marke, and of the cheife men of the State. They came to Paris, the King sent the Marquis of Rhosny to conduct them to Fontainebleau, and to intreat them, to bee contented with their reception in that place whereas the Queene was, seeing their Ambassage was common to both, and that for the indisposition of her greatnesse, it could not be at Paris; which occasion did renew the ioyes of the Court, the which was in so great Tranquillity as it seemed neuer to haue beene in trouble. The Great Turke sent Bartholomeo de Cueur his Physitian vnto the King, to acquaint him with the Estate of his affayres, and to intreat him to mediate a truce in Hungary. When as this man spake of the Turkes power, he did so extoll it, as if he had beene able to vanquish all the Princes of Christendome, not excepting Pope nor Emperor, so as the King of France did not meddle in it. He presented a Dagger and a Gymliter vnto the Kings Maiesty, whereof the Hilts and Scabberds were of Gold, garnished with Rubies, and a Plume of Herons feathers. The King related vnto him what he had done in Sauoy, and complained that (to the preiudice of ancient Capitulations) not onely the English were distracted from the Banner of France, (vnder whose gard and protection they were bound to trafficke) but also the Flemings, Hollanders and Zelanders were comprehended vnder the Banner of England. To this complaint he added an other, against the courtes and violencies of the Pirates of Algier, and the Coast of Barbary, saying that if the Iustice of the great Turke, did not cause these Piracies to cease he should haue no reason to beleue his friendship.

The order of Recollets.

At this time there sprong vp Religious men in France, who said they were true obseruers of the order of S. Francis, and that the Franciscans and Capuchins did not maintaine it so exactly, but they needed reformation. The King gaue them a Couent at Beaufort, and by the example of this piety many other places desired it. They would lodge at Balmette neere vnto Angers, the which had beene founded by Rene King of Sicillia. The Franciscans (who could not indure to be dispossessed by these Recolets) be-seeged them, offered to force their Gates, and to scale their Walles. The besegged defended not them-selues with words and exorcismes, but with stones, and in such choller, as if the people had not come, the scandall had not ended without Murder.
The Prouinciall seeing that the Recolets would not receiue him, and that the Bishoppe would not suffer him to vse force, appealed, as from an abuse of their establishment.
The Recolets shew vnto the Court, that they are the true Children and Disciples of Saint Francis, liuing according to the Rule and Discipline that was obserued in Italy, from whence the good Precepts of the Reformation of Regulars were drawne, that if those of the Famely of Obseruance, and of Capuchins were tollerated and honoured in France, they should be of noe worse condition. This cause was the argument of a famous pleading in the Court Parliament, in the which Servius the Kings Aduocate said; That a Reformation was necessary not onely in the Order of the Franciscans or Gray-Friars, but also in all others, but they must be careful, not to transforme by Nouties, in steed of Reforming by Censures, alledging many reasons against the bringing in of new Orders.

A great

ment.

The King goes to Calais.

The Count
Sors sent vnto
the King.

Where-vpon the Court pronounced that there was abuse, and restored the Ancient Religious to the Couent of Balmette, forbidding all religious Men of the Order of Gray-Friars, to goe out off the Realme, without licence from the King or their Superiors. Iealous and distrustfull heads gaue it out, that the Peace was in weak estate, when as after the iniury done vnto Rochepos in Spaine, and the forbidding of Traf-ficke, they see the King gonne sodenly to Calais, and that from thence hee had sent the Duke Biron into England. The Arch-Dukes tooke a sodaine Alarum, and to that end sent the Count Sors vnto the King, to deliuer vnto him the state of the Seege of Ostend, and to beseech him not to suffer that their enemies should thinke that these

A these approaches should be to their aduantage, and that their rebellion should be fauoured by an example so hatefull to all Princes. The King sent the Duke of Esquillon to visit them, and to assure them that his intention was not to trouble the Peace, but onely to visit his Fronter, and to provide for the fortifications. They did not generally beleue this, for although he made this Voyage in Post, many thought that he would imbrace this occasion of the siege of Ostend, and all the Court followed him, as to some great Exploite. And for that he would not haue the world in suspence of his desseignes, he gaue the Gouernours of his Prouinces to vnderstand that the cause of his going to Calais was but to visit his frontier, and to provide for that which should bee necessary to assure it, not from present dangers, but from those that might happen.
He declared also that he had no other desseigne, then the preferuation of Peace with-all his neighbours, to enioy that which God had giuen him. But there were other practises which could not be dispersed but by the Kings presence.

1601.
The Duke of Esquillon sent to the Arch-dukes.

The Queene of England sent Sir Thomas Edmonds to visit the King, and the King returned her the like by the Duke of Biron. Hee went accompanied with a hundred and fifty Gentlemen. The Count of Auvergne was there as vnkowne, but his quality discouered him. There was nothing omitted that might be for the reception of an Ambassador, & somewhat more. Being at London many Noblemen receiued him, and accompanied him to Basing, where he rested a day or two before he did see the Queene, who made him knowe that she was honoured by her Subiects above other Princes. A Prince should loofe no occasion to let Strangers see the greatnesse of his Estate, to giue them cause to admire him, and to maintaine his Subiects in the dutie which they owe him. The Queene of England who hath made good prooffe that Women may raigne, as well and as happily as Men, obserues this better then any Prince of her age, making all them that followed the Duke of Biron in this Legation, to giue the like Iudgement.

The Duke of Biron sent into England.

The Queene beeing set in State, all the French Gentlemen entred first, but when as she discovered the Duke of Biron, whom she knew by the discription they had made of his Face and stature, she spake with a loud voyce; "Ha Monsieur de Biron, how haue you takē the paines to come & see a poore old Woman, who hath nothing more lyuing in her, then the affection she beares vnto the King, and her perfect iudgement to know his good Seruants, and to esteeme Knights of your fort. As she spake this, the Duke made a low reuerence, and the Queene rose from her Chaire to imbrace him, to whom he deliuered the charge he had from the King, and withall his Maiesties Letters the which she read. She thanked the King for his remembrance of her: but she said she could not conceale, that as there was nothing vnto a heart (like vnto hers) full of affection and desire more pleasing, then to see and heare what it desired, so could she not but feele an extreame torment, to see her selfe depriued of the sight and presence of the object which shee had most desired, whose actions she esteemed not onely immortall but diuine, being ignorant whether shee should more enuy his Fortune, then loue his Vertue and admire his Merits; so much the one and the other did exceed the greatest maruailes in the world. That she could not say that a courage which feared nothing but the falling of the Pillers of Heauen, should feare the Sea, or not trust vnto it for a passage of feuen or eight houres, blaming them rather which had not instructed him as well to contemne the Wauers of the Sea, as the desseignes of his enemies vpon the Land. From these speeches, she fell into some bitterness of Complaints, which she de-liuered with a little vehemency, saying: that after she had succored this Prince with her Forces, purse, and meanes, and if she could haue done it with her own blood, and had as much desired the happy successe of his affayres as him-sel'e, and the ruine of his enemies more then him-sel'e, they made no accompt of her, forcing her to thinke that the loue they bare her was but for the hope of commodities they might draw from her, the which being dried vp, all affection was cold. That they had sought her in the torment to forget her when the time was calme. That they preferred new friendship before the old, wisdom before Iustice, and profit before reason. And for a signe of inhumanity, they

 she continued her discourse in softer and milder termes. There she gaue her hand vnto all the Gentlemen which the Duke of Biron presented vnto her: among them all she nored Creguy to be sonne in Law to l'Esduquieres. She commanded him to approch neere vnto her when all had done, to whome she declared what esteeme shee would make of him for his sake, whom shee held to be without peere, saying; That if there were two l'Esduquieres in France, she would demand one of them of the King her brother. Creguy answered; That he would thinke himselfe happy, if by the Kings commandement any occasion were offered worthy of her seruice, to witnesse vnto her Ma-iesty that he did partake in the desire which his Father-in-law had alwaies had, to giue her some prooffe of his affection, and that he would alwaies carry himselfe so insect, seeing he could not be present but in desire, the Kings seruice binding him to re-maine elswhere. To whom the Queene said; That she did accept of his good will, and wished him to remember. The Duke of Biron receiued all the honours of the Queene and State, that might be giuen to so great a Personage, the particularities whereof I omit for breuities sake. Hauing finished his Legation, hee tooke his leaue of the Queene, to whom she gaue a great present, & so dismissed him with very gracious speeches. He found not the King at Calais at his returne, who was gone backe to Fontain-bleau against the Queenes lying down, where he had left her, and the Duchesse of Bar with her. All France attended the Fruit of this birth, as the full of their Felicities, assuring themselves, that by the birth of a Daulphin, they should finde all that which fore-passed ages, and that which was to come, could desire. Ten dayes before his birth, the Earth quaked in many parts of Europe. The great Duchesse who desired greatly to be neere the Queene; sent her a rich Cradle, exquisitely made at Florence, hoping it should serue for a Daulphin (for she would not haue giuen it with so good a will for an other Sexe) intreating the Gouvernour of Lions, by her Letters, to fauour the passage, and his dilligence that had charge of it, to the end that he might arriue in time, and not to suffer any to open the Coffers.

The Queene fell in labour on Thursday at night, the seauen and twentieth of September. The King and the Princes of his blood, were in the chamber, according to the ancient law of the Ceremonies of the Crowne, to the end, that the interested in the succession, may not pretend there was any supposition. The Queene was held for a while in great danger, for she had giuen her selfe such liberty in eating of fruites, as shee felt it, and repented it in her trauell, but in the end, about eleuen of the clock, shee was deliuered of a sonne. The King blessing him put a Sword in his hand, to vse it to the glory of God, and the defence of his Crowne and people. All the Princes and Noblemen flocked to reioyce at this new Grace. The ioy was so great, and the King was so prest with the Congratulations of them that came about him, as going to the Church to giue God thanks for this fauour, he lost his hat in the throng. The Secretaries of State, made dispatches presently into all Prouinces, to make them partakers of this great ioy. The first was brought to Paris by Varennes about foure of the clocke, to the Chancellor, the Court of Parliament, and the town-house, presently thanks were gi-uen to God, and bonfires made throughout all the Realme, the people holding this late grace, as an assurance of the fruites of all the precedent. Sourray was chosen for his Gouvernour. The Pope sent presently vnto the King and Queene to congratulate with them of this birth, and to carry vnto the yong Prince swadling bands, bearing clothes, and other things, blessed by his Holinesse. All Princes allied to this Crowne, sent to congratulate this happy occasion. The Queene of Spaine was brought in bed about the same time of a daughter. The Spaniards were no lesse content then the French, saying that they had rather the Queene should begin with a daughter then with a sonne, least they should fall into the accidents, which Iealousie and Ambition do breed, when the Children appeare so soone to sollicite them to be gone; when as their ages are confounded, that the one is in the flower, the other in the season of fruites, the which is most capable to command and rule, and that the desire to succeed may not giue occasion on to trouble the order of Nature, and maketh the one repent that they are Fathers, 1601 and declares the other vnworthy to be Children.

The Duke of Biron came to Fontainebleau, whereas the King, Queene and Daulphin remained, he gaue an account of his Ambassage into England, & deliuered the Queens Letter vnto his Maiesty. He continued in Court vntill the ende of the yeare, and presented vnto him the three Estates of Bresse, Beauey, Veromcy and Gex; whom the King receiued as gratiouly, as if they had bin Frenchmen by birth and affection; he confirmed their Priuiledges, and made them feele the fruits of this change. He erected a Presidiall Court at Bourg, depending vpon the Parliament at Dijon, notwithstanding any opposition made by that of Grenoble, pretending that the Countries exchanged should hold the place of the Marquisate of Saluces, and be incorporate vnto Daulphin.
 He releued the Countries exchanged, in their impositions and Taxes, and with such moderation, as as the most miserable, promised vnto themselves happinesse, vnder his sweet subiection. Among other speeches, which the King vsed vnto the Deputies, these were noted. It is reasonable (said he) seeing you speak French naturally, that you should be subiect to a King of France: I am well pleased that the Spanish tongue shall remaine to the Spaniard, and the Germane tongue to the Germane, but all the French must belong to me.
 The Daulphin made his first entry into Paris the 30. day after his birth: the Port was beautified with Armes. The pompe was of a cradle in a litter, whereas the Lady of Mon-glas sat with the Nurce. The Prouost of Marchants and Sherifes went out of the Ci-tie to meete him. The Gouverneffe made answere to the Oration. His first lodging was at Zamets house. Two dayes after he was carried back to Saint Germain in Lay, and to the end the people might see him, passing through the Citty, the nurce held him at her breast. The King had determined to conduct the Queene to Bloys, but the desire he had to instruct the Duchesse of Bar his sister in his Religion, stayed them all at Paris, whether he had sent for the most learned Prelates and Deuines, to satisfie her in the presence of such Ministers as she had brought with her. But they coniured her not to yeeld vnto this change, nor to dismember her selfe from the body and society of the children of God, to bow her knees vnto Idolatry. She continued so constant in her beleefe, as she made a protestation, that if her Religion were preiudiciall to the Estates of the Duke of Lorraine, she was ready to returne into Bearn, beseeching the King to suffer her to end her life as shee had begun it. So as the conferences vpon this subiect remained vnprofitable, and were of no more effect, then that which was made at Ratif-'bonne at the same time, & for the same cause. The King hauing settled as happy a peace in France as could be desired, he sought to redresse the disorders which could not be cured during the violence of the war, he did two things to reforme the disorders of the Treasure, in the one he cut off a great number of Officers belonging to the Treasure, and in the other he caused a great and seuer search to be made of their abuses. The more Officers the King hath for the managing of his Treasure, the lesse profit comes vnto his Coffers, for that a great part is spent in their entertainements. So as it was resolved at the Estates held at Roan, to suppress the Offices of the Treasurers of the generalities of France by death without hope of reuiuing.

 ease. When as Rhosny was called to be Superintendant of the Treasor, they were out of hope to do their busines as they had wont. By his aduice the King commanded a strict search to be made of their abuses in the Treasure, and to that end he erected a Chamber (or Court) which he would haue called Royale, consisting of Iudges chosen out of his Soueraigne Courts of one of the presidents of the Court of Parliament, two Masters of requests of his houshold: Two Councillors of his Court of Parliament, of one president of his chamber of accompts, Three Councillors of the Court of

And for that they had giuen the King to vnderstand, that nothing did so much impouerish his Realme, as the transport of gold and siluer, the which was visuall by the suf-france of Officers, he therefore reuiued the ancient Lawes for the transporting of gold and siluer, or bullion out of the Realme, adding paine of death thereunto, and losse of all their goods that should do to the contrary, the third whereof should go vnto the In-former. He commanded all Gouvernors to haue a care of the obseruation of these prohibitions, and not to grant any passports to the contrary, vpon paine to be declared par-tak-ers of these transports, and for their secretaries that should countersigne them, confiscation of their goods and perpetuall banishment. But the forbidding of the transportation of gold and siluer is not the onely meanes to make a Realme abound therewith, if the vse of it within be not well ordred. And therefore the King did forbid the superfluous vse of gold and siluer in lace or otherwise vpon garments. This Edict did greatly trouble the ladies in Court, yet it was obserued for that it was general and excepted none: the King himselfe did frowne of a Prince of his house, who had not yet thought of this reformation. The King continuing the same care to settle all things in good Estate, seeing that forraine Coynes went at a higher rate in his Realme then where they were coyned, he commanded that the vse of forraine coyones should be for-bidden, after a certaine time giuen to the people to put it away, restoring gold to his iust value. This commandement was iust, but it was a great ruine to the people, for the Strangers seeing that their Coynes were not currant among vs, discontinued the trafficke, and liued without that, without the which wee thought they could not liue.
Those which were wont to come to Lions went to Geneua, where the Duckats were raised as much as we had abated them. The King by all these Edicts had nothing releued the necessities of the Nobility, if hee had not provided for Vsuries, which haue ruined many good and ancient houles, filled Townes with vnprofitable persons, and the Country with miseries, and inhumanities. He found that Rents constituted after ten or eight in the hundred did ruine many good families, hindred the trafficke and commerce of Marchandise, and made Tillage and Handicraftes to be neglected, many desiring through the easinesse of a deceitfull gaine, to liue idly in good Townes of their Rents, rather then to giue themselues with any paine to liberall Arts, or to Till and Husband their inheritances. For this reason (meaning to inuite his subiects to enrich themselues with more iust gaine, to content themselues with more moderate profit, and to giue the Nobilitie meanes to pay their debts.) he did forbid all Vsury or constitution of Rentes at a higher rate then sixe pounds sixe shillings for the hundred. The Edict was verified in the Court of Parliament, which considered that it was alwaies preiudiciall to the common-weale to giue money to Vsury: for it is a serpent whose biting is not apparant, and yet it is so sensible as it pierceth the very heart of the best families.

The affaires of the Realme being in so great tranquility, as the King had no care but to enioy the fruites of Peace; He made choise of Ambassadors to send to forraine Princes that were in League with him. Barranx was named for Spaine, Betanes for Rome, the Count Beaumont was chosen for England, and the President Fresnes Canise to go to Venice, who had a particular aduice giuen him, the which for that it is of consequence and serues for instruction to others in the like charges, deserues to be noted.
It hath alwaies beene obserued at Venice, betwixt the Popes Nuntio and Princes Ambassadors that remaine there, that the last come is alwaies first visited by the others before he returns them the like. It happened that Huraud de Messe the Kings Ambassador at Venice, hauing beene twise or thrise sent backe thither by his Maiestie, and no other Ambassadour: at his last returne the Popes Nuntio refused to visit him, saying, that hee was not a new Ambassadour, and that it was in him to visit him first, the which he did, as well for that they could not take his returne for the beginning of a new Ambassage, from this complement of courtesie, the Popes Nuntio would draw a consequence of dutie, and would challenge a right to be visited first. So as the Ambasador of Spaine hauing made difficultie to visit the Nuntio, attending it first from him, according

A according to the ancient order, they stood so long vpon this Ceremonie, as they passed all the time of their Legation without visiting one an other. And therefore the King foreseeing that if de Fresnes Canay were not informed of these particularities, hee might haue beene surprised in this Complement of visiting. In this discourse of Ambassadors, let vs see the issue of two important Ambassages, the one for the King at Thurin, the other for the Duke of Sauoy at Paris, and both for the swearing of the Kings peace. James Mistes of Myolans Lord of Saint Chaumont, Knight of both the Kings Orders, was commanded to goe to Thurin to receiue the Dukes oath. He went well accompanied with gentlemen, and neuer Ambassadour was better receiued then he was in Sauoy and Piedmont. D'Albigny Gouvernour of Sauoy feasted him at Chambery like a Prince, the Duke commaunding him to entertain him in all places as himselfe.

B The Duke of Sauoy, exceeds all the Princes of his qualitie in such Ceremonies.
There is not any Court where they are performed with more order and pompe. The Ambassador comming within a League of Thurin, hee was intreated by the Duke to stay his entrie one day, for that the Duke of Nemours did feast him, at a house of his, and that the cheefe men of his Court being also inuited, desired to be there, and not to lose the opportunitie to meet with him, nor the Ladies to see his reception. Hee sent for him, and for all the cheefe men of his traine horses richly furnished, with footmen in very good order to enter into Thurin. Two leagues from the Towne he was met by his companies of men at armes. The commanders hauing presented themselues vnto him, the companies opened and made them way to passe through the middest of them, hauing passed a little farther, he was incountried, by the Marques of Lan, in the head of the cheefe Noblemen of the Dukes Court, to accompanie him into the Towne, at the ports whereof there were twentie Staffieres or foremen euery one with two torches of white wax in his hand to light him to his lodging, whether presently the Duke sent the Earle of Crenie the first gentleman of his chamber, to let him vnderstand how much hee was pleased with his comming, and greeted that hee should not see him vntil the next day: At the houre appointed word was brought that the Duke desired to see him, whereat the first incounter hee vsed him with more then ordinarie words, and great declarations of ioy which the Duke receiued of his arriuall,

D and of the contentment he promised vnto himselfe by the effects of his legation. The Ambassador did the Kings commendations vnto him, and told him that he had commandement from his Maiestie to represent many things vnto him touching the treatie of Peace. The Duke answered that they must not talke of affaires, intreating him to for-beare eight daies. The Kinges Ambassadour was well aduertized, that he would gaine time on the one side, as he lost on the other, attending a Post from Spaine touching the oath with he was to make: his good shews could not hide his harts-griefe for the losse of part of his estates, the possession whereof had neuer been so pleasing, as the priuation was troublesome. Cheurieres visited the Princes and the Infanta's according to the Kings commandement. The Ambassador of Spaine went in Pilgrimage to our Ladie of Mont de Vic, because he would not be at the Assembly. The Ceremonie was like vnto the precedent at Chambery for the treatie of Veruins, after which the Ambassador dined with the Duke, where there was nothing forgotten that might giue him contentment. The Duke told the Ambassador that hee would suppe with him, but alwaies at his own charge, whether he caused many ladies to be inuited: during the heat of these iollities the Duke tooke no taste in affaires he so much desired to content the Kings Ambassadour and those that were with him. Yet he did not leaue to satisfie him in that which he had propounded, touching the rights & pretensions of the Lady of Lucey, and for many demands which they of Geneua had made vnto the King, vpon the execution of the treatie. For the first they answere that he wil giue the King contentment, & for the second, that his Maiestie would neuer iudge it reasonable that he should bind himselfe in his owne Estates, to conditions, which they of Geneua would not allow in theirs. The Ceremonies being performed, the Ambassador tooke his leaue, and his departure was not lesse honored then his comming, where he did not forget to giue them great presents. Some said that after so great an expence in his voiage to Paris, and that A hauing wasted his Treasure, and ruined his Countries with war, those which did accom-panie Cheurieres should nor haue like presents to them that were with Botheau when as the Duke sware the peace of Veruins. But he did the Contrarie, shewing that the last of the vertues which should die in him should be liberality, and that he knew, in whom how much, when, and how he should giue, and that in such occasions he was full.

He gave vnto the Ambassador a iewell of 4000. crownes, and to all the Gentlemen hortes. The Marquis of Lullins came into France to take the Kings oath. The Ce-remonie was done at the Celestins in Paris, according to the accustomed manner and forme vsed in the like treaties, and in the presence of many Princes of the bloud, Noblemen, and counsellors of State, the act being signed by the King, by Villeroy, and Forget B Secretarie of State. The seigneurie of Geneva intreated the King to giue them the ba-lewicke of Gex, as a necessary thing for the safetie of their Estate. The King answered, that being concluded by the treatie, which he had made with the Duke of Sauoy, that the lands exchanged for the Marquisate of Saluces, should remain vnited and incorporated to the Crowne, he requested them to rest satisfied with this condition, and not to hope for any alteration, for this consideration, these countries being of one condition with the other Prouinces of the Realm, the would not admit any diuersity in their laws, he therefore established the exercise of the Romish religion, and sent the Baron of Lux to put the Bishop of Geneva in possession of the Churches of his Diocesse, causing Masse to be said in the Churches of Gex. They of Geneva made fasts, and publike prayer to the end (sayd they,) to keepe the Idols from their wals.

The Alliance with the Swisses renewed.

In the beginning of this year, the Court being quiet, and dreaming of nothing but of feasts and dancing, and the whole State in such tranquillitie, as nothing might seeme to interrupt it. The King had but one businesse without the Realme, whereon depended the contentment which he might giue to the Swisses, in confirming the promise which his Ambassador had made of the renewing of their alliances. There had beene many Assemblies held to that end at Bade and Soleure, but all vncertaine, as they be commonly. Their resolutions were inconstant and variable, with new demands, which did cut of nothing of the necessitie of the first. These diuers agitations sprang from Milan and Saues, who could not endure to see the Flower de Luce flourish in the rockes and Alpes, and were grieued to haue spent so many double Ducats in vaine, to choake the seedes of their affection to this Crowne. De Vic disposed things in as good sort as the King could desire, Brulart was sent to make the worke perfect. He gaue them to understand the Kings last resolutions, with so great wiledome and dexteritie, as they were allowed by the greatest part of the Cantons. After that, the partisans of Spaine and Sa-uoy found that all their crosses brought more aduancement then difficultie to the Kings affaires, and that the most obstinate became temperate, and were forced to yeeld, and that they could not hinder, but that the light of vertue & the Kings fortune would shine through the Caos of their practices, Syllery finding that their wills were well prepared, and disposed to entertaine and accept of the Kings intentions, he made the proposition of renewing of the League at Soleure in September, After this manner:

A Diet at So-leure the 11.
of September.

Oration of Monsieur Sillery to the Swisses.

My most honored Lords, I haue bene sent into this Countrie by the most Christian King my maker, your best friend, allie, and confederate with charge to deliuer vnto you his louing recommendations, with the letters which his Maiestie hath written vnto you, by the which you may conceiue his intention vpon the cause of my voiage, according to the which his Maiestie hath also expressly commanded me, to assure you of his loue and affection, and of the esteeme which he had made of your Nation, for that he had made better triall of their courage and valour then all other Princes, hauing bin so often with them in battell and other exploits of warre, and to tell you that he desires to continue with you the antient friendship, alliance, and good correspondency which hath so long and happily continued, betwixt the Kings of France, his Maiesties predecessors of happy memorie to the common good of the one and the other. After that he had receiued your friendlie answer dated the 15. of May, in the yeare one thousand six hundred, touching

1601.

A touching that which had bene propounded vnto you on his behalte by the deceased Monsieur De Montfornain: his Ambassador concerning the renewing of the League, his Maiestie did presently appoint his Deputies to come and treat with you, the which had bene duly effected, if the vnexpected warre of Sauoy, contrary to his Maiesties intention, had not stayed the voyage of his sayd Deputies, the which since hath not bene deferred, but to send by the same meanes greater prouision of money which cannot bee so soone gathered together as was requisit, for the pouerty of the people, who are yet afflicted for the warres and calamities past, which haue so long continewed, and is the onely cause which hath staied your payments, to the great griefe of his Maiesty, and of all good Frenchmen, who were forry to see you vnaccommodated and B could not helpe it. This excuse my Noble Lords, is not onely true, but worthy of compassion, if it please you to remember the true and first cause of this stay, and the great miseries and wronges which all France and so many poore Innocents haue since suffered.

And although that by the happy peace which it hath pleased God to giue vs, there bee occasion to hope for all prosperity, and that the milchiefe decreasing, and commodities increasing, as wee see daylie, by the grace of God there will bee meanes, to giue his Maiesties good friends and seruants satisfaction. Yet this cannot be so sodainely, but it is necessary to haue some time to reape the fruits, notwithstanding it is most assured, and the haruest, and fruition is neere, which will recompence the long expecta-C tion.

I thinke my Lords it were superfluous to shew how profitable, this alliance hath bene heretofore to the one and the other, for that it is notorious to all the world, bee-ing made manifest by effects, and hath no need of prooffe. We acknowledge freely and willingly, that the assistance and succours of your souldiers, which at sundry times, and in many occasions, haue bene employed both within and without the Realme, haue bene verie profitable for the succouring of the Kings and crowne of France. I assure my selfe also that for your parts you will acknowledge how much the Alliance and friendship of France hath bene fauorable and helpfull vnto you, since the which you haue not bene onely respected of Princes and Potentates, which are nerest vnto you, D but haue also bene sought vnto by them that are farthest off: you haue not bene molested, nor set vpon by any, and by this meanes you haue increased in wealth, power and authority, and your Estate is become one of the most happy and most flourishing that euer was.

So your wise Predecessors haue thought that no other alliance could be more commodious vnto you for many reasons best knowne vnto your selues: wee demand nothing one of another, there are certaine conuentions betwixt your nation and ours, whereby they agree better then any other. Wee desire your bataillions to forrifie our armies, which may bee also sayd that you did neuer trust, nor agree so well with any as with our French foote and horse.

E My Lords they which faine imaginary rights and pretentions to any part of your Estates, desire not your good nor vnion, and if according to your wisdomes it please you to examine strictly the Councils and proceedings of some, who vnder a disguised shew of some present profit, seeme to affect your friendship, you shall finde that their chiefe end is to seperate you one from another, to weaken and deuide the force and bodies of your Leagues, and by that meanes to open and make the way easie to execute their old designes, which they haue long projected, being needfull to vse great fore-sight to preuent them and not to suffer your selues to be abused with their policies.

You must thinke my Noble Lords, that you haue none so dangerous enemies, as those which seeke to sow diuision among you in your Councils, for it is directly con-F trarie to your greatnesse and quiet. The Kings of France, pretend not any thing of you but your friendship, they desire your vnion and prosperity, for the loue and affection which they beare you, but to the end that no man may bee in doubt, I say they ought to desire for their owne interest, that you should bee alwaies vnited and fortified, to the end that your assistance may bee vnto them a speedy, powerful,

1601 and assured succour, they which may not faile them when fouer they shall haue need. A
 The Kings of France and their ministers haue alwaies employed themselves to perswade and maintaine a peace and vnion betwixt you. And it may bee truly sayd that the alliance of France is the most proper and firme bond of your coniunction and friendship, to maintaine you powerfull and happy together by this common intelligence, the which cannot bee when you shalbe deuided. King Leuis the eleuenth employed himselfe to compound the controuerfies which were betwixt your famous Predecessors, and the house of Austria, and by his Authority and mediation, the Treaty was concluded of the hereditary League, with the Archduke Sigismund in the yeere 1474. the which hath bene since confirmed by his successors, and continued vnto B this daie.

In the yeere of our Lord 1531. the fise Cantons hauing some dissention with them of Zurich; were forced to contract with Ferdinand the King of Romanes, and since Emperour, brother to the Emperour Charles the fifth. The fruites of this new friendship were the cause of a ciuill warre betwixt the sayd Cantons. This warre was pacified by the care and dilligence of King Francis, who made both the one and the other capable of that which was necessarie for their owne good and preseruacion. A peace was concluded, but it was expressely agreed that the letters and seales of this new alliance should bee restored, as if it had bene held the chiefe cause of this trouble. In the yeere of our Lord 1582 the deceased King Henry shewed no lesse affection and care C to preuent the beginning of a warre, which was apprehended betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and my maisters of Berne, assisted by some other Cantons; there are many yer liuing which can witnesse the good induours of Mounseigneur De Mandelot and Hautefort, to smother this trouble in the breeding, as in all other occasions the Kings of France and their ministers haue giuen prooffe of their affections to the good and quiet of the Cantons.

Multiplicity of alliances vnprouisable.

Image of a good King and of a good captain.

My Lords with the alliance of France you may assure your good and prosperitie without any feare, and free your selues from many dangers and inconueniences which doe infallibly follow the multiplicity of alliances. And if the alliance of France hath euer deserued to bee esteemed, if it hath heretofore bene desired; in my opinion it shalbe with more reason now, when as wee are neerer neighbours, hauing meanes to succour one another without demanding passage from any Prince, the Realme of France beeing in full peace, restored to her beautie, and her lymits extended by the force, clemency, wisdom, and conduct, of that great King, who hath iustly merited the title of greatnesse, for the glory and greatnesse of his vertues, and of his high exploits, for in him may bee seene the perfect Image of a good King, and a great D captaine, which is the greatest commendation which the auncient Sages haue thought might bee giuen vnto a mortall man. His Maiestie hath shewed his valour and force of armes during the warre; hee hath also made his bounty and wisdom shine in time of peace. All diuisions are ceased in his Realme, and every man E liues in peace vnder his Authoritie, aswell by his power, as through the loue and affection of his subiects, who reuerence and feare him as a great King, and loue and obserue him as a good father. And doubtlesse his Maiestie hath no other care but to make his subiects most happy vnder his obedience, restoring the manuring of the Land, the Trafficke, Marchandize, order, and policie in all the partes of his Estate; and it is to bee hoped that his raigne will abound in all felicity for his subiects, friends and good neighbours.

This great King, my Noble Lords, desires your friendship and alliance, such as you haue had with the Kings of France his Predecessors. It is not to hurt any one, but to doe good to all. It is not to trouble the publike peace, but rather to maintaine it, his Maiestie hauing giuen good proofes of the sinceritie of his intentions F for the generall quiet of Christendome, by his facility in the Treatie of peace made at Veruins with the King of Spaine, and since confirmed at the Citie of Paris and Lyons with the Duke of Sauoy, whereof I can giue Testimony hauing had the

A the honour to serue in all that which hath bene negotiated in the sayd Treaties of Veruins and Lyons. His Maiestie offers you his loue and affection which is to bee esteemed in a good and iust Prince, whose faith hath neuer failed, to his friends, enemies nor to his owne subiects. Hee promisseth you all affection that can with reason bee desired, aswell for your payments, as for all other conditions which should bee required, and hath giuen power to my Lord Ambassadour, and mee to aduise with you of the best meanes that may bee to renew the alliance with you, and to make it so firme and durable as it may neuer be changed nor altered.

His Maiestie doth also assure himselfe of your wisdomes and equitie, that you would not require any thing that were not reasonable and in his power, and that you would consider and adde therevnto what shall bee required of your part, to assure the effect of a good alliance, that heereafter they might not fall into former inconueniences, by meanes whereof his Maiestie findes himselfe charged with great and excessive debts, the which had not bene if alliances had bene kept: I speake it without offence to any, but onely by the necessity of duty, which binds mee to represent the truth of the fact for two reasons, the one that it may bee provided for, the other to the end that considering the greatnesse and quallity of the debts, you may know we deserue to be a little borne withall in the payment thereof.

I hope in his Diuine bounty, that as it hath pleased him to manifest by so many C Miracles that hee hath taken into his protection the affaires of this good King, this Realme, and this mighty common-weale, that hee will also bee pleased to inspire your hearts with his wisdom, to take a good and holy resolution, which may bee first to his glorie, for the health of both the Estates, and of all good men, and finally for the increase of the honour, glorie, and prosperity of your Estate, for the which the alliance of France shalbe vnto you as it alwaies hath bene very honorable and profitable.

His discourse was very pleasing vnto the hearers, who thought that the alliance of France, with whom they neuer had any question, and whose friendship had not bene troubled with those feelings which the iniuries of warre doe fix deeply in the mindes D of men, was more profitable and necessary then that of other Princes, which haue hereditary defeignes vpon that Estate, who would cast lots againe, and come to a new diuision.

These had some-times sought to make there profit of the diuersity of Religion that is amongst the Cantons, in weakning the body by cutting off the members. France on the contrary side had alwaies exhorted them to liue in peace, and not vndermine the foundation of their Estate the which consistes of concord and vnion. So Princes should alwaies desire that their Allies might liue in Vnion and Peace. This proposition of renewing the League with the King, was very acceptable vnto them all, but it troubled the small Catholike Cantons, who had made new Leagues with their neighbours, and desired that they would propound some meanes vnto them, that in contenting the King they might with honour keepe their latter promises. The Ambassadors answered, that they must take those resolutions of themselves, whereby they might willingly contribute that which depended of them. It is no reason sayd the Ambassadors, that you should bee directed and set into the right way by vs, seeing you left it without vs and against vs. The Cantons sayd, that the friendship which they had sworne to France, was grounded vpon conditions, the which sayling, the duty of their alliance must also faile.

Friendship grounded vpon profit is neuer durable, that of the Suiffes cannot bee otherwise vnited, they loue the Darigues more then Darius himselfe, and glory to see the greatest Princes of Europe to purchase their friendship. Some aduiled the King to F leaue the petty Cantons, and to take them as his enemies, seeing they had broken the League. But he thought he should wrong the reputation and dignity of his crowne, if hee should loose the friends which his Predecessors had gotten. And therefore his Ambassadors (although they seemed not to care for it) omitted nothing that might B b b b b a serue serue to reduce them into the right way, from the which, the opinion of profit, more A then the force of friendship, had drawne them: thinking it reasonable to loue friends with their humours, not for the respect of the continuance of friendship, nor of their constancy, but for the honor of this crowne. They would not binde the Kings word to any other thing then the payment of a million of gold in discharge of their debt or pension. There must be an other day to deliuer that which should be refused by euery Canton vpon the Kings offers and propositions. The petty Cantons appointed a Diet at Lucerna, to resolve of the difficulties they were in betwixt the alliances with France and Spaine, seeing they might not hold the one but they must abandon the other. Their resolution was to accept the renewing of the league, and to esteeme old friends for the best. Yet they did not publish it so soone, that it might bee the better accepted: many daies were spent in generall assemblies at Bade and Soleurre, to reduce it to an immutable point. Monsieur de Vic went vnto the Grisons, and procured an assembly to bee called at Coire of the three Cantons and their commons in their Episcopall city: their were as many difficulties as the country is rough, the Spanish practises had so much withdrawne their affections from France, they could not dissemble the griefe they conceiued for the confirmation of this League. The Count of Fuentes would not suffer any prouision to goe out of the Dutchy of Milan, that the dearth and discommodity of victuals, might make the Grisons know that the friendship of Spaine was more profitable vnto them then that of France, and that they should not so much desire the C number, as the profit of friends.

De Vic propounded the Kings intention to three score and feuen Ambassadors deputed by the three Cantons of the Grisons, and to as many other chosen out of the country. They hold a great liberty of opinions in their assemblies, euery man speaks what he thinks. Heere they which made least shew, spake loudest, in the end they resolved to accept of the renewing of the League, adding therevnto such preiudiciall conditions, as two of them were sufficient to make the League fruitlesse for the King. De Vic sayd vnto them, that they must not thinke that the King would endure any addition or deminution in the ancient Treaty, answering the sayd Articles by writing, to the end that the commons which were to determine thereon, might iudge that their reasons were not stronger then those which he had propounded vnto them, and their commodities and suerties greater with the Kings alliance, then with al others. While that De Vic was with the Grisons, Silery labored to dispose the 13. Cantons to the Kings wil. But there was still more to resolve then had bene resolved on. The Suisses although they haue not the quicknesse of spirit as other nations, yet are they not lesse aduised in the conduct of their affaires. So as when the Kings Ambassadors thought that in the last Diet held at Soleure, there would be but one sitting, for that al difficulties had bene very exactly considered, they must yet haue patience for twelue daies, with more crosses and difficulties then were euer treated of in Suifferland, for the like affaires; for both the Kings friends and enemies, had conspired not to consent to the conclusion of the Treaty, without assurance to be paid vnreasonable sums euery yeere, besides the million of gold, that was granted. The stay of the bringing of the Kings mony did also greatly distast them that should haue the best share in the distribution. The more certaine the hope is, the more troublesome is the stay. This sayling was insupportable vnto them, and thrust them into bad resolutions against the aduancement of the Kings affaires. So as the Ambassadors did thinke for a time they should get much, to breake with some, and to differ with others, rather then to tie the King vnto such forced conditions. But after much toyle of body and minde, the Treaty was concluded with the good liking of the superiors. There remayned nothing but to haue the Duke of Biron come, to authorize by his presence, what had bene concluded by the Kings Ambassadors: hee came in the end of Ianuary, wel accompanied and as well received by the Lords of that common-weale, and by the Colonels and captaines, to whom it seemed that they were in France, seeing him alwaies that had commanded ouer them in the Kings army. The Duke spake vnto them in the general assembly at Soleurre in this sort, Noble Lords, the

A the King my master (making the same esteeme which his Predecessors haue done of your generosity, desiring the continuance of true frindship and faithfull alliance which hath bene of long time betwixt his crowne and your comminalties) hath commanded me to come into your country, for the happy ending of the Treaty which the Seigneours of Silery and de Vic haue managed for the renewing of the League. His Maiesty hath also commanded me to assure you of the account he makes of your Faith, and that he will fully obserue the promises that shalbe made vnto you. He doth also assure himself, that for your parts you will bring al willingness and freedome, now that his Realm is the most flourishing, giuing more cause of Enuy then of Pitty. Hee desires more earnestly to renew the ancient alliances that haue bene betwixt the Kings and crowne of B France, and your common-weale, thinking that the good which shall rise thereby, shall be profitable vnto you, and the best and most assured means for to make you liue powerfully and happily. I wil conceale how highly I esteeme the honor which the King my master hath done mee, in making choise of mee with these Gentlemen, to serue for so good and holy a worke, and also to see my selfe with a Nation, which hath bene often (both in peace and warre) cherished and esteemed by my deceased Lord and father, the Marshall of Biron and of my selfe: For prooofe of my affection, I offer you all that is in my power, being desirous to assist you with all fauor, and to serue you in that which a Knight of honor ought and may.

C The Kings alliance was accepted by the Suisses, publike thanks were giuen to God, and the Duke with the Ambassadors solemnly feasted. The alliance which before had bene contracted but for the Kings life onely, was concluded for the Dauphins also, after that of the Kings, and as many yeeres after as were granted to the deceased King. The King receiued great content to see this Treaty so happily concluded to the honor of his crowne, contrary to the intent and practises of those that sought to hinder it.

The King of Spaine had leauied a great army in Italy; men spake diuersly of his designs, some added that D'Albigny was gone to Milan to the Count of Fuentes; that the Marquis of Aix was in Spaine; that the Duke was ready to subiect himselfe wholly to the will of the council of Spaine, to whom he deliuered his two sonnes, having made D them Knights of his Order, to prepare them to the voyage, and had sent De Joumy (an extraordinary Ambassador to Rome) to beseech the Pope to send them his blessing. But the King knew well, that vnder these shewes and pretextes, there were other Negotiations to trouble his Estate, whereof hee made no shew: yet such as did see him when hee was most free and priuate, discovered that his head was troubled, and that the toyle and wearinesse of his minde, was much more then that of his body. One day coming from hunting, being very pensie before the fire with his hat on his eyes, hee drew his sword, speaking some words vnto himself, then he turned towards the Vidame of Chartres, who was there present, asking him when La Fin his vncler would come, and that hee longed to see him. At the same time there were great reparations made at the Bastille, E rather to keepe that fast, that was to be within it, then to resist without, which made many beleue, that the yeere should not passe, without lodging of some one of marke in the place.

There are crimes, whereof they make no shew vntil they bee committed, but in cases of Treason they must thunder and lighten both together, and it is better to auoyde the blow being farre off, then to attend it, and not regard it, there being nothing so troublesome as to liue in continuall feare of conspiracies, the which the more they are diffembled, the more they are fortified. This winter, the Court was full of iolity and sports, the Queene hauing made a rich and sumptuous Maske, calling fiftene Princesses and Ladies of the Court vnto her, which represented fiftene vertues, whereof the Queene F made the first. The Duke of Vendosme being attired like Cupid, marched before the Queene: but within few daies after hee changed that habite into mourning, for the death of the Duke of Mercure his father-in-law, who died of a Pestilent Feuer on Twelfth day in the city of Nuremberg, coming into France to prepare a greater expedition against the Turkes.

discouraged

Spaniards gaue it out, that it was for Algier; but the cleare-sighted knew well that without some treason among the French, the Spaniards affaires were not in so good Estate as to attempt any thing against France. The King was aduertised that the Duke of Biron was strayed from his duty, and assured moreouer, that this disposition of his did not grow in an instant, and that he had not entred into these bad resolutions suddenly, if he had not had conference with strangers. He could not beleue that a spirit so vigilant, so active and so valiant, could suffer it selfe to be transported with such violent furies: and it seemed a dreame vnto him, that a man which had gotten so much honour, to whom his Father had left so much, and who had receiued daily what hee would from the King, should resolve to that which was contrarie to his Honour, and the greatnesse of his courage. This good opinion made the King not to beleue the aduice which was giuen him of his bad intentions, making no shew thereof, but that hee would giue him the gouernement of Guienne, and two hundred thousand Crownes recompence, with the Castels of Trompette and Blay, to draw him from the Frontier, which was more commodious for conference with them, who were resolved to withdraw him from France, or to ruine him.

The Duke of Biron refused the gouernment of Guienne.

He refused entainment from the Spaniards.

He sayd hee would dye a Soueraigne.

He was honored with the first charges of the realme.

They had sought him after the taking of Lan, when as they discovered, that hee was come to Paris in choller, for that the King had refused him something, wherewith hee gratified the Duchesse of Beaufort: then they offered him two hundred thousand Crownes yearly entertainment, and to be Generall of all the King of Spaines forces in France. As they had found him an Achilles in battayle, so they found him an Ulysses to their words, stopping his eares at their enchantments, saying, That chol-ler should neuer draw him from his dutie: that although his Nature were fierie and boyling in the feeling and apprehension of a wrong, yet his heart would neuer suffer this fire to consume the Faith and Loyaltie, which hee ought vnto his Prince. Hee re-tayned nothing of the offer which they made him, but onely the remembrance of the reputation and esteeme which they made of his valour, and euen then he suffered himselfe to be carried away with those motions, which do often transport the Mind to infolenie and contempt of all things, when they see themselves assured of ease, how-soeuer the chance fall, and that they shall neuer bee vnder the seruitude of Necessitie.
He was sometimes heard say, That he would not dye, before hee had seene his head set vpon a quarter of a Crowne: that hee would rather go to a scaffold to loose his head, then to an Hospitall to begge his bread: that hee would dye young, or haue meanes to do his friends good. Either Caesar, or nothing. Either a free life, or a glorious death, but hee had neyther of them. His Desseignes made him to vtter words of a Soueraigne, and so absolute, as the wife did impute it to extreame arrogancie, the which hath alwaies ruined and confounded them that entertaine it. It is a great hap-pinesse for an Estate to haue great Captains, but there is nothing so hard to inttaine, for when as they thinke, that they haue bound their Country vnto them, although all they do be lesse then their duties, they are easily discontented, and like to Pausanias and Themistocles seeke new alliances and friendship from enemies, if they be not rewarded to their owne willes; and to the height of their Ambition. The Duke of Biron had done great seruice to the King and Realme, so were his recompences so great, as no Nobleman of his qualitie in France, but might enuie him: For being not yet fortie yeares old, hee had enjoyed the chiefest dignities of the Realme. At fourteene yeares hee was Colonell of the Swisses in Flanders. Soone after Marshall of the Campe, and then Marshall Generall. Hee was receiued Admirall of France in the Parliament at Tours, and Marshall of France in that of Paris. Hee acknowledged none but the King at the siege of Amiens, and was his Maiesties Lieutenant Generall, although there were Princes of the blood. To increase his greatnesse hee was declared a Peere of France, and his Barony erected into a Duchie. And yet not content with all this, hee sayd hee would not dye, but hee would straine higher. That hee will go no more to re-couer the Townes of Picardie, vnlesse the King set vpp his Image in brass before the Louvre, vsing still in his brauerie some very dangerous speeches, and with such affection,

1602.

He desires

of the warre.

Affection, as he was not pleased with them that did not applaude them. When hee saw after the siege of Amiens, that Brittain was reduced, and the Warre ended, he thought that hauing no more vse of his valour, he should haue no more credit: that he should haue no more means to play the petty King, & to do all that without feare which he did with our Iustice. He complained of the King, and of the vnequall recompence of his Merits and Seruice: he proclaimed his discontents, adding threats to his complaints, speaking of the King with so small respect, as his most passionate seruants held his speeches to be insolent and dangerous. It was the defect of his Nature, but Fortune added something vnto it, for finding himselfe to abound with all the prosperities that a wel-ordered desire could wish for in his condition, he found that men lose themselves, being too much at their owne ease. The opinion of himselfe rayfed his thoughts so high, as he valued himselfe at an inestimable price, thinking that his heart was not of the common temper of others: that there was no man living that might equall him, and that none that were dead had attained to his merits. And although that in all his life he had shewed small zeale to Religion, yet now when as he prepared his heart to the motions of ambition, he would seeme very religious, protesting that he would be an irreconcilable enemy to the Protestants. La Noüe, Seigneur of la Fin, was (by reason of the troubles of Prouence, and the quarrell of Des Dignieres) retired to his house, being threatened by the King, in quarrell with some great personages of the Realme, and furcharged with debts and suites in law. The discontented do still meet by appointment or by chance.
The Duke of Biron (who knew that he had bene employed in the Duke of Alançons affaires, that since he had negotiated with the ministers of the King of Spaine and the Duke of Sauoy, during the siege of Amiens, and that he had a heart full of discontent) imagined that he sought a Master. They talke together, and mixed their griefes and passions in one complaint, they propound to seeke that without the Realme, which they could not find within it, and to enter in practise with the Duke of Sauoy: they resolve to aduertise him of an intelligence which Des Dignieres had vpon the Fort of Barrault, the which he executed happily. Now after so many examples of ineuitable dangers, the Duke of Biron abandons himselfe to a voyage full of dangerous rocks, and fearefull dangers, vnder the conduct of a man who was yet wet with shipwracke which hee had suffered.

He went into Flanders for the execution of the Treaty of Veruins, where Picoté of Orleanse had conference with him, and inspired his heart with desires to raise his Fortune with those who both knew and admired his merits. The Duke of Biron heard him, and made no shew to vnderstand him, and yet he left him in an opinion, that if he came into France he would be well pleased that he should speake more plainly vnto him of that subiect. The Spaniards did beleue that he yeelded, seeing he gaue care, and assured themselves either to winne him or to vndo him. The King was aduertised by one that was then employed in the Arch-dukes Court, of this practise, but he sent him word that the Marshall Biron was of too a high spirit to yeeld to so great a trecherie. Being returned out of Flanders, the King would haue married him, but he made shew that his affections were otherwise settled. And although he gaue it out, that he sought the daughter of Madame de Luce, yet he treated to haue the other daughter of the Duke of Sauoy, whereof Cheualier Bretton had spoken vnto him. La Fin had a promise from the Duke of Biron to do all he could to content his hopes. Picoté had made a voyage into Spaine to receiue directions. Farges (a religious man of the Order of Cisteaux) went into Sa-uoy, and so to Milan, to receiue order how to teare this plant from France: but the Duke of Sauoy being at Paris, pulled vp the Flower-de-luce which was planted in his heart, and disposed him so to trouble the King within the Realme, as he should leaue him the Marquise of Saluces in peace. Vpon this assurance the Duke of Sauoy had no meaning to effect the Treatie of Peace: warre was proclaimed; the Duke of Biron takes the chiefe places of Bresse: being at Pierre Chastel in the beginning of September, la Fin comes vnto him, who by his order had made two voyages to Saint Claude, where Romeus met him. The King had aduice thereof, but he thought it better to dissemble these practises

He discouers

to La Fin.

1602. Stifes, then to surprize the best of his seruants in his acts of infidelity. He was content to A draw him into Sauoy, and to tell him that he must abandon La Fin, and not giue eare to his bad perswasions. The K. shewed him his error, to guide him in the right way, but as they which are posselt with this violent passion of desire to be Masters, are no more capable of gouernement nor Councell, he conceiued that what the King spake for loue proceeded from feare, continuing still his practises with La Fin, and neuer going to see the King, but with a great troupe. He made him beleue being at Annessy, that he desired to discouer some passage, and demanded guides of the Countrie to that end, but it was onely to let Renazé passe to the Duke of Sauoy, to discouer vnto him the estate of the Kings armie, and to make D'Albigny retire with his troupes, the which without this aduice had bene cut in peeces.

He enters the Kings aduice.

He is discontented for the refusal of the Cittadell of Bourg.

He treats with the Duke of Sauoy and the Count of Fuentes.

They offer him one of the D. o Sauoyes daughters in marriage.

It was at the same time when as the Duke of Biron intreated the King to giue the B gouernement of the Cittadell of Bourg, to him that he should name. It is the nature of great men which serue Princes, to thinke they merit all, and to be more dangerous then enemies, if they be refused what they demand. The King answered him, that hee would commit that place vnto de Boiffes. This deniall did so transport the Duke of Biron, and thrust him into such strange and diuellish resolutions, as one morning being in his bed at Chaumont, he made an enterprize vpon the Kings person, whereof mention is made in the deposition of La Fin and Renazé, but it was not executed. Hee himselfe had horror of so execrable a thought. La Fin went also from the armie to conclude the bargain C with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes. He treated first with the Duke, and the Ambassadour of Spaine at Iurec, and then at Thurin with Romcas. Hee went to Milan to the Count of Fuentes, whither Picoté also came, bringing an answer from the Councell of Spaine, to the Duke of Biron's propositions, and order to conferre with La Fin, and to perswade him to make a voyage into Spaine. Hee sayd openly, that the King of Spaine desired to haue the Duke of Biron at what price and perill soeuer. The Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes appointed a day to meet at Somewith the Ambassadour of Spaine, La Fin, and Picoté. There their minds were knowne, and all difficulties freed of either side. La Fin who had pierced into the secret of his counsels, sayd, D That the marriage of the Duke of Sauoy's third daughter, was the Cyment to ioyne together and vnite all this Treatie, with promise of siue hundred thousand Crownes, and the transport of all the rights of the Soueraigntie of Bourgongne. A more sedled iudgment, and greater constancie then that of the Duke of Biron, might haue bene troubled with such plausible and goodly offers: he could not be seduced but by that Demon of Ambition, nor stumble but by that blindness.

The Duke of Sauoy gaue him more hope, then assurance of this marriage, and it was not credible that hee would accept of a meane Gentleman for his Sonne-in-law, who was not of so great a House, but there were many better then his in France. Princes promise all, and hold nothing but what doth not preiudice their greatnesse. Whilest that La Fin treated of the Duke of Biron's capitulation in Italy, the Treatie of peace at Lyons was concluded. The ignorant sayd, that the King had done ill in not proceeding, and that hee should keepe that great Rampar of the Alpes, for the frontier of Gaule. These were discourses of men which did not consider, how dangerous it is to go farre from the Frontier, and to leaue behind his backe a strong conspiracie: without this peace the King had bene forced to passe the Alpes, the which had bene a fauourable occasion for this Treason. Hee was aduertised of the badde seruices the Duke of Biron did him: and that the enterprizes which hee had vpon the Cittadell of Thurin, and the best places of Piedmont, were discouered by their trecherie, to whome hee had trusted his Crowne and Scepter. A Prince that hath Traytours in his army, neuer fighteth happily. Charlemagne repented his trust repofed in Ganelon, and Charles Duke of Bourgongne in Campobaccio.

The Duke of Biron had alwaies dissuaded this peace. For that is alwayes the nature of fouldiers to desire worke at whose cost whosoeuer, and not to haue rest, but in troubles which they breede or entertaine. But finding that this peace must send him home to his

A his gouernment, and that the King had some notice of his practises with La Fin, hee leemed to be very penitent, and asked pardon of the King, walking in the Cloyster of the Franciscan Friars at Lyons, beseeching him (with a countenance full of contrition and humilitie) to forget his bad intentions, the which rage and despight for the Cittadell of Bourg had possessed his heart with. The King pardoned him, saying: That hee was well pleased, that he had relyed vpon his clemencie, and the loue which he bare him, wherof he would alwaies giue him so good proofes, as he should haue no cause to doubt, nor to attempt any thing against the assurance he had of his loyaltie. Going from thence, he met with the Duke of Espernon, saying, That (as to his best friend) he would impart vnto him, the best aduenture that euer happened vnto him, having discharged his conscience from the terrors and horrors that did afflict him: and that the King had pardoned him what was past, and had promised him all fauour hereafter. The Duke of Espernon answered, that he was glad, but he must craue an abolishment: for offences of that qualitie are not so easily remitted. How should I (sayd he) assure my selfe better then in the Kings word? If the Duke of Biron must sue for an abolishment; what must others do? The Duke of Espernon had reason to aduise him to take an abolishment, and the other was in no error in trusting to the Kings word, who had forgotten his fault; if hee had done nothing since to renew the remembrance. But here they obserued an act the King, to come and receiue his commaundements, and the testimonie of his clemencie, parts from Bourg, and comes to lye at Vimy. There he made a dispatch to La Fin, who was at Milan. Hee goes to Lyons, and is receiued of the King, as the father doth his lost child, whom he hath found again. He stayed some dayes at Lyons, and hauing accompanied the Queene at her departure, he returned to Vimy, where hee made another dispatch to La Fin by one Farges. As soone as he comes to Bourg, he sends away Bolco (cousin to Romcas) to aduance the busines.

Crimes of treason are not pardoned without an abolishment.

He continues the offence pardoned.

This negotiation was continued at Some, betwixt the Duke of Sauoy, the Count of Fuentes, and La Fin. The Count of Fuentes led La Fin to Milan, desiring to be satisfied of some points, but finding his answers not constant, he thought it not fit to trust the secret vnto him, but to dispatch him; who finding that he was vnpleasing vnto them in this negotiation, stayed not long there. Hereupon he sent him backe, and requested him to passe by the Duke. But he did well in taking his way by the Grisons, to recouer Basill, Paurentin, and Befançon, for Renazé his Secretarie, who passed into Sauoy was stayed prisoner. The worke changed nothing but the instrument. Alphonso Casaf, and Romcas continued it with the Baron of Lux. In the meane time the Duke of Biron slept not, hauing sent a man into Spaine, although he were neare vnto the King, who for that he would not loose him, kept him about him, he carried him to the frontier, and sent him into England, where he heard of the death of the Earle of Essex. A fresh example of Iustice against those that seeke to be feared of their masters, and abuse their loue. At his returne he made a voyage into Gasconie, where he was honoured of the Nobilitie as a Prince, and beeing returned to Dijon, he went into Suifferland, to conclude the reuning of the Kings allyance, where he continued his practises with the Count of Fuentes, to whom he sent his Secretarie, vnder colour to conduct his Pages to Nova Palma, a Fort of the Venetians. Being returned out of Suifferland, hee went not to giue account of his charge, excusing himself vpon the holding of Estates of the Prouince. The K. who had some inking of these broiles, (by Cómbelles) desired greatly to speake with La Fin, to be informed of the truth. La Fin who had his heart big with despight, that the Baron of Lux would haue all the fruit of this negotiation: and that Renazé was detained prisoner in Sauoy, sent Cerezat to the Duke of Biron, to tell him that he could no longer be his seruant, if he did not deliuer him Renazé, aduertising him also that hee could no longer defer his going vnto the King, and that he desired to know what hee would haue him say, touching things past. He made smal account of one of his propositions, and spake of Renazé as if he were no more among the liuing. Touching the other he said to Cerezat, that he was of opinion he should go to Court with a small traine, and that he should should prepare himselfe at the first, to receiue words of choller and contempt from the A King, the which he should easily calme, in beseeching him to beleue, that the voyage which he had made into Italy, was onely for deuotion to our Lady of Loretto, and that passing by Milan and Thurin, they had charged him to propound the marriage of the Duke of Sauoys third daughter vnto him, which he would not hearken vnto, seeing his Maiestie would take the care to marrie him. He intreated and adiuured Cerezat, to aduise La Fin, to dismisse all those that had made the voyages with him, especially a Curate, and to lay his papers in some place of safetie, if he would not burne them, and to consider in the end, that he had in his hands, his Life, his Fortune, and his Honour. La Fin came to the Court at Fontainebleau in the end of Lent, he spake first with the King, and B with Villeroy alone, he had conference with the Chancellor in the night, with Rhosai in the Forest, and with Sillery at the pressing place, being newly come out of Suifferland. All had horror to see the writings, and to heare the desseignes which they vnderstood. We must not beleue lightly: for Slander is subtil, and doth seeke to supplant the most innocent actions. But when the preferuation of the State is in question, the most doubtfull things are not to be reiected nor contemned. The King could hardly beleue so great a wickednesse: the facilitie of his bountie made him hard of beleefe. La Fin made him to see such apparent and certaine proofes of this conspiracie, as hee was forced to beleue more then he desired. Hee declared all that had past in his voyages to the Duke of Sauoy, and the Earle of Fuentes, for the Duke of Biron, saying: That hee desired, C that the returne of the warre might haue troubled his Maiestie, and profited them that were the cause of it. But seeing that his sacred and inuiolable person was not excepted, and that they made cruel desseignes against him, he had such horror, as he was resolu- ed, to giue him intelligence thereof, chosing rather to faile in his promise to the Seruant, then in his duty to the Master. The King full of clemencie and bountie, was wonder- fully grieved to see so vnatural a conspiracie: yet he sayd, that if the Conspirators did their duties, and gaue him the meanes they might to preuent the bad desseignes of his enemies, he would pardon them. If they weepe (sayd hee) I will weepe with them. If they remember what they owe me, I will not forget what is due to them. They shal find D me as full of clemencie, as they are voyd of good affections. I would not haue the Mar- shall of Biron the first example of the seueritie of my Iustice, and that he should be the cause that my raigne (which hitherto hath beene like vnto a calme and cleare skie) shold be suddenly ouercast with cloudes of thunder and lightning. And from that time his resolution was, that if the Marshall of Biron confessed the truth, he would pardon him. His Councell were of that opinion, so as he would employ himselfe effectually, to do as much good for the seruice of his Estate against his enemies, as hee had practised ill among them. Of many papers which La Fin presented vnto the King, they made choice E of seuen and twenty peeces, which were not those which concluded most against the Duke of Biron, but which made mention onely of him, the King beeing vnwilling to haue the rest discovered, to the end that the punishment of one, might serue for an example to all. The Chancellor kept these papers with such care, as he caused them to be sowed vnto his doublet, beeing loth to trust any one with them, or shew them til need required. The Baron of Lux was at Fontainebleau when as La Fin arriued, the King sayd vnto him that he was very well satisfied, that La Fin had spoken so honourably, and so wisely of the Duke of Biron, that he knew well his intentions were not conuerted to any bad desseignes, as they sayd. He returned to Dijon well content, thinking that all things were found. La Fin writes to the Duke of Biron, that he had satisfied the King of his actions, and hath sayd nothing but what he thought might serue to banish all bad impressions. The King managed the busines so wisely, as the euent was happy, making shew to feare no enemies but abroad. He grew ielous at the arming of so many gallies at Genoa F for the K. of Spaine, vnder colour of the Prince of Piedmonts passage, least they should haue some enterprize vpon Prouence. He therefore commanded the Dukes of Guise and Ventadour, to be careful of their charges. He writ to the Gouvernor of Lyons (whose intent was to spend some part of the Summer at Chaumont) to return to Lyons, for that he

A he was aduertised from all parts that his enemies had some desseigne there, whereof they wanted. He commanded Des Digueires to go to horse-backe if need were, and when the Gouvernor of Lyons should send for him, and he caused the Marquis of Spinola's troups to bee obserued, the which were ready to passe at Pont de Grefin to go into Flanders, the which in truth were but to couer the Duke of Biron's practises.

The King parted from Fontainebleau to go to Blois and so into Poictou. There are alwaies in States (as in great bodies) swellings and bad humors, which are not to be cured by violent remedies, but gently, and by the Princes presence. There were in Guienne and Poictou, diuers morions, which could not be disperfed but by the light of the King. He resolu- ed to go into those quarters, and to shew himselfe vnto them glorious B in peace, who had neuer seene him but triumphant in warre. Hee past to Blois, Tours, and then to Poictiers. His presence did pacifie all Mutinies, which grew by reason of the imposition of a Soultz vpon the Livre, and through the apprehension which was giuen the people, that he would giue Garrisons to some Townes, and Cittadels to others, and to all in generall an increase of their miseries. But as soone as the King had sayd vnto them, that he came not to see them and ruine them, but to releue them. That he would build no other fortresses but in their harts, nor vse any more constraints to succour the necesseties of the Crowne, then their owne good wils: That he desired more to adde and increase, then to take away or diminish their contents: and that hee would not haue the gold of his treasure to be bathed in the teares and bloud of his subiects: there was no man but did blesse the yeares of his raigne, and did wish it immortal. His presence did also disappoint many bad practises, which were growing. France was so full of corrupt humors, as vpon the least motion that happened, it was readie to fall into her former Phrenesies.

The great trouble of the Pallace at Paris, by the intermission of hearing of causes, and the dismission of Aduocates, (the which happened the 12. of May, a fatall moneth for the Parisiens by a greater reuolt) seemed to preface some new storme. The cause grew from a decree of the Court, giuen against Aduocates, and by the Kings authoritie and expresse commandement, who before he parted from Paris to passe the Easter at Fontainebleau sent for the chiefe of the Court of Parliament, and of all the other D Courts, to recommend their charges vnto them. From whose owne mouth they vnderstood, how much he desired that Iustice might be administred with lesse charge, and lesse losse of time. That there was no Iustice for them that had no money; so excessiue were the Iudges Spices, and the Aduocates Fees. The Court of Parliament desiring that according to the Kings mind, intention, and last command, the excesse (whereof they complayned) against the Aduocates, might be reduced to a meane and iust temper, assembled to redresse those disorders. The opinions beeing heard and numbred, against Aduocates, the first President shewing that a reformation was as necessarie in Iudges as in Aduocates. In the end a decree was made, by the which it was ordained E and appointed, that euery Aduocate should set downe vnder his hand, in the end of his writings, what he had taken for his owne fees, to the end that in case of excesse, it might be moderated, when as the Court should proceed to iudgement of the proceffe. Moreover, they should giue a certificate what they had taken for the pleading of causes, to be set downe in the taxe of charges, all vpon paine of extortion. This law was not made against the good, but onely to restraine the auarice of others, who preferre the oportunitie of taking, before all apprehension. All notwithstanding did oppose themselves against the execution of this law, saying, that they would rather leaue their places, then subiect themselves to the rigour of the Decree, and do so great a wrong to the dignity and liberty of their profession.

F The Court made another Law, whereby it was decreed, that such as would not pleade, should deliuer their names vnto the Register, after the which they were forbidden to practise as Aduocates, vpon paine of falshood. hundred and seuen, they past through the pallace hall, went to the Register to give vp A their hoods, and to declare that they obeyed the second decree, seeing they could not obey the first. From that time the pallace was without pleading, the Aduocates being busied to defend themselves, yet they royle was not great for them to maintaine a bad cause for themselves, which had defended so many for others. The cause was bad indeed, for that it did impugne the Iustice of a law made at the Estates of Blois, and that it seemed priuate men would know more then the law it selfe. They caused a Declaration to be published at Paris, in the name of a young Aduocate, but it was written by one of the learnedst of the pallace, declaring that as of custome they should referre their reward to the discretion of the parties; the reasons were grounded vpon the fidelity, discretion, learning, and eloquence of the Aduocates of the Court of Parliament B of Paris, to whom they could not reproch preuarication, or filthy contracts, so ordinarie heretofore at Rome, or that they euer had proceffe for their Fees, although they plead infinit causes, for the which through the pouertie or misprision of parties, the Aduocates haue not any thing, and others for the which they receiue no recompence, but a yea, yea three or foure after their employments. They shewed, that they could not iudge of the excessiue fees of a Pleader, vnlesse they knew the time which had bin employed to peruse the writings, and to study the questions, and that sometimes bare words cost more whole nights, then a long discourse, which shall containe many Cytations, will require quarters of houres. That for this respect the President Thou in a famous cause, after that he had pronounced sentences, sayd, (as hauing charge from the Court) that all which Princes and Noblemen gaue vnto their Aduocates, could in no sort equall the recompence which their care, diligence, and knowledge did merit. That this profession is very laborious and painfull, to the which the gate of the greatest dignities of the Realme was open, when as they knew not what it was to buy such Offices.

That there is nothing comparable to the apprehension of an Oratour, to loose in one day the reputation which he hath purchased in thirtie yeares, when as he speakes in the presence of 3000. persons which neuer heard him, and that an inconsiderate word or a defect of memorie (wherein the greatest Oratours haue sayled) should blemish all the D fruites of their study. That this profession being an Art which consumes much, it shold be fauored, to the end that such as are in that course might be encouraged to perseuer, and others inuited which might succeed them. That next to the Art of warre there is nothing more generous, then to oppose themselves to the violence of great men, notwithstanding all their secret and open threats: and to make Truth, Equitie, and Iustice to shine through a million of cloudes, which they would obscure by diuers Contracts: To cause the wicked to tremble, to incourage good men, and to be a Sanctuary to innocents oppressed, and by the liuely force of an eloquent discourse, capable to moue rockes, to breake the hardnesse of mens hearts banded to support iniustice and wrong, and according to occasions which should be presented, extoll vnto E heauen, his Prince, and countrey. That it was impossible that they which had attained to the most difficult sciences in the world, shold submit themselves to the scandall of Sollicitours, who would giue lesse to the Aduocate then their masters had commaunded them, and to couer their theft they would make them beleue, they would not giue them quitances for such a summe, although they had taken all. That the very day this Order shold take place, all Liberties shold be banished from the Barre, there beeing few which could resolue to liue otherwise, then vnder the Lawes which great personages haue made, hauing immortalized their names by their Learning and Eloquence, who could not do any thing against their Honour, no more then against their consciences, flying dishonest things, not as vnlawfull, but as shamefull and reprochful. That posteritie will neuer approoue the counsel which some would giue his Maie- F stie, to bee the first that shold beginne to disfaue those which had bene alwaies held and esteemed among the best and most pregnant wits of his Kingdome, and who by their golden penne and immorall sounding voyce do consecrate to eternitie the

A the worthie actions, and glorious deeds of armes, of great Kings, and great Captaines: yet could they not moue the Court to reuoke or change the Decree; they were forced to haue recourse vnto the King, to reconcile this diuision, which happened vpon a day, which reuiued the memory of a greater trouble, sent his letters to the Parliament in tearmes conformable to his iustice, and the wisdom of his Councel. By the which it was lawfull for Aduocates to exercise their functions, as they had done before the sayd Decree, enioyning them notwithstanding to obserue the ordinance made at Blois in that behalfe, in the 161. Article. The parties which had sutes did languish in expectation of this declaration. As they complained of the corruption, so they suffered the inconueniencie of the remedy.

B The Court which had made many iust and seuer Lawes against Duels and Combats, confirmed the Edict which the King made at Blois. Before his Maiesties departure from Fontainebleau, he had commanded the Constable, Chancelor, Marshals of France and the chiefe of his Councell, to deuise some meanes to suppress the libertie of Duels, being so iniurious and preiudiciall to his Estate. By their aduice an Edict was made, by the which they that call, or are called, or which assist, or second him that calls, or is called, are declared guiltie of high Treason, and to be punished according to the rigor of the Lawes. Commanding the Constable, Marshals of France, Gouvernours, and Lieutenants generall of Prouinces, to preuent Duels, and to forbid them vpon paine of death, to iudge absolutely as they shall thinke good, of all that concernes the reparation of wrongs, and to force them that are condemned, to satisfie by imprisonment. C It is true, that the custome of fighting is stronger then the Law, that the obedience of the Law is alwaies held for faintnesse of heart, and to kill in single combat not for iniuries and offences alone, but for opinions and shadowes of offences is but a sport, being to be feared that Duels wilbe as ordinarie in France as in the Realme of Narsingue, whereas the King doth not only allow them, but doth also assist, and giues markes of honor and recompence to the victors, vpon condition that another might take it from him by the same meanes that he had gotten it, in measuring their armes. But it is lost labor to prescribe lawes to them who thinke their courages cannot be subiect, nor D the French kept from fighting being of such an humor as they cannot liue otherwise, but must with the losse of their liues pay their apprenticeship of Fencing.

Whilst the enemy watched to ouerthrow this Estate, and that to minister occasion to speake of them, they would set Diana's Temple on fire, and consume obedience to ashes, the King neglected not the meanes to crosse their desseignes. The voyage which he made into Poyctou, diuerted the effects, and reclaimed them to their duties which by perswasions and dangerous impressions were gone astray. And although wee haue some feeling of the last Frenzie, and that the Feauer which hath so afflicted the body, hath in it some bad humors, that the people is by nature variable and easily drawne away. Yet the pretexts which they tooke to moue them, were reiected like drugges E which had taken wind, and bitter pilles guilt ouer with goodly hopes, to profit by the change of the present Estate. In the end the King effected his busines happily in Poitou: he found so great an obedience in them to please him, as hee remained very well satisfied. His Maiesty left so many testimonies in all places of his bounty, as al had cause to praise him, and to blame their practises which sought to trouble the peace. The D. of Biron did not thinke the King shold haue found so great obedience and loue, among his subiects of that Prouince. He had sent some of his seruants to Court, to learne how the market went, and to shew the discontent he had for the ialousie which was conceiued of his faith and duty. The King who was well informed of his intelligences with the Count of Fuentes, resolved to see him, and to keepe him from his enemies. Hee sent Descares F vnto him, with charge to say, that hauing intelligence of the great Leuiies of soldiers made in Italy, hee had resolved to maintaine the bodie of an armie vpon the frontier, and to giue the charge vnto him, and to that end hee had commanded de Vic his Ambassador in Suisse, to demand a leuy of 6000. men, and to cause them to march where he shold haue directions: that therein he followed the counsell of the Constable his gossip, whose aduice he sent him in writing, and desired to haue his by mouth, con-iuring him to come with speed. He stirres not for all that, excusing himselfe sometimes vpon the holding of the Estates: sometimes that the enemy being so neare, it were an act vnworthy of his reputation to turne his backe and abandon the frontier. The King sent the President Janin, a man powerfull in perswasion, who comming to Dijon, gaue the Duke to vnderstand how much the King desired to see him, and how necessary this fight was, and among many discourfes (applyed fitly to his humor) he let him know the Kings strength, and the length of his arme. This was not able to moue him. He considered that the Duke of Biron must be perswaded to this voyage, by him that was all of his counsell, whom he assured that as he should haue all the Honour of this perswasion, so he could expect nothing but disgrace and ruine of a contrarie counsell. His friends notwithstanding did coniure him not to come, one of his best friends sent him word by his brother, that his gouernement was disposed of, and that for his last hope he aduised him to retire into the Franche Conté. Another friend sent him word that he should distrust all he saw, and all that should be sayd vnto him to moue him to come: that the Kings letters were golden Pills: that La Fins assurances were but de-ceits, and to consider that the voyage which the Vidame of Chartres had made to Au-tun (to assure him that his Vncle had sayd nothing) was made at the Kings charge. But another friend sent him a contrary aduice to come, and that his onely presence would disperce all these bad reports. There was danger in either. The King sware hee would go fetch him: He should haue seene himselfe beleeged with the Kings forces, and farre from the strangers which had charge to passe into Flanders. In going, the foulness of his offence could giue him no hope to returne. He takes that aduice which he thinks lesse perillous, and nothing doth so much aduance the execution, as the assurance he takes of that which La Fin had written vnto him, whom he sees returned to his house contented, and freed from all distrust. So the Duke promisseth to come vnto the King about the middest of Iune, to some of his houses neere vnto Paris. It was a signe of distrust which the King dissembled, as being indifferent vnto him. The President Janin goes before, and the Duke of Biron with Desceurs follow after by easie iourneys. Vpon the way he had an aduice sent him to come no further, and being at Montargis he was in great suspence, but hee had so great a confidence of himselfe, and of the opinion which all the Court had of his valor, as he did not beleue there was any man so hardy as to lay hold of him, and that if he might haue but meanes to draw his sword, he would free himselfe from his enemies. He flattered himselfe in his vanity, and pleased himselfe as Pigmalion did in his Image, and Narcissus in his Shadow. The counsell which they gaue him to humble himself vnto the King, was the last anchor of his health. He found no man that spake for his pride, but euery man would haue intreated for his humilitie:

The King sends for the Duke of Biron

But his courage was too great to stoope. Presumption had filled his eares with so much vanity, as the voice of Truth could not enter. If he were not resolved to take that course what need he come? He should consider that he had offended the King, that offences of Princes are fixed stars, their fauors are moueable, & are like to the Egyptian wheels.
That if the King had had no other prooffe of his bad desseignes, but what suspicion and opinion might giue him, it had bene alwaies dangerous to approach. If he had known nothing but by dreames and diuinations, yet should he thinke it had bene sufficient to put him to death. We must thinke (sayd Neslor to Agamemnon) that all that a Prince doth dreame for the conduct of his Estate is true. And if the innocencie of that wher-of hee was accused, had assured him of his returne, yet should he consult with his conscience: it is better to relye in her, then in all the assurances which the offence can imagine, to free him from the punishment which followeth him, as the shadow doth the body. The conscience is the accuser, the witnes, and the iudge of the most secret crimes the poursuites and torments whereof cannot be auoyded.

These with other reasons were giuen to stay him in his iourney. But it is impossible to auoyde the prouidence of Heauen. The Duke of Biron will needes carrie his head to the Kings Iustice. The discourse of Reason, or the iudgements of Truth preuaile not with

A with a spirit transported with passions. There were many badde présages of the Dukes voyage. A Duke came into his cabinet and no man knew how, he commanded it should be carefully kept, but as soone as he was parted it died. Presently after the horse which the Arch-duke gaue him called Pasfranz, fell mad and killed himselfe. The like happened to a horse which he had from the great Duke. Another horse which the Duke of Lorraine gaue him, pined to death.

He came to Fontainebleau, when as they had no more hope of his comming, and the King had resolved within two or three dayes after to go into Bourgongne. His Maiestty walking in the great garden about sixe of the clocke in the morning, was heard say vnto the Lord of Souvray. He will not come? He had scarce spoken these words, but he sees him enter with him. The King sayd, he comes fitly to conduct him to his house. He aduanceth and makes three great courtesies a good distance off. The King embraced him and sayd, that he was come in good time to conduct him to his house: which words were di-uerly vnderstood by the hearers. The first words he vsed vnto the King, were vpon the occasion of his comming, beginning to excuse his long stay. The King gaue eare to few words, but tooke him by the hand, to walke and to shew him the plot of his building. Passing from one garden to another, the Duke of Espernon saluting the Duke of Biron, told him in his eare, that in comming he had giuen more credit to his own courage, then to the counsell of his friends. In all the discourse which he had with the King, C as there appeared coldnesse in the countenance of the one, so there was some signe of perturbation in the others words. The King talked vnto him of the bad course hee had taken, the which had no other issue, then ruine, repentance, and despaire. The Duke of Biron answered, That he was not come either to iustifie himselfe, or to demand pardon, or to accuse his friends. He let scape many other words, which his Maiestties presence and the law of duty should haue restrained. It is not sufficient to be faithfull, if his tongue and heart do not witness his loyalty.

Dinner time being come, he desired to dine with the Duke of Espernon, for that his owne Trayne was not yet come. After dinner they came to see the King, who hauing walked a litle in the Hall, retired into his Cabinet, commanding two or three to enter, D and sayd nothing to the Duke of Biron, who stayed at the corner of the bedde towards the chaire, obseruing that he was not respected as he had wont to be, and that hee was no more in opinion and admiration as he had bene. The Marquis of Rhosny entred into the Cabinet, and hauing stayed there almost halfe an hower, he came forth and faluted the Duke of Biron, telling him, that the King asked for him. There he was perswa-ded not to conceale that which time could not long keep hidden, and whereof the K.
was so well informed: that what he desired to know from the Dukes owne mouth, was but to let him see, that none but himselfe should haue knowledge thereof. The D. of Biron (who thought that La Fin had not discovered any thing) continued still firme, vpon the protestations of his innocency, beseeching the King to do him iustice, against E them that sought to oppress him by slanders: insupportable to a conscience so cleare as his was, or to suffer him to take his reuenge by the sword. The King led him to the Tennis court: he could make the match, saying, That the Duke of Espernon and he, would play against his Maiestie and the Count of Soissons. The Duke of Espernon answered presently, You play well, but you make your matches ill. At night hee supped with the Lord Steward. It appeared he was not content. He ate not any thing, no man spake to him, and they held him for a man abandoned to misfortune. Yet he thought no man would lay hand on him, trusting too much in his owne courage. The King in the meane time walked in his chamber, deuising of some great resolution, he was heard speake these words, he must bend or break. He gaue him time to take counsell of his conscience, & to evaporate those bad humors which did choke him. The night past so quietly as many thought it would be but a thunder-clap, which made a great noise, and did little harme, that the King would rest satisfied to haue discovered the treason, and taken all meanes from the traytors to hurt him, not being conuenient to discover all the conspirators.
He commanded the Count of Soissons to go to the D. of Biron, & to do what he could to 1602. to dissolue the hardnes of his heart, and to draw the truth from him: he goes vnto him, A he coniures and adiures him, to think of that which he thought least of to humble himselfe, and to feare the Lyons paw, and the indignation of a King. The Duke of Biron answered, That the King could not complaine but of the good seruices he had done him, and that he had great reason to complaine that he suspected his loyalty, hauing giuen him so many proofs. The Count of Soissons hauing obserued his humor, and what little fruite might be drawne from his obdurate heart, by any more perswasions, who beleeued that the K. had sent him to draw something from him, he left him. Early the next morning the King walking in the little Garden, he sent for the Duke of Biron, and talked long with him, thinking to reclaim him, and to giue him means to free himselfe from the mischief in- to the which he did run headlong by his wilfulnesse. He continued long bare-headed, lis- B ting his eyes vp to heauen, beating his brest, and making great protestations to main- taine his innocencie. There appeared choller in the Kings countenance, and by the Duke of Biron's behaviour there seemed fire in his words.

Disimulation
a new vertue
in Princes.

In great accidents iustice is without for-malitie.

From thence the Duke went to dinner, by the way he met one with a Letter which aduised him to retire himselfe: he shewed it to the Captaine of his Guard, who wished that hee had bene stabd with a Dagger, so as he had not come. He mocked at all them which fore-told his fall, and seemed alwaies hardy and bold in his answers. The King heard his braueries coldly, but not able to apply himselfe to dissemble, which is held a C new vertue in Princes, he still cast out some words of the bad estate into the which his wilfulnesse would bring him. The King was much troubled in mind before he could res- olue: the Lords of Villeroi, Sillery, and Geure went and came often, before they could vnderstand whereunto it tended. Many thought it was to shorten the course of Iustice, in so apparent a crime, and begin with the execution, dealing with the Duke of Biron, as Alexander did with Parmenio: for Princes are Masters of the Lawes, they haue one forme of Iustice for great men, and another for those whose qualitie requires not so great respect. In these accidents there is no difference whether bloud be drawne be- fore or after dinner; Necessity teacheth the disorder, and the Profit doth recompence D the Example, so as the Estate be preferred by the death of him that is prevented. But the King will none of that. He proceeds with more courage and Generositie: these ex- amples of execution had bin blamed in his Predecessors, he will haue his subiects, and all the world to know, that he hath power and authority sufficient to root out by the forme of Iustice, not the authors of such a conspiracy, for they be diuels, but the com- plices and the instruments how terrible foeuer. He will haue the solemnities and lawfull ceremonies obserued, and that they be iudged by the rigour of the Lawes. He vseth no Proscriptions, he makes no Proclamations, that he will giue 100000. crownes to him, that shall bring the Conspirators heads, and will make his house Noble: hee sends for them, they come, and being come hee punisheth them.

The Duke of Biron carried a short sword.

He prayseth
the King of Spaine.

The resolution was taken to apprehend him, and in like sort to seaze vpon the Count of Auvergne. The King would not haue them taken in the Castell, but in their lod- E gings. The Duke of Biron who had some doubt thereof, and who was prepared for that which he could not fore-see nor prevent, thought that hee needed not to feare any thing in the Kings Chamber, and that all the danger were at the going forth; and therefore he provided himselfe of a short sword, with the which he presumed to make his passage. They gaue the King to vnderstand, that if he were apprehended in any o- ther place, it must needs be bloody: that to auoyde an inconuenience, it was good to passe ouer respects that were more vaine then necessary. The King walking in the Gal- lery, called for Vitry and Pralin, and gaue them order how he would haue his coman- dements executed, and then he called for his Supper. The Duke of Biron sapt at Mon- tigny's lodging, where he spake more proudly and vainly then euer, of his owne Me- F rits, and of the friends he had gotten in Suifferland. Then he fel to commend the decea- sed King of Spaine, his Piety, Iustice, and Liberality. Montigny stayed him suddenly, saying, That the greatest commendation they could giue vnto his memorie, was to haue put his owne Sonne to death, for that he had attempted to trouble his Estates. This speech brake off,

A off the Duke of Biron's discourse, who answered but with his eyes, and thought of it with some little amazement. After supper the Count of Auvergne and the Duke of Biron came to the King, who walked in the garden. They were well accompanied, in- tending to haue gone with a lesse traine. It was sayd the Dukes horses were sadled ready to be gone, and that he had asked leaue in the morning. The King hauing done walking, inuited the Duke of Biron to play; they entred into the Queenes Chamber. The Count of Auvergne passing by the Duke at the entry of the doore, sayd vnto him in his care, We are undone. There plaied at Primero, the Queene, the Duke of Biron (vpon whom all the mischief must fall) and two others. The King plaied at Cheffe, and in playing did act the part of Vlisses, going and comming to giue order to his affaires. B It appeared that his spirit was troubled with a waighy action. Hee entred into his Cabinet, being perplexed with two contrary passions, doubtfull wherevnto hee should yeeld. The loue which hee had borne to the Duke of Biron, the knowledge hee had of his valour, and the remembrance of his seruices, made him to reiect all thoughts of Ius- tice, and to treat him, as Licurgus had done him that put out his eye. On the other side, feare of trouble in his Estate, and the apprehension of the execrable effects of so vnaturall a conspiracy, accused his clemency of cruelty, which preferred the priuate before the publike. Hee praied vnto God to assist him with his Holy Spirit, to pacifie the combat which hee felt in his soule, and to fortifie him with a holy resolution, to C that which should bee for the good of his people, ouer whom hee commanded by his onely grace. His praier beeing ended, all difficulties which troubled him were disper- sed, and he fully resolved to deliuer the Duke of Biron into the hands of Iustice, if hee might not otherwise draw the truth from him of his disloyall enterprises. They conti- nued play still, the King taking the Queenes place some-times, attending the end of his resolution. The Count of Auvergne was retired, the King sent for him, and walked vp and downe the chamber whilst the Duke of Biron dremp of nothing but his game. Varennas Lieutenant of his company, making a shew to take vp his cloake, told him in his care, That he was undone. This word troubled him so, as hee neglected his game. The Queene obserued it and told him, That he had misreckoned himselfe to his owne losse: The D King sayd; That they had plaied ynough, commanding euery man to retire. He entred into his Cabinet, and commanded the Duke of Biron to enter with him, whose health or ru- ine depended vpon an answer pleasing to his Maiesty. Who willed him once for all to declare what he had done with the Duke of Sapoy, and the Count of Fuentes, and that he should assure himselfe, his clemency should be greater then his fault. The Duke of Biron who beleeued that hee deserued death that demanded life, had not the heart to humble himselfe, nor the tongue to craue pardon. He answered the King more boldly then euer, That they had overprest an honest man, and that he neuer had any other design, then that which hee had sayd. I would to God it were so, replied the King, but you will not tell it me: Adieu, good night.

He plaies at Primero with the queene.

He will not humble himselfe to the Kings Clemency.

He is seized on at the Kings Chamber doore.

E As he goes out of the Cabinet, and had past the chamber doore, hee met with Vitry, who laies his hand vpon his sword, and demands it of him by the Kings commandment. From mee (sayd the Duke of Biron) to take away my sword who haue so well serued the King? my sword, who haue ended the war, and haue settled a peace in France? That my sword which my enemies could neuer take from mee, should bee taken from mee by my friends. Hee intreated the Duke of Montbazon to beseech the King, to giue him leaue to deliuer it into his owne hands. The King sent Vitry charge to doe his commandement. The Duke of Biron was forced to suffer them to take it from him, and in deliuering it, hee cast his eyes about him, to see if hee could seize vpon some other, but they had preuen- ted him. When as he saw all the gard placed in order in the Gallery, hee thought they would haue slaine him, and demanded some-thing in his hand, That hee might haue the honour to die in defending himselfe, and some little time to pray vnto God. They answered him; That there was not any man would offend him, that they had no other charge from the King, but to conduct him to his lodging. You see (sayd he in passing) how they in- treat good Catholics.

The Count of Auvergne taken

False bruits of the causes of his imprisonment.

A Letter written by one of the Kings servants.

The Marshall Launardin sent into Burgundy.

He was conducted to the Cabinet of armes, whereas he neither slept, nor laie downe. A Pralin went to the Count of Auvergne, declared vnto him the Kings commandment, and demanded his sword; Hold, take it said the Count, it hath neuer killed any but wilde boares, if thou hadest aduertised me of this, I had bene in bed and a sleepe two houres since. These two Noblemen were like vnto two torches, which beeing held downeward are quenched with the waxe which did nourish them and giue them light. And as if all the duques power had bin in his sword, as soone as he had deliuered it, he remained as a body without a soule, and was in a moment depriued of all that which Galba held most precious amongst men, faith, liberty and friendshipp. There came no word out of his mouth but did offend God or the King. He suffered himselfe to bee carried away with extreame impatience. The fore-sight of misery which doth moderate it in others, made B it insupportable to him, cursing himselfe and his indiscretion, in that he had not beleueed his good friends, who aduised him to make his peace a farte off. This choller in effect was not much vnlike vnto a mad man, but in the countenance: for suddenly he reclaimed himselfe and considered that all his cries and words, were not of force to saue him.

Presently dispatches were made to all the Princes and Potentats of Christendome, to Gouvernors of Prouinces and to Ambassadors, who were amazed at this accident, as of a most odious conspiracy, by a person that was so much obliged. Those which fauored it, gaue out false brutes in Italy, that it was a blow giuen to Religion, to weaken it in the ruine of him who sayd that hee desired no more glorious tide, then to bee furnamed the Scurge of the Huguenots. That it was an aduice from England to breake the lauelins one after another. The King would haue these false impressions made cleere by the light of truth, euen whereas the passion of his enemies did seeke to obscure it.

One wrying out of the Realme vpon this subiect, sayd, That it was no question of Religion, but to dismember the crowne, and to diuide it at the discretion of the Countsell of Spaine, and the Duke of Sauoy, rooting out the King and his Race. It may bee the Authors and vndertakers would haue bene troubled in the execution of their deigne, although we had not preuented them, as now we haue. But it was the end wherevnto they aspired. The names of many haue beene drawn in vnkowne to them, the which the Kings Iustice might wel discerne and verifie: you must not bee moued with the bruits which flie abroad, but beleue what I write vnto you, for it is the very truth. The next day about dinner-time, the Duke of Biron sent to tel his Maiesty, That if hee tooke not order for Burgundy it was lost, for that as soone as the Baron of Lux, should heare of his imprisonment hee would vndoubtedly deliuer Dijon, and Beaune vnto the Spaniard. These words did greatly offend the King, who sayd; Behold the bouldnesse and impudency of the Marshall Biron, who sends mee word, that Burgundy is lost, if I take not order, and that the Baron of Lux will draw in the Spaniard when he shal heare of his imprisonment. His obstinacy hath vndone him, if hee would haue told mee the truth of one thing, whereof I haue prooffe by his owne hand writing, he should not bee where he is; I would I had payd two hundred thousand crownes, that hee had giuen mee meanes to pardon him. I neuer loued any so much as him. I would haue committed my sonne and Realme into his hands. Hee hath done me good seruice, yet he cannot deny but I haue thrice saued his life. I drew him out of the enemies hands at Fontaine-Francoise, so wounded, and so amazed with blowes, that as I playd the souldier to saue him, I also playd the Marshall to make the retreat, for hee told mee that hee was not then in case to doe it, nor to serue me. The King attended not this aduertisement from the Duke of Biron, for hee had already sent the Marshall Launardin to settle his Authority in that Prouince, with a resolution to march in person if there were neede. His enemies were not without feare, doubting that hee would proceed farther, nothing being so much to be feared as an enemy that hath alwaies vanquished. About fiftene daies before, Bourg l'Espinaffe received a Commission to raise a regiment of tenne companies, and Nereffan had the like to supply his. The order was to send them into Prouence, but necessity had drawne them into Bourgongne, with two regiments of Suisses, vnder

A vnder the commands of the colonels, Galaty and Heyd, and a great quantity of Artillery drawne out of the Arcenall of Paris, and that of Lions, it all the country had not presently yeelded obedience to their Prince. The President Janin made many voyages thether with great expedition. Some of the Duke of Biron's seruants had a desire to seeke the prisoners liberty by proofes of obedience, and not by effects of rebellion, and that he would iudge of his intentions by the behauiour of his seruants. The townes of Dijon and Beaune intrenched themselves against the castles, who (acknowledging that it were not onely a rashnesse, but an iniustice to fall from their obedience) deliuered the B care of Boesfe. All France was in peace, euery man detesting the Duke of Biron and his adherents. The King seemed to bee very well satisfied, seeing things to succeed better then hee expected, hauing found all obedience and submission in them who in shew were most bold and resolute to trouble his affaires. Hee was more respected and feared of them then euer, and there was no man so great, but did humble himselfe. He sayd openly, that hee was resolued not to indure his subiects to play any more with their King, abusing his bounty as many had done, contemning his actions as vniustly and rashly as without punishment. The prisoners were led to the Bastille at Paris on the Saterdag after. The Duke of Biron going in the boate, seemed heauy and C penfue. The Count of Auvergne was merry and dined. The Duke of Biron entred into the Bastille as into a graue: The Count of Auvergne went as to the Louvre, and imagined that the place where hee should bee, could not be a prison: The King entred into the city the same night, and the people with great cries of ioy, blessed his returne, and praised God for their captiuitie that would haue brought France againe into seruitude.

The King comes to Paris.

This great Prince who like vnto Augustus neuer thought of the death of the least of his subiects but with sighes, did shew that a father cuts off his members with griefe. Some daies after a Gentleman comming to doe his dutie to his Maiesty, sayd vnto him, that he held his life, fortune and honour of him, and that hee came for to doe him D homage: To whom the King answered aloud, that hee might bee vnderstood. I knowe you well, if euerie one did resemble you I should not bee in the paine I am. There were new forces which passed the Alpes. The Spanish Ambassadour demanded passage for Flanders, beseeching the King not to beleue that his master was acquainted with the Duke of Biron's defeignes.

There was some likelihood that their iourney was not so farre, for they could not but arriue to late, Count Maurice was entred into Brabant, to passe into Flanders to the reliefe of Ostend. The Archduke was prepared to hinder him; they must measure their forces, and it was most certaine before this new army had past the Alpes, they had met. This made their marching to bee much suspected, and had done more, if the President Janin had not assured the King, that the Baron of Lux would not giue care to the offers that were made him, promising to bring him to the court, where the King offered him all surety. His Maiesty was aduertised that the Count of Fuentes (one of the chiefe instigators of the Duke of Biron's conspiracy with the Duke of Sauoy) had caused his forces to aduance vnder colour of sending them into Flanders, to giue fauor and countenance to his Partisans that were in Bresse & Burgundy, to encourage them and to with-draw them from his Maiesties obedience. For these reasons as the Ambassadour of Spaine did presse to haue the passage vpon the riuier of Rhosne free. The King who beleueed that by reason of things past, hee could not bee to distrustfull answered, I will not leaue the frontier vnarmed, vntill I bee satisfied by the arraignment of the Duke of Biron, what account I shall make of the faith of the King of Spaine your Maister, touching the obseruation of the peace. You will haue mee beleue that he was ignorant of plots and practises laied with the Count of Fuentes, and I answer that it is hard to beleue that his money, hath bene so bountifully employed without his priuety and command: yet I meane not to breake the commerce that is allowed by by our Treaties. He had only commanded the Marshall Lauvain to lodge and campe A vpon the frontier, to defend the entry of his Estates. D'Albigny hauing bragged; that it hee attempted to retrench the passage, he should soone hane it laied open by armes.

But the Spaniards durst not attempt to passe the bridge of Grefin, fearing to bee repulsit and charged, retyred to Rumilly and Anicy. In the end the King seeing that they feared more their owne harme, then they had any desire to doe harme, hee suffered them to passe.

But to return to the Duke of Biron, it was a strang thing that hauing consulted with himselſe, whether he should come to Court or not, he neglected his friends aduice, and tooke the worst resolution. A minde transported with passion, reiects the best rea- B sons, and retaines the most dangerous opinions. Like vnto a boulder which lets the floure passe, and keepe nothing but the Branne. Before his departure from Dijon, they sayd at Marſailles that hee was taken, and in parting his friends sent him word that hee should leaue his head where he carried it: and that there was no returne for him. Neuer prisoner was better garded, with more care, order and vigilancy. The King caused the Duke to be kept as in his owne house, and at liberty. And for that nature hath found no other remedies against the iniuries of fortune, and the wearinesse of life, then death, they feared that hee would offer violence to himselſe. And therefore those which kept him, carried no armes, and seeing himselſe serued with a knife without a point, hee sayd it was the way to the Greue. Scorning at death, he sayd, that it cou'd not come vnlooked for, C to a man well resolved, nor strange to him that hath foreſcene it, nor shamefull to a resolute minde. Yet he found that it is a miserable life not to be able to die, being deprived of all meanes to aduance death, and to haue no other consolation but in the onely desire of an impossible thing.

Hee spent the first daies of his imprisonment, without eating or sleeping. These violent motions of choller, and the heat of his blood, put him into a Fever, and griefe carried fuming passions vnto his braine, which increased his sicknesse, in the which (as in all other diseases) the feare of death, the paine of his body, and the alteration of his life, did much augment the griefe of his prison. Hee was some-what affraid least vnder colour of remedy, they should giue him poyson to cure all his griefes, and therefore he would haue them take a taste of euery thing, although there were no other assurance of his life, but what his owne conscience could giue him.

His captiuitie deprived him not of the liberty of speaking. The fire of his courage was not smothered vnder the ashes of this affliction. What sayd hee? and what sayd hee not? choller thrust forth a streame of words, in the which there was not a drop of reason. Some-times he sayd; That if they desired to put him to death, they should dispatch him; that they should not bragge they had made him to feare death; that they should speedily drinke themselues drunke, with the blood which remained of thirty and thiue wounds, which he had receiued for the seruice of France.

It is the nature of great spirits not to bee silent for present perils or the feare of serui- E tude. They feared that solitarinesse, fasting, melancholy and change of the place would trouble his braine, and thrust him into some furious passion. To pacifie the discontent of his first imprisonment, they perswaded him to submit himselſe to the mercy of God, and gaue him hope of the Kings pardon. The Archbishop of Bourges went to see him, hee dissuaded him from many bad Maximes of Bourges, and satisfied him of many points which he held against the purity and integrity of a iust confession: Hee desired to speake with Villeroy and Sillery, who went to see him by the Kings commandment.

The Constable of Saint

amplar of an ambitious man.

They had told him, or hee had learned it in the time of his liberty by the reading F of Histories, that the Constable of Saint Paul had bene prysoner in the same place, and desired to see the discourse. They gaue him Enguerrand of Monstrelet, in whose Edition this Tragedy is related. Hee deceiued the time in the reading of Annals, the which he had amplified if they would haue let him alone. Hee should haue done better if hee had read them sooner, and had propounded vnto himselſe his fortune, whose dignity

A dignity hee did effect, full of so many accidents as it had bene sufficient to correct his. 1602.
If hee had seene it sooner hee had found precepts which like vnto a Lanthorne had gi-uen him light amidst the darkenesse of this dangerous navigation, in the which hee had nothing but his owne ambition for compas and saile. Hee should haue knowne that Machiavels counsell (who saith that priuate men rise neuer from a base to a high fortune but by fraude, and force) is ruinous, and that humane lawes being grounded vpon diuine, suffer no confusion of designs whilſt that euery one doth limit them by this condition, and that hee knows that God doth distribute powers for the government of people: That it is alwaies dangerous to play with his maister, and although hee suffer him for a time, yet he is like vnto the Lyon who sodenly laies hold of him that thought to haue mastered him. The Germanes say wee may not eate Cherries with great men, for that they will cast the stones in our eyes if wee play the companions with them.

In the beginning of his imprisonment, he talked of nothing but of Iustice, but knowing his fault hee had no hope but in the Kings mercy. Some one published an admonition at Paris, beseeching the King to change the punishment of death into perpetuall imprisonment, that of imprisonment into banishment and his banishment into an honourable seruitude to make warre against the Turke. That if by his offences he did not merit to serue the State, which he sought to ruine, yet he might serue the generall Estate of Christendome.

This counsell was dangerous, for who could assure the King that hee would make warre in Hungary: and what caution could bee sufficient for France? Hee had bene more dangerous without it, then within. A burning fire-band casts more flame and smoke without a chimney, then within it. Hee added moreouer, that hee should forbid him the carrying of armes, and tie him from the warre, but if hee should haue made his house his prison, who should haue kept him? if he had designed of reuenge in prison, what would hee haue done at Liberty? Many which respect no more the Lawes of Honour, then of Iustice, would haue repayed vnto him, to bring in ineuitable mis-chiefs. There was an intent to saue him. The iron worke was forged in Bresse. The refusal of fife hundred crownes, for the Petardier, hindred the execution. As soone as hee was a prisoner, euery one sayd hee was a dead man: and seeing himselſe so carefully garded, hee sayd; That they did not put birds of his sort into a cage, to suffer them to escape. He made that iudgement of himselſe, which the Admirall did of the Earles of Egmont and Horne, when he heard they were prisoners: when they once come to accuse and imprison a man of courage and faction, it is more dangerous to absolue him then to condemne him.

The King sent his Letters to the Parliament; to proceed in the criminall and extraordinary proceſse of the Duke of Biron, according to the formes which are to bee obserued in crimes of so great importance, against persons of his quality: all other affaires set aside. The Commissioners appointed for the King, were Achilles de Har- lay first President in the Court of Parliament at Paris. Nicholas Potier second President and Councillor of State to his Maieſty. Stephen Fleury and Philibert of the Parliament, good Iudges, but not to bee mooued in crimes of State. Informations were taken at the Bastille. The prisoner made some ceremonies to answer, but being entred into discourse, hee gaue the Commissioners matter enough to worke on, confessing in a manner all. From his answeres alone they might haue framed his condemnation, saying ynough to make him loofe as many liues as hee had yeeres. Hee had so ill gouerned his iudgement in his prosperity, as it did him no seruice during his imprisonment; yeelding some-times vnto griefe, some-times vnto choller, and alwaies to indiscretion, speaking as much to ruine himselſe, as to discharge him. Hee was confronted with the witnesses face to face; but when as hee did see La Fin, he fell into an extreame shaking.

The first President asked the prisoner, if hee would except any thing against La Fin, hee answered; That hee held him for a Gentleman of honour, his friend, and his kinsman.

1602. But when he had heard his deposition, hee cried out against him as the most execrable A man in the world, appealing to all the powers of Heauen and Earth, to iustifie his innocency. La Fin grieved that hee should hold him for a slanderer (a name common to all wicked men) sayd vnto him: That he was sorry they were in a place where the one was allowed to speake all, and the other was forced to heare all. Hee maintained all hee had sayd against him, and spake more plainly of his conspiracy, then in his deposition. The prisoner sayd, That if Renaze were there, he would auerre the contrary: He was brought before him, whereat he was much amazed to see him, whom he held to be dead; and who was out of his remembrance, as in an other world. He then beleued that the Duke of Sauoy had set him at liberty to ruine him, hee felt his conscience toucht, when as all B things conspired to his condemnation. An admirable iudgement of Gods secret Iustice, in this escape of Renaze. Mens intentions produce contrary effects. He was detained prisoner at Quiers in Piedmont, to the end he should not discouer this practise; he escapes from his gard, and comes to fortifie his maisters deposition, who else had bene but one witness.

He is amazed to see Renaze
whom he held to be dead.

No man dares sue for him.

Hee had many friends, but not to iustifie his innocency, as Plato sayth, That many friends is a signe of wisdom, and want of them shewes the contrary: There were none that durst presume to sue for his liberty or pardon. The King had made this attempt so detestable and odious to all the Princes and Noblemen of the Court, and the means to execute it so execrable, as all his friends were silent: there were some that sayd, that C for any other crime, yea if he had killed a Prince in the Kings Cabinet, they would haue begged his pardon, and would haue sacrificed their children to the Kings Iustice for an expiation of the offence, rather then to loose him. But in this act, friendship was a conspiracy, and intercession a crime. His friends went to Saint Maur where the King was: they cast themselves at his Maiesties feet to implore his mercy, and to moderate the severity of his iustice, more in consideration of his father, then for any respect of the sonnes seruices which could not equall his fault.

The King sayd, That it was a matter of such importance for his Estate, as he was constrained to leaue it to the course of Iustice; that to haue attempted against him who was his King, and his benefactor was insupportable; that hee could not remit this D crime, but he must ruine himselfe, the Queene his wife, his sonne, and his Estate. That hee knew they were such true hearted Frenchmen, that as they desired not the one, so they would haue patience for the other. They hauing knowne the foulness of the fact, and the reasons which forced clemency to yeeld vnto Iustice, abandoned the pur-sute. The Countesse of Rouffy solicited the Court: The prisoners mother was not there. The King commanded the Court of Parliament to proceed to iudgement, without any intermission.

The prisoner was a Peere of France, the Barony of Biron beeing made a Duchy and a Peere by the King. A Peere cannot be iudged but by the King and his Peeres, but the E King is neuer present when he is a party, and that the accusation of the party concerns his person, his honour, or his Estate. And although the order of the ancient Peeres bee more in number then by the first institution, for that of the sixe secular Peeres, sue are vnited vnto the crown, and the sixth doth no more obey the King, yet the new created enioy the same priuiledges and prerogatives that the ancient did, and the last although hee bee above the number shall not bee iudged but by his Peeres, but may assist at the iudgement of another Peere, and haue his voyce as well as the Duke of Burgundy, who is the Deane of the Peeres, yea the wiues, whose Lands are erected into Payries, or that hold it by succession may assist. Mathilda Countesse of Arthois Peere of France, was called and deliuered her opinion with the other Peeres at the iudgement of Robert Earle of Arthois. But if the Peeres being called doe not appeere, they may F proceed. The Peeres of France were called to the arraignment of the Duke of Biron, they appeered not.

The peeres
come not.

The Court forbears not to proceed, notwithstanding their absence. At the chambers beeing assembled, the Chancellor accompanied by Mailles and Pontcarre (two Councillors

A Councillors of the State) entred into the Parliament, two Sargents at armes and some officers of the Chancery going before him. He was receiued at the entring of the Bar by two ancient councillors, and being saluted by the Court, hee set him downe in the Presidents place: hauing deliuered the Kings intention, and his assurance of the integrity and wisdom of the Court, vpon an occasion importing the State, and vpon a foule crime in a person other waies recommended for his seruices, hee made a signe to Stephen Fleury the Reporter of the Proceffe to beginne. This was done for want of the Peeres. A request was made in the prisoners name that it would please the Court to allow him counsell to direct him in the formes of their proceeding, whereof hee was as ignorant, as he had let all France know how well he vnderstood the art of warre.
De la Guesle the Kings Attorney Generall beeing heard vpon this request, and Seruin the
S. leiter Generall speaking for him, hee sayd, that although this request seemed to bee grounded vpon some Presidents for that the like had bene granted vnto the Prince of Condé, Yet there was great diuersity and many considerations for the denying of this. Their opinions beeing giuen, it was reiectd. Cicero pleaded for Rabirius and Anthony for Norbanus, but there is no Aduocate admitted for crimes of State; counsell depends of the conscience of him that is accused, his defence must come from his owne innocency, and hee may well free himselfe from blame, without the mediation of any man, and without the helpe of an Aduocate.

His Proceffe

They which are accused, of crimes must plead for themselves.

C If hee bee innocent, truth will confound all the practises of his accusers; If hee bee guilty there is no excuse nor euasion but his guiltiness will appeere. It is not lawfull to defend the wicked, and good men haue no need of defence. They spent three sittings to examine the informations, which done, the conclusions of the Atturney Generall were read and followed. There rested nothing but to heare the prisoner and to call him before the Parliament.

While they were viewing of the Proceffe, one had set vp a discourse vpon the Pal-lace gate, to moue the Iudges to pity, and that they should not punish the weakenesse of Adam, for the serpents subtilty. The Lord of Montigny came vnto the Bastille about foure of the clocke in the morning; the prisoner who alwaies slept little (holding D sleepe to bee no life) was already vp and at his deuotion: hee would not trouble him in so necessary an action, but stayed vntill hee had done. Enting into his Chamber, hee told him the occasion of his comming, that the Court was assembled for his Proceffe; that the Lord Chancellor was there, and had commanded him to bring him.
Hee seemed a little troubled, although hee had bene aduertised that hee should bee sent for. Beeing ready, hee goes out of the Bastille, thinking neuer to returne, and that they drew him out of the cares of captiuitie, to lead him vnto the darkeness of death, and that hee left the prison to loose his life. Hee was conducted in the Marquise of Rhoinies Carosse, through the Arcenall to the Riuers side, where hee entred into a boate couered with Tapistry, in the which the Kings gardes were, the chiefe
E Approches, the Ports, the Greue and the Towne-house, were manned with Suisses.
Hee entred into the pallace by the first Presidents Garden, and went to rest him selfe in one of the Chambers, vntill hee were sent for, presenting him a breakfast before hee entred.

The houre beeing come, the Register went to call him, and hee entred into the golden Chamber. The place whereas Strangers haue come to implore Iustice of the King; whereas great Kings haue held it an honour to haue a place: where hee himselfe had sat, and bene honoured with the most glorious Title of vertue: whereas one of the King Soliciters had said; That Biron had none before him to imitate: that hee could imitate none but himselfe, and that hee made himselfe inimitable to them that F should come after him. This place I say, shining with the beames of the Kings Iustice, made him to remember the change of his condition, the which forced him some-what to blush: an accident which happens to the most assured. The Scarlet robes doe more amaze him then all the red caffokes of Spaine, or the most fierce encounters of his enemies. He had no other place, then that which was appointed for men accused,

beeing

1602. being set vpon a stoole within the Barre, but finding himselfe to farre off to heare, or A to bee heard; hee rose vp, and carried his stoole neerer, saying vnto the Chancellor, Excuse mee my Lord, I cannot heare you, except you speake louder. When the Duke of Alancou was examined before the King, and in open Court, hee was set in the middest of the Hall vpon a lowe stoole; the Constable of Luxembourg, the Duke of Nemours, and the Chancellor of Poyet, were set within the Barre like to the Duke of Biron. Hee sat with his cloake vnder his right arme, holding his hand sometimes by his side, after a brauing manner, the which notwithstanding did not become him ill, hauing his arme free to lift vp his hand to heauen, and to strike his breast, when hee would protest of his Loyalty to the Kings seruice. They would not haue allowed it in an o- B ther, being expected that men accused should shew humility outwardly, and feare inwardly.

In this Estate the Duke of Biron thought that in this great Senate hee should finde some one that would doe for him as Sempronius Gracchus had done for Scipio: that hee would speake openly, that hee would neuer indure the common-weale should receiue that disgrace to see Scipio set in the ranke and habit of men accused for crimes. Hee whom the Court had scene sit vpon the Flower-de-Luce, in recompence of the great seruices which hee had done. The Chancellor fitted his discourse in such sort, as there was no occasion to call him by his name, nor by those of his qualities. Of many points that were in his Proesse he collected five principall, the rest consisted in presumptions, C whereof he made no account, for that we must neuer moue the opinion of the Iudges vpon a matter that is without prooffe.

The first was to haue had conference with one called Picoté borne at Orleance and fled into Flanders, to haue intelligence with the Archduke, and had giuen him a hundred and fifty crownes for two voyages to that effect.

The second was; That hee had treated with the Duke of Sauoy three daies after his comming to Paris, without the Kings permission, offering him all assistance and seruice against all men, vpon hope of marriage with his third daughter.

The third, that hee had had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy in the taking of Bourg and other places, giuing him aduise to attempt against the Kings army, and a- D gainst his owne person, discouering many things of importance.

The fourth was; That hee would haue brought the King before Saint Katherins fort to be flaine there: and to that end had written to the Gouvernor, giuing him some tokens whereby he should know his Maiesty.

The fifth was; That he had sent La Fin to treat with the Duke of Sauoy, and the count of Fuentes. The Duke of Biron denied all that he had confessed at his first examination, holding it no danger to suppress the truth, when as confession may hurt.

To the first the Duke of Biron answered, That Picoté being his prisoner in the Franch County and knowing that hee was acquainted with captaine La Fortune (who was his friend) he thought he might employ him for the reduction of the town of Seurre, wher- E in hee vsed such dilligence, as the place was assured for his Maiesties seruice: that since this reduction hee had not scene Picoté but in Flanders, when as he went for the confirmation of the Peace, where hee came vnto him with some others, intreating him to bee an Intercessor for them vnto the King, that they might returne vnto their goods, and liue in their owne houses, promising him for recompence of his intercession two sutes of Tapistry, the which hee reiected, with some spleene, for that they sought to buy his fauour, and for that they desired from him an assurance for their returne, he sent them to the Lords of Bellieure and Sillery, who knew what was fittest for them, and the formes that were to bee obserued for their returne. That it was true that Picoté had receiued a hundred and fifty crownes of him, but not for any other re- F spect, but for the charges hee had beene at in the reduction of Seurre, hauing often in-treated him, & prest him by many letters, to haue pity on him, as of one that was banished from his house and country, hauing borrowed this sum to beare his charges in this reduction. That hee had put it to account in certaine summes which hee disbursed for

To the second he answered, that hee came to Paris fiftene daies after the Duke of Sa-uoyes arriual there; that La Fin who accused him, came after him. That it was true, the King dying at Conflans, and the Duke of Sauoy with him, after dinner the King retiring into his wardrope, he commanded the Count of Auvergne and him, to enter-taine the Duke of Sauoy: That the Count of Soissons, and the Duke of Montpensier comming into the chamber, hee gave them place, and went into the wardrope, tied the Kings points, gave him drinke, and presently after went to Paris. That vpon some speech which Roches the Dukes Secretary had with him touching the marriage of his Highnesse third daughter, hee acquainted the King therewith, who hauing since giuen

B him to vnderstand by La Fortune, that he did not like thereof, hee had no more dreamt of it. And in token that he had no intelligence with the Duke, nor will to conspire with any of his, the King hauing commanded him to accompany him in his returne, and to shew him the strongest towines in Bourgongne, hee had excused himselfe, beseeching his Maiesty to dispeace with him, fore-seeing that the Duke would not effect the Treaty, and that hee should bee greeued to make warre against a Prince, whom hee had accompanied, and made good cheere vnto. Aduising the Baron of Lux to conduct him through the weakest towines, and not to giue him any time to view their fortifications.

To the third, that he had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy, in the conquest of the country of Bresse, giuing him aduise to attempt against the Kings army. He answers, C that if he had had intelligence with the Duke of Sauoy, hee would not haue vnderaken Bourg, against the Kings opinion, being not assisted by any, but such as were ordinarily with him. That the Gouvernours of places (who were then the Dukes subiects and now the Kings) could witnesse if there were any fauour vsed, and if in making warre, hee had any other object, but the execution of his Maiesties commandements. That if he had had any bad intent, he had not yeilded vp Bourg so easily as he did.

To the fourth, vpon the aduise giuen to the Gouvernor of Saint Katherins fort to kill the King. He seetheth his Maiesty to remember, that hee alone did dissuade and diuert him from going to view the fort, giuing him to vnderstand, that there were very good D Gunners in the place, and that he could not goe without great danger. That vpon this aduise, his Maiesty altered his purpose, saying, that if hee desired to see the place, hee would bring him a plot of it the next day, offering his Maiesty to take it with five hundred Hargubuziers, and that he himselfe would goe vnto the assault.

To the fifth, that hee had treated with the Duke of Sauoy, and the Count of Fuentes by the mediation of La Fin. Hee answered that beeing denied the keeping of the Cittadell of Bourg, hee grew into that dispaire, as hee had desired to bee all couered with bloud, being capable to say or to doe any thing. At these words the Chancellor asked him, with what bloud hee desired to bee couered? with mine owne answered the prisoner, wishing to liue no longer after this refusal, and I would haue ingaged my selfe in E such sort among the enemies, as I would haue died there, or would haue returned all couered with bloud. That for two moneths space hee had written and spoken more then he ought, but hee had not omitted to doe well. Hee added moreover that La Fin had bewitched him with enchanted waters, and by speaking Images, as he was forced to submit himselfe to his will: That he spake not vnto him, but in secret and vnknowne words, calling him his Maister, his King, his Prince, his Lord. And scratching his left care. He spake execrable things against La Fin, to moue the Court not to regard his accusation, and testimony. Hee that had not scene the fact verified by his owne letters, would haue sayd it was vlisses accusation, forging false letters from Priam to Palamedes. He still fled to his pardon, saying that hauing done nothing since, the Kings clemency should remit his fault, and that if he must implore it once more, he had his knees as supple as euer to doe it. The Chancellor sayd vnto him, that he had written a letter vnto F La Fin since the Dauphins birth, by the which hee did aduertise him, that seeing it had pleased God to send the King a sonne, hee would no more dreame of those vanities, desiring him to returne, and if he had not employed him he would not haue written.

the continuance of his practices.

This letter was produced to shew the continuance of his bad desseignes, whereof he made vse to iustifie himselfe and to shew his repentance, saying alwaies that hee had done well, although hee had some thought of doing ill.

The Chancellor sayd vnto him, that seeing he felt his conscience so cleere, and knowing that hee had done nothing, why did he not lay himselfe more open vnto the King, who sought him with great affection at Fontainebleau, to tel him the truth of that which hath beene since discovered by the proesse. Hee wauered at this demand, saying that he did not thinke the King had knowne any thing of that which had passed betwixt him and La Fin, for that hee had assured him by othes and fearefull curses, that hee had sayd nothing that might hurt him. That hauing conferred with a Religious man of the order of the Minimes, to know (if hauing past his word with an oth to La Fin, neuer to discover what had past betwixt them) hee might with a safe conscience say any thing? Hee had answered him, that seeing there was no more any intent to execute the things that were sworne betwixt them, hee ought not to reueale them: That this resolution continued so constant in his minde, that although the Arch-bishop of Bourges had visited him in prison, and had giuen him many reasons to free him from these scruples, yet hee held it an act vnworthy of a man to falsifie his oth, and that it was onely fit for a soule hardened with Atheisme (the spring of all impiety) to sweare with an intent to circumuent. Here his speech sayled him with the violence of his griefe, but recouering his spirits, he spake these words.

My misfortune hath this consolation, that my Iudges are not ignorant of the seruices which I haue done to the King and Realme, and with what loyaltie I haue carried my selfe in the greatest and most important affaires, to restore the King vnto the Realme, and the Realme vnto the King: to preferre the Lawes of State, and to settle you in this place, from the which the Saturnales of the League had expelled you. This bodie (whereof you hold the life and death in the disposition of your Iustice) hath no veine which hath not beene opened, and which I would not willingly open for you. This hand which did write the letters, which are now produced against mee, is the same which hath done the contrary to that which it hath written. It is true, I haue written, I haue sayd, and I haue spoken more then I ought; but no man can shewe that I haue done ill. And there is no law that punisheth the lightnesse of a simple word, or the motions of the thought with death: my words haue beene alwaies feminine, but the effects of my courage Masculine. Choller and despiht haue made mee capable to say all, and to doe all: but reason would not suffer mee to doe any thing, but what deserued praise and imitation. I haue had bad desseignes, but they neuer past my thought. At the same instant they sprong vp, they were smothered. If I had beene desirous to nourish and make shew of them, I haue had great meanes and occasions. I could haue done bad seruice to the King, in England and in Suiferland. There are aboute a hundred Gentlemen that can witnesse of my behauiour in the first Ambassage, and for the second, I desire no other testimony but that of the Seigneurs of Sillery and de Vie, who know in what manner, and with what fidelity I employed my selfe to reconcile and vnite so many wils disioyned and with-drawne from the Kings alliance. If you will consider how I came, and in what Estate I left the places of Bourgonne, it wil be impossible to haue any bad conceite of my desseignes. They found not a man of warre in my Gouvernement. I haue left the places without garrisons. I haue giuen the captaines no other commandement but to serue the King well, and to doe that onely where vnto they are bound.

Euery man aduised mee not to come to Court. I met a foote-man by the way who brought me a letter from one of my dearest friends, who coniured mee not to aduance: being arriued, my sister of Roussy sent me an other, aduising me to be gone without taking of my leaue: I shewed it to a Gentleman that was with mee, who sayd vnto mee, That he would willingly bee stabbed in the bosome, so as I were at Dijon. I answered, That if I were there and were assured to receiue a hundred stabs at the Court yet would I come vpon the Kings word. A guilty minde and prest with horror of his conscience had

A had fallen in pecces with feare and trembling, and would haue imbraced an other party. The secret knowledge I had of my loyaltie, and the innocency of my desseignes, could not giue mee any imagination of distrust: I alwaies sayd within my selfe, I haue serued the King too well, to haue a thought that he should not account me his seruant. The King hath had too many proofes of my faith, to suspect my loyaltie. I could not comprehend, that the Kings Iustice, could touch a man resting in the tranquility of his conscience, and in the expectation of his commandements. Moreouer I was assured that the King had pardoned mee, and that I had not offended him since his pardon. I cannot deny that I could him, nor all that had past in this action, but in saying vnto him that the refusal of the Citadell of Bourg made mee capable to say and doe any thing, I did thinke it was not needfull to speecifie that which I was ashamed to haue attempted, and that the consideration of the good which I had done vnto the King in his seruice, should alwaies weigh downe the euill that I would haue done, and the which I haue repented. That if he hath not giuen me life, but to put me to death, he must consider that it is more commendable for a Prince to giue it, then to take it away from him to whom he hath giuen it, and that his clemency shines neuer more cleerely then vpon offences that concerne himselfe. If it please not the King to regard my seruices, and the assurances which he hath giuen me of his mercy, I confesse my selfe worthy of death, and hope for no health in his Iustice, but in yours, hoping you will remember better then hee doth the dangers I haue vndergon all my life for his seruice. I implore his mercy, and although I should not say any thing; yet the wounds which I beare would speake for mee. I hope for it the more confidently, for that it hath neuer beene refused to them that haue done worse then my selfe. I would haue done euill, but my wil did neuer passe the tearmes of their first conception, being ouercast with the clouds of choller and despiht. It were hard if I should be the first President to bee punished for thinking. Not that I feare death, the which I hold to be ordayned, not as a punishment, but for the end of Nature, and that it imports nothing to leaue this life in the midst of my course, if it were with as much honor, as I haue had in the beginning. My fault is great, but it was onely in conceite and not executed: in desire and not in effect. Great offences must haue great fauours. I am he alone in France, which feelles the rigour of iustice and cannot hope for the merit of mercy. What soeuer chanceth, I rely more vpon you my Masters then in the King: who hauing heretofore regarded me with the eyes of his loue, looks no more on mee now but with choller, and holds it a vertue to be cruell vnto me, and a vice to vse any act of clemency towards mee. It had beene better for mee that hee had not pardoned mee at the first, then to giue mee life and then to make me loose it with shame and dishonor.

They gaue him leaue to speake what hee pleased, the Chancellor holding it reasonable, that seeing he had no counsell to aduise him what he should say, they should in regard thereof giue him time to speake all, and hearing, to consider his reasons, and the variety of his first answeres with the last, in the which there were great contradictions. Those which are accused of any cryme take it for a fauour to bee heard patiently vnto the end: although for the most part they doe but increase the reasons of their punishments. Hee spake so boldly and so eloquently, as if a man should iudge of the fauour of a discourse by the attention, there was not any one of long time heard with greater patience in that place. Some shed teares in the place and wept in their houses, for pity, not of his innocency (for that appeered not) but of his fortune so miserably delected. Heate is more naturall to a man then cold; and mildenesse more then rigour: but hee could expect nothing but Iustice from this great assembly. It was impossible that passion, fauor or respect, should alter the integrity of their iudgements. The opinions of some weake spirits may be moued, who regard more the apparence, then the essence of things, and which beleeue not the harme vnlesse they feele it, or that the fire is hot, vnlesse it burne them. But to blinde so many graue heads from seeing the truth, it was an enterprife of too great difficulty. A little water may bee poysoned, but not a whole riuer.

The prisoners discourse was so long, as they had no time to give their opinions. Hee A was sent backe to the Bastille, returning more cheerefully then he came, for as in going forth of the Bastille to the palace, he imagined that he went to his death, so seeing himselfe brought backe, he conceiued that he returned to life. And for that he had answered the Chancellor to all his demands, and had moued some of his Iudges to lament his misfortune, many to detest his accuser, and all to wish that the fowlenesse of his offence, and the good of the State would allow of his pardon. He thought that hee had so ballanced their opinions, as mercy should preuaile about rigour. He therefore neuer ceased all Saterday, Sunday and Monday, to relate vnto the captaines, and to the gard, that kept him, all that had beene demanded of him, what he had answered, & how brauely and discretely he had satisfied all, adding withall, that hee did imagine hee saw the B Chancellors countenance going out of the great chamber. Hee did counterfeite him in his staiednesse and the grauity of his words, fit for a man of his age and quality, imagining, that he spake in this manner. Behold a wicked man, hee is dangerous in the State, wee must dispatch him, he deserves death. Which words neuer came out of his mouth, hauing carried himselfe very respectiue in this Arraignement, hauing neuer pronounced that word of Death, but in concluding the iudgement. And therein hee alwaies vsed some words to qualifie his grieve in the Image of his affliction, more then of his innocency, vnable to forget the remembrance of the good that was past, or the feeling of the present euill. These were the last fits of the prisoners hope, the which finding no solid body, did run after the shaddowes of his imagination, and flattered him so pleasingly, as hee thought not to die, saying, That they could not supply his place if hee were dead. Noting among all them, that thought themselves most capable, great wants and imperfections. Yet in all these extremities he had nothing that lulled him so much a sleepe as his owne prayes. Sometimes hee would say, Is it possible, that the King should bee so vaine, as to make him to apprehend death, and to thinke to terrifie him therewith? But hee conceiued of things according to his imagination, the which was not answerable to the truth.

The iudgement of the proesse.

The Iudges opinions.

Principal reasons of their opinions.

In treason the intent is punishable.

On Munday the Chancellor returned to the Pallace to determine on his sentence. They continued vntill two of clock in the afternoone in giuing of their opinions. They D were drawne from one principle of truth, as many lines are from one center, and did concur all in one resolution conformable to the conclusions of the Kings Atturney generall. That it was iust, necessary, and profitable to quench these burning flames of ambition in the blood of the Duke of Biron, if they would not see the Realme in combustion. A whole day, and a good part of the night would haue beene spent, if euery one had giuen a reason of his opinion, those of the great Chamber onely, and the Presidents of the Inquests spake what they would. This subiect is like vnto a great and thicke forest, they know not what tree to choose: It is so full and so rich, as abundance of reasons troubles the choise: And these were the chiefe. There was a concurrence of a great crime and great merit. All France was a witnesse of the one: and of the other the truth E was apparent. The proofes which are required to discover a secret crime are here made perfect. Prooofe by mouth, and the prisoners answer. Prooofe by writings, letters and instructions. Prooofe by the deposition of witnesses, against whom hee hath obiected no exception, which might impugne that which they sayd and maintained.

By these three sorts of proofes we see that monstrous attempt against the Kings person verified, and that furious conspiracy to trouble his Estate, and to make it a prey to his enemies, and both the one and the other doth make the prisoner guilty of high treason in the first and second degree. Hee confesseth that he would haue done ill, that his intent was written and imparted to others, and yet he neuer did ill. That it neuer past his thought. That thoughts are not to be punished as he sayd. That the desire to steale F makes not a theefe: It is true, but the guilt of treason is so detestable, as the intent how farre so euer from the execution, is punished and reputed for the effect. Repentance which followes after, and changeth the desaigne, may well serue for the offence, but it helps nothing for the punishment.

A Gen-

A Gentleman hauing attempted to kill King Francis the first, repented, and reuealed it in his confession, yet being accused by his Confessor, he lost his head. As the respect of the Image of God, grauen in the Maiestie of Kings, frees them from all lawes made by men, so the dignitie of their persons doth warrant them from all enterprises and conspiracies of humane malice, the which dares not once thinke to put them in practise against their Images, much lesse against their persons. The prooofe of an intent, although it were not resolued nor determined goes not vnpunished, which passeth often times vnto things without life. To houses, images, ashes, yea and to the memorie it selfe: This crime troubleth the dead, thirty or forty yeares after their funerals: for that it is not extinct in dying, and (the which is contrarie to common sense and natural humanitie) they punish the child, the wife, and the family, for the fathers offence, being a contagious Leprosie, and hereditarie to all his race. The father cannot excuse his sonne. And the Senator Fuluius was commended to haue put his Sonne to death, for that he had beene one of Catlines conspiracie. Let him then plead no more, that hee hath done no euill, it sufficeth that he would haue done it. Lawes are not made for bad actions onely, but for Councils also and resolutions. His intent began the crime, occasion had ended it, if he had not beene preuented. If hee had done no other euill, but to giue eare to the promises and perswasions of the enemies, he were guiltie. For in matters of State, the subiect cannot dispose of any point of his will, without the permission of his Prince. We must not stay till venomous beasts haue bitten, and then kill them, nor Traitors intents executed, before we discover the Treason. It is then too late to iudge of the crime, but to complaine of indiscretion: then they seeke no more releefe from Law, but they flie to Armes. It is not then time to accuse and to punish, but to weepe and to flie. The city of Rome laboured in vaine to resist Caesar, after that he had subuerted the lawes, vsurped the Dictatorship, and terrified all Italy with the brute of his forces. If they should haue stayd vntill the prisoner had executed his desseigns, there had beene no talking of Iustice nor of State. You must not tarry till the house shake, and be ready to fall, you must vnderprop it, and repaire it in time. It is a miserie (sayd the Emperour Domitian) when they will not beleue a conspiracie against Princes, vntill D they be slain by the Conspirators. Now that God by a singular work of his prouidence hath discovered this conspiracie, it toucheth the health of the State, and the honor of the Court, to punish these Conspirators. Reason requires that the example may make knowne how execrable this offence is, for the which it is lawfull to torment the dead, and terrifie them that be liuing, to make the children partakers of their Fathers punishment, and to assure them rather of miserie then of life, that the world might haue more horror of his wickednes then feare of his punishment. The Kings Clemencie hath had her turne, now Iustice must take hers, making her authoritie to be feared and admired, like vnto the sea, which is more admired when the waues are swolne, and risen vp to the clouds, then when it is calme and still. But they consider the qualitie and merit of the E prisoner. First, Iustice hath her eyes blinded, and shut from all distinctions, but that it holds the offence greater in a great person, then in a mean, and by this proposition, the punishment must be greater. The fautes of mean men are hidden in the multitude, their fortune and reputation is one thing. Those which raised to great places, do good or harme by the example of their good or bad actions, are they which are knowne and discovered to all men. In matters of rebellion and crimes of State, they regard not what is past, they looke onely to the present, and what they may expect hereafter: the most vertuous actions yeeld to the violence of the bad. The accused hath serued the King, it was his dutie, he hath bin recompenced. He hath attempted against his seruice, therein he hath done what hee ought not. The offence and the punishment are twins: at the same instant that he hath offended, he drawes vpon him the rigour of punishment. F If with Antipater, hee hath carried vpon his bodie the markes of vertue, there is nothing now to be scene but signes of infidelitie in his heart. His merits haue mounted to the greatnesse of the first dignities of France, his ill-deseruings cast him downe with shame, and shew him to be vnworthie of those excellent degrees of honour. Good seruice

In crimes of State they consider nothing but the punishment.

1602. seruice cannot enter into comparifon with bad, nor crimes in paralell with merits. The offence which is greater then the seruice, changeth the bond of recompence into punishment. He that helpe to build a house, deserues much of the owner, but when he sets fire to it, all the remembrance of his good which he hath done vanissheth away. The accused hath had a good share in the restoring of the State, but since he would haue vndermined it, and ruined the foundations, he hath practised to make it a prey to the enemy, they can no more returne to that which he hath done, they iudge what hee would haue done, and shall haue no other esteeme or reputation, but as an Arifon, a Nabis or a Catilin. He hath bin profitable to the State, it is true. But he hath offended against the Lawes of State. Their preferuation is so necessary, as it were better to loose the most profitable members in an Estate, then to suffer them to be violated: for in putting them to death, it doth but decrease the number of valiant men, but in suffering them to liue, you do wrong vnto the Lawes, and thereby ruine the quiet of the State. Hee hath done well for the preferuation of the State: it is true. But he that seekes to destroy what he hath preferred, makes himself an enemy, and the remembrance of his well-deseruing dies in the iniurie which he would haue done to the whole body. He hath begun well, but he ended ill. All actions are censured by the end. If the heele, (that is to say) Constancie and firmenesse, had not failed in Achilles, he had bene immortall. It is not sufficient for a man to begin to do well, if he desists in the midst, and continues not vnto the end: who deserued better at Rome then Manlius, the onely preferuer of the Capitoll against the Gaules? and who was more seuerely punished then he, whom they cast downe headlong from the Capitoll, for his factions and mutinies?

If it were a crime not to serue the Prince, was it not execrable to hinder, and to conspire against his seruice? As the seruices done by the accused, cannot be compared with his offences, so his quality cannot moderate his punishment. Iustice hath no eyes to regard a Dukes Crowne, a Marshall of France his staffe, nor a blew riband. All these are no prerogatiues, but that he which attempts to trouble the State, shall be held an enemy to the Maiestie of the Prince, & the publike good. Great men are greatly punished. Dignities aggrauate the offence vpon him that is bound not to offend. The greater the bond is, the more execrable is the ingratitude. There is no gentleman in France more bound vnto his Prince then the accused. If duties and bonds hold no place in the affections of subiects to their Prince, to what Altar shall they go to seek assurance of faith? must not the King in these continuall doubts of disloyaltie, trust the gard of his Person vnto strangers, as Lewis the 11. did vnto the Scottishmen. And finding no religion nor conscience among men, trust vnto beasts, as Masini (sa) did? God is offended when as respect of the quality withholdeth the course of Iustice, & threatens that Estate with ruine, wherein they suffer a wicked subiect to liue. Achab felt the heauie hand of his wrath, for that he saued the life of Benadad. As this furious desire of soueraigne command, troubles all the considerations of Nature, Friendship, and Duty. So in punishing them wee must neither regard the respect of bloud, the remembrance of seruices, nor the motions of friendship. The offence is of too great a consequence to dissemble it. Hee that doth not punish an euill, allowes of it. But they say it hath bin pardoned, that wee must not open a wound which hath bene closed vp. Kings and Fortune do often pardon, to punish them more seuerely that haue abused their pardon. The prisoner confesseth that he did not say all, and a pardon cannot extend, but to those things that haue bin mentioned and confessed, the greatest part of the offence hath remained in the will of the repentant, he hath confessed but as litle as he might. There was a difference betwixt him that did pardon, & him that demanded pardon. The King pardoned to the end he should not fall into a relaps of his former faults: & he demanded pardon that he might offend more safely. It appears by his confession, and by that which he hath sayd in the face of the Court, when as he was demanded why he had not discovered his offences frely vnto the King, when as he gaue him so great assurance to forget it. He answered, that hee did not thinke La Fin had sayd any thing, and that hee had kept his word, hauing confirmed it with great oaths, that if he had acquainted him with that which hee had discovered Euill vn-punished is suffered. A pardon extends but to confession.

A couered to the King, hee would haue cast himselfe at his Maisties feete as readily as he did to craue pardon. There was then some-thing betwixt them that was not yet pardoned. They which offend do often mis-reckon the time, seeking to excuse their fault. The conference of times discovers the continuance of intents. The pardon was in Ianuary, and after September he writes, That seeing it had pleased God to giue the King a Dauphin, he wold no more thinke of those vanities, and La Fin addes, that there was a billet of a contrarie tenor, that the negociation was continued, and that the King had no knowledge thereof from the prisoner. The pardon should haue drawne him to repentance, and not to ingage him in new trecheries, the which could not bee remitted nor pardoned, for that he had offended often without punishment. Hee must not continue his errors, the last payes for all the precedent. The Court allowes not of this pardon in a crime that is beyond all pardon, and whereof the abolishment depends not of the King, who may not be prodigall of his subiects bloud, nor bring the health of all in generall in danger, for one in particular. This reason moued Alexander to put Philotas to death, being giuen to vnderstand, that if he pardoned him, hee would make him able to attempt new treasons against him, when as it should not bee in his power to pardon him. A pardon doth not change the bad intent of a mighty malefactor. This Philotas knew well, that they which had exhausted all mercie, and drawne it drie, hauing no more hope, did runne head-long into despaire. That there are benefites which are odious, for that he blusheth to confesse the cause, and to acknowledge himselfe debtor for his life to any one. Alexander had enemies enough abroad, hee had no neede of any at home, and assuring his Estate of those, he needed not to feare the rest. Kings like vnto Physitions must know the diseases of their States, the accidents that are past, the present, and the future, and employ Iustice as a drugge, the which is not good for them that bee sicke, and may profit others before the disease hath actually seized on them.

A Prince cannot be liberal of his subiects bloud.

There remains one onely consideration, that the D. of Biron may do great seruice, and that it is not impossible but he may returne to the way of his first innocency. There is lesse harme not to beleuee it, then to beleuee it. Wee must not vpon an vncertaintie that is to come, neglect the remedie of a present mischiefe. There is more trouble to absolue him, and more danger to set him at liberty, then to put him to death. Hee is not likely to do any more good: we can expect nothing but reuenge from his courage. There is no more any Furius Camillus who changed his exile into a bond vnto his country that had banished him. Serpents seeme dead in winter, the cold keeps them from hurting: but when as the Sunne recouers his forces, they spend their venom. The prisoners bad intents might sleepe for a time, but it should be to awake againe and neuer to leaue the State at rest. He that can neuer profit by his vertue nor his loyalty, must profite by his example. These were the reasons of the Court, vpon the which by a generall consent a sentence of death was concluded against the Duke of Biron. E There were few in condemning him but sayd, that it was fit to arraigne La Fin, and giue warrant to apprehend him, and that it was impossible he should bee cleane from the slime which he had handled, and that if the affaires of Spain (which is like vnto the Temple of Hecatompodon, the which goes forward in words and not in workes) had bin answerable to the vehemency of their affection, hee had sayd nothing. The King was aduertised thereof, who assured la Fin by his letters, that he would neuer endure that so great a seruice done to the Crowne, should bee his ruine. It was reason, for if the Ancients did appoint Honours for Beasts, that had done any seruice to the Commonweale, they should bee no lesse thankfull vnto a Gentleman that had saued his country. Whosoeuer discovers a Conspiracie against the sacred and inuiolable person of the Prince, ought to bee rewarded by the publike. So was Vindicius by the Romans. Princes loue them for awhile that haue done some great villanies for their seruice, the which is soone turned into deadly hatred, lothing to looke on them, for that their preference doth reproch them with the wronging of their conscience. But this happens not to him who without any instigation of the Prince, but moued onely with with his duty doth reueale a conspiracy, choosing rather to faile in the office of a friend; A then in duty of a faithfull subiect. The Chancellor concluding their opinions pronoun- ced the sentence of death, and by graue reasons and great examples reconciled some few opinions for the apprehending of la Fin. Saying, that the enterprife of the priso- ner condemned, was not in his head alone, that there were others, who having a de- sire to say some thing, would retire themselves when they should see la Fin so intreated, who in the common opinion had deferred reward. And although that Mars would not haue the day which is giuen vnto him, to bee the last to one that had deferred the name of a second Mars, yet the shadow of death did enuiron him on Tuesday about Noone; seeing a great multitude of Parisiens about Saint Antonie's gate, hee then B beleueed that he should be a spectacle vnto them. The Lord of Vitry's Lieutenant freed him from this imagination, making him beleue that it was to see certaine Gentlemen fight. Hereupon (and of that which the heart doth alwaies diuine in the like accidents, seeing more signes of death then of life) hee framed in his imagination infallible con- sequences of his death, sending the Seigneur of Baranton to intreat the Marquesse of Rhosny to come vnto him, or if he could not, to be an intercessor vnto the King for his pardon. He answered, that he was extremely grieved that he durst not do the first, and had not meanes to effect the second. That the King was forry that at his coming to Fontainebleau hee was obdurate and would not deliuer the truth, which tooke from him the meanes to saue his life, and for his friends to sue for him. This multitude did not runne to the gate without some occasion, they knew that the sentence of death C was giuen the day before: Certaine Officers of the Court and the Executioner were scene enter into the Bastille, the Scaffold which should bee set vp at the Greue was made, but they were ill-informed: for the King hauing commauded the Chancellor to send him the sentence, after he had giuen it in the Parliament, that he might let him vnderstand his pleasure touching the execution, Sillery who had carried it to Saint Ger- maine, returned with letters, by the which (for the auoyding the ignominie of his death at the sute of his friends and for other considerations) his Maiesty was pleased to change the place of the execution, and to appoint that in the Bastille, which should haue bene at the Greue.

These letters being verified, on Wednesday morning the last of Iuly, the Chancelor accompanied with the first President of the Court of Parliament, Sillery and three Ma- sters of Requests, and followed by some Officers of the Chancery, De Vosson Register for criminal causes, & 6. others, came to the Bastille about 9. of the clock in the morning to let him heare the sentence of the Court. At his entring hee commanded them to make the prisoner dine and not to aduertise him of his coming, remaining in a little chamber neere the entry on the left hand about an houre and halfe: where he resolved who should be sent for to assist at this execution, of whose names he made a list. He that apprehends death hath no desire to eate: yet he set him downe, rose againe presently, and according to his vsuall manner went vnto a window which looked into the Court of the Bastille, where hearing the cries and lamentations of a woman, he thought they were for him, and had this sad content to see they wept for him before his death. Soone after the Chancellor goes towards him, who crossing through the Court, the Duke of Biron espied him and cried out, that he was dead. You come (sayd he) to pronounce my sen- tence, I am condemned vniustly, tell my kinsfolkes that I die an innocent. The Chancellor went on without any motion, commanding that they should bring him into the Chap- pell. The prisoner seeing him come a far off, cried out: Oh my Lord Chancellor is there no pardon? is there no mercy? The Chancellor saluted him and puts on his hat. The Duke of Biron continued bare, and hauing abandoned all the powers of his soule to griefe and passion, he tooke the aduantage to speake first, and to speake all that a tongue ouer- grieved might vtter, reproching the Chancellor that hee had not had so great a desire to saue him as to condemne him. Hee added thereunto certaine words, the recording whereof is prohibited, and the report punishfable. But Princes regard not the railing of subiects against their Maiesty, the which returnes alwaies from whence it came. The Duke

A Duke of Biron knowing not whom he should challenge most for his misfortune, turned towards the Chancellor, and shaking him by the arme, sayd, You haue iudged me: God will as-for me, hee will lay open their iniquities, which haue shut their eyes, because they would not see mine innocencie, you my Lord shall answer for this iniustice before him, whe- ther I do summon you within a yere and a day, I go before by the iudgment of men, but those that are the cause of my death shall come after by the iudgement of God. All which was deli- gered with such violence, as he cryed out and stormed both against the King and his Parliament. They beare withall which proceedes from choler in a condemned man of his humor and qualitie. But this excesse to adorne a Chancellor to heauen being 70. B yeaes old, was held vnworthy the great courage of a Captaine, blaspheming and bra- uing death, and yet ignorant how they pleade in another world. He was not the first in the like extremities, that haue adiourned their Iudges before the throne of God. Iohn Hus sayd in dying: That those which had condemned him should answer a hundred yeres af- ter before God and him: and the Bohemians who preferred the ashes of his bones and maintained his doctrine, coyned money with this adiournment. But the Duke of Bi- rons assignation was vaine: for the Chancellor appeared not, but hath bin more health- ful since then before. He found no meanes to enter into discourse amidst the confusion of so many words which were like to a violent streame. Yet he interrupted him, to tell him that he had need of Gods help, and that he should recommend himselfe vnto him. C He presently answered, that he had thought vpon God, and implored his ayde to giue him patience against their iniustice, but neither he nor his Iudges had thought of it in condemning him. Passion (sayd the Chancellor) makes you to speake many things with- out any colour, and against your owne iudgement. There is not any man hath better knowne your merits then my selfe, and I would to God your offences had bin as much vnknowne as they haue bin dissembled. The knowledge thereof was so great and so perfect, as your Iudges haue bin more troubled how to moderate your paine, then to haue you punished, they haue more laboured to iustifie you then to condemne you.

Passion

the tongue.

Whilest the Chancellor was speaking, the Duke of Biron turned towards Roissey Ma- ster of Requests, and asked him if he had also bin one of his Iudges, Roissey answered. My D Lord, I pray God to comfort you. My father loued you so intirely (replied the Duke of Biron) that although you were one of them that had condemned me I would forgieue you. And so returning to his discourse, he addrest himselfe vnto the Chancellor, who was saying something vnto Voisin. I see well (sayd he) what it is, I am not the most wicked, but I am the most vnforgotten. Those which haue done worse then I would haue done, are fauo- red. The Kings clemencie is dead for me. He doth not imitate the examples of Cesar nor Augustus, or of those great Princes, who not only pardoned them that would haue done ill, but euen them that did ill, and who were euer sparing of their blood, yea of that which was least esteemed, wherein can the King shew himself greater then in pardoning? Clemency is a kingly vertue, euery one may giue death, but it belongs onely to Soue- E rains to giue life. And cruell that he is, doth he not know well that hee hath pardoned me. I had a bad desseigne, he granted me grace. I demand it againe, you may easily ad- uertise him, a Post will soone returne. The Queene of England told me, that if the Earle of Essex would haue humbled himselfe and sued for grace, shee would haue pardoned him. He grew obdurate, and would neuer implore her mercie, taking from her all meanes to shew the effects. She like a generous Princeesse desiring to pardon him, euen as she would that God should pardon her. He was guilty, I am innocent, he sued for no pardon for his offence. I craue it in mine innocencie.

Clemencie

Is it possible the King should thinke no more of the seruices I haue done him? doth F he not remember the Conspiracy at Mantes, & the danger he had run into, if I had had intelligence with the conspirators, who found nothing that did more hinder the effects of their desseigne then my loyaltie, nor a more readie meanes to attaine vnto it then in causing me to be flaine? There is no veine in my body which hath not bled for his ser- uice: He shewes that he neuer loued me any longer then he thought himselfe to haue need of me. Hath he forgotten the siege of Amiens, where they haue seen me so of- ten ten couered with fire and bullets, and to be in so many dangers either to giue or to receiue death? He now quencheth the torch in my blood, after that he hath vsed it. My Father exposed himselfe to a thousand dangers, and purchased death to set the Crowne vpon his head. I haue receiued fife and thirty wounds vpon my body to preserue it for him, and for my reward, he takes my Head from my shoulders. Let him beware least the Iustice of God fall vpon him. Hee shall find what profite my death will bring him, it will nothing assure his affaires; but impaire the reputation of his Iustice. Hee doth loose this day a good Seruant, and the King of Spaine a great Enemie. I am not put to death for that I treated with him, my courage raysed mee vp, and my courage ruines me.

A condemned man may not dispute.

There is no charme nor violence that can force an honest man to do ill.

The Diuels answers are deceitfull.

Supposition of letters.

The Duke of Biron deliueres vp the Kings order.

It is not lawfull for a man condemned to dispute of that which hath beene iudged against him. And therefore the Chancellor said; that he should not torment himselfe any more against his Iudgement, that they had done him that Iustice which a Father is bound to pronounce against his owne Sonne if he had offended in the like sort. At that word, choller makes him to breake forth, saying, What Iustice? I was neuer heard but once, I could not deliuer the fiftith part of my Iustification. What Iudgement vpon the testimony of the most wretched and most execrable man in the world, who neuer came neere me but with enchantments, nor went from me but he had enchanted me? He bit me by the eare, and made me to drink enchanted waters, calling me his King, his Prince, his Lord. Hee cannot deny but hee made me to see an Image of waxe which spake these two words in Latin. Thou shalt die wicked King. If hee hath this power ouer a senselesse Image, what might he not do vpon me whose will he did tyrannize vpon by his witch-craft, forcing me to do what he pleased. But la Fin sayes, that he knowes not what this Image meanes. If it be true, these words discouer the Diuels pollicie, who speakes the truth in his miserie that trusteth vnto his lies, and intangles him still with inscrutable ambiguities. So he deceived Craesus when he told him that the Riuer Halys should loose a great power, meaning his, not that of Cyrus, against whome he went to fight. So the Diuell meant not any other King then he whome La Fin saluted by the name of King, calling the Duke of Biron his Prince and his King. At euery word now he vttered some execration against La Fin, taxing the Court of Iniustice, to haue condemned him vpon his accusation. The Chancellor sayd vnto him that the Court had considered aduisedly of his answers and his letters. It is true, sayd the Duke of Biron, I haue written some, but there are some that by an odious wickednes premeditated haue beene counterfeited. Those that were of my hand-writing were not my intention. I disauowed them when I sent them. There are some that can counterfeite letters so artificially, as they that are charged therewith are confounded, and beleue they had written that which they neuer thought. The Marquesse of Vernueil confessed to haue written that which was not her hand, nor euer in her thought, and when she had read the letter, she cryed out, that her hand had betrayed her heart, hauing neuer any thought of that which was contained therein. The Chancellor wold haue interrupted his discourse, but he prest him in such sort as there was no meanes to make any way. He spake of the Kings pardon which he had granted him, as if he had relyed vpon his word, not seeking any other assurances. He told what letters the King had sent him to perswade him to come, and the policie of the President lanin to draw him there-unto, to deceiue him as he sayd, calling him a Deceiuer, the aduice of his friends coniuring him not to come with many other vnneccessarie discourses.

The Chancelor to interrupt him, sayd, that the King demanded his Order, the Duke of Biron drawing it out of his pocker, deliuered it vnto him, protesting and swearing vpon the saluation and perill of his Soule that he had neuer broken the oath which hee had made in taking it. It was true that hee had affected Warre more then Peace, to make himselfe necessarie, and to maintaine the reputation which he had gotten by the practise of armes. It seemes he had not well obserued the articles of this Order, by which no Knight of the Holy-Ghost might take any Pension, Entertainment nor Money from a forraigne Prince, nor tye themselues to the seruice of any other person during

A during the Kings life, but should faithfully reueale all which they knew did import his Maiesties seruice. The Chancellor would haue had him to reade his sentence: he beseeched him not to intreat him with that rigor, that he knew what it did import, but the King should content himselfe with his Life, and suffer his Goods to go vnto his kint-folkes, ending his paine with his death. The Chancellor said that he doubted not but the King like a Prince full of bounty would let his kint-folkes knowe that hee had loued him. Although the losse of life is nothing comforted by the preseruacion of goods, yet this gaue him some consolation, so as the fume of his choller was sodenly disperied. The Chancellor sayd, That he had brought two Diuines to comfort him and to prepare him for death. The prisoner said vnto them, That he was already prepared, and had his Soule in that tranquillity, as the night before he had spoken with God, and that his gard had heard him laugh in his sleepe.

The Chancellor who had much forced his patience, sayd vnto him, we will bidde you fare-well. What fare-well said the condemned? I will come and see you againe after dinner, answered the Chancellor: As he went forth he intreated him to grant him the last consolation that remaines for men that are dying, when they may haue their wils to passe after their deaths, and to suffer him to make his Testament. It was granted, and he disposed thereof with a spirit free from all perturbation. He remembered his seruants and friends, not forgetting the Baron of Lux whom he lamented aboue all. He drew three rings from his fingers deliuering them to Baranton to giue vnto his Sister of S<sup>t</sup> Blancart, desiring her to weare them in remembrance of him. He had about three hundred Crownes when he was taken prisoner, a part he playd, the rest he gaue away to the poore. Eight or ten of his gard came to take their leaues of him with reares in their eyes. He gaue them Apparell, Shirtes, Cloakes and all that he had in his Cofers. So when the table is taken away, they giue the meate that remaines, to them that haue waigted. Garnier the Kings preacher and now Bishop of Mompellier, with Magnan Curat of Saint Nicholas of the field, presented themselves to comfort him, to take from him the violent fittes, which the opinion of his innocency did giue him, and to with-draw him from the affections of the world. Voisin told him that it was the course of Iustice to reade the sentence, and that he must kneele downe before the Altar. Read it saies he, I will be as supple as a gloue. It was read in these termes.

The Processe beeing extraordinarily made, and examined by the Court and Chambers assembled, and by the Presidents and Councillors that were deputed, by letters patentes of the 18. and 19. of Iune, at the request of the Kings Attorney generall, against Charles Gontault of Biron, knight of both orders, duke of Biron, Peere and Marshall of France, gouernor of Bourougne, prisoner in the Bastille, accused of treason: interrogations, confessions & denials, confronting of witnesses, letters, aduises and instructions giuen to the enemy, confessed by him, & al which the attorney generall hath produced. A sentence was giuen the 22. of this Moneth, by the which it was decreed in the absence of the peeres of France (being called) they should proceed to Iudgement, the conclusions of the Kings Attorney Generall beeing giuen, and the prisoner beeing heard by the Court vpon the Crimes wherewith he was charged, all considered it was said. That the said Court had declared and did declare the said Duke of Biron guilty of high Treason, for his Conspiracies against the Kings person, enterprises against his Estate, and treacheries and treaties with his enemies, beeing Marshall of the Kings army. For reparation of which Crimes, they depriued him of all his Estates, Honours and Dignities, and condemned him to loose his head vpon a Scaffold at the Greue, declaring all his goods mouable and immouable wherefoeuer, to be confiscate vnto the King: the Signeury of Biron to loose the name and title of Duchy and Peere for euer, with all other goods held immediatly of the King to bee vnto the Crowne of France, decreed in the Court of Parliament the last day of Iuly 1602. and signed by Belluere Chancellor of France, and Fleury Councillor in the Court and Reporter of the processe. Hee grewe into choller thrice in the reading of the sentence: when they said that he had attempted against the

choller after the reading of his sentence.

Kings person, hee protested with great Imprecations that it was false. That hee had neuer made any conspiracie, that he had his head troubled with some enterprises of State, for that he would not liue idly in peace, but giue some imploiment to men of warre. But it was about two and twenty moneths since hee had any thought of it; desiring that Voisin might raze that out of the sentence. When hee heard that hee should bee executed at the Greue, hee said he would not goe thither, but would rather be drawne with foure horses, and that it was not in all their powers to lead him. Voisin sayd, that they had provided for it, and that the King had done him the grace to change the place of his execution, hauing appointed it in the Bastille: What grace answered the Prisoner? The third point of his sentence was, that hee was troubled for the reunion of the Duchy of Biron to the Crowne, the which hee said, could not bee forfeit to the prejudice of the substitution of his Bretheren, and that the King should bee satisfied with his life.

After sentence pronounced they vnto him their hands.

The Diuines after the pronouncing of the sentence spake more boldly vnto him of death, and to free him selfe of all worldly cares as he had done of his goods, and that he should haue no other thoughts but of his Soules helth. Hee then grew into choller, swearing that they should suffer him in Peace, and that it concerned him only to thinke of his Soule, with the which they had nothing to doe. It is the order in Cryminall executions to deliuer the party condemned into the hands of the Executioner as soone as his Iudgment is read. They would haue done so with him: but Voisin went to speake vnto the Chancellor, to know if they should not distinguish him from other prisoners. The Chancellor was in doubt whether they should binde him or not. He asked Sillery what he thought, who vnderstanding by Voisin that the party condemned was well pacified, sayd, it was to bee feared that in seeking to bind his hands they would cause him to breake the bonds of patience, and enter into new furies, for that they which are in that distresse, are distempered for small matters.

Yet the Chancellor would haue the aduice of the first President, who was in another Chamber, for that hee had dined before he came vnto the Bastille: Hee said that it was dangerous to suffer his hands free, and therefore they must binde him. Euerie one was of Sillerys opinion, who considered not so much what should bee done as what might bee done, for the Party condemned would neuer haue suffred him selfe to haue beene led bound to the place of execution but in Fury and Dispaire. The Executioner (who said since that a young hangman and not experienced would haue died for feare) had beene in danger to endure that which he would make him to suffer. In this liberty, his spirit was alwaies free in his thoughts for the last disposition of affaires: the Diuines intreated him to consider that he was no more what he had beene: that within an houre or two he should be no more: that he must leaue this life to liue for euer: that his Soule must goe before the fearefull Throne of the liuing God, to bee rewarded with a more happy and perfect life then that which he had past in this world, or condemned to infinite paines, in comparifon whereof, that which he should suffer was but a light pricking, in respect of the burning flames of the diuine iustice.

He confesseth him selfe.

Hee then entred into the examination of his Conscience, in the which he remained about an houre. This action required an Humble, Penitent and a contrite heart, and yet he seemed much more carefull of worldly things, and of the affaires of his house, then of his Soules health, and as it were a young apprentice in the first praier of his Religion, praying vnto God not as a deuout Christian, but as a Soldiar, not as a religious Man, but as a Captaine, not as Moyse or Elias, but like to Iosua, who, on horse-backe and with his sword in his hand prayed and commanded the Sunne to stand still. His confession being made, he walked vp and downe the Chappel, still casting out some exclamation for his Innocency, and some execration against la Fin, asking if it should not bee lawfull for his brethren to cause him to be burnt.

Here-vpon Voisin comes, who tells him that the Chancellor and the first President were very glad of the constant and generous resolution hee had to die, and that they would come

He resolues to die.

A come presently to see him. He answered that he had beene long resolued, and that it was not the paine of death, but the manner that did amaze him. Whilest hee attended them, there were many notes brought him, touching his affaires, where-vnto hee answered without trouble or passion. Hee recommended the payment of some debtes which he did owe to gentlemen, that had nothing to shew for it, and among others, to the Ambassador in England: when the Chancellor had dined, he came to see him with the first President, and found that as a troubled water growes cleere being settled, so the time which he had giuen him to thinke of his affaires, had taken from him the violent agitations of his fantasie, and freed his heart from the feare of death, he commanded all that were in the place to retire, and they sat downe together about halfe an houre, but their discourse is vnkowne.

In the end the Chancellor sayd vnto him, I should do wrong vnto your courage, if I should exhort you vnto death, she hath presented her selfe vnto you in so many places, as it is not in her power to trouble the Constancy and Patience, where-vnto I belecue you are disposed. You find it hard to die in the flower and vigour of your age, but if you consider that our dayes are lymited, and that they depend on the fore-sight of the Gouvernor of the whole world, you will receiue this death as by the will of God, who meanes to retire you out of this world for your owne good, before that some great and long misery shall send you. As wee may not desire a death which is farre off, so may we not reiect that which offers it selfe. No no answered the party condemned, labour not (my Lords) to fortifie me against the feare of death, these twenty yeares it hath not feared me, and knowing not where she would take mee, I haue expected her euerie where. You haue giuen me forty dayes to thinke vpon it, yet I could not beleue that it being not in the power of my enemies to take away my life, I should be so miserable as to bee seized on by death, with the consent of my friends. The King (said the Chancellor) hath cut off all that might be shamefull and ignominious. He then asked him if hee would speake with any one. He sayd that he desired to see La Forfe and Saint Blancart. They told him that they were not in the City, but there was a Gentleman of the Lord of Badefous, and after that he had demanded for Preuost (Comptrouler of his house) and that they had answered him that hee was gone three daies before to a house of his in the Country, he then sayd, that he ought not to haue beene there, that hee had all his blankes, adding there-vnto these words of Compassion. All the world hath abandoned me. In these crymes friendshipp is dangerous, friends faile, and the disease is taken by acquaintance, as well as by infection. Hee is wise that knowes no man, nor no man knowes him.

He desires to see his friends.

At these words the Chancellor and the first President tooke their leaues of him with teares in their eyes. He intreated them to receiue a good opinion of his life, by the assurance which he gaue at the point of death, that hee had neuer attempted any thing against the King, and that if he would haue vndertaken it, the King had not beene liuing three yeares since. The Chancellor went out of the Bastille with the first President and Sillery, and stayed in the Arcenall vntill the execution was done. The Duke of Biron intreated the Knight of the Watch to go after him, and to request him that hee would suffer his body to be interred with his Predecessors at Biron, for although nature hath provided that no man shall die without a graue, yet men thinke curiously thereof before they die, and imagine that as glory preserues the reputation of the life, so the Graue maintaines the remembrance of the body. He that had scene him would haue thought he had not beene ready to die, so little care he had of death, or else he promised to himselfe some vnexpected effects of the Kings mercy, or to escape by some miracle. There is no such deceit as imagination frames in these extremities, when the flatters herselfe with vaine hope, imagining that God doth greater wonders, and that they haue scene a pardon come betwixt the Executioners sword and the Prisoners necke: Voisin asked him if he pleased to say any thing else that might serue to discharge his conscience. The Preachers exhorted him not to conceale any thing, and to consider that they could not giue him Absolution but for what he should confesse.

The Chancellor takes his leaue of him.

1602. He answered, that although the King did put him to death vniustly, yet he had so much loued his seruice, and had serued him with so great loue and obedience, neuer diuiding the one from the other, as he felt in his thoughts of death, those of his loue, to bee so liuely and ardent, as hee would not conceale any thing that hee knew to bee against his person or state, for all the world, no not for the assurance of his life he would not speake any thing that was not true.

He drew Voison and his confessors a part and whispered some-thing vnto them, the which was presently written. Hauing continued with his Confessors halfe an houre, (being neere fise of the clock) one came and told him that it was time to part. Goe we (said he) seeing I must. Hee then kneeled downe before the Altar, makes his prayer, and recommends himselfe vnto God, before hee goes out of the Chappell. Hee asked B if there were any one that belonged vnto the Marquesse of Rhosny, Armaut was there, whom he willed to present his commendations vnto his Maister, in remembrance not so much of him that went to dye, as of his kins-folkes which remained aliue, and to assure him that hee held him for a good seruant to the King, and profitable and necessary for his seruice, and that hee was sorry hee had not followed his counsell. Hee knew one that followed the Duke of Mayenne, and intreated him to say vnto him, that if in his life hee had giuen him some cause not to loue him, yet hee desired him to belecue that hee died his seruant, and the Duke of Esquillons and the Earle of Sommeriues his children. Hee charged Baranton to deliuer his last words of loue and affection vnto his bretheren, commanding them to keepe the faith which bound them vnto the Kings seruice, C not to apprehend his misfortune, nor to come at Court vntill that time had worne out the skarres of his ignominious death. Hee intreated one of them that had garded him to goe tell the Earle of Auvergne that hee went to dye with-out griefe, but for the losse of his friendship: that if God had giuen him a longer life, hee would haue done him more seruice, beseeching him to belecue that hee had sayd nothing at his arraignment that might hurt him, if it were not that hee had more want then bad meaning.

He sends commendation to the Count of Au-uergne.

The Count of Auvergne receiued this farewell as from a true friend, and with a feeling, worthy of his friendship, hee intreated him to leaue him a base childe of his, the which hee would bring vp with his owne. Going out of the Chappell, the Executioner presented himselfe vnto him. Hee asked Voison what he was. It is (said he) the Executioner of the sentence. Retire thy selfe (said the Duke of Biron) touch mee not vntill it be time. And doubting least he should be bound, he added, I wil go freely vnto death, I haue no hands to defend my selfe against it, but it shal neuer be said that I die bound like a sheefe or a slave, and turning towards the hang-man, hee sware that if hee came neere him hee would pull out his throate. Hee could not endure the sight of the Executioner: Hee had reason, for they torment the body, as Diuels be executioners of the soule. And although they be men and the instruments of iustice, yet they are held execrable, and had no dwelling house allowed them in Rome by the Cenfors Lawe. The two Preachers led him downe, intreating him to resist his impatience, which did but distemper his minde, and made him loath to leaue the place which he could not hold against his will. Comming into the Court, he went fise or sixe paces without speaking a word, but he, ha, ha. He cast his eyes vpon the Lieutenant Ciuil, in whose house la Fin was lodged, to whom he sayd, I am your friend, beware you be not abused with Sorcerers and Magicians if you free not your selfe of them, you will repent it.

He growes

He goes to the Scaffold

They had made a scaffold in a corner of the Court of the Bastille before the portall going into the Garden, sixe foote high and some-what longer, there were fise steppes to goe vnto it. There were no Ornaments, no Tapistery, no distinction. The most stately death is not the least troublesome, the greater the preparation is the more remarkable is the infamy. It is no great honour to kneele vpon a veluet Cushion, vpon a Scaffold spred ouer with Tapistery, and to haue by him an Executioner clad in black veluet and Crimson Silke, with the sword of gold of Helioabulus, The death

A death which is least ceremonious is the best. The beholders were some at the windowes, some in the Court. There were the Prouost of Marchants, foure Sheriffes, three or foure Maisters of Requests, some Presidents of the Chambers of Accounts; and some Councillors, the Lieutenants Ciuill and Criminall, and the Kings Atturney Generall. The Duke of Biron comming to the Scaffold kneeled vpon the first step, praying in few words, and his eyes lift vp to Heauen. Hee was exhorted to kisse the Crosse in remembrance of his redemption. Hee was attyred in Russet Taffata with a blacke hatte. He cast a furious looke vpon the Executioner. Voisin perswaded him that it was an other, but he knew him wel, saying, that they sought to deceiue him, but he commanded him to stand by, and when it were time, he would call for him. He threw downe his hat, and cast his hand-kercher to a boy, and presently called for it againe to vse it, seeming in this act that he had not the corrage to looke vpon death with open eyes. He put of his dublet, and cast it to the same boy, but the Executioners man got it, and kept it.

The Executioner offered him a cloth to put before his eyes, the which he reiected, saying, that if hee toucht him, but to giue him the stroake of death, hee would strangle him. He sayd vnto the souldiars which garded the Port (throwing them his naked brest) that he should be much bound vnto him that would shoote him with a Musket: what a pity is it sayd he, to die so miserably, and of so infamous a stroake? They might see by his hollow eyes, that his thoughts were distempered. At these words the teares fell from the souldiers eyes. All those of his profession sware by his Spirit, and by his good Angell, as the Ancients did by that of their Prince. The poorest souldiar was cherished by him, at the least he had some good words to assure him of his good liking. The Hargubuziers did wound him at the heart, through the extreame compassion they had of him. So were the souldiers of Eumenes, moued when they saw him bound and manacled, intreating them to kill him. He asked if there was no pardon, and directing his words to the standers by, he sayd, that he had made his soule ready to present it before the face of God; but he tooke pity of the Kings soule, who put him to death vniustly; that he died an innocent, and that his death was the recompence of his seruice: Voisin said vnto him, that it was the manner to reade the sentence. He was angry that they would make him to feele death, and to die so often before his death, for he felt him selfe to dye cruelly in the repetition of the crymes of his condemnation, beeing sufficient that they had brought him thether where he was ready to obey, and that they which did see him were not ignorant of the cause.

When as the Register answered him that it could not bee other-wise, hee gaue him leaue: but vnderstanding the words: that hee had attempted against the Kings person and State, hee sayd that it was false. That God was his iudge, that he would bee depriued eternally of his grace, if it were true, that for two and twenty monethes past he had neuer any thought of it, and that the King had pardoned him. Hee talked all the while that Voisin read his iudgement, so as neither the one nor the other could be vnderstood, the Auditors not knowing to whome to giue care. The party condemned protesting still, and coniuring the Assistants to remember that these two and twenty monethes he had not attempted any thing against the Kings seruice. No man doth at any time condemne him selfe. You shall see few of these great Spirrits, that die by their owne confessions, although they bee found guilty. Some confesse the Fact, but they hold it no Cryme, as that young Gentleman who was one of them that murdered the Duke of Milan, beeing ready to receiue the stroake, hee cried out, that the Death which hee suffered was troublesome, but his Reputation should bee eternally glorious.

His iudgement being read, the Preachers perswaded him to call to God for helpe, and not to thinke any more on Earth, but to yeeld his Soule to the immortal disposition of the Creator, and to leaue his body to that which Iustice had decreed. Hee asked what he should doe, and takes his hand-kercher, with the which hee blinds his eyes, asking the Executioner where hee should set himselfe: hee answered him, there my Lord, there. And where is that? Thou seest that I see nothing, and yet thou shewest me as if I did see plainly : and therewith being in choller, he pulled away his hand-kercher to see: A He blinded his eyes againe, and for that it is a kind of grace to be soone dispatcht, and a great cruelty to languish in the expectation of a paine, he commanded the Executioner to make an end. He desired to die standing, according to the aduise of Vespasian. The Executioner answered him that he must kneele, that he might doe nothing out of order. No no, said the Duke of Biron, if thou canst not doe it at one, giue thirty. I will not stirre. They prest him to kneele, and hee obeyed, willing the Executioner to dispatch, then he start vp sodainly againe, casting his eyes vpon the Executioner, and looking vpon the standers by, he asked if there were no mercy: It was imagined, that either hee would haue laied hand vpon the Executioners sword, or that he presumed that when he should bee ready to receiue the farall stroke they would bring him his pardon, and that the King would doe him no other harme then feare him, as Papirius Curfor did one of his souldiers for breaking of his ranke. The Executioner intreated him to suffer him to cut his heire. At that word he grew into coller againe, hee vnbandd himselfe, and sware that if hee toucht him hee wold strangle him. You may see in two persons, two extreame passions. Feare rettyred the Executioner within him-selfe. Choller transported the Duke of Biron beyond himselfe. The one trembled for feare, the other for rage. Voisin sayd vnto him, that he had too much care of his body, which was no more his owne. He turned to him in choller with an oth, saying, I will not haue him touch me, so long as I shall be liuing: if they put me into choller, I will strangle halfe the company that is here, and will force the rest to kill me, I will leape downe if you thrust me into dispaire. His colour did rise, and shewed a distemperature in his face. Those that were vpon the scaffold went downe. The Executioner remayned amazed, fearing death more then he that was to die.

But this choller preuailed nothing, it was like vnto Ctesiphon, to kicke against the Moiles heeles. Resty horses get nothing but spurring, they are neither freed from their burden, nor from their iourney, he must resolue to goe this way, the which he must pacfe at length. Voisin intreated the Preachers to goe vp againe, and to pacifie him, fearing least he should fall into dispaire, for his soule being much troubled, with the violence of so tragical an end (entring into these furious motiues) was subiect to great distemperatures. They goe vp againe, and speake some good words vnto him in his care, the which doth temper his furious rage, and calme the choller which the Executioners presence did thrust him into: he had alwaies liued in Warre, he could not die in Peace. All men found these furious passions strange in the last act of his life, the which required a great constancy of mind, and a perfect iudgment to know God, to call to him for mercy, and to pray him to intreat his Soule more fauorably then iustice had done his body.

Hetherto they beleueed, that although hee were entring into death, yet he thought not to die, and that he would feaze vpon the Executioners sword. Sodenly he resolue to free this passage, & hauing receiued his absolution, he said, My God, my God, my God take pittie on me. Then turning to the Executioner, he takes the binder that was in his hand, trusses vp his haire behind, and binds it vpon his fore-head, and with his hand-kercher hee blinds his eyes, and so kneeles downe. The Preachers comfort him in his last resolution, assuring him that his Soule was ready to see GOD, and to bee partaker of his glory in Heauen. I sayd he, Heauen is open for my Soule. And this done hee bends downe his head, presenting it as willingly vnto the sword, as Agis did his vnto the balter, saying vnto the Executioner. Strike, Strike, oh Strike. This was to die in commanding, and to command in dying.

The Executioner hauing scene him to rise, and to vnblind him-selfe thrise, that in turning towards him being not bound, hauing the sword in his hand, he might wrest it from him, thought that there was no way to execute him but by surprise, and therefore hee sayd vnto him that hee must say his last prayer to recommend his Soule vnto God, intreating the Preachers that were gone downe to cause him to say it. At which wordes the Executioner made a signe to his man to reach him his sword, with Hee cuts off his head.

A with the which hee cut off his head, euen as he was speaking. The blow was so sodaine, as few men perceiued it, the head leaped from the scaffold to the ground. The Preachers prayed for the happy departure of the soule, from so vnhappy a body, the which was presently stripped into his shirt, and couered with a sheete. His heart panted, as if in rising against the head, it had said as Apollodorus thought that his did when he drempt that one did hee in peeces. It is for thee that I suffer. This head full of the fumes of Ambition, was the cause of the Hearts death. The Executioner struck him so high about the nape of the neck, as hee glanced vpon his lawe-bones, and left a great tuft of haire on his neck. Being dead, he shewed choller in his countenance, as they write of the Souldiers which dyed at the battle of Cannas. Euery one departed, commending the Kings iustice, and lamenting the misery of so valiant a man, beleening that of long time they should not see his equall. His kinsfolkes would thinke themselves happy, if the glory of his life might wipe away the infamie of his death, if the shining of his first actions, were not obscured with the darknesse of the last; that for a recompence of all his seruices which haue made him so famous, they might obtaine the fauour that they would neuer speake of him. But there is no lawe of forgetfulness, to deface the memory of that which hath beene, and of that which is. About nine of the clock at night, he was carried to Saint Pauls church, and buried in the middest of the body, before the Pulpit, the Ce-laines hauing refused to giue him buriall, hauing had no permission nor commandement for it. He was not distinguished from others by his Funerall pompe, nor by the number of Ensignes (like vnto that great Capitaine at Granado), but by the holy water which the Parisians did cast hourly vpon his graue. Such was the end of the Duke of Biron.

Great Gan-saine dying had a hundred Ensignes hung ouer his graue.

There is no calme but hath a storme: one would haue said to haue scene him at the height of his prosperities; That he had fixed a nayle on Fortunes wheele, that it might not turne, and yet he is sodainly cast downe. There past but one night, betwixt his glory and his ruine. The Flower being so sodainly blowne, the first Northerne winde did wither it, and carry it away. His honours and greatnesse were the meanes to ruine him, like vnto *Abisalon*s long hayre, by the which he was hanged. King Lewis the eleuenth did alwayes say, That Pride carried Ruine behinde him. A heart which knowes from whence the good comes which it inioyeth, is alwayes an enemy to Pride. So there is but a moment betwixt glory and ruine. Great trees are long in growing, but are rooted vp in an instant. And it is true, if the Duke of Biron had had a braine, hee had not lost his head, and had not brought it into the hands of his Princes iustice, whom hee had so much offended.

This Marshall had goodly parts, communicable to few, his valour was admirable, The Marshall and happy in all his incounters; of an inuincible courage, infatigable and neuer tired with any toile, continuing ordinarily fifteene dayes together on horse-back. Hee was not inclined to voluptuousnesse, nor much to the loue of women, sober inough, the which began to quench that furious humour, as intemperancie and greatnesse increased, or that rest did moderate his boyling passions. Hee was extremely vaine-glorious, yea some-times hee would refuse his meate, and content him-selfe with little glory. to feede his fantasie with glory and vanity. Hee was of a meane stature, black, reasonable grosse, hollow eyd, and rough in speech and conuersation. He was aduenturous in warre, ambitious beyond all measure. The excessse of his ambition made him to braue it without iudgement. Hee became so presumptuous, as he thought that neither the King, nor France could subsist without him. Hee was become ill-tongued, speaking ill of all the Princes, threatening the Parliaments, and the officers of iustice, some with death, and to dispossesse others of their places. Hee was aduanced from the meaneft to the highest degrees of honour, of a simple souldier, hee became a Capitaine, then a Colonell, afterwards Admirall and Marshall, and in the end Lieutenant of the Kings Armies, and in his heart hee aspired to bee Duke of Burgundy, Sonne in Lawe to the Duke of Sauoy, and nephew to the King of Spaine. If Sylla were resolute, cruell and bloody, hee yeelded nothing to all men together: If hee were valiant, this

A comparison betwixt Sylla and the Duke of Biron.

1602. this man exceeded him by ten degrees, and all the Romaine Princes together. Their Actions and their ends were almost alike, but that Sylla dyed after he had vanquished: this before he could vanquish, and in the midst of his course, did feele the vengeance of Gods wrath. Howsoever he had wonne the Souldiers hearts, to whom hee gaue all liberty, hee purchased credit with them that had neuer seene him (for they that had seene and felt him, withed him at the Indies) and made Strangers admire his valour: the Constable of Castille in the Franche-County, the Archduke at Amiens, and the Marquis of Waranbon in Artois, whom he made to pay forty thousand Crownes for his ranfome, with many Spaniards which hee caused to be hanged sodainly, for that they had called him Baron. Moreouer the Kings exceeding fauours, the praises where-with hee did publicly honour him: his admirable fortune, his comming to the restoring of the last ruines of the State, like to another Camillus to deliuer the Capitoll, had made him not onely famous throughout all Europe, fearefull to all the neighbours, but necessary for France. Behold a man that was happy, full of content, which held Fortune captiue, withall her treasures: he commanded the felicities of this world, he had glory, honour, riches, and those gifts which Fortune imparts to her darlings. He was raised to the top of Fortunes wheele, but hee fell, for he that gouernes the helme and all her motions, could no longer endure his insolencie and vanity. Sequitur suberbos vltor a tergo Deus. The causes of his ruine are infinite; the contempt of piety is the chiefe: this ground taken away, all vices abound, and as the seruant said to King Asneus, O Prince, follow the infallible way of Piety, and your Scepter shall be durable: for whereas faith and holinesse hath no place, there is no happinesse; the reason is, for that without God wee hold all things indifferent, the Law folly, Iustice frensie, and Faith a fantasie; we hold the words of vertue and vice to be idle, whereas the feare and trust in God, limits our passions and insatiable desires, so as gouerning our actions by a iust proportion we cannot erre.

Shame followes pride.

He was often-times seene to iest at the Masse, and to laugh at them of the reformed Religion, with whom he had beene bred vp from his infancie. For at the age of eight yeares, the Lady of Brifambourg his fathers sister (beeing of the reformed religion) did so affect him for his actiue disposition, as she demanded him of his Mother, the which he granted, and from that time she made him her onely heire. Vntill the age of fixteene yeares he was called Charles of Gontault (for then hee had an elder brother which died since at the Duke of Alançons voyage into Flanders) and bred vp at Brifambourg neere vnto S. Iean d'Angely, where he was nothing giuen to his booke, but wholly inclined to Armes, for which consideration, his father the Marshall Biron, a martiall man, and then a catholike, tooke him from his Aunt, and led him for a while with him through the countries of Xaintonge, Aulins and Angoulmois, where hee caused him to be instructed in the catholike Religion: but vpon false principles which he did learne of some Courtiers, hee did often mock at all religion. The second cause of his ruine was the alteration of his fortune. After the death of his elder brother, his father caused him to be called Baron of Biron, and brought him to Court, where at the first he had a quarrell with the Lord of Carency, sonne to the Earle of la Vauguion, the which was ended by a combat of three against three, Biron, Loignat and Ienissac of the one side, slue Cerency, Estissac, and la Bastie: their quarrell grew for the heire of Caumont, which either of them affected in mariage, yet neither of them had her. The Duke of Espernon got his pardon, the which was confirmed through the credit which his father had then in Court. Some say, that being thus in trouble, hee went disguised like a Carrier of Letters, vnto one la Brosse a great Mathematician, whom they held to be skilfull in casting of Natiuities, to whom he shewed his natiuity, drawne by some other. And dissembling it to bee his, he said 'it was a Gentlemans whom hee serued, and that he desired to know what end that man should haue. La Brosse hauing rectified this figure, said vnto him. That hee was of a good house, and no elder then you are, said hee to the Baron, asking him if it were his? the Baron answered him, I will not tell you: But tell mee (said hee) what his life, his meanes, and end shall bee. This good old man who was then in a little his fortune.

A little Garret which serued him for a Study, said vnto him, My sonne, I see, that hee, whose nativity this is shall come to great Honours, by his industry and military valour, and may bee a King, but there is a CAPVT ALGO which hinders it. And what is that (said the Baron of Biron?) Aske me not (said la Brosse) what it is. No (said the Baron) I must know it. In the end he said vnto him; My Sonne, it is, that he will doe that which shall make him loose his head. Wherevpon the Baron (as they report) did beat him cruelly, and hauing left him halfe dead, he went downe, and carried away the Key of the Garret doore, whereof he bragged when he was gone. They say he had conference with one Cesar, who was a Magitian at Paris, who told him, That onely a back-blow of the Bourguignon would keepe him from being a King. He remembered this prediction being a prisoner in the Bastille. And intreated one that went to visit him, to learne if the executioner of Paris were a Burguignon, and hauing found it so, hee said, I am a dead man. During these last ciuill warres, his father being commander of the Kings Army, of a young Baron hee was so-dainly made a Captaine and Marshall of the campe. After his fathers death at Espernay, hee was Generall and Admirall of France, then Marshall and Lieutenant of the Kings Armies: the defeat of the Spanish succours at Laon, with his exploits in Burgundy and Picardy, made the King so to loue him, as he onely was in credit: there remained nothing but to vse his happinesse modestly. Doubtlesse hee did great seruices to the King and to the Crowne, but he was rewarded with great fauours, and aduanced to the greatest dignities and honours of the Crowne, the which if he could haue vsed temperately, euen in the height of his Fortune, hee had beene too happy. It is reported that his father said vnto him, seeing his haughty disposition; Baron I would aduise thee when a Peace shall be made, to go and line priuately at thine owne house, else thou must leaue thy head at the Grene. In many things Soueraigne Princes haue a common interest: a blow giuen with the right hand is fencible to the left: A conspiracie in one place, giues example and consequence in another. Who so hinders his neighbour from punishing the felonies of his subiects, binds him-selfe to the like, and may suffer the same storme, for euery Soueraignes country is apt to breed sedition and treacherie, and as intercessions are odious, so the defence and protection is vniust. Whatsoever is said that Princes should imbrace them which are persecuted, as one element defends him that is afflicted by another, it is not to be vnderstood but of persecutions apparantly vniust. Hence growes the custome of Princes to congratulate for the discouerie and punishment of treason against their estate.

All Princes that were allied to the crowne of France reioyced at the discouery of the Duke of Biron's treason. The Queene of England, and the King of Scotland sent their Ambassadors vnto the King to congratulate that God had so happily preuented this last conspiracie. The King of Spaine did the like by Taxis. The Archduke laide all the blame vpon the Count of Fuentes. The Duke of Sauoy sent the Count of Viesque vnto the King, as well to obserue how the Duke of Biron's death had beene taken in court, and in that great city whereas there was diuersity of humors and opinions, as to excuse him from the imputation which was laid vpon him to be the Architect of this conspiracie.

The Ambassadors of England, Scotland and Sauoy, were receiued of one day at Monceaux. The King in receiuing of them made a great difference, for hee receiued them not with one countenance. The last was not vsed like vnto the first, the King leaning vpon a window, shewed by his gesture, that hee was not pleased with his excuses, and that words alone could not repaire so bad effects, nor make him beleue that the Duke of Sauoy had not beene an actor to corrupt the Duke of Biron. The Dukes Ambassador made his excuse with a great grace and boldnesse, although it be a very hard thing to discourse of a subiect to one, that can giue no beleefe vnto it. The Count of Viesque passing through Lions, visited the Gouvernor, and gaue him a letter from his Maister, the which hee sent vnto the King, who was very well pleased with his proceeding, and writ vnto him in this sort. It was not needfull to send mee this letter, but onely Guiche the 1. of September to giue mee a new confirmation of your loyalty, which I hold so assured, as it needed neither that, 1602. that, nor any other. But the wisest doe alwayes obserue the ancient formes, whereof that is one of the principall, not to see nor heare any thing from forraigne Princes, without the priuie and permission of his Maister. The King parted from Monceaux to goe to Paris, where he dispatched the Ambassadors. That of Sauoy came to his Maister beeing newly returned from Vercel, where hee had visited the Duke of Saxonyes brother passing into Italy. He presented him with eight horses richly furnished, and a hat-band with a Jewell esteemed at twelue thousand crownes. Soone after hee went to Riouly for his pleasure of hunting, leading D'Albigny with him, to whom hee made shewes of extraordinary loue. Mens coniectures were not able to pierce into the secrets of that which they treated of together; but they will burit forth before the yeare shall end. The Count of Viesque came to Riouly in the beginning of October. Euery man said at Thurin that his Ambassage was gracious, and that the King was well pleased with that which the Duke of Sauoy would haue him beleue, yet all Sauoy was full of Souldiars, and no man knew how they should bee employed. Some said that the Duke of Biron's death would breed a new storme in France, but all the choller and threats of them that repined thereat, was but a fantastieall lightning. The Count of Fuentes would haue done his best to haue bred a storme: his spirit which hath no rest but in exercise, thinking (with Teres father to Sitalces) that nothing doth distinguish him from the rest of his Maisters seruants but warre, was so much discontented for this death, as hee could not sleepe. He did meditate of reuenge, and the King was well aduertised thereof.

Brates of w of the Duke
of Biron.

It was thought that vnder colour of passing a new Armie ouer the Alpes, hee would discouer some desseigne, and the King was aduertised from many parts, that the City of Lions was not the last, nor the least in his chollerick thoughts. That three and twenty companies of Spaniards (in the which were at the least three thousand men) had past the Mountaines, and were dispersed in Sauoy: that the Duke of Sauoy had at Romilly five hundred men, vnder the regiment of Valdisers, and at Anissy fiftene hundred Neapolitains; that they attended some Lansquenets: that neere vnto Genoa there were thirtie companies of Spaniards landed: and that they fortified Saint Genis (against the last treatie of Peace) a fitt place to execute any desseigne vpon Lions or Vienne. The King therefore fore-seeing that if they sought any aduantage vpon France it should be rather for Lions then any other place, he therefore lodged in the Bastions of Saint John and Saint Clair five Companies of the Regiment of Bourg L'Espinaffe, and those of Nizet, at Montluet and Seissel.

These troups
of the Duke of Sauoy were not for Lions, but for Genoa.

The Baron of Lux comes to the King.

The opinions of this new Armie was as diuers as their desseignes were secret, yet it seemed that the Duke of Sauoy feared, least his countrie should bee forced againe by the Kings army, and that hee should not haue so good a composition as the first, and therefore he provided for all his places in Sauoy, but this hatched another great dessein whereof wee will speake in the end of this yeare. The King was much troubled to search into the depth of the Duke of Biron's conspiracie. La Fin was not acquainted with the last resolutions, the party condemned would neuer discouer his complices. All this practise was well knowne to the Baron of Lux, who came vnto the King vpon the assurance of his Maiesties word to goe and come freely: yet hee was aduised not to approach neere vnto the Court of Parliament, who would not intreate him more mildly then they had done the Duke of Biron, seeing hee had bene imbarked with him in the same vessell, and to consider that Princes promise any thing to discouer a Treason, but they neuer trust the traitors, and if happily they fauour them for a time, the hatred which followes after, is more violent and irreconcilable. That they vse men, as a countryman doth his Bees, when they haue drawne out the Honey and Waxe, they chase them away with fire, & smoke. The King was so well satisfied with that which the Baron of Lux had said vnto him (hauing talked long with him) as entring into his Carosse, he told the Count Soissons, and the Cardinall of Ioyeuz, that hee would not for two hundred thousand Crownes, but to haue spoken with the Baron of Lux.

His pardon past in the Parliament at Paris, and hee was receiued in that of Dijon, with the same honours he had before, and his charge of Lieutenant in the government of

A of Bourgongne, and of the country of Bresse, his wisdom did conduct him in a stormie sea, to a safe Port, and made him to auoyde some dangers, whereas any other would haue lost both Card and Compass. The greatest indiscretion which the Duke of Biron had committed, (next to the giuing care to the promises and perswasions of strangers) was that he had written his intentions, and had imparted them to another. It is a maxime in matters of conspiracie, not to commit any thing to writing, but all must goe by mouth. They could not haue condemned the Duke of Biron, but by his owne letters. And of all those of whom hee spake in his letters, there was nothing found of theirs in writing. Letters serue indifferently for an assurance of the faith that is giuen, and for a prooffe of infidelity.

B Hee would dye with that content, that none of his friends should bee toucht but him selfe. Hebert his Secretarie indured the Racke, and his patience did iustifie him, but the Kings words were a more violent torture vnto him, drawing the truth from him, the which hee would not confesse vnto the Court. The Baron of Fontanelles (who was found to haue intelligence with the Duke of Biron) was broken vpon the wheele by the decree of a great Councell. Mom-barras Gouverneur of Rennes was committed to Prison. Such as had knowne him during the last troubles full of resolution and affection for the reducing of Brittain to the Kings obedience, lamented his misfortune. The Earle of Auvergne continued two moneths in the Bastille after the execution of the Duke of Biron. The King set him at liberty and receiued him into fauour, after three or foure dayes that hee had purged himselfe and discharged his conscience to the Chancellor, the Marquis of Rhosny and to Sillery. Hee grew presently familiar with the King, as if hee had neuer bene sequestred from his presence, wherein appeared his Maiesties good nature and his generous spirit, which doth neuer remember any iniuries.

This generous and naturall disposition to forget offences, hath alwayes bene obserued in him when as hee commanded armies. The Author of the free discourse saith, that he had scene within a quarter of an houre after a battle wonne, the vanquished so familiar among the victors, as they could not distinguish them; they came ordinarily to his Maiesties rising and going to bed, to his dinner, to his chamber, and into his cabinet, and were for the most part petty maisters of the campe in those ciuill warres, who neuer durst to haue spoken to the King, if they had not bene his enemies, and in this qualitie they receiued a good countenance. But the Duke of Bouillon considering what had bene done in the Bastille vpon the person of so great a Captaine, would not trust to this great mildnesse, although he had as great prooffe thereof as any other. The King sent for him, and hee desired to iustifie himselfe in the chamber at Castres. The King let him vnderstand, that the pretext which hee tooke to flie vnto the Chamber at Castres for Iustice, was without ground, for he was not called into question, and when he should do it, it could not bee there, for that hee depended not of that iurisdiction, neither could they take knowledge thereof without commission from his Maiestie. Hee attended not to vnderstand his pleasure more particularly by the President Cau-martin, whom he resolved to send vnto him, but tooke the way to Geneua, and so to Heidelberg. The Subiect may neuer capitulate with his Prince, but if necessity doth require it, it must not be betwixt two Barres, like to the Constable of Saint Paul, but as farre off as hee can.

The Duke of Bouillon refused to come to the King.

The Duke of Bouillon beeing in his Viconte of Turenne, when as the King sent for him, he answered him with this letter. Sir, hauing vnderstood by that of your Maiesties owne hand of the eightene of this moneth, that I had bene accused by those which had bene examined in Councell vpon the conspiracies of the Duke of Biron, & that you commanded mee to repaire presently to court to iustifie my selfe, I sent away him presently that came, with answer to your Maiesty that I would follow instantly, the which I had done, if I had not receiued certaine intelligence who were my accusers. The which made mee to change this resolution, and humbly to beseech your Maiesty to consider that the treacheries and disloyalties against your Person and State are so fully „thought to the contrary. They doe ill acknowledge your mercy, to continue still culpa„ble, changing onely their offence. Seeing that since they are become false witnesses, I „will say vnto you my Liege, as the Psalmist said vnto God. Lord come not neere me, un- „till I bee fortified. I must confesse that I feare your countenance (hauing admitted such „men to accuse me) seeing that your Maiestic demands my iustification, the which hath „retained me, not that my conscience doth accuse me of any fault that is worthy of such „an examination. Seeing it doth import your seruice, it is requisite I should satisfie your „Maiesty, your realme and mine honor, and free them of my religion from the scandall C „which they should receiue, if my crime were not punished, & mine innocencie knowne.

 „For the attaining whereof, I assure my selfe that your Maiestic would not deprive mee
 „of the liberty, which all your subiects of the religion enioy, and the rather, for that no „Iudges can be more interested in these affaires, seeing the question is of the decay of „your Realme to augment that of Spaine, wherein all your subiects haue one common „losse; but those of the Religion (whereof the Chambers do consist) haue a more par„ticular: the which they esteeme more deare then their liues, which is the losse of their „exercice. They will therefore bee seuerer Iudges rather then milde. If they shall finde „mee guilty, they will hate me more then any other, from whom they did least expect it.
 „I must humbly therefore beseech your Maiestic, to send my accusers and accusations, D „thinking the imputation which is laide vpon mee heauie, and the time tedious, vntill „your Maiestic may be fully satisfied of mine innocencie, for the speedy effecting where-
 „of I will attend at Castres the iustification of my fault or Innocencie, Iudging that the „time which I should haue spent in going to your Maiestic, would haue but prolonged
 „the affliction of my soule remaining accused, seeing that your Maiestic was to send „mee backe to the Chambers, to condemne or absolue mee, beeing the Iudges which „your Edict hath giuen mee. That it would therefore please you to releue my minde „speedily in giuing mee the meanes to make my Innocencie knowne, and that by this „prooue you may rest assured of my faithfull seruice, and I of your fauour, the which shall „bee about all things desired of your most humble, most obedient, and most faithfull „Subiect, and Seruant.

Henry de la Toure.

The Prince of Ginuille commited.

The King caused the Prince of Ginuille to be committed to the Duke of Guise his brother. Sillery examined him very carefully, his Maiestic relying vpon his wisdom & integrity. He aduertised the Gouvernours of Prouinces why he did it, vsing these words. I haue committed my Nephew the Prince of Ginuille, vnto my Nephew the Duke of Guise his brother, for that he had rashly and indiscreetly giuen care to certaine propositions, that were made vnto him against my seruice: I will hold him in the same gard vntill that matters be made plaine. But I assure my selfe it concernes him onely, wherein those of his house haue no share, neither is there any one named or comprehended with him, whereof I thought good to aduertise you.

Wee need not feare that the hearts of the French, although they be inconstant, will passe any more into Spaine. The Marshall of Biron, head hath stoppt the passage. There

A There is no man desirous to giue care to the promises of Spaine, hauing such ruinous effects: and who doth not detest that cruell ambition, which hauing corrupted the best blood of the Duke of Biron, bred in him so violent and continuall a Fever of the mind, as after that it had afflicted him about foure yeares, there was no other remedie but by that shameful letting off blood, which made his soule all bloudie and violently to leaue his body. Those that will not be diuerted by the aspect of this head, and which imagine vnto themselves mountains of gold beyond the Pirenes, let them consider that a Prince and chiefe of his party, hauing followed their desseigns, hath gotten nothing but ruine, after that he had ingaged his liuing, his wiues, and childrens, he spent fife hundred thousand Crowns in ready mony, and became indebted vpon his own credit, and his friends in about a million of gold, he was in the end so disliked, hated, and contemned of them, as in stead of canonizing him, the Duke of Feria did giue aduice to make him away, or to keepe him prisoner. We must resist the first thoughts of despite, discontent, and rebellion, and take heed least the desire of new fauours which we affect of the Prince, make vs not forget the former: for hence grow discontents more powerfull to draw vs to ill, then reason is able to restrain vs to good: from despite spring bad desires, which neuer increase but by furie and blindness, and produce violent motions of ambition, which bind him to vndertake and to do any thing, although there bee nothing that may dispendence the subiect from his durie to his Prince.

C They did speak, write, and discourse of this death both in their Prose and Rime, some with so small reason, as they strued to find innocency in the life, and constancie, and resolution in the Duke of Biron's death, although that in the last there were more colour and violence, then constancie, whereof patience is one of the principall branches, and in the first so great guilt, as if the Court had quited him, his conscience could not absolue him. Such as in these discourses desired rather to seem learned, then wise, repented their knowledge, and were in paine. Herein some one did me a bad office, which forceth me to adde something in this Narration for mine owne defence, and if that which I shall say, doth not content Slander, yet shall it be according vnto truth, or like vnto bad Musitions, who are neuer wearied themselves though their musicke be vtunable.

D Presently after the Duke of Biron's execution, I did write sixe lines to Lions vpon this subiect, to dispenge my selfe of a longer discourse which they expected, meaning to reserue it for this History; whereunto I added sixe verses written (as it was sayd) by one of the first Poets of France, vpon the heads of the father and sonne, the first struck off with a Cannon, the other with a sword. This letter coming before all aduice of so famous an accident, was imparted and copied out greedily, contrarie to my intent. In the end it returned to Paris, and from thence to Monceaux where the King was. Hauing found opportunity there to speake vnto his Maiesty after supper, of a busines far from this letter, wheron I dreamed no more: hauing told me his pleasure he added these words: Go and speake with Monsieur de Villeroy, I asked if it were for the busines whereof

E I had spoken vnto him, No sayd he: and drawing me aside it pleased him to heare mee, and to giue me better words then I could hope for, adding in the end, Speake to Monsieur de Villeroy, without giuing me any farther knowledge of the matter. I repaired vnto him early in the morning, not knowing what to say, but only to receiue his Maiesties intention: after some complements of courtesie, he caused all them in the chamber to retire, and then he sayd vnto me: You are made the author of a letter touching the Marshall of Biron, which hath gone far out of the Realme: it containes but fix or seuen lines, and hath points in it, which the King hauing well considered of, is so much the more offended, that hauing made you his Historiographer, it appeares plainly what your passion might be, words beeing the Interpreter of the minds affection.

F It behooued me then to protest, that I had neither spoken nor written any thing against the Kings Iustice; to lament the Duke of Biron's death, who in his life had not giuen me any occasion to bewaile it, with any other then a common affection, which grieues that so braue a Knight should so forget himselfe: that hauing seene a discourse of my writing of the causes and effects of the warres, betwixt the Houses of France

1602. and Austria, vnto the peace of Veruins, thinking that I had not spoken of him neither so often, nor so highly as he desired, for that all the glorie of braue exploitcs should be referred vnto the head, especially beeing in the armie, hee complained to the Chancellor of Belieure, and discouered his choller more plainly to De Vic, Ambassadour in Suifferland, adding cruell threatcs to his bad words against me. Here he cut me off, and sayd: This letter speakes not after this manner, and I belecue you will know it by the copie. At the first three words I did auow that which was of my style, if I had denyed it, they could hardly haue represented the Originall: but beeing loth to lye vnto God, I spake my conscience, which was free from scruple and apprehension. He approoued this freedome and sayd, that the last line was it which had offended the King. They which haue his life do not beleue his death: whereunto I replied, that the copie was not comfortable to the Originall, and that by an iniurious forgetfulness, or an extreame impofigure they had left out a word which did peruert the fence, and had giuen the King occasion to be offended, and that there was, They that haue knowne his life, will not beleue his death: That besides this omission there was nothing in the letter, but might be spoken of so extraordinarie an accident, & death of that quality, & that there was great difference betwixt writing of an Historie and a letter. And admit he had sayd, that hee went as chearefully to execution, as he had in former times to a charge, that hee had amazed death, and made the hang-man to tremble, this did not impugne the iudgement of the Court, seeing that the innocencie of the condemned is not iudged by his constancie in dying: That it is not strange nor incredible to write that a man which had contemned his life, and braued death in so many occasions, had shewed courage in this last action.

That if they had obserued violent motions in him, a death of that fashion might well put a man of his humor into furie. This letter did also speake of that head which had caused the death of the bodie, saying, that the one was generous, and the other full of glorious wounds. But these tearmes were to bee considered according to the simplicitie of my intention, which did not iudge of this head as it was vpon a Scaffold, but for that which it had beene in many great actions, and had purchased honourable makes of valour for his Princes seruice: That it were a point of great ignorance, or impudent flatterie, to attribute glorie vnto an act full of shame and ignominie, and to confound the light of his first actions, with the darknesse of the last. These reasons did content him, and he ended with these words. The King would not speake vnto you of it, for that hee hath a good opinion of you, but thought fit that I should tell you of it. Thus much I thought fit to say for my Apologie, passion hauing moued me to make this little digression. The King hauing since beene satisfied of the truth, he returned againe into fauour.

Humbert de la Tour Daulphin, giues Daulphine to the first sonne of France.

There came 15, or 16. Deputies out of Daulphiné to Paris. This Prouince was giuen to the Crowne of France, by Humbert Prince of Daulphiné, vpon condition, that the K. eldest son, (the presumptiue heire of the Crown) should be Soueraign therof from his birth. Hauing made great ioy for this blessing, and to see that which they had not seene since K. Charles the 8, they made choice of some out of the 3. Estates of the country, to go and performe their first duty of subiection, and to know their Soueraign Lord. Jerome of Villards Archb. of Vienne, was the chiefe of this Ambassage, the which he gouerned and performed happily, and with honor. Hauing done their duties to the King and Queene, and let them vnderstand the charge which he had from the States of the Countrey with the other Deputies, he was led to Saint Germaines, to see their new Prince, who was vnder a cloth of Estate in his Cradle, vpon a little bed. The Count Soissons, Gouvernour and Lieutenant generall of Daulphiné, his Gouvernesse and his Nurse were by him. The Arch-b. of Vienne spake vnto him standing, all the rest kneeled of one knee. The substance of which speech was. That the ioy of France had beene infinite by his birth, fore-seeing that her felicitie should be imperfect without it, and that the blessing of Peace could not continue without his birth, who should bee the death of all pretexts of Ciuill Warres, but your Prouince of Daulphiné hath farre greater cause

The Archb. of Viennes speech to the Daulphin.

A cause of Ioy, for that it feesles in effect, that which the rest of the Realme hath but in hope. Those which haue beleueed that felicitie could not be in the infancie of a child, seeing it requires a continuance of yeares, and a constant knowledge of vertue and fortune, meant it not by Kings children, and above all of the first borne of the Crowne of France, at whose first birth we see all the fauours raine vpon his head, the which Heauen can powre vpon them whome it will make happie. The same day my Lord, that you saw the light, the Sunne did salute you a great Prince, and the sonne of a great King, you are borne our Soueraigne Lord, and we are become your faithfull vassalls, and most humble Subiects, so as this Prouince which amidst so many afflictions hath sighed aboute an hundred yeares, for the day when it should see borne that sacred bud of the Royall flower, holds it the greatest point of glorie and felicitie, not to know any power more absolute and soueraigne then yours, and to obey you before that you know what it is to command. This cradle (my Lord) about the which the Eternal Prouidence (which hath a speciall care ouer this Realme, and hath appointed his Angels for your guard) is the throne wherein we adore in your liuing Image the inuisible Maiestie of the liuing God. The rocking of this cradle hath settled the felicitie of France, which began to be shaken by furious and dangerous attempts both without and within. It is an extreame griefe vnto vs, that the law of this cradle will not suffer vs to heare you, and make vs so happie as to vnderstand you. And if you vnderstand not but by the Language of infants, which be teares, you shall know the affection of your peoples hearts, by the teares of ioy which fall from their eyes, praying God that it hath pleased him to giue them a Prince issued from the first Crowne of the world, who carries in his heart the generosity of his father, and in his eyes the sweetnes of his mother. A Prince which in greatnesse of courage and in reputation of braue and immortall actions, shall exceed the glorie of all the Princes of the land and sea, as the Daulphin in lightnesse and swiftnesse passeth all the creatures both of land and sea. We acknowledge you for our Prince and soueraigne Lord vnder the King your father, and the Queene your mother, and we do now offer vnto your Highnesse, our liues, our persons, and our fortunes, for homage of your most humble and faithfull subiection. These goodly words were accompanied with a rich present. It was a cupbord of Plate richly wrought and beautified with sundry figures of Daulphins, beeing valued at twelue thousand Crownes. All that attended vpon the Prince had presents of some value, or else Meadilles made for that purpose.

The sonnes present serued for the mother. The King was the better pleased with this Deputation, for that it was in the first yeare of his sonnes infancie: and it is certaine, that of all the proofes of duty and affection which the subiects can yeeld vnto their Soueraigne, those are most commendable which are done without desigine. As Daulphiné doth acknowledge this Prince for their Soueraigne Lord vnder the King: so Bourgongne and the Countreies of Bresse, Baugey, Valfomey, and Gez, (which are annexed vnto it) had him for their Gouvernour: But during his Infancie, and vntill hee were capable to vndergo the functions of that Charge, the power of Licutenancie was giuen to Roger of Bellegarde, first Gentleman of the Chamber, and Master of the Kings Horse, who tooke his oath in the Kings hands: His Pattent was read in the Parliament of Dijon, the Cittie receiued him with all sorts of honours, and went to fetch him at the Carthusiens where he made his abode, attending the preparation for his reception.

The Kings desires beeing seconded with so many prosperities, it pleased him of his owne bountie to take pittie of the ruines and calamities of his subiects, in reuoking the Imposition of the Soulz vpon the Livre (or two shillings) which they called the Pancarre: Hee would not that this great releefe should surprize his peoples hearts, declaring his pleasure some moneths before it was put in practise, to the end that things beeing first expected before they were enioyed, might bee the more acceptable. The King rayled his coynes of Gold and Siluer, the Crowne to fixe shillings and fixe pence, the quarter of the Crowne to fixteene Soulz, and the Francké to one and twenty and foure Deniers, that the coynes of siluer might be valaed after the A rate of threescore and foure Souls to the Crowne. And as that which is held good and profitable at one time, is not so at an other, the counting by Crownes (found in the yeare one thousand five hundred seuentie and seuen, profitable and now verie preiudiciall) was forbidden, and that of the Lyure brought into practise in Contractions, Obligations, and Acts of Iustice, as it was before, since King Philip the faire, Francis the first, and Henrie his Sonne. There is no law which should be more firme and lesse variable then the stander of mony, and there is no crime lesse pardonable then that which offends the Kings picture. For the effecting whereof all coynes should be of pure metall without mixture, all gold, all siluer, or all copper. For as long as mixtures shalbe B allowed, the mint-men will alwaies alter the price of that which should be immurable. The abundance of Dozens in France is such as it is impossible to purge the Realme, but by a generall decay of those that are made, which would be the ruine and impou- rishment of the poore people, or by a defence not to coyne any other hereafter but of siluer.

There sprung vp a new ioy for all France. The Heauens which in former times did raine gold at Rhodes for the birth of Minerva, did now poure forth a great shower of Ioy for the birth of the Kings first lawfull daughter. The Queene was happily brought in bed on the two and twentieth day of Nouember in the morning, and thanks were giuen vnto God according to the vsuall custome. The Riuier of Saonne was ouer- flowed in that sort as the Townes that were seated vpon the bankes, were in great dan- C ger of this inundation. The bridge at Lions was so shaken, as if it had not beene forti- fied by the waight that was layd vpon it, the two Townes had beene diuided by the riu- er. This inundation was greater and more furious, then that which ioyned the riuers of Rhosne and Saonne, in the place of Comfort, but not so terrible as another which happened an hundred yeares since in the moneth of Februarie, with such violence as the waues past ouer the Bridge, and beate downe one of the Arches towards the Ex- change.

This yeare all the Elements did contribute to the prosperitie and blessings of the Peace, the Earth did let the King see a new production of his Treasure. They discou- D red in many parts of the Realme mynes of Gold, Siluer, Copper, and Lead. In the Countrey of Lionois, neere vnto a village called Saint Martin the plaine, which de- pends of an Earledome of the Church of Saint John of Lions; there was a myne of Gold found by a Countriman, who labouring in his Vineyard, found a flint stone in- termixt with Gold, wherby they gathered an infallible assurance that this member was not without a bodie. De Vic Superintendant of the Iustice at Lions, had commande- ment from the King to set some to worke in it. The first production was admirable, and among many goodly peeeces, one was shewed vnto the King very rich, in the which the Gold did appeare, and put forth like vnto the buddes of a Vine, as fine as that of Caruana, so as it might be sayd, that these five thousand yeares the Sunne had made E nothing more perfect in the bowels of the Earth. For it was not Gold in pepin nor in poulder, as in the running streames of the New-found Land, nor mixt with sand as in Bohemia, but in Stones and in Rockes, all pure Gold or pure Siluer: for alwaies the one goes with the other, perfect of it selfe without mixture of any other mettals. The King imitating his Predecessors who had alwaies fauoured the workes of Mynes, which bring infinite commodities, made a generall Edi& for the ordering of the worke and worke-men: Hee created a great Master and a Controuller generall ouer all the mynes of France, with priuiledges to draw in forraigne worke-men which they could not want. Bellegarde was the first great Master of the Mynes, who resigned it to Rufé Beaulieu Secretary of State. Bellingin first Groome of the Kings Chamber, was F Controuller generall.

The new alliance with the Suiffes beeing concluded, they deputed fortie two a- mong them, to whome they gaue power to sweare the obseruation thereof. They came into France in September being honorably receiued in al places. The fourteenth of

A of October they came to Charanton a League from Paris, where they were royally feasted at the Kings owne charge in Senamys house. After dinner the Duke of Mont- bazon, and the Lord of Montigny Gouvernour of Paris went out of the city with an hundred or sixefcore Gentlemen to meete them, and to welcome them in the Kings name. At S. Anthones gate, Bargelone, Prouost of Merchants, with the Sheriffes, Councillors of the City, Quarter-Masters, chiefe Bourgeses, and the three Compa- nies of the Archers of the citie, receiued them, and conducted them to their lodging in Saint Martins Streete. Where besides good words of welcome, they found presents fit to procure thirst, Gammons of Bacon, dried sweet meates, and store of Ipocras and choise wines. The next day they dynd with the Chancelor, after dinner he went to his Maiestie to the Louvre, desiring them to haue a litle patience, vntill the King sent for them. Soone after the Duke of Esquillion accompanied with fifty young Gen- tlemen of the best houses that were then in Court, went to fetch them and to conduct them vnto the King: entring into the base Court of the Louvre, the Duke Montpensier with many Knights of the Holy Ghost, and Noblemen of marke, receiued them in the Kings name: at the stayres-foote going vp to the Hall, the Count of Soissons with ma- ny Gouvernors of Provinces, and old Knights of the Order, receiued them, and so con- ducted them into his Maiesties chamber, where they did their obeysance, the King ta- king euery one of them by the hand. Then the Aduoyer of Bearne who was their spea- C ker, sayd vnto him in his owne language, That the cause of their comming, was to sweare the renewing of the Alliance, and to assure his Maiestie of their faithfull seruice. Viger did interpret vnto the King, who after he had answered them, and witnessed the con- tent which he had of the Declaration they had made in the behalfe of their superiours, hee told them, That they were welcome, from thence they went to kisse the Queenes hand, who was in her chamber, with all the Princesses and Ladies of the Court, pre- senting their seruice vnto her, and the good affection of their Superiours, for the which she thanked them.

Before the oath was taken, they intreated the King that it would please him to heare some particular charges they had from their Superiours. The Chancelor was appoin- D ted to heare what they demanded: the which the Aduoyer of Bearne deliuered vnto him in three Demands. The first was, that it would please his Maiestie to augment the summe of eight thousand Crownes, which was appointed to be distributed euery yeare among them, beeing not sufficient to pay their interests. The second was that the priuiledges of those of their Nation, which trafficked in France, might bee confir- med. The third was, to giue them the declarations that were promised, as well vnto the five petty Cantons, for the continuance of their Alliance with Milan and Sauoy, without infringing that of his Maiestie, as to the Protestant Cantons, that they might not be forced to giue men to make warre in France against them of the Religion. To the first his Maiestie made answer, that the ciuill and forraigne Warres where-with his E people had beene ruined, would not giue him meanes to do better yet, and that they must content themselves with that which had beene promised. The second and third were granted, and the Declarations required by them, signed. Sunday the twelfth of October was appointed for the swearing of the Alliance in our Ladies Church, where the Ambassadors were conducted by Monsieur De Vic. The King beeing come to the Church and set in State, the Princes of Conde and Conty went to fetch the two and forty Ambassadors in the Bishops Hall, and conducted them to their places. All be- ing set, the Arch-bishop of Vienne approached to his Maiestie, carrying a booke of the Euangelists in his hands, and at the same instant the Ambassadors drew neere also. Be- fore them was Vagner Secretary of State at Soleuvre, betwixt M. de Sillery and de Vic, he carried betwixt his armes a cushion of crimson veluet, garnished with Gold, on F the which were two Treaties of the Alliance, the one in French, the other in the Ger- mane tongue, sealed with his Maiesties Seale, and those of the Cantons and their Al- lies. After they had all done their duties, and saluted his Maiestie, Monsieur de Sillery sayd vnto the King: That these Treaties of Alliance were the same which his 1602.

Predecessors

Predecessors had made with the Seigneuries of the Cantons: and that whatsoeuer was added, was for the honor and profit of his Maiesties seruice. The Aduoyer of Beame who deliuered the speech, sayd: That the Seigneurs of the Cantons, their Superiors, had held it for a great honour, that the King desired their alliance, for the which thinking themselves much bound, they had enioyned them to thank his Maiestie, and to offer him on their behalfe their most humble seruice in all occasions that should bee offered, and of all might be expected of true and faithfull allies and confederats, according to the Treaties of their alliance. That they were also sent by their superiors for the performing of the oth, to the end they might faithfully obserue what was contained in the Treaty, and to beseech his Maiestie to do the like for his part, as it belongs to good and loyall friends, allies, and confederats. That by his Maiesties commandement they presented themselves for the performance of the oth, praying God to poure out his blessings vpon so good an alliance, to the content of both the Estates: with prayers, that it would please God to preferue the King and the Dauphin their new ally, in all prosperitie, and giue him a long life and happy reign. The King hearing him, stood vp with his hat on, and answered him with a great Maiestic. That he desired to renew the treaty of peace and alliance with the Seigneurs of the Cantons, for the great esteeme he made of the valor of their nation, who had alwaies bin partners of the honor of his victories, and had made better triall thereof then any of his Predecessors, hauing bin happily assisted by them. That he did accept the offer of their succors, and did in like sort promise to assist them with all his forces and means against any one that should seek to oppresse their liberty. The which he desired them to beleeeue, with assurance, that he had neuer failed in his promises: being ready to sweare the treaty of alliance with them, and to obserue it inuolably, as he had giuen charge to the Chancelor to let them vnderstand more at large.

The Kings
answer to the Suilles.

Oration made by the Chancelor to the Suilles.

The Chancelor made a long speech vnto them to the same purpose, saying: My masters, you haue heard from the Kings mouth, the contentment he receiued of your Legation, and the esteeme which he makes, and will alwaies make of the good friendship, Alliance, and Confederacie of the Cantons, ancient and faithfull friends, Allies, and Confederats to the Crowne of France. Whereunto I will adde the ioy and generall content which the three Orders of the Realme do in like manner receiue. The memorie of former ages, and all Histories may teach vs, that those Estates haue bene held most powerfull and assured, which haue bene supported with most friends, and yet it is seldome seene (what neede soeuer Potentates haue to fortifie themselves with alliance of their neighbours) but that there remaines some distrust, that the greatnesse of their Allies will in the end cause the ruine of their Estates. The Alliance of France with the most vertuous nation of the Leagues, hath alwaies bene free from suspicion. First, there was neuer question, pretension, nor contention betwixt the two Estates, by reason of the Countreys which are held by either part. The Kings of France since the Treaties, and long time before, haue alwaies desired to fauour the greatnesse and prosperitie of the Nation of the Leagues, whereunto besides their naturall inclination and good will, they were moued by their owne interest and reason of State. The greater and more happie that you haue bene or shall be, the more they shall thinke themselves fortified with so great a friend. You haue heretofore made the like Iudgement of the Kings of France, and his Maiestie, here present, assures himselfe, that you will continue the like opinion of him, as you haue had of his Predecessors, and will still haue the same confidence, and retaine the same good opinion of your friendship.

Hee thinke, that your greatnesse is his owne, hee loues and esteemes you for the great and worchie proofes he hath made of your valour and affection to the good of his affaires, hee intreates you to beleeeue, that his greatnesse and prosperitie shall bee alwayes yours, and vpon your loyaltie, at your command, onely bound to the assistance which is promised you by the Treaty of Alliances, but also if it should chance that any Prince or Potentate whatsoeuer, without exception, should attempt against

A against your Estates, hee hath resolved to let you know, by the effects, that your greatnesse is in like recommendation vnto him as his owne, and in such an occasion hee will neither spare his person nor any meanes which God had giuen him. I will tell you that as you haue found the Kings of France affected to loue and cherriish you, so haue you found their Ambassadors most ready to serue you, and to imploy themselves in anything that might concerne the good and prosperitie of your affaires, they did neuer thinke, that which we haue blamed in some, that they should neuer confirme our vnion, but by diuiding you, and troubling your quiet: but contrariwise I may speake confidently and with truth, that they haue done the best offices they could, to nourish peace, concord, vnion and good correspondency amongst you, the which hath made you hereto fearefull vnto all your enemies, and your country as happy and flourishing as any others of Christendome: The actions of the Ambassadors discouer their masters intentions. The successe of things happened, doe also giue a great Testimony of the good that is in this happy alliance.

In the time of King Francis the first, of glorious memory, wee did see in the yeere 1544. all Germany, the Nether-Lands, Spaine and in a manner all Italy had conspired the ruine of this Realme of France, vnder the conduct of the Emperour Charles the fifth, with whom Henry the eight King of England did also ioyne. King Francis had not then any other friend, or confederat to succour him but the Nation of the Leagues, wherewith hauing fortified his armies, hee wonne the battaile of Cerisoles, made head against the great forces, which the Emperour had gathered together from all parts of Christendome, made him to consume his army, which was entred into Champagne, and forced him to demand a peace, the which was afterward concluded at Crespy. As the alliance with the Leagues hath bene happy for France, so wee may say that the alliance of our Kings, hath brought that happinesse to your Nation, as when they haue seene France vnited and in League with the Cantons, neither the Emperors nor any Prince of his house or others, durst attempt to make warre against you, and yet before Maximilian the first and his Predecessors you haue bene forced, for the preservation of your liberty, to hazard many battailes, in the which by the grace of God you haue gotten the victory. Wee hope, and wee promise with the helpe of God, that this good fortune shall continew of either side, if wee doe follow the wise counsell and resolutions of our forefathers, remayning wel vnited together, & not giuing care to any thing that may breed alteration, or a coldnesse in our alliance; if wee preferue it carefully in the same faith whereon it is grounded, and doe cherriish it by all the good offices which true and faithfull friends, allies and confederats, may expect. It is the oth and promise which you make presently vnto the King. It is the oth and promise which the King doth make presently vnto you, and will religiously obserue. These words being ended the Chancelor inuited them to the oth.

Which done the Ambassadors presented themselves to sweare the oth, laying their hands by order of their Cantons vpon the holy Euangelist, to euery one of the which, the Chancelor sayd. You sweare and promise vpon the holy Euangelist, in the name of your Seigneurs and Superiors, well and faithfully to obserue the Treaty of alliance made betwixt his Maiesty and your superiors, without any contradiction or breach directly or indirectly. The order which the Ambassadors held in the oth was, first. The Cantons of Berne, Lucerne, Zurich, Schwits, Vonderwald, Zug, Glais, Basle, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffuse and Appenzel. And of allies, the Abbot of Saint Gall, and the towne of Saint Gall. Of the Grisons, the Canton of Grise, the Cades, the Canton of Droitu-az, Valais, Mulkus, Rotweil and Brenne.

After all the Ambassadors had taken the oth, the King likewise sayd. That hee did sweare and promise to obserue the Treaty as it had bene agreed. Which done they dined in the Bishops pallace. The Prince of Condé sat at the bords end, the Princes of Con-ty, Soissons and Montpensier, the Constable, the Dukes of Neuers and Elquillon, the Earles of Auvergne and Sommeriue, with many others were on the right hand, and the forty two Ambassadors with some French gentlemen on the left. sadors oth.

1602. of dinner, his Maieſty (who had dined apart) came to ſee them, commanding euery one A to keepe his place, then he called for wine, and dranke to all his friends and allies, and ſo went preſently to the Louvre: towards euening bonfires were made and twenty peeces of cannon ſhot of in ſigne of ioy. During there abroad at Paris they were feaſted by the Prouoſt of Merchants, the Count of Soiffons, the Conſtable, and the Ducheffe of Longueuill, and the Friday after the ceremony of the oth, they tooke their leaue of the King, who gaue to euery one a chaine of gold, with his picture, and what was appointed for their voyage, ſtay and returne, and ſo they returned into their country.

In the iuriſdiction of the towne of Langres (in a village called Aprez) Claude Berenger, Lord of Pont, and Guillemette of Metz his wife made their reſidence, hauing alſo a Nephew of the ſayd Berengers with them named alſo de Pont. This woman beeing B ſuborned by a Chanons baſtard of Langres, named Chauvitey, Nicholas Jounet and John Pernet, called the youth, to ſatiſfie their fleſhly luſt without ſuſpition, and at more liberty, they reſolued with her and a maide of hers to make away her husband and his Nephew.

This plot beeing layd, they found an eaſie meanes for the execution. Theſe three Adulterers ſeeing the Gentleman gone to Langres, goe a hunting with his Nephew, whom they ſlew in the thicke of a wood, and threw him into a deepe hollow place betwixt two high rockes, out of the which he could neuer be drawne. Theſe murderers ſeeing themſelues rid of this poore yong man, reported vnto the Gentlewoman C what they had done, concluding with her to cut her husbands throat at his returne from Langres, the which they put in praſtiſe the ſame night that hee returned, for this poore Gentleman hauing receiued a kiſſe (of this daughter of Iudas) being very weary, went to bed and ſlept, the which ſhee knew, and preſently brought theſe murderers into his chamber, who coming eaſily to this poore yong mans bed, being a ſleepe, they cut his throat, and bury him abroad among the Rockes.

After this murder they giue it out, that the Lord of Pont was ſlaine in his voyage to Langres. His wife puts on a mourning weed, and makes a counterſeit ſhew of heauineſſe: but God ſuffers not ſuch offences to bee vnreuealed, a poore man found out the hole where they had buried him, and gaue notice thereof vnto the Juſtice, who D went to the place, and cauſed the Gentlewoman to bee brought thither, who at the firſt ſeemed not to know him, but ſeeing that he was knowne by euery one, and vanquiſhed by apparent ſignes, which they ſhewed her, in the end he knew him. But the Officers did not proceed againſt her with that dexterity that Lagoly did to the wife of Claude Anthoine a Merchant of wines at Paris, who had alſo cauſed her husband Anthoine to bee ſlaine coming from a houſe of his, by ſouldiars whom one named Iumneau (her Adulterer) had ſuborned, for the wife of the ſayd Anthony was hanged, and Iumneau broken aliue at the place Maubert: but this Gentlewoman Da Pont, ſeeing the Juſtice to proceede againſt her by informations, and that they ment to apprehend her, ſhee made an eſcape with all her complices and her ſeruants, and could neuer after bee taken; E yet through their contempt their proceſſe was made, and all of them were hanged in picture.

One Scipio at Paris ſlew his wife and her Adulterer together.

The other accident happened at Paris, of a Gentleman which ſlew his wife and her Adulterer lying together, in this manner. This Gentleman called Seigneur Scipio, being aduertified that his wife (a faire young Gentlewoman) did abandon her ſelfe to luſt, and defiled his bed with a young man: hee admoniſhed his wife, and ſayd vnto her; That hee did willingly paraon what was paſt, but if ſhee returned any more to her ſinne, hee would kill her with her Ruffian, if hee found them together. The Gentlewoman ſcornes this aduice; and an other giuen her by a wife and vertuous Gentlewoman; That if ſhee did not carrie her ſelfe more diſcreetlie, without doubt her husband would doe her a ſhrewde turne. Shee answered her, That her husband was too verie a ſoule to attempt it.

Seigneur Scipio aduertified of the impudency and leud behaiour of his wife, takes his horſe, and makes a ſhew to goe into the country: his wife goes to the Sermon at Saint

A Saint Germain l'Auxerrois, Scipio returnes, and ſhuts himſelfe into his cloſet vnknown of any one. The Sermon being done, ſhee returned preſently to her houſe, and aduertified her adulterer of her husbands abſence, who ſayled not to come at the aſſignation ſhee gaue him, and then they went into the husbands bed: who coming out of his cloſet, found them naked together, and ſlue them, the adulterer had thirty wounds, and the woman ſeuene and twenty: and ſo their deteſtable ſinne was knowne by the view of their dead bodies, the which were brought before the Juſtice, beeing a lamentable thing, and pittifull to behold. The husband did eaſily obtaine his pardon the which proceeds from the Kings bounty. It is a iuſt grieve the which may ſodainly tranſport a husband, finding his wife with an other, as theſe poore infortunate wretches were. The B King about this time pardoned all thoſe, that had beene of the Duke of Birons conſpiracy, ſo as they came and declared themſelues within two months, and cauſed their pardons to be confirmed.

A pardon promiſed to all that were of the Duke of Birons conſpiracy.

The diſcourſe of the enterpriſes and intelligences which the Duke of Sauoy and his father haue had, to ſurpriſe the city of Geneua, with their pretentions, and their defence on the contrary ſide to maintaine their Liberties, would make a good volume. They relied vpon the publike aſſurance of the Treaties of Vervins, Paris and Lions, in the which they held themſelues to be comprehended, and thereby aſſured from all the deſignes of their neighbours. The Duke of Sauoy did not hold himſelfe tied by the C peace, not to ſeek the meanes to become Maiſter thereof, and to reigne there as his Predeceſſors had done, and that there was no danger to breake his faith with people of a contrary Religion. This city doth ſo much import his Eſtate, as it deſerues, if not to breake the peace, at the leaſt to ſtraine and wreſt it. It is ſituated at the end of Lake Lemane, which ſerues for a ditch on the North part: The riuer of Rhosne paſſeth by the towne on the Weſt ſide, and vpon the Eaſt and South is the countie of Sauoy, the great and rich plaines of the Baylewikes of Thonon and Ternier, and the countries of Chablais and Foucigny. The Duke had great pretentions to it, as ſoueraigne of the county of Geneua, and Vicar perpetuall of the Empire. He maintained, that if the Biſhop of Geneua had ſome abſolute authority, it was without preiudice to the Souerain D raignty, the which hath alwaies remained to his Predeceſſors, as Earles of Morienne or Dukes of Sauoy.

The ſituation of Geneua.

The Dukes pretentions.

The city of Geneua (who to maintaine her liberty findes all propoſitions of ſeruitude troubleſome and ſtrange, hath alwaies deteſted the Sauoyards commaundments; That the Biſhops of Geneua haue beene alwaies ſoueraigne Princes of their city, and that the Earles of Sauoy and Geneua, haue often done homage to the Biſhops of Geneua, for the Barronies of Ternier, Remilly, Montfaucon, and for the county of Geneua. That the Duke of Sauoy can pretend no right, as Vicar perpetuall of the Empire, being granted by ſurpriſe, and reuoked after examination of the cauſe by the ſame Emperor, who vpon complaint made vnto him by a biſhop of Geneua, called Ardubius, E declared that hee had beene ſurpriſed in that behalfe, and diſannulled all that hee had giuen to the Earl of Sauoy his couſin, forbidding him to contradiſt this reuocation, vpon paine of his indignation, and a thouſand markes of pure gold. The parties differing vpon the maine point, the queſtion could not bee decided without prooſe. The Duke would haue no other production, but his title of Duke and Soueraigne of Geneua, to maintaine the which hee beſieged the towne, and brought it to extremity, as hath beene ſhewed elſewhere. It is true, that without the Kings protection this city would not long reſiſt the forces of the Duke of Sauoy.

The defence of the Geneuois.

The Inhabitants haue beene reduced to that Eſtate as they might ſay as the Caponans did vnto the Romaines, imploring their ayde againſt the Samnites: It is a greuous and F miſerable thing, what our miſfortune forceth vs to confeſſe (fathers conſcript) to bee brought to that extremity as hereafter we muſt abandon our ſelues, either to our friends, or to our enemies. If you defend vs, wee ſhalbe yours, if you forſake vs, the Samnites. Being abandoned by the King, there is no defence for them but will prooue weak againſt ſo mighty a Neighbour, who ſhall bee alwaies aſſiſted by the greateſt forces of Italy

Italy and Spaine. And if they bee succoured by them of Bearn with whom they haue an equall alliance, they shall runne the hazard of common-weales, which in the end haue beene recompensed with a forced subiection. The Swisses propound not bare words in their amities, they ground them vpon equality of profit. The humour of this city is to be free, there is not any cittizen but speakes freely to any Prince how great foeuer, as Demosthenes sayd, when they talked of the milde and easie command of Antipater. Wee will haue no Maister how gentle soener. The Inhabitants of this city haue an hereditary hatred against the Duke, the which is so rooted in them, as if hee did presse them by force to the extremities of a siege, they would resolute with them of Xanthe to mingle their ashes with the smoake of their houses. The Duke B hauing attempted what hee could by force, resolues to surprise them now by policie. Hee made an enterprize as full of proofes of his courage, iudgement and good conduct, as of his misfortune.

It had beene long in hand, and yet nothing was discouered, yet was it well knowne, that hee had caused ladders to bee made. That from all partes hee drew vnto him men of resolution; that hee had good numbers at Chambery well paid, and well entertained, attending the full ripeness of this designe, and yet they knew not how hee would employ them, preparing onely their hearts and armes for the execution of their Princes commaundements, referring the conduct thereof to his wisdom. Yet could they not beleue that this designe was against them of Geneva, for that hee Treated C with them of the liberty of trafficke, hauing some few daies before sent President Rochette to let them vnderstand that it was expedient to Treat of some manner how to liue for the ease of the people.

They were so well pleased with this motion and his assurances, that although cities of this condition doe not easily beleue them that make warre against them, yet they were lulled a sleepe therewith, and neglected their preseruacion, thinking that there was nothing of more power to defend them, then the Treaties of peace betwixt France, Spaine and Sauoy. In the which they thought themselves to be comprehended vnder the name of Allies and confederates of the Cantons. In like sort the Dukes subiects went so freely to Geneva, as the Eue before this execution, certaine Gentle- D men who knew something of this designe, beeing come into the city to buy horses sayd. That they would come the next daie to conclude the bargain: and others had vsed the like speeches for other Merchandise, beleeuing that the victory was assured: but Heauen which laughs at the presumptions of these Imaginations, had resolved to humble them.

The Gouvernor of Lions had speedy intelligence, that the Duke of Sauoy was come on this side the Alpes, and that hee had brought scaling Ladders: hee aduertised the King thereof, and made prouision for the city of Lions. D'Albigny Lieutenant General for the Duke on this side the Alpes, had drawne them downe, and lodged them in townes neere to Geneva. The Rendezuous was at Chambery, the time of the execution was referred to the generall. The troups began to march about fixe of the clock: Brignolles gouernour of Bonnes had beene a chiefe actor in this designe, holding it so certaine, as he sayd. He would die if he did not liue in Geneva. D'Albigny had set gards vpon all the waies to stay all passengers, that no report might goe before them, and that the Duke of Sauoies marching might be vnknowne, to whom they represented the execution to be so easie & certaine, as he would needs be there himself in person to reape the fruite, and the triumph which his grand-father had begunne. Hee past the Alpes but with siue in his company, and came the same day neere vnto Tremblieres, a village but a league distant from Geneva. They which should execut the enterprize & giue the first attempt, went along the riuer of Albe, that the noyse of the water might keepe F the Sentinells from hearing them as they marched. Two things happened that were predictions of bad successe. There appeared vnaccustomed fires in the ayre. A Hare crossed them many times in their way, and gaue them a false alarm. Many things were seene that night that troubled their imagination, causing them to take 1602.

A Groues for Squadrons of men, and Thistles for Lances, as it happened once before Paris. About eleuen of the clocke at night, they discouered certaine stakes, on the which the Serge-makers of Geneva did drie their Serge. Those that were in the foremost ranks would haue charged them, thinking it was some Ambuscado. From thence they passe along the riuer of Rhosne, placing the body of their troups in the meadow of Plainpallais. Brignolet with those that were appointed for the escaladoe, follow D'Albigny who leads them into the ditches by the counterscarpe, on the side of the Corraitiere, without beeing discouered by the Sentinells, although the Duckes in the ditch made what noyse they could to awake them of Geneva, as the geese had done at Rome against the Gaules. They passed the ditch vpon hurdells, and planted three b Ladders against the walles, they were of a strange inuention, beeing portable vpon Moyles, and to bee made as long and as short as they pleased, and yet they were as strong as if they had beene but of one peece. If they had beene as fortunate, as they were well furnished of all things necessary, they had executed their designe happily. They had made prouision of hatchets, hammers and pincers, to cut in sunder chaines of iron, breake open lockes and to pull out great nailes and barres of gates. They had many Petards, and few that could vse them.

Fortune which is powerfull in such enterprizes sayled them, after that hee had brought them into the midst of the towne, and made them masters of the streetes about two houres. There were almost two hundred men mounted by one of these Ladders. Brignolet was the first, carrying himselfe more valiantly then wisely. Hauing recovered the wall, he surprised the souldiar that stood Sentinell, he got the word from him, slew him, and cast him into the ditch, staying in his place for him that went the round, that he might doe as much to him, the which hee effected, comming to giue him the word in his eare. The boy which carried the Lanthorne fled, and aduertised the court of gard what had happened to his maister, wherewith notwithstanding they were not greatly moued.

The first discovery of the surpris.

This was betwixt one and two of the clocke, attending the houre of foure, for then they had propounded to beginne the execution, meaning to giue more time to them D that were to second them, and to haue the day draw neere, for that in all executions of warre which are done in the night, there is confusion. The assailants had a good houres respight to mount, and as much time more before they incountred any that made resistance. If D'Albigny had beene within to vse the benefit of the time, and to dispose more wisely of things, then Sonars, Brignolet, or Atsignac had done, they might bouldly haue sayd the towne had beene wonne. Halfe an houre after two of the clock, a sentinell in the tower of the minste, hauing heard some rustling in the ditch, shot off his peece to giue the alarum, and forced Brignolet to discouer himselfe, charging all that were at the court of gard of the new gate, to plant the Petard there, and to make an entry for the body of the army which was in Plainpallais. They forced the court E of gard beeing but siue and twenty men: but against the Maximes of warre, which commands them to kill all, they let one escape, who ran vp and let downe the portcullis, to make their Petard vnprofitable. The towne was full of cries and fearefull exclamations, wherof the Sauoyards should haue made their profit, and increased their courages, as it did daunt the inhabitants, who knew not which way to runne, some crying to one gate, others running to an other. But the assailants lost themselves in the appearance of so happy a successe. Those without should haue giuen an alarm at some gate, to diuide the forces of the towne. Those that were within, made no vse of their hatchets, hammers, and pincers: they did forget to fire some houses, and they were surprised with a dulnesse of spirit, thinking more of booty and spoyle, then to make perfect their conquest. In the meane time, the Consul cries as they did sometimes at Rome. He that loues mee, let him follow mee. Some countrymen of the neighbour villages which kept gard in the Towne-house by turnes, being led by some captaines and Townesmen, presented themselves to the new gate, they were valiantly repulsed, and yet the first shot they made, slue their Petardiar, who was busie about his Petard.

The Portcullis at the new gate cut downe.

Brignolet Raine.

This

1602. This first charge had not dislodged them, if the whole strength of the Inhabitants had A not come, and charged them so furiously, as they beganne to giue way, shewing neither conduct nor courage. Necessity which breeds assurance, euen vnto them that are borne without courage, made the townsmen so resolute in this defence, as the Sauoyards did presently turne their backs. The nimblest were forced to returne to their ladders, which now could no longer serue them, for a canon planted vpon the Bulwarke de l'Oye, against the ditch, had broken them in such sort, as they left foure and fifty dead vpon the place, along the Curtyne of Corratiere, and thirteene that were taken aliue. If the townsmen had had souldiars inough to haue made a sally in this confusion, those that were at Plainpalais had not returned in so good order. There were thirteene taken aliue, vpon promise that was giuen them that they should bee prisoners of war, for B else they would haue preferred an honourable death, before any promise that was made them, to take them aliue, and to disarme them. Assignac was amongst them, who fought courageously, and gaue the order of Saint Maurice (which hee wore) to his seruant, willing him to saue himselfe, beeing resolved to die with his sword in his hand. It had bene better for him to haue bene slaine at the combate of D. Philippin, then to be reserued for so ignominious a death.

The resolution of the Baron of Assignac.

The prisoners are intreated like theues.

They were condemned to be hanged.

Letters from the Seignoury of Geneva to Monsieur de la Guiche Gouverneur of Lions.

The Seignoury would not intreat them as prisoners taken in the warre, but like theues that had entred the towne by surprize against the Law of Nations, and the publike faith. They sayd that the Duke was too noble a Prince to aduow so wicked and treacherous an Act. There were many opinions vpon the Iudgement of their death. The most modest concluded to haue them put to ranfome, others to keepe them prisoners, that they might serue for exchange if occasion required, through the continuance of the warre: but the most violent stirred vp the people, representing vnto them their Religion, the rauishing of their wiues and daughters: the murder, sacke and perpetual slavery concluded against them, and the lamentations of their widowes and children that had bene slaine, the which beeing well considered of, made the mildest opinions seeme vniust. So as they were condemned to be hanged. They requested their heads might bee cut off like Gentlemen, the which was granted them, but it was after they had bene strangled. The threescore and seuentene heads, as well of those that had bene hanged, as of the others that had bene slaine, were planted vpon the Galloes, and their bodies throwne into the riuer of Rhosne. On the Twelofday after they made a generall fast for their deliury. They presently sent to all their neighbours for succors. They published in all places, the wonders of this deliury: they write vnto the gouernor of Lions in this manner.

My Lord, you haue vnderstood heretofore, by many of our letters, how his highnesse of Sauoy, notwithstanding that he knew, and had confessed, that we were comprehended in the peace made in January 1600 betwixt his Royall Maiesty of France and him: yet he hath oppressed vs in sundry sorts, not onely by the detayning of our Reuenues; forbidding of trafficke and other violences and extortions, yeelding nothing to the many and iust admonitions of his Maiesty, but also hath attempted often to invade and surprize vs in this time of peace. So it is, that to glut his pernicious desaigne, the Lord of Albigny on Satterday last the eleuenth of this month, about mid-night, had brought before our towne, on the side of Plainpalais, about two thousand choise men, horse and foote, and had cast about two hundred into our ditch, nere vnto the old gate of Corratiere, and hauing planted Ladders one within an other, hee had caused them to mount about three of the clock on the Sunday morning the twelfth of the month, encouraging them, being himselfe in the ditch, so as beeing entred into the towne, some went to the New-gate to plant the Petard, and to draw in the body of their troupes, which made a stand in the meadow of Plainpalais, others would haue seized vpon the Minte-gate, and so haue entred into the midst of our towne. But it pleased our good God to looke vpon vs with a fauourable eye, and to giue courage to our men, so as they haue repulst them so valiantly, as they haue slaine the best part of them vpon the place, and some others haue bene taken, and since hanged by our commandement. The rest

A rest haue cast them selues head-long downe the Walles, so as we heare that many of them are dead or grieuouly hurt. But it is likely that the Lord of Albigny will continue his hatred against vs; hauing also intelligence, that his Highnesse is not farre from vs. Wee therefore most humbly pray and intreat you with all our affections, that it would please you duely to consider the preiudice which the taking of our towne would bring vnto his Maiesties seruice, and to continue your fauour towards vs, and assist vs, with your Wife and Graue aduice. &c.

Many Iudged of the end of this enterprife by the beginning, and were more dilligent to write then they had bin to execute it well. The King had intelligence, that the Duke was Maister of the Towne, and the manner of the execution was represented with so great ease and happinesse, as there was lesse reason to doubt it then to beleue it. The truth was not knowne but by letters from the Gouvernor of Lions, the which came before any discourse that was published by the towne that was deliuered. The Duke repeat the mountaines in post, his Troupes remayned a league from Geneva in three places, at Tounon, Fossigny and Ternier. Hee commanded his Ambassador to giue the Senate of Berne to vnderstand, that hee had not made this enterprife to trouble the quiet of the Cantons, but to prevent L'Esguieres from being Maister thereof, who intended to deliuer it vp afterwards vnto the King, who had bene too mighty a Neighbour, and would haue giuen them altogether occasion to feare him. The issue of this Enterprife did shew, that God wil not haue Treaties violated, for the assurance whereof his Name hath bene inuocated, notwithstanding any pretext of religion. Witnesse C Lewis King of Hungary in the vnfortunate battell of Varna against the Turkes, where he had broken his Faith.

They beleued in Court, that Geneva was taken.

The Duke returns in post.

His declaration by his Ambassador to the Senate of Berne.

The King aduertised of the successe of this enterprife, hee sent word vnto the Magistrates of this Common-weale, that if their enemy did attempt by a settled seige, or by open Warre any thing against them, hee would assist them, and imploy all his forces for their defence, commanding the Gouvernors and Lieutenants Generall of the nearest Prouinces, to ayde them all they could. The Cantons of Bearne and Fribourg allied to Geneva, being aduertised of this attempt, sent twelue hundred Suisses, and the King who had an entrest that it should not fall vnder the command of any other Prince or Common-weale, sent also sixe hundred French. All prepare to Warre, the Geneuois made some courses into the Duke of Sauoyes Country, and surprised Saint Gemy of Aouft, they imagined vpon a little good successe to extend their limits vnto Mont Cenis. The King commanded De Vie his Ambassador in Suifferland, (who returned then to his charge) to passe by them, to assure them, that hee was not of their humors, which frame not their affections, nor bind not the duties of friendship but vpon good euents, louing friends no longer, then they draw profit from them. That he would neuer fayle them for their defence and protection, desiring to know of them, what meanes they might haue to make an offensive warre; to the end, the succours hee should send them; might bee profitably employed. They receiued De Vie with a publike applause, sending forth the French Horse and Foote, to meete him: but as hee was deceiued in this v unexpected Ceremony, so were many others which thought that hee came to encourage them to warre. They heard his Propositions in a priuat conference, exhorting them rather to a long and durable peace, then to a short warre. They intreated him to propound the like in their generall assembly, which no man else durst doe, euery one holding it a Crime, and a signe of Basenesse, not to preferre the counsell of warre, before any accord, and not to enter in hostile manner into the Dukes Country. Some which had neuer scene warre, but in the Idea, conceived victories in their imaginations, building vpon the Snow of Mont Cenis. That it would not continue aboue sixe moneths; that the warre would be no lesse profitable for the good of their Common-weale; nor lesse happy, then it had bin to their Neighbours, in the time of Duke Charles; and that all that had any intrest in their preferuation would assist them. That all those great Spirits which delighted in the exercise of warre, would come and offer them their Armes and Liues.

The King promisth to succour them of Geneva.

Monsieur de Vie sent to Geneva.

War is pleasing to men that know it not.

1603.

De Vic through the truth and excellency of his discourse, gaue them to vnderstand; A that peace was so necessary for them, and Warre so preiudiciall, as they had great reason to imbrace the one, and to flye the other. That although the causes of warre, bee alwaies goodly, and the meanes made easie, yet the effects were no lesse terrible, the successe being not alwaies answerable to their hopes. That a forraigne Warre was profitable, and to bee vnderaken when as Ciuill Warres could not be other-wise auoyded: but a well settled Estate, which hath alwaies liued happily by Peace, should not seeke these stormes, nor take delight to be at warre with her Neighbours. Thus he perswaded them to imbrace peace, confirmed by an equall commerce of all commodities, and which should roote out all occasions of warre. They entred into some truce with the Duke, but hauing required assurances for the obseruation thereof, it beeing not honorable, B they proceeded no farther, and the Duke gaue them to vnderstand that it was indifferent to him, whether they were his friends or enemies. The King, who is a Prince full of iustice and integrity, foreseeing that this warre would not be ended by them that did begin it, desired to mayntaine the peace which was so necessary for all Christendome, for the which he had layd a side Armes, when as hee might hope for most fruite for the increase of his Estates. His Ambassador therefore in Suisseland perswaded the Cantons of Glaries, Basle, Soleurre, Schaffouze and Appenzel, as least suspected and interested, to be the mediators of this Accord. There was some difficulty, but the Seignoury tyred with a warre, the profit whereof could not repaire the ruines which the want of Peace should cause, and hauing tryed that all the profit they could hope for, depended C on their neighbours succours. That hope which is not maintained but by forraigne supports, is alwaies ruinous: That they had no meanes to reuenge the wrong that was done vnto them: that there was no likelihood that the Catholike Suisses would breake with the Duke of Sauoy for their respect: that beeing so neere they must of force apply them-selues to some quiet and equall kind of lyuing: they yeelded to the perswasions of their friends and Allies, and by their aduice relinquished many demands which their Councell had resolved, and the Duke had reiected as vnjust and dishonorable.

The Cantons of the Suisses mediators of a Peace.

Geneua resolves to a peace.

A Peace concluded betwixt the Duke of Sauoy and the towne of Geneua in July 1603.

A priuiledge granted to the city of Lions.

The Conference of the treaty was at Rouilly with D' Albigny; and the conclusion at Saint Iulian, betwixt the deputies of either part. If the issue hath beene happy and profitable to both parties, they are bound to none but the grace of God and the Kings wisdom, who desiring to entertaine the publike quiet, hath made a peacefull vnion of those willes that were so much diuided, for at his instance the Suisses had laied a side more Muskets and Pikar which they had prouided, then had beene seene in Sauoy in tenne yeares before, and they of Geneua did moderate their demands, not so much for any respect of their enemy, as to please the King, yet the malicious gaue it out, that the King had incensed them to warre by his Ambassadors. The Consulate of Lions had obtayned of the King (at the Queenes intreaty, and in consideration of the Honor done her at her entry) a Priuiledge, by the which none might come to be Sheriffes, that were not Towne-borne Children, it was the same prerogative which Pescenius Niger had E given vnto the Romaines, forbidding any person to bee admitted to publike charges that was not borne and bred a Romaine. Euery Priuiledge which causeth an inequality among Cittizens (lyuing vnder the same Lawes) is the Apple of discord and cause of diuision, like vnto that of the Bianchi and Neri at Florence. A great towne hath euer but too many seeds of diuision, without seeking new; Most commonly the rich are intollerable to the poore, and the poore enuy the happines of the rich: there is alwaies some question betwixt the great and the small.

This new distinction of persons must needs caused angerous innouations in a city, where the inner part is more to bee feared then the outward. Those which pretended to bee from their beginning, by birth and affection of the Country of Lions, seeing them-selues perpetually excluded from the most honorable charges within the City, had recourse vnto the King, laying before him the inequality of this Priuiledge, the

A the disgrace which they receaued, and the ruine which should fall vpon the City, when the Inhabitants should abandon the place of their abode, and that they might not remaine in a place where without offence or any iust cause, they were for euer deprived of that little Honor they might hope for, after they had serued the Publike in many burthen some charges. Those which were originally borne at Lions sayd, that the Inhabitants of the Country comming thither, labored more for their owne profit, then for the good of the publike, and did not much affect the publike good, if they did not hope for their owne priuate commodities, hauing no hands but for them-selues. That it was neither profitable nor commendable to impart the chiefe Honours, and to commit the government of the City to new men, for many reasons which haue beene set downe

B by the wife, but especially least they confound the ancient Order and Government with strange Customes and Manners. The King considering that a small matter doth trouble a multitude (as the incounter of a ditch doth disorder the ranks of an Army when it marcheth) hee gaue them to vnderstand that hee desired they should agree together, sending them to La Guiche Gouvernor of Lions to reconcile these wills diuided only vpon this subiect, but vnited in all other points that concerned the obedience and seruice of his Maiesty. This diuision began to decrease when as they vnderstood that his Maiesties pleasure was to content both parties, to reduce things to the ancient order wherein they had liued happily, and not to suffer the good correspondency which had beene betwixt the inhabitants of one City, to bee lost by the quality of this Priuiledge, the which by fruitelesse innouations did alter that which the Ancients had allowed and maintayned. The King therefore commanded that the reasons of either part should bee carefully examined and considered of in his Councell. The President Janin was reporter of this Controuersie. The Councell hauing vnderstood the Kings intention, and considered of the Gouvernor of Lyons aduice, thought that as they might not chang the Ancient customes in the which they had liued well, so it was iust and reasonable to gratesie the Originall families of the City, for that they had suffered most in these last troubles, and had opposed them-selues most resolutely against the faction. They therefore thought it good that there should remaine a distinction with some marke or prerogative of honor, reseruing the charge of Prouost of Marchants for such as were

The King will not haue this priuiledge to be the cause of any diuision.

The King declares that his meaning was not to exclude his subjects but strangers: only from the Office of Councill.

D Cittizens borne, and that those of the Country which had continued there for tenne yeares Heads of families, should bee capable of the Consulship, to enter indifferently with them that were borne there. By this declaration both the one and the other had part of their demands. The King sending them backe, recommended vnto them obedience, and Respect to their Gouvernor, and Concord and Vnity among them-selues. And for that in the last Consular Elections there had beene some-thing done indiscreetly the Chancellor vsed some words vpon that subiect, both Graue, Iust, and worthy the greatnesse of his Charge. It is my opinion (sayd hee) that as the King hath an interest that none should bee chosen for Magistrats of a towne, but those, of whose Loyalty his maiesty is well assured, so the more the liberty of election is left vnto them, the more E obedience should his Maiesty, the Gouvernours and Lieutenants Generall of Prouinces finde in the Inhabitants, in that which it should please him to command them. The King desiring to increase the comodities of the realme, and to enrich his Subjects, hauing tryed in his royall houses of Fontainebleau, Madril, and the gardens of the Tuileries, that silke-wormes might be bred and brought vp as happily in France, as in any part of Europe, he resolved to adde the art of silke to the felicities of the peace, a speedy and fit remedy to auoyd the transport of gold and siluer. Here-vpon he had the aduice of Commissioners deputed for the establishing of the trafficke, the which he had chosen as well out of his Councell, as of the Soueraigne Courts of Parliament, Chamber of Accounts, and Court of Ayds. They gaue his Maiesty to vnderstand, that for the more F speedy bringing in of this new worke, hee must of necessity begin by the planting of Mulberry-trees, to feed the wormes that weaue and make the silke. And therefore some expert in that Art, did bind them-selues to furnish a great number of white Mulberry trees, and graines to make Nurseries, in foure parts of his Realme, at Paris,

Inuention to make silke in France.

Orleans,

1603. Orleans, Tours, and Lions, who were bound to make their diuisions by the first day of Aprill this yeare, with instructions how to sowe and plant trees and Kernels, to gouerne the wormes, to draw and spinne the silke, to Prepare it, and make it ready to bee sold. There could not bee found in this age a more profitable husbandry. The people of Languedoc, Prouence, and Dauphiné haue found this labour so succesfull within these few yeares, as the onely reuenue of silke doth now bring more money to these Prouinces, then the Corne, Oyle, and Woade, although they haue great abundance. It doth also begin very happily at Lions, and if it continues, this Citty will bee as famous for silke, as Tire and Bulis were for Scarlet.

The profit of the art of silke.

As the profit is great and pleasing, so the practise is not painefull, for one man is sufficient to employ the leaues of three great Mulbery-Trees, to nourish and entertaine halfe an ounce of Wormes; women and children are as capable as men. It is done without any diuersion from their labour, and almost without any losse of time, at such a season of the yeare when as the fruites of the Earth require rather the fauour of Heauen, then the industry of men. It is not done without a perpetual admiration of the wonders of that Soueraigne hand of the almighty, by whose order wee see these little beasts without flesh, blood, bones, veines, sinewes, nor arteries, without scales, or bowells within, without teeth, nayles, or pricks, and without silke, haire, eyes, or eares, to make that in forty daies which all the industry of man could not doe in forty yeares. They are the workers of a stufte which serues for an ornament in the house of God, and in those of Kings, and furnish the cheefe ingredience for a most wholesome confection, for the cure of mellancholly, which is that of Aikermes, which is made by the infusion and decoction of silke in the iuice of Kermes.

The voyage to Metz.

The King went to Metz and tooke the Queene with him. The cause of his voyage was the badde intelligence betwixt Sobole commanding in the Cittadell, and the inhabitants of the towne. The Duke of Espernon shewed in this trouble, as in many other more dangerous, that of the two best things of our life, happinesse is the first, and wisdom the second. Sobole was one of them to whome hee had yeelded a part of that great and incomparable fauour which he had during the raigne of the deceased King. Having the gouernement of Metz from the King he made Sobole his Lieutenant of the towne and Cittadell, in whome hee had as much confidence, as hee had vowed his affection vnto him. As the great troubles in the yeare 1589. had made France like vnto a troubled riuer fit for Ambitious men to fish in, so those which held places of importance began to raise their authorities as high as the liberty of the time, and the forgetfulness of the French would suffer them. Two or three yeares after the Duke of Espernon was troubled in Prouence, and his credit crackt with the King. They say that Sobole began then to carry him-selfe more proudly then he was wont, vsing no moderation, which is the perfect ornament of prosperity. He suffered himselfe to be called Gouernor. A title which did adde nothing to his profit and commodity, and did breede him Iealousie with his equals, badde opinion in the Iudgement of his superiors, and hatred and feare in the hearts of his inferiors.

There was an other occasion which made his carriage more odious, which was the Pursute he made against the principall of the towne, for treason and conspiracy. They were freed from prison beeing innocent, but they tooke this resolution to free themselves from the command of Sobole. It is the humor of the people to write any good they haue receiued vpon the water, and to ingraue the wrongs are done them in brasse. The Duke of Espernon passing by Metz to goe to the Spaw, heard great complaints against Sobole, the which hee did but heare, finding that there was some Iealousie of his aboad at Metz, for as often as hee sent for him to eate or plaie with him, and to bring his Brother with him, the one or the other remayned still in the Cittadell. Yet the Duke of Espernon entred into the Cittadell, and was receiued with all the honours hee could desire, Sobole presented him the keyes at the gate, protesting of his affection, and complayning of those which sayd hee would refuse him

A him the entry: the souldiars stood with their pikes vp, and their Harguebuses and Muskets vpon their shoulders, and the Halbards behinde them.

The Duke of Espernon returned to Court, to vnderstand the Kings pleasure touching these troubles. He made a second voyage to Metz. Their murmuring against Sobole was turned into publike complaints, and their complaints into Barricadoes betwixt the Cittadell and the Towne: the Inhabitants were transported with so strange a passion, as they submitted themselves to any thing, so as they might not be commanded by the two Bretheren. This commotion had not lasted long, if it had not beene supported. The presence of the Duke of Espernon gaue them courage, who else would haue beene much amazed. The King first sent Boisfize, and then Varenne, both which serued his Maiesty according to his intentions, and disposed Sobole to do what-
B soeuer he should commande him, declaring notwithstanding that he would not deliuer the place but to himselfe. This was the occasion of the Kings voyage, who went thether in a very vnseasonable time. Vpon the brute of his going many Princes of Germany sent to take vp their lodgings at Metz, who notwithstanding (hearing that the King would make but small aboade, and the time being troubl some) came not out of their Stoues, so as there came not any but the Duke of Deux Ponts, the Landgrau of Hesse, and the Prince of Brandebourg. The King finding the hatred betwixt Sobole and the Inhabitants to be irreconciliable, was aduised to giue the charge of the Cittadell to Arquien: Lieutenant of the Coronells company, of the Regiment of his Maiesties gards, and the Lieutenantancy of the gouernement of the Towne and of the C Country of Messin to Montigny his brother, to hold them as Lieutenants of his Maiesty in the absence of the Duke of Espernon.

The Duke of Espernon goes againe to Metz.

The King would not enter into Metz before that Sobole was out of the Cittadell. Some thought hee would not haue beene so obedient, but hee shewed he had no designe beyond his dutie. This was a disgrace vnto him. Hee blamed his fortune, and Fortune accused his bad carriage. The way hee tooke to maintaine himselfe, overthrew him. Men must hold great Commands like simple Commissions, and not as Inheritances. They must desire them without Passion, and receive them without Insolency. The King past the feast of Easter at Metz. Where he herd the Iesuits requests
D for their reestablishment. They could not finde a better opportunity to speake vnto the King, then that which Varenne (controller generall of the Posts of France) gaue them giuing them Intelligence that the King would come to Metz and their spend the Easter. Herevpon foure Iesuits of Pont a Mouzon, were deputed to go and do their duties vnto his Maiesty, & to renew the request for their returne vnto those places from E the which they had bin expelled. They came to Metz on the Wednesday before Easter day, and the next day in the after-noon they had audience in the Kings Cabinet, whereas the Duke of Espernon, Villeroy, Geure, and Varennes were present. The King receiued them graciously and would not suffer them to kneele, but commanded them to stand vp: and although he takes no delight in long speeches, knowing that they come prepared with goodly words. Yet he herd father Ignace Armand with patience and attention, who made a long and eloquent Oration:

Sobole declares vp the Cittadell.

Foure Iesuits
come to Metz for their reestablishment.

Sir, since it hath pleased God to make you victorious and a peaceable possessor of the Scepter and Crown which is due vnto you, and that we had the happinesse to read, and know in your Maiestie those great perfections, which since the memorie of man haue not bin found in any great Prince or Monarke, and especially that great clemencie, and assured marke of a Noble and generous minde, the which after so many victories and triumphes you haue vsed towards them which had most offended you, wee then conceiued a great hope that you would shew the like clemencie and mildnesse to vs.

F But as all things in this world are mutable, when as wee thought to doe you humble seruice, and to yeeld you the obedience which subiects owe vnto their King and naturall Prince, there fell out an vnfortunate accident which troubled all our desseignes, and sequestering vs from you, tooke from vs the meanes to doe you

1603. „you the seruice which wee pretended. Yet wee can assure you with truth, that not- A „withstanding all the crosses and contradictions, or the false reports which haue bene „raised vp against vs, both within and without the realme, wee haue neither lost the af„fection wee owe to our deere cuntry, nor our desire to your seruice, nor the hope wee
 „had in your clemencie and naturall bonntie: Assuring our selues that time in the end „will discouer the truth, and mollifie all offences which the misery of ciuill warres „haue bred.

„This hope hath much increased since your comming into these parts, which makes „vs now to prostrate our selues at your feete, and to beseech your Maiestie not to deferre
 „the grace any longer which wee haue so often demanded, and to giue vs occasion to „preach throughout all the world, that our hopes were not vaine, being supported by B
 „the bounty of so great a King, receiuing vs in the end as his most humble subiects, and „most desirous to employ our selues, for his Maiesties seruice, there being nothing that „can be more grievous vnto vs, then to see our selues in disgrace with the King, and not „able to assist our cuntry with those poore means which God hath giuen vs, and ac„cording to the vocation wherevnto wee are called.

„Wee doubt not but they haue laboured to make vs appeare before you, otherwise
 „then we are, by the imposition of the foulest and most odious crimes, which a subiect „might commit against his Prince and country, the which wee detest as execrable, and if „wee had once thought to do them, we should thinke our selues unworthy, I will not say C „to be receiued into our country, but to liue vpon the earth.

„They haue in like manner sought to blame our institution allowed in a generall „councell, and by so many Popes, and receiued by the most Christian Kings your prede„cessours, as if it tied vs to obey our generall in all things, yea in that which should bee „contrary to God and reason. Yet I cannot beleue Sir, that euer any such opinion could „lodge in the hearts of those that haue the least knowledge of our institution, being „contrary to our constitutions, which doe alwayes except in the obedience due to our „Superiours, all that which may not bee done without offence to God. But how were
 „it possible, that of so many which enter into our company, and all desirous of saluati-
 „on, any one should remaine, if they should see that such an impietie, (not obedience) D „should haue place? was it euer heard of any one that left vs (how great an enemy so„euer) that there was any such thing, and that this obedience did derogate from that „which wee owe vnto Kings and Magistrates, or that it doth command vs to giue coun-„cell to any one that may bee preiudiciall to your Maiestie and State? Many haue also „sought to perswade you, that wee did sollicite children of good houses to bee of our „company and religion, to haue their goods and ioyne them vnto ours: It is con„trary to the course wee hold in the reception of those which desire to serue GOD in „our company, receiuing not any one before wee haue made a long tryall of their vo„cation, whether it bee by the inspiration of God, or perswasion of men, and that many „times for thres or foure yeares. If they finde this vocation not to be of God, they are „refused, being an essentiall lette to their reception, and there is not any thing which E „Superiours recommend more to them of this company, then to bee very carefull „not to perswade any one to enter into a Religious estate, but only to excite them to „vertue and learning, leauing that to the holy spirit, which is of the perfection of the „Gospell, and of the councell of our Sauours, and for proofe, the number of them „which are in France, is so small as it makes not the twentieth part of them which are of „other religions.

„As for that which is sayde, wee pretend to enrich our selues by their means, which „are receiued into this company, it needs not many words to discouer this falshood.
 „Euery man knowes the reuenues of our Colledges, I thinke that few men can vaunt
 „that they are much enriched. One thing I can say, that hardly shall you finde one of F
 „our Colledges in France, whose foundation is sufficient for that which is necessary „to support the charges, and you shall finde many, which for the most part liue of „almes. That of Paris the chiefe Cittie of your realme, comprehending the legacies of

A of the Presidents Saint Andrew, and Hannequin with all others, hath neuer had 1603 „about a thousand crownes rent, which will hardly serue to entertaine twenty persons.
 „Such a Colledge requires at the least three score, for all the sciences and faculties „whereof wee make profession. Many of this great Cittie haue entred into our com„pany, and some of good houses, the which haue not left vs a foote of land. If they „haue giuen vs any almes in money, to supply the want of our foundation, the grea„test summe doth neuer come to the eight part of their goods, the which hath bene „alwayes sought with the good liking and consent of their Parents. If our Colledges „haue sufficient foundations, wee desire no more. And if any one of our body dispo-„seth of his goods, the application is left free vnto him, and commonly if his kins„folkes bee poore, hee leaues them all, if they bee rich hee employes some part to godly „B vses, and to Hospitalls, with the liking of his kinsfolkes. Wee were in truth very mis„erable and voyde of sence, if hauing quit all the commodities which wee had by suc„cession, or might get by our industry, wee would seeke them in Religion. And how „were it possible we should be so greedy to affect them, hauing nothing in perticuler, and „if we had a hundred times more in common, wee should reape no greater commoditie „for our owne perticulars, the ouer-plusse being employed according to our constitu„tion to entertaine poore Schollers, and in other workes of charitie. They also impor„tune your Maiesties eares continually, and say that wee meddle with matters of State.
 „The cause of this opinion and presumption is, for that some-times Noblemen and „C Prelates, vouchsafe to vse vs for matter of conscience, and to direct them in their de„uotions and spirituall exercises, wharsoeuer they doe or appoint afterwards, is at„tributed vnto vs, although wee haue had no communicacion, nor haue medled in the „businesses. For in truth Sir, there is nothing so contrary to our estate and intencion, „nor more forbidden in our company, vpon greuous paines, then to meddle in like „affaires.

These be Sir, the cheefe points which are objected against vs; and if there be any other,
 „whereof it shall please your Maiesty to be better informed, we promise so to answer, „by writing or by mouth, as you shall rest satisfied, and see plainly that they are but in„ventions, forged either by them which affect vs not, or by such as haue no knowledge „D of our institution and manner of life. But we will answer more plainly to the view and „contentment of all the world, by our workes, when it shall please your Maiestie to vn-„binde our hands. Therin shall euery man see plainly, what wee say and promise: and „your Maiestie shall witness, yea they which are most contrary vnto vs, that wee haue „bene true.

That if our prayers and humble petitions can finde no place in your Royall heart, „yet wee will not leaue to haue yours alwayes grauen in the bottome of ours, to loue
 „you, to wish all greatnesse, and happinesse, and to offer our continuall prayers vnto „God, for the preservation of your Maiestie, of the Queene your most beloued spouse,
 „of our Lords your children, and of your Realme our most deere cuntry, remaining „E in perpetuall sorrow: that wee could not shew by effects, that affection which wee „haue desired. But wee hope otherwise, and with this hope wee beseech you to cast
 „the beames of your clemencie, vpon this little company of your most humble sub„iects, who with grieve of heart, vpon their knees, and teares in their eyes, implore „your mercie: Yours I say, being so naturall vnto you, and imparted vnto so many.
 „Regarde not that which hath bene done and sayd, with more zeale and lesse discre„tion then was needfull. It was some priuate member, and not the whole body, the „which as it hath neuer allowed of the errors of priuate men, so should it not receiue „the preiudice. Wee doe not implore your mercy, but to serue God and your Maie-„stie, there vnto tend all our designs and intentions, and therein wee will employe „F our blouds and liues: Such as desire not your greatnesse, nor of your Realme, reioyce, „at our disgrace; thinking (it may bee) that wee might helpe to make it more flori„thing, if wee were restored.

Wee

1603. „ Wee beseech your Maiestie, in all humility, that yee will bee pleased to adde this A „ Bond to many others, which tye vs to your seruice, let not the mercy and clemencie „ which you shall vse to vs, depend vpon any but of your selfe: let it be wholly yours, and „ let vs not be beholding to any but to you. The gift shal be more pretious, and our bond „ much greater. This will increase our courage to loue and serue you, and excite euery „ one to the like duty. Wee will not bee vanquished therein by strangers, but will rather „ surmount them. If they of our company in Spaine, Italy, and Germanie, do it, wee will „ rather dye being naturall Frenchmen, but wee will yeeld the like duty to our King and „ country. The lawes of God and nature (common to all) bindes vs there-vnto, and wee „ shall haue many priuate bonds to doe it, when it shall please your Maiestie to vse so „ great clemencie.

„ Sir, the holy and sacred time of the death and passion of our Sauour speaks for vs, „ That blood which he hath powred forth abundantly vpon the Altar of the crosse, for „ sinners, his enemies, doth inuite you to vse clemencie to those whose heart and affec„ tion are wholly yours. Wee haue not deserued so great a grace of your Maiesty, but hee in „ whose name wee demand it, and who without doubt demands it for vs, after so many „ prayers, which wee haue offered vnto him, shall haue such power with your Maiestie,
 „ who by his Christian pietie will neuer depart from that which he shall know to be plea„ sing, to that soveraigne bountie of our God, whom wee pray that after hee hath made „ you to raigne long and many yeares in this world, hee will giue you an eternall and af„ fured kingdome in the other.

„ The King answered them very gratiouly, I wish no harme to the Iesuites, and all the ill that I wish to any liuing creature, let it happen vnto my selfe. My Court of Parliament hath done some thing against you, but not without good consideration. Hee receiued that in wri„ ting which they had deliuered by mouth, deliuered it to Villeroy, and hauing considered „ thereof, he declared vnto them expressly how desirous he was, and what care hee would „ take for their returne. If your businesse (said he) were not in the Popes hands, I would dis- patch you presently, but you know it is not expedient to do anything without him. I will haue you: you are profitable for the publike and for my estate. Hee added moreover, that beeing „ at Paris he would thinke feruently of their affaires. They demanded if his Maiesty would „ not be pleased that the three Prouincials of their company in France, accompanied by D „ three others, should attend there at his returne, and receiue his commandements.
 „ There needs not so many said the King, it shall bee sufficient that you and father Cot- ton come. The King made this voyage partly to pacifie some trouble growne betwixt the Cardinall of Lorraine and the Prince of Brandebourg, for the Bishoprike of Strauf„ bourg, and this was the cause of their quarrell. The Bishoprike of Strausbourg being „ voided by the decesse of their Bishop (who was a Catholike) the Cardinall of Lorraine „ obtained the grant thereof from his Holinesse. But for that they of Strasbourg since „ the stirres in Germany, had held the confession of Ausbourg, the decesed Bishop had „ retired himselfe out of the City, and liued at a house of his in the country in his religio„ n, and yet notwithstanding he receiued his temporall reuenues from them of Strauf„ bourg. On the other side the Marquis of Brandebourg Elector of the Empire, had ob„ tained an Election from them of Strausbourg for one of his Sonnes, who beeing na„ med to the Bishoprike, and receiued by them of Strausbourg, he will inioy the Bishops „ rights without any other ceremonie. The Cardinall on the other side hauing obserued

 „ the accustomed order therein, demanded the Bishops rights of them of Strausbourg, „ such as his Predecessor inioyed, who died a Catholike, & according to the Article of the „ Interim set downe by the confession of Ausbourg. Herevpon they of Strausbourg „ made some difficulty, and the rather for that being neighbours vnto the Duke of Lor„ raines territories, they haue often many controuersies to decide, as it doth commonly „ fall out betwixt neighbours. They had also giuen their consent to the nomination of F
 „ the Prince of Brandebourg for Super-intendent or Administrator, that is to say, Bi„ shop after their manner, for these and other priuate reasons, they refused the Cardi„ nalls demand.

The

A The Prince of Brandebourg gets possession, and prepares to withstand the Cardinal, all things tending vnto Armes. Many and great Leuiues of men were made on ey-„ ther side, Those of Strausbourg were also in Alarme, seeking to preuent all disorders
 „ if it were possible, yet fauouring the Prince of Brandebourg more then the Cardinall „ of Lorraine. The Emperour had written vnto them both, declaring that his intenti„ on was, that neither of them should haue wrong. The King was intreated to interpose
 „ his authority as a Friend to both parties, for the auoiding of all scandall. The Prince „ of Brandebourg, named Bishop of Strausbourg, was come into France some moneths „ before: And they say he remained some daies at Troyes, vntill his Maiesty had assign„ ed him a time and place to haue the Honor to come and kisse his hands, the which „ was done at Loges neere to Saint Germaine in Lay, where the King gaue him audi„ ence, and so the sayd Prince was dispatched, with promise of all fauour, to compound
 „ the Controuersie betwixt him, and the Cardinall.

During the Kings abode at Metz, the said Prince of Brandebourg came accom„ panied with the Lamgrau of Hesse, the Duke of Deux Ponts, and a Deputy from the „ Arch-bishop of Treues Elector of the Empire: and by their aduice it was determi„ ned, that the Cardinall should haue a portion out of the sayd Bishopricke, and the „ rest should remaine vnto the Prince, and by that meanes they should continue „ friends as before. Thus a Peace was made betwixt them, the which might else haue „ bene preiudiciall to the whole Empire and to all Christendome. The King went „ C from Metz to Nancy to see the Dutchesse of Bar his sister, and the Duke of Lorraine.
 „ At that time a marriage was concluded betwixt the Duke of Deux Ponts and the „ Ladie Katherine of Rohan, remayning then with the Kings Sister, and so hauing pro„ uided for all things necessary for the frontier, he tooke his way to Paris the 7. of April.
 „ It is assigne of a happy Raigne when the subject reioyced to see his King: Prouence
 „ had bin possesst with this desire fiftene yeares, being the onely Prouince of all France
 „ that had not yet seene the King. He was expected there with great impatiency, ha„ uing promised after his returne from Metz to go thither. As it was reasonable to „ giue comfort to that Prouince, so was it necessary to fortifie that Coast, and to haue
 „ an eye to the desseignes of the Sea Army of Spaine, which vnder colour of attemp-
 „ D ting some thing vpon Algier, might fall vpon that Coast, by which the Emperour „ Charles the sixt held it the easiest to inuade France.

At the same time (report which carries all things abroad without distinction or „ iudgement) did publish throughout Europe, a newes happily false; which was that „ the King had beene extremely sicke. Hee was indeede sicke, but not so extremely „ as they should so iudge of him. Hee was soone restored to his naturall health, „ and returned to his ordinary manner of Liuing. The actions of Princes must be al„ waies great: not busying themselves in making of Lanthornes like to that King of „ Macedonia. They must alwaies hold their Subjects in this opinion, that in doing no„ thing, they doe some great worke. It was a great precept, which the Emperour Charles „ E the sixt, gaue to King Philip his Sonne, alwaies to exercise himselfe in some vertue, a„ greeing with the dutie of a King, to hold the Subjects as it were in admiration of his „ effects; and not to giue their thoughts at any time to fill them with other affections.
 „ When occasions of Warre cease, hee must applie himselfe to those of Peace, as „ to the administring of Iustice and ording of his Realme. To conclude, all the acti„ ons of a Prince must tend to the good and helth of his people, for whom hee liues „ more then for himselfe, as the Sunne doth not shine and giue heate but for men and „ the elements. During the Warre no man enquired what the King did, his great af„ faires provided store of worke, the ende of one enterprise was the beginning of an „ other. Now that these seditious stormes are appeased, that the waues are smooth and „ F the Sea calme; that Peace giues him a rest worthie of his labours, that so many pains „ past, make his pleasures more sweet, & that the reward of vertue makes his triumphs „ seeme more glorious, their passeth no day but some one asketh, what doth the King?
 „ They neede not studie for an answer, hee is alwaies in action farre from Idleness.

1603. The cheefe action is neuer to bee without action, hee hath beene so bred vp from his Cradle, he cannot be otherwise: Bees neuer become Droanes, great spirits doe neuer degenerate, we shall see him on horse-back at the age of Masaniissa, hee will be fearefull to his enemies at that of Agefilaus, hee will shew himselfe in the head of his armies at the age of foure score yeares, like vnto Phocion, his valour will neuer grow old no more then his memory.

Building is a worke worthy of a Prince which is at peace.

Hee contents him-selfe notwithstanding to inioy the fruites of Peace, and not to thinke any more of Warre vnlesse he be wronged. One of the greatest contentments the peace doth yeeld him, is that of his buildings, and there is no exercise more worthy of a King then to repaire the ruines of time, if they bee buildings which regarde the glory of the Prince, and the common profit of the people, when as the Morter is not made with the bloud and sweat of his poore subiects. At one time the King had Mansions in diuers places, in the great Church of Orleans, at Fontainebleau, at Saint Germain, at Monceaux, and at the new bridge at Paris. All great workes, whether that wee consider the building by the desseigne, or the desseigne by the building. Among many meruailes of his life, that was admirable, that hee did build and make warre both together. The first day he entred into the Loure hee did desseigne and set downe what hee hath since continued. He hath made Saint Germaine and Fontainebleau (two houses of the Kings his Predecessors) royall and stately Pallaces. Hee finished in the hottest of the warres and forraine tempests, that which they had vnderaken in a calme and Peacefull season.

They were buildings whereof wee may truly say, that the workmanship exceeds the matter, wherein he was serued with as great affection and promptitude, as wee may obserue good order and iudgment, and will be the more durable, for that the workmen receiued commoditie, and the labourers did not sweat for nothing. Many gallant spirits found out ingenious inuentions, which our age admires, and the forepassed haue not knowne. Waters had not yet beene raised higher then their springs. This present age and those which are to come, owe this industry to Montonis President of the Minte in the generality of Lyon. This actiue affection in the King to royall buildings, made subiects (by an honest and commendable imitation) to raise the ruines which did generally shew a hideous face, and mournfull markes of horrible and furious effects, both in townes and countrie. The paued caufies which are continued in diuerse Prouinces, the bridges which by the motion and care of the Marquise of Rosny are built vpon Riuer, where neuer were any, witnesses with what curiosity, the King sought the ease and commoditie of his people.

Exercise of Noblemen in Court.

Wee haue seene what the King does, wee must also know where vnto the Court is inclined. How can they liue without warre, that thinke it a dishonor to dye in their beddes, who are accustomed to triumph ouer idlenesse, and rest not but to take new breath? What doe so many Noblemen, which cannot endure rest but with impatiency? Some goe a hunting, others dwell and dye among Ladies: many giue themselves to the knowledge of tongues and the Mathematickes: the most quarrellous stripp themselves into their shirtes, notwithstanding any prohibition of Duells or Combats: the most temperate retire themselves from great expences. Some there are who loth that ease should triumph ouer their reputations goe out of the Realme with the Kings permission. It is a signe of a great and noble courage to goe and make warre vpon a forraine Theater, and to see the diuersity of people and nations, that hee may settle his iudgement and arme himselfe with experience. When wee speake of them that haue well employed the ease and liberty of peace, we must remember the Duke of Neuers. He went into England, Flanders, and Hungary, and through a great part of the North. He past to the King of Denmarke, who (for the respect of those two great and famous houses, of Gonzaga allied to the greatest houses of Europe and of Neuers, which carries the title of Dukes of Brabant and Limbourg, but much more for the loue of this crowne) receiued him with great and famous honours.

The King was aduertised that the Seignury of Venice would renew a negotiation which

A which they had attempted and left vnperfect twenty yeares since, which they now sought to conclude. De Vic Ambassador for the King in Suifferland hauing discouered that both parties had begun without the King, gaue them to vnderstand that they could not finish nor conclude that without his Maieesty. The Count Fuentes did also crosse it, for that this newe League should make him to loose the hope of that which the Spaniards had pursued so many yeares. As soone as the King had giuen them to vnderstand that he was well pleased therewith, it was concluded: neither partie respecting the threatres of the Count Fuentes, who sware that he would take from the Grisons the traffike which they had in the Duchie of Milan, and the reliefe of Corne which they receiued from thence. The Articles of this Alliance are set downe at large in Peter Mathew. The Count Fuentes discontented with this League, made the Grisons repent it, hauing cut of their commerce and all commodities which they drew out of the territories of Milan, without the which they could not well liue. The two Countries ioyned together, & the barrenesse of the one is supplied by the fertility and abundance of the other. To bring them vnder the yoke of Spaine, and to force them to break with the Venetians, he built a fort at the entry of their Country, whereof shall bespoken hereafter.

An Ambassador sent from Venice into France about the same time past by Lions, a graue and wise man, and well practised in affaires of State. The gouernor of Lions did visit him, & among other discourses vnderstood from him that the Seigneurs of that Common-weale did hold themselves more bound vnto the Count Fuentes then to any man liuing, for that they had made vse of his threats to sharpen their courages which time had made blunt and dull. His braueries had made them to take resolutions for the good of the State, which they had neuer drempt of, drowning their Counsels in the delights of Peace, and presuming that they should not feare any storme in so great a Calme, but hauing seene the Counts humor to stirre vp Warre in Italie, and that he bragged he had Instruments to drawe them in, that had no will to dance, they had so well provided for their affaires, as they feared his hand no more then his tongue. The last yeare the Lord of Pont had been in new France (called Canada) from whence he had brought two Sauages, which he presented vnto the King: they learned of them that the great Riuer which they thought to haue been but a Gulfe (for that it is eigheteene leagues broad where it enters into the Sea) was about foure hundred leagues long, and past through many goodly Countries and Lakes, into the which many other goodly Riuer did runne, and that he might goe vp into it in Canowes, which the Sauages do vse to sayle in that Riuer. Hee resolved with some other Sea-Captaines (with the Kings good liking) to returne, and to search into the hart of the Country by meanes of the Sauages, as well as hee had discovered along the Sea-Coast, where is nothing but Rockes and high Mountaynes, and sands full of Pyne-trees, Sapins, Cipres and Holly. He parted from Honfleur the 15. of March, carrying the 2. Sauages back with him, & the 18. of Aprill he came into the great Riuer of Canada, where hauing entred a 100. leagues, in the end hee came to Tadoussac the 24. where he found made Sauages in Cabines. Going on land, he went with some of his companie to the Cabin of the great Sagamo, called Anadishion, where they found him, with some 4. score or a 100. of his companions, which made Tabagie (that is to say, a Feast) who receiued them very well, according to their custome, and made them to sit neere him, the Sauages being placed one by another on either side of the Cabin. One of the Sauages which he had carried with him, began to make his oration, of the good reception which the King had made them, and of the good vltage which they had receiued in France, and that his Maieesty wished them well, and desired to people their land, & to make peace with their enemies (which be the Irocois) or to send them forces to vanquish them. He told them of the goodly castles, palaces, houses and people that he had seene, and the manner of liuing of the French. The Sauages gaue him audience with great silence. When he had done speaking, the great Sagamo began to take Tabacco, and gaue some vnto the Seigneur of Pont Graue of S. Malo, and to his company 1603. company, and to some other Samagos that were neere him; hauing taken it well, hee A began to make his Oration to them all, speaking deliberately, staying some-times a little, and then beginning againe, he said. That in truth they had reason to bee greatly contented to haue such a King for their great friend: Where-vnto all the other Sauages answered with one voyce, ho, ho, ho; that is to say, I. I. Then the Sagamo sayd againe, That he was very glad the King of France should people their Land, and make warre against their enemies: That there was no nation in the world to whome they desired more good, then vnto the French: Then hee gaue the Sauages to vnderstand, what profit they might receiue from his Maiestie.

After that hee had ended his speech, Du Pont and his company went out of the Cabin, and then they began to make their Tabagie or feast, the which is done with the B flesh of Orignac, which is like vnto beefe of Beares, sea-Volues, and Beauers, which is the ordinary meate that they haue, with great store of wilde-fowle. When they eate, they sit of either side of the Cabin, euery one hauing a Dish made of the Barke of Trees: the meate being sodden, there is one that giues to euery one his portion in his Dish, where they eate very grosely, for when their hands are greasie, they either rubbe them vpon their hayre, or vpon their Dogges, (whereof they haue great store to hunt withall.) Before they eate they dance about their Pannes, and after they haue eaten, they returne to their dancing, euery one taking the head of his enemy which hee hath slaine in battaile, the which hangs behind him. They made this feast together, for the victory which they had obtained of the Irocois, of whome they had slaine some C hundred. Three nations of Sauages were there assembled, that is to say, the Estechemins, Algonmequins, and Montagnez, to the number of a thousand, all enemies to the Irocois, against whom they make cruell warre by surprise, for that they are more in number then they.

The eighteenth day of the moneth, the said Sauages which were then at the point of Saint Mathew, came to campe at the Port of Todousac, where the Frenchmen were. At the breake of day, their great Sagamo going out of his Cabin, went about all the other Cabins, crying with aloud voyce, that they must dislodge to goe to Todousac where their good friends were. Sodenly euery one pulled downe his Cabin, and the great Sagamo began first of all to take his Canow, and to carry it to the Riuer, in the D which he embarked his wife and children, with great store of Fures, so as they were neere two hundred Canowes, which goe exceeding swiftly, for although Du Ponts ship-boate were very well manned, yet they went faster then it. There are but two persons that doe rowe, the man and the woman. Their Canowes are eight or nine paces long, and one broad, they are very subiect to ouer-turne, if they bee not well guided: They are made of barks of trees, strengthened within with little hoopes artificially made, and they are so light, as a man may carry one easily: and euery Canow will carry the waight of a Pipe. Their Cabins are lowe made like Tents, couered with E barks of trees, leauing a hole open in the toppo, to let in the light: they make many fires in the midst of the Cabine, whereas some-times they are ten families together. They lye vpon skinnes one among an other, and their Dogges with them: All these people are of a pleasant humour, they laugh most commonly, yet they are some-what Saturnists: they speake deliberately, as if they would bee well vnderstood, and stay soddenly, studying a good space, and then they speake againe. They vse these customes in their Orations in Councell, whether none come but the principall, which are ancient: the women and children assist not. All these nations endure so much some-times, as they are in a manner forced to eate one an other, through the great cold and snowe, for the beasts and fowle which they vse, retyre themselves into the hotter countries. They are apt inough to learne to till the ground or any other worke, if they may be taught. Many of them are of good iudgment, and will answer directly to any question. They are full of reuenge and great liars, in whome there is no trust, they promise much and performe little, for the most part they haue no lawe, and beleeue that after that God had made all things, hee tooke a number of Arrowes and F stick

A stick them in the earth, from the which sprong men and women which haue multiplied in the world vnto this day, and are growne in this sort. That there is one God, one sonne, the mother and the sunne which shines which are foure, yet that God is about all, and that the sonne and the shyning sunne are good, by reason of the benefit which they receiue, but the mother is nothing worth, for that she eates them. In like sort they hold that the father is not very good. They haue an infinite number of other foolish opinions, and they haue certaine Sauages among them, whom they call Pilotous, which speake visibly vnto the deuill, and tells them what they should doe, as well for matters of warre as other things: to whom they obey at their first command. B They also beleeue that all their dreames are true, and many say that they haue scene and dreymt what should happen, but to speake truly they are illusions of the deuill which abuseth them.

They talke
vnto the deuill.

They are all well proportioned, without any deformity of their bodies, and nimble. Their women are well fashioned, repleat and somewhat full: they are yealow by reason of the painting wherewith they annoint themselves, which makes them of an Oliue collour. They apparell themselves with skins, one part of their bodies is couered and the rest bare. In winter they couer themselves with good fures, whereof they haue great store, where there is great store of snow, they vse a kind of racket, the which is twife or thrice as bigge as that of France, which they tie into their feete, and so goe in the C snow without sinking, for else they could not hunt, nor goe in many places.

Their complexions ap-

ages and interments.

They haue a kinde of marriage, when a maide is foureteene or fiftene yeeres old she may haue as many seruants and friends, and accompany with as many as she please; then after siue or six yeeres, she will take whom shee likes best for her husband, and liue together till death, vnlesse after sometime they haue no children, then the man may bee vnmarrried and take an other wife. After they bee once married they are chaste, and the husbands are for the most part iaculous, giuing presents to the father or kinsfolkes of the woman whom they haue married. As for their Interments or Funeralls, when a man or a woman dieth, they make a pit, into the which they put all the goods hee hath, as kettles, fures, hatchets, bowes, arrows, aparell and other things, and then they D put the body into the pit and couer it with earth, on the which they lay great peeces of wood, and one peece they set right vp, the which they paint red on the toppo. They beleeue the immortality of the soule, and say that they goe to reioyce in other countries with their kinsfolkes and friends when they are dead. The Seignieur of Pont hauing spent sometime to discover the great riuer of Canada, & some other particularities of the country, returned the 24. of August, & arriued at New-hauen the 26. of September. The great Turke (seeing the great exploits which the French had done in the wars of Hungary and Transilvania) had often intreated the King not to suffer any French to goe to the warres of Hungary, and to tie him to make a strict prohibition, hee granted all and more then his Maiesty could desire for the reparation of publicke and E priuate iniuries, against the liberty of the commerce, and the safety of the navigation in the Leuant Seas, the which were greatly molested by Pirates. Hee sent a Chaours (which is a Generall or a Conductor of a Carauane) vnto the King in September, with very kinde letters, and a stile not vsuall for the Princes of the house of Ottomans, who speake as Turkes, and glory to speake proudly and Imperiously to the Potentates of Christendome, giuing him this title. To the most Glorious, magnanimous and great Lord of the beleeve of Iesus: Elected amongst the Princes of the Nation of Messias, the Com-

The letter I omit for breuities sake, beeing not greatly pertinent to this subiect. And for that the great Turke was informed, that the Pirates of Algier and of Thunis, made markets of the French, which they tooke, and sold them vnto the Moores (who were alwaies cruell and mercilesse vnto the Christians, being forced to endure all without complaining, and to murmure against the rigour which Fortune allowes the Master ouer his slaue) hee writ to Ameft King of Fez.

and intreats him to prevent this sale, as against the Iustice that was left them by their Prophet, and to set all the Frenchmen that were in his dominions at liberty. The King labored to conuert the warre of Hungary into a long truce or an honourable peace for the Christians. He disposed Mahomes therevnto by the dexterity of his Ambassador, and if the house of Austria had trusted that of France, they had reaped the fruites of this Negotiation. Mahomes to shew that hee had a desire to lay a side armes, presented the Emperor with armes and horses, and to Mathias, the Archduke he sent a rich robe for a present.

A quarrell betwixt the Count Soissons and the Marquis of Rhosny.

There was no talke in Court but of the quarrell betwixt the Count Soissons and the Marquis of Rhosny, the which was very hard to reconcile. It grew vpon words reported and disauowed. The Count Soissons was much offended, many framed diuers Meteors in their heads, vpon the consequence of this question, some there were that made damnable vowes, the which were as odious and as punishable, as those sellers of funeral stufes that were punished by the Senate of Athens vpon the accusation of Demades. The King foreseeing that his seruice did suffer in this diuision, gaue him to vnderstand by the Chancellor and Sillery, and afterwards by the Count of Saint Paul, and the Duke of Montbason, that he desired this trouble were ended and he satisfied, he answered them al after one sort, That he should hold himselfe unworthy of the honor to bee as he was a nere kinsman to so great and couragious a King, if hee had no feeling of so blowdy an injury. The King considering that this quarrell did nothing aduance his seruice, he made himselfe the instrument of this reconciliation. Hee sent for the Count Soissons and the Marquis of Rhosny to the Louvre. They came both well accompanied. The prefence, authority and intreaty of his Maiesty, was of force to smother the remembrance of all injuries, and to reconcile their willes. Let vs now see what they haue done in the Nationall Synode held at Gap, held by them of the reformed Religion, whereas many beleueed that in giuing audience to Ambassadors, and receiuing Letters from forraine Princes and common-weales, they had done more then their condition would allow, and had taken the way to make an Estate in the Estate. I will say no more. The passion of Religion might diminish the beleefe of the truth. The Synode began the first of October. It Treated of things touching Doctrine, Discipline, and the Gouernment of Churches, giuing a good Testimony that there are among them men full of zeale to the aduancement of their Religion, and who in their resolutions can ioyne wisdomie with Doctrine, causing them to blush that haue so much suffered the ancient constitutions of the Church to degenerate, and haue so much neglected the Gouernment and Discipline, as the Synodall assemblies of Diocesses, so necessary and profitable, are nothing but vaine and fond ceremonies, where they doe onely exhort them to doe well hereafter, not caring to correct or amend the ill that is gone and past.

They are reconciled by
the King.

A Synod held at Gap.

The profit of Synodes.

Of many meanes which the Church (in her infancy) did vse to preferue this spirit of Peace and Charity, which gaue life vnto all the members, and intertained the Cy-ment and bond of the whole building, that of these assemblies hath beene held the most fruitfull, and should bee made twise a yeere, if they will follow the Canons of the Apostles and the Decrees of Nice and Sardinia. There they conferred of the order and direction of all affaires.

There the Pastors taking knowledge one of an other entertained their friendships, renuing the bonds of their affections. It serued for a bloud-letting, and a good purgation for bad humours in a corrupted body, to preferue and keepe it in health, purity and chastety of the faith. There they shewed the power of the spirituall sword vpon the incorrigible, who in the end found the pappes of the Church dry for them, when through error, malice, or obstinacy, they made themselues unworthy of the sweetnesse of her milke. There in the end they did straine the strings of the policy and discipline of the Church, the which being through negligence growne slacke made no sound nor harmony. In this assembly of Gap (after that all the Deputies of the Prouinces of the Realme had shewed their commissions) they beganne by the Inuocation of the name of God, the which was followed by the reading of the confession of the faith,

1603.

A faith, wherein they did expound those things that were not plaine enough. The common desire of the Ministers to see the schisme pacified that was betwixt them and the other congregations of Germany, England and the Low countries, made them re-solue that the assembly should write vnto the Vniuersities both Lutherans and Caluinists, to deuise some meanes to reconcile these contrarieties in some points of their confession.

This assembly began by a declaration that the Bishop of Rome was Antichrist, foretold by the word of God. The Ministers haue for a long time written and preached it, and the Catholike Doctors the contrary. They now made this opinion an Article of faith, and added it to their confession for the thirty one. And for that many sayd they were molested because they termed the Pope Antichrist in their publike or priuate discourses, they were exhorted to perseuer in this confession as one of the principal causes of their departure from the Church of Rome, and charged their Deputies in Court to beseech his Maiesty not to suffer them to be hindered in making a free confession of that which they beleueed. The Pope complained vnto the King by his Noncio; who no lesse affected to the holy Sea then his predecessors, who had receiued the glorious title of Christian, was much offended, forbidding the Ministers to proceed any farther, and not to vomite forth those bad words, from whence might spring a new kinde of poyson.

Addition of an Article in the confession
of faith.

The Popes
complaint.

The confession of faith beeing read and examined, it was sworne by all the Deputies in the name of their Prouinces, with promise to continue, and a protestation that it was the same Doctrine that was taught in their Churches. Which done they entred into the examination of their discipline. It is the order which should bee held for the administration of the word of God, praiers and the decencie of ceremonies, whereof their assemblies are very bare, and yet notwithstanding beeing purged from superstitions are very necessary, and maintaine Religion, as the barke preferues the tree, without the which it withers and dries away. In this reading of the discipline, it was obserued that some Prouinces had petticular formes and ceremonies, in the election and reception of Ministers. The assembly Iudging by the aduise of the Apostle, that wee must haue but one rule and one forme in matters of Religion, they ordained that all Churches, should follow the same forme, in the imposition of hands vpon Pastors, by the which he that should be presented to be receiued should kneele, and this imposition should be vpon the Sunday or some other day of solempne assembly in the presence of the people, and not in consistories, or colloquies.

And for that it was shewed that many Ministers in their preaching, vsed more the authority of the fathers then that of the Scripture, the assembly threatned them with suspention which straying from expositions, conformable to the word of God, were carried away to those of the Fathers or scholasticall Doctors, or deliuering allegories, or discourses of Philosophy, produced the words of the Fathers in the Pulpite, namely in the time of Lent, or the like season, or tooke the text of Catholike Preachers.

Expositions of the Scriptures.

They did also disallow like disputations in Synodes and Colloquies, vpon contrauer-sies of Diuinity, sending them to the Schooles at Saumur, there to bee argued according to forme of Syllogisme, which is the instrument of disputation. They also thought these contentions amongst Pastors to bee dangerous, and necessarie to restrain them that would bring them in vse.

The Discipline hauing beene read and sworne by all the Deputies, in the name of the Prouinces, with a solempne protestation to obserue it strictly, and to cause it to bee obserued in all pointes, and in all their Churches, they produced the acts of the last Synodes to see what remained to bee executed. Then they past Apellations made by priuate men, greewing at the decrees of Prouinciall Synodes. After which they iudg-ed of censures, suspentions, and other corrections, whereunto they added that which concerned the prouision and establishment of Ministers, in those places where they were demanded, and whereas the assembly thought them necessary.

After-

1603.

Afterwards they treated of the generall affaires of the cause. The petition of the brethren of the Marquise of Saluce banished from their houses for the profession of this religion, hauing bene read, the assembly answered: that they should bee maintained and confirmed in the vnion of the Doctors and discipline of other Churches, and to that effect petition should be made vnto the King, to recommend them to the Duke of Sauoy, that they might enioy the liberties graunted by the Edicts.

Vpon this question, if in suites depending before the Iudges of another Religion, they should vie these words, Presended, reformed Religion, The Synode sayd that petition must bee made vnto the King, not to force them to say or doe any thing contrary to their consciences, exhorting all them of this Religion to forbear this word of reformed, as contrary to the freedome and liberty of their confession.

They of Xaintonge propounded another if it were lawfull for a priuate man to appropriate a place for his buriall, and to set it vpon pillars or otherwise, and if it bee lawfull for Noblemen or other, to set vp their armes in Temples which are built. The Synode answered that for Sepulchers all should bee obserued according to antient simplicity without appropriating any thing in particular, witnessing their communion with the Saints that were dead, as well as they desired in the happy resurrection. As for Temples, they should also obserue the same modesty and simplicity. The assembly casting their eyes vpon spirituall and polittike matters, they did carefully consider of that which concernes Schooles and Vniuersities, as the nurseries of ministers and pastors of their Doctrines, hauing nothing in Religion more important then the institution of youth, the which is made apt to any thing wee please, wherefore they ordained, that all the Prouinces should entertaine a certaine number of schollers, in the Vniuersities of this Realme, the which should not be admitted to the Ministry in their Prouinces, without good and sufficient testimony of their manners and doctrine, from the pastors, and professors, of the Vniuersities where they had studied. The Vniuersities are also exhorted to haue common libraries, and especially the great Bible of Antwerpe in many languages.

A memorable example of a crime and of iustice.

This yeere the King did graue in the register of his vertues, a memorable example of Iustice. The cause is considerable and the subiect of consequence. A young gentlewoman of Normandy visited and courted by her brother, disdained her husband, by whom she had two children, for that hee was somewhat aged and made no profession of armes. This inequality of age, together with his condition, made the coniugall affection like vnto a small brooke, whereof when the spring is stoppt the bed remains drie, and there is nothing left but filthe for toades and frogges. The greene grasse that was vpon the bankes withereth, yea the trees that were planted along, die. This marriage, hauing lost the radicall humour of loue, it made all pleasure and content to wither, produced nothing but noyse, disdaine, contempt and quarrell. This miserable woman cared no more for her husband, but to draw meanes from him to make her selfe more pleasing in the eyes of an other, delighting in Luxuriousnesse and excessse of apparell, vnder the which the deuill is accustomed to make open warre to Chastity, and to rauish the honour of a woman, without the which her life is a life without a body, a body without a soule, a soule without a spirit, a spirit without breath, and a breath without ayre.

It seemed that the first acquaintance of this woman with her brother, was nothing but a perfect loue, such as honour and that which they were one vnto another might well allow. Who so had seene the familiarities of this sister with her brother, would not haue beleued that they had made loue, the Law of Nature beeing of greater force then reason, or truth it selfe. In the meane time this fury prooued Adultery and Incest, making the wife to abandon the company of her husband to cleaue vnto her brother, who forgetting nothing that might be sayd or done to couer his crime and to auoyde punishment, wandred vp and downe the country with her vnder disguised names, but carrying still in his conscience the sting and Vicer of so execrable a pleasure. Shee grew bigge with child, and beleeuing that in hiding her

A her great bellie, her offence should bee also hidden, she caused her selfe to be conducted into that great forest of Paris, where she continued with her brother the exercises of Cupid and Psyche. The figge leaues could not couer their shame. The al-seeing eye of the diuine Iustice discouers them, and will not suffer that so infamous a lust should continue. These violent streames beeing runne out, the mudde and filth that was in the bottome appeared presently. The husband oppressed, with so iust a grieffe (as the Law doth not hold him punishable, whom it forceth to kill, the wife beeing surprised in Adultery) came to Paris, and discouered those which had deprived him both of rest and honour, hee caused them to be apprehended and committed prisoners, the one in the great Chastelet, the other in Four l' Euesque. The sister confesseth herselfe guilty of Adultery to free her brother from incest, laying the child to one that was altogether innocent. Vpon the difficulty of proofes the Lieutenant Cryminall condemned them both to the racke. He might well haue proceeded to sentence.

A sentence
giuen by the Lieutenant Criminel.

But considering that they must deliberate well, before they iudge of the life of a man which is not made without care, he desired rather to proceed coldly therein then overboldly. The husband whose heart could not be moued to pity, by the consideration of his two children, appeales from this sentence of the racke. The court considering that mildnesse doth norrieth and giues more scope to vice, declares the appellation and sentence from the which he had appealed to be voide, and amending it, they iudge the accused sufficiently conuicted of the crimes of Adultery and Incest, for satisfaction whereof they condemne them to loose their heads.

A sentence of the Court.

The King during the processe was often sued vnto for their pardon. But considering that in such crimes it were impiety to shew pity: that mildnesse was severity, and clemency cruel, and that the most holy and the most iust of his predecessors, reuoked a pardon which hee had giuen to a malefactor, falling vpon that verse of the Prophet David in his praier-booke. Doe Iustice at all times, sayd, that hee referred it to the Iustice of his Court of Parliament. The father desired to change the infamy of the punishment into a death lesse shamefull, but longer and more cruell, the which the Emperour Opilius Macrinus vsed, causing such as were condemned for crimes to bee D shut vp betwixt foure walles. He offered all his lands to procure his children that manner of punishment. This could not bee, for that by the doome of the Iudgement, the execution was to bee done at the Greue, where it moued pity and compassion in many, lamenting the youth of the brother, the beauty of the sister and the misery and blindness of them both. The yeere ended in peace as it had begunne in pleasures and sports, there was no new occasion offered, but the passage of the Constable of Castille to goe into England for the conclusion of the Treaty of peace betwixt the Kings of England and Spaine. The King aduertised of his passage by Bourdeaux, sent to the Marshall D'Ornano to receiue him, the which hee did, going to meet him with a great number of Noblemen and Gentlemen of the country. The Emperour Charles the fifth passing through France, admired the great and goodly traines of Gouvernors of Prouinces which came to receiue him, commending them very much.

The Constable of Castille (full of his Spanish fumes) made no great account thereof, and receiued these honours after a Spanish manner. The Marshall D'Ornano entertayning him with the singularities of this Realme, told him. That hee should see a country, yea a world in seeing Paris. He answered him. That he had left behind his backe the goodliest Cities of Christendome. But they are not so Great nor so well peopled, sayd the Marshall D'Ornano. The people answered the Constable, And nothing to the excellency of Cities, although it helps something for the strength of the State. The Marshall shall asked him, if hee would not see the King. Hee shewed by his answer, That hee was not greatly curious, yet must see him, with the respect that was due to that Majesty. Hee came to Paris with a great traine. The King of Spaine spares no cost in such occasions, and thinkes no expences more royall, then those which makes his gold to glister in the eyes of strangers. In like sort, his Ministers and Ambassadors seeing themselves so well followed and serued, take delight in shewing the greatnesse of their maister, A and are not silent when they must publish his power. Mendoza who neuer went out of his lodging but on horse-backe, in Litter, or in Carosse, with all his traine, although it were but to goe to the Church, the which was very neere his lodging, he neuer spake three words, but two were for the greatnesse of his maister, saying often; That God was mighty in heauen, and the King of Spaine on earth. An other going out of Rome to accompany the Pope, went with fixe Litters, six Carosses, euery one hauing six horses, two hundred Groomes, and threescore Carts for baggage, and all for a small iourney. The Prince of Parmas traine, was admirable and Royall, shewing by his equipage the greatnesse of his maister whom hee serued. The Constable of Castille did not hide it, B neither in his words, nor in his traine, hee had alwaies some words of ostentation to shew it.

He went to the Louvre and did see the King in his Cabinet, hee entred with a good grace, but stately & proud, the which was sodenly conuerted into great humility, for approaching nere vnto his Maiesty (who was sitting in a chaire) he kneeled vpon one knee, and continued so a litle longer then hee thought. The King tooke him vp, imbraced him, and shewed him a very good countenance. Hee spake much to assure him, that the King of Spaine held nothing more deere, then the preseruacion of the peace; and vnlesse that time should greatly force his will, hee had no other power, but to continue it in this resolution, and to bring forth fruites of great loue and friendship, the which is C firme and constant betwixt equall powers. Hee heard from the King words of the same affection: then he tooke his leaue to goe see the Queene. Going downe to crosse the Court, where he was attended by his people with forty torches of white wax, hee said to some of his company, That the King had receiued him with the Maiesty of a King, and had imbraced him as his kinsman.

Hauing done his duty vnto the Queene, he demanded leaue to go and see the Daulphin. The King caused him to bee conducted the next day to Saint Germaine. Beeing arriued there, they gaue notice to his Gouvernesse, that the Constable was there with a great Traine of Spaniards. At that word of Spaniards, the little Prince opened his eyes and makes them speake it againe. They be Spaniards that come to see you, Spaniards D said the Prince ça ça giue me my sword. Who so had not knowne that this word came from his owne motion, would haue thought that they had printed in his fantasie the same opinion which King Charles the seuenth, Lewis the eleuenth, and Charles the eight had had in their infancy of the English and Bourguignons. And if the Spaniards had heard him, the strangenesse of such a word would haue caused them to apprehend new worke, and to feare and beleue that which the French soldiars saith, that they must present Milan for the first attempt of this young Eagler. The Constable admired his constant eye, and his Physiognomy, and was amazed at so great a boldnesse in that age, and so much Iudgement in that Infancy. Monsieur the Daulphin told him tales in his language, and according to his vnderstanding, as Alexander did to the Ambassadors of Persia. Al the Spaniards did meruaile, and the more for that the dore was open for the least of the trayne. They see about him a goodly company of yong Noblemen, Alexander Monsieur, the Prince of Longueuille, and the three sonnes of the Duke of Espernon. The Constable of Castille past on to goe into Flanders, hee came to Bruxelles and descended at the Archdukes palace, where hee was well receiued, and from thence hee past into England. Although the subiect ought not to reckon the yeeres of his Prince, but to wish him a long & prosperous life, yet we must say that with the end of the last yeere the King beganne the foure and fiftith yeere of his age, a rearme which Cato held to bee ripe and well aduanced, wherevnto few Kings of France attayned, and yet it hath nothing abated the vigour and strength of this Prince, who is active and disposed, and as liuely as hee was at the age of thirty yeeres. Cares and yeeres hauing onely made his beard white, it is true that now he begins to feeble some flux of the gout. A disease which breeds with ease, and which comes to Princes rather by excesse, then by trauell in their E

A their youth, and which is sooner gotten by the chase of Venus, then by that of Diana, where beeing no pleasure in the world which doth not carrie some displeasure behind it. The best course is to repent the euill before they commit it, that is to say, to haue only intended it, and the means to grow old, is neither to do nor to eate any thing through voluptuousnesse. A great condition or qualitie to whom all things are lawfull that please, will find this rule of gouernement very hard. Great men commit great excesse, and in the end they tast the fruites which they haue sowne. It is reason that after a time infirmities should cease, and cleare the troubles of their soules, as thunder and lightning doth purge the ayre, that diseases (as fore-runners of death, and porters of the prison, wherein they are inclosed) should teach them that they are men, and subiect to humane miseries, that they are not raysed vpon the cloudes, to be free from a world of miseries, that are disperfed vpon the earth, and that they should remember that the more their delights abound, the more their strength decays, and that hee that doth least, doth least harme, and passeth the last yeeres of his life with more content and lesse griefe. B

The King would not complaine much of that little touch of the Goute, for that it had beene but gentle, and when that after his recouerie, the Courtiers did see him to weare furred bootes, they sayd, it was more to hold the grieft in some reputation, then for any need he had. Hee did a publike act which hath particularities worthy to bee C knowne. I do not forget these occasions, for that they supply the discourse of this Historie, without the which it should be constrained to seeke for matter farre without the Realme: for of secret things, and which are treated of in the Councel of the Cabinet, we must attend the knowledge thereof by the euents, which time shall discover, and not trouble our selues to seeke out the springs of Nilus. A father how great and powerfull soeuer, cannot thinke too soone nor too often, to breed vp the youth of his child in vertue, nor to assure his fortune: I say a child without distinction: for although the Law doth distinguish bastards from them that are lawfully begotten, yet Nature makes no difference. The King hauing determined to make Alexander Monsieur (his base sonne) of the Order of the Knights of Malta, resolved to do it in time, that hee D might receiue the name and the effect. The great Master reputing it an honour to haue a Prince of their Company, issued from so valiant and couragious a race, sent all necessarie expeditions. The King hauing receiued them, would haue the execution to be accompanied with a sumptuous and stately ceremonie. He caused the great Commaunder of France and that of Champagne to come to Paris, and commanded them to call the greatest number of Commanders and Knights they could thither. The King had chosen the Augustines church for this effect, but the Commander of Ville-Dieu, (beeing Ambassador of their Order) beseeched him that it might be in that of their Temple, as one of the chiefe Houses of the Order. On the Sunday morning the King and the Queene went in one Carosse, hauing Alexander Monsieur betwixt them, who was E deliuered by the King vnto the Grand-Prior, who attended him at the first gate with all the Commanders and Knights: As the church was hung with the richest Tapestry that could bee found, so was it filled with that which was of greatest worth in Paris. The Princes, the Princesses, the Cardinall of Gondy, the Popes Nuncio, many Bishops, the Ambassadors of Spaine and Venice, the Constable, the Chancellor, the seuen Presidents of the Parliament, and the Knights of the Order of the Holy Ghost. The ceremonie began by the blessing of the sword, and by the change of his habits, to let the Knight vnderstand, that he did bind himselfe to change his life, and to take vpon him the true ornaments of vertue, without the which all the pompe and felicity of the F world is but wind and vanity: for beeing attired in white sattin, layed thicke with gold lace, the sleues whereof were garnished with rich Medailles, a Carcanet of stones crosse vnder his arme, a blacke velvet cappe with a little white feather, and a band covered with great pearles, he put on a robe of blacke Taffata, and was conducted neere vnto the great Altar, beeing accompanied with the Duke and Duchesse of Vendosme, and followed by the Commander for the conduct of this ceremonie. Saincte Foie Bishop of Neuers

Of Calatraua the third, of Saint Iaques in Spaine the fourth: of Saint Mary de la Mercede in Arragon the fift: of Christ in Portugall the sixth: of Saint Lazare and S. Maurice in Sauoy the seuenth: of Saint Stephen in Tuscane the eight. This exhortation ended, the Masse began, and after the Gospell, Alexander Monsieur presented him selfe vpon his knees before the Grand-Prior of France, with a burning torch of white waxe in his hand, to demand the Order. Hereat the King (who was set vnder a rich cloth of Estate, of purple Veluet embroydered, in the midst of the Quire) left his place, and comming neere to helpe him to answer, he sayd aloud, that he left the ranke of a King B to do the office of a Father. The Grand-Prior gaue him the Order after the accustomed manner, and after Masse was done, as a new Knight he presented himselfe the second time to make profession. The King aduanced againe, and promised for him, that comming neere to the age of fixteene yeares, he should make the vowes and profession perfect. They be the same vowes which religious men do make, Obedience, Pouertie, and Chastitie. He did his obedience in the same place, and then being dis-robed, the Grand-Prior set vpon his brest, a plastron of blacke Sattin, with a great white Crosse, and so the Ceremonie ended with great ioy and founding of trumpets. The new Knight feasted the Grand-Priors of France and Champagne, with the Commanders and Knights at the Temple, and the King went to dine with Zamet. C

This Order hath alwaies affected two kinds of Knights, some for seruice, and others for honor, and both for the greatnesse, defence, and support of the Order. There haue bene children of the greatest and mightiest houses of Christendome, who although they do no seruice in effect, (beeing dispensed withall) yet they profit their profession much, by the entertaynement and communication of friendships and respects of their houses, to the common good of the Order. Others that are issued from the noblest families of all the Nations of the world, are bound vnto actual seruice in the Iland, they haue all the Mediterranean Sea for the bounds of their exercise, and all the world for witnesses of their glorie. After that they haue done the seruice which they owe vnto the Order, they cannot grow old in pouertie, and in this assurance they go more willingly to all occasions that demand a prooue of their valor, being reasonable to hazard themselves in great enterprises, to merit great recompences.

Let vs passe to the Duke of Lorraines Court, which wee shall find all in teares and mourning, for the death of the Lady Catherine of Bourbon, Duchesse of Bar, and the Kings onely sister, she had bene tormented with a continuall Feauer, and there were some signes of beeing with child. All the Phisitions sayd, she was not with child, one onely maintained the contrarie, and she beleued his opinion, for that hee was of the Religion, neither would she take any thing but from his hands, for that we beleue that easily which we desire. She grew in choller against them which impured her disease to any other cause, saying: That they neither desired her contentment nor her husbands. She thought she could not endure too much to become a Mother. This belief that she had a child in her body made her to bring forth death, rejecting all kinds of remedies to preferue her fruite. If the Phisition which had ministred to her as to a woman with child, had not fled to Metz, and from thence to Sedan, all his Phisicke could not haue kept him from death. The profession of Phisitions hath this prinleidge, that the Sunne sees their practise, and the Earth hides their faults.

The Duke of Lorraine did her no lesse honour after her death, then he had witnessed in her life. He sent vnto the King an Inuentorie of her Jewels. He caused the body to be conducted vnto the frontier of France, in a Carosse wel appointed, couered with black Veluet, and drawne with foure horses. The foure Bayliffes of Lorraine carried the four corners of the cloth which couered the Coffin: threescore Gentlemen marched before with the Guards. The Earle of Chaligny and some Noblemen of the country went after it. There were twelue Suiffes which marched on either side. It was receiued vpon the frontier by those whom the King had appointed. The Inhabitants of Troyes would haue

A haue receiued it with a Canopy, but Tintcuille thought it not fit, neither would the King haue taken it well. She was much lamented by the Duke of Bar, who could not haue bene husband to a better wife, nor she wife to a better husband. The fift yeare of their marriage was with as great respect and loue as the first. The affections of this Prince and this Princess, were in such harmony, that besides the diuersitie of Religion, you would haue sayd they were but one Soule, not in two bodies, but in one called by two names: for they spake with one mouth, and thought with one heart. And if there be any content in eying, amidst the contents of this world, this Princess protested that she had neuer content in this world more perfect then in Lorraine. The Duke of Lorraine and the Duke of Bar, desired as well to see her satisfied for doubts of Religion.

A marriage of great content.

B They coniuired her in the extremity of her sicknesse to thinke of her soules health, but she sayd vnto them, that she would die as she had liued. She was no more forced in the exercise of her Religion at Nancy then at Nerac. True it is, that she went to receiue the Communion without the Towne, and had preaching and prayers in her house but for her selfe onely and her followers, without the which she had bene much honoured by the Lorraines, and at that time more then before, the Pope hauing granted a dispensation of the marriage: When the newes of her death was brought vnto the King, the chiefe of his Councell came presently to apply some remedy to this wound. He found that they came to that end, and therefore he commanded them to leaue him alone, C and that he would resolue with God. He caused the doores and windowes of his cabinet to be shut, casting himselfe vpon his bedde, to weepe more freely, and to ease his grieve in the liberty of his sighs. All the Court did mourne, and the Ambassadors presented themselves in that habit vnto the King, to condole this death in the behalfe of their Masters. The Popes Nuncio was some-what troubled in this complement, and would not mourn at an accident for the which those of his profession could not weep.

After 5. yeeres instance made by the King,
the Pope
granted a dispensation of the marriage.

The King sayd, that he would not tye him to it against his liking, but he would be glad not to see him, vntill his time of mourning were past. Some other would haue spoken so mildly: and we know that Princes haue showne strange effects of their choller against Ambassadors, that haue failed in the honor and respect of these complements.

his sister.

D The Nuncio beeing better aduised, resolved to apply himselfe to the time, and to do as the rest, thinking it would not be taken ill at Rome, knowing that hee did it onely to please the King and to haue audience. But he had some difficulty to decipher himselfe when he was to speake vnto the King: for he could not vnder one habit play two contrarie personages, neither had he words in his mouth, nor teares in his eyes for this sorrow. He that will ease anothers grieve, must shew that he hath a part and feeling thereof. He went after another manner, and his spirit did fit him with another kind of complement, the which although it were free, yet was it not vnpleasing. He sayd vnto the King, that such as knew what he was, and in whose name hee spake, would wonder at the office which he did, but he had more occasion then any other, for that all lamented E the losse of the body, but his Master, the losse of the soule. The King sayd vnto him, that he beleued his sister was faued, for that in the last gaspe an extreme grieve might carry her right into heauen: the Nuncio replied: My Lord, that discourse is more Metaphysicall then Physicall, and so they both entred into other talke.

The King of Spaine and the Arch-dukes had the yeare before set an Imposition of 30. for the 100. vpon all marchandize, that should come in or go out of their dominions. This was secretly to forbid the French to trafficke into their countries, and openly to breake the Treatie of Veruins. This Imposition did very much trouble, and in a manner put all our Townes, which trafficke commonly into Spaine and Flanders into a mutinie. The King could not in the beginning perswade himselfe, that they would tye his subiects to the obseruation of this charge, commanding his Ambassadors which resided with those Princes, to expostulate the matter, and to aduertise him thereof. Their answers, and the rigor they vsed afterwards to his Maiesties subiects to make them pay the Imposition, did witness sufficiently that they would not exempt them. To obserue some equalitie in the intercoure of publicke trafficke betwixt the subiects of the three Princes,

Philip of Spaine complained.

Princes, the King imposed the like custome vpon all merchandize, that should come A out of the Dominions of the King of Spaine, and of the Arch-dukes into France, and vpon those which should be transported out of France into their countries. These burdensome impositions, the rigours where-with they were exacted, the abuse and deceites which were committed in receiuing thereof, could not induce the two brother-in-lawes to make the trafficke free as it ought to be betwixt good neighbours, which desire to enioy the fruites of peace which God hath giuen them, as the King protested he would do by his declaration, and had alwaies shewed it by the effects.

So to redeeme his subiects from the losses and vexations which they receiued by this Imposition, the King by the aduice of his Councell, did forbid all his subiects in generall, to transport any kind of Marchandize, without exception, vnto any place vnder the obedience of the King of Spaine, and the Arch-dukes in Flanders, and the entry into his Realme of all those that might come out of their countries and estates. And to the end that the effect of his intentions might not be made frustrate, to the contempt of his ordinances, by such as might lade marchandize in France, and afterwards cause them to be transported into the sayd Princes countries, he ordaind that all strangers, subiects to other Princes and Common-weales, to whom he allowed free trafficke into his Realme, before they should depart from those places where they had laden the marchandize which they meant to transport, should giue in good and sufficient caution before the Officers of the Port to bring backe within a certaine time prefixt, C a certificate from the Officers and Magistrates of those places, whether they pretended to carrie the sayd marchandize, by the which it might truly appeare, that they had been discharged there: and if it should be afterwards verified, that they had beene laden againe, and carried to any forbidden places, the Sureties should be answerable. And it should bee lawfull for the Kings Iudges and Officers to commence sute against them and their posteritie.

The Marchants of the coast Townes produced many great reasons to mooue him to take away this Impost: but his Maiestie did oppose others that were more important the which made him obstinate in this defence. He himselfe receiued the greatest preiudice, for his farmes were much diminished. But he desired in this point as in all other, D to do the office of a good father to his people, and rather suffer this losse for himselfe, then to see an infinit number of families to fall into ineuitable ruine, by Bankrupts which these insupportable Impositions would make.

Desire and hope of gaine, would make Marchants to flie through fire, if there were no other passage, rather then to loose any occasion of profit: yet notwithstanding many did by the meanes of Strangers trafficke into forbidden places. Neither is there any Decree which Couetousnesse, and the Trecherie of Officers wil not violate: wherefore the King did by a second defence adde corporall punishment, with confiscation of marchandize against them that should infringe it, their fauourers, counsellors, or abettors, and giuing the moitie thereof vnto the informers: enioyning the Marchants E which should haue any marchandize in the Sea-ports, and frontier-Townes, to cause them to be marked and inrolled by his Officers, to auoide the abuse and fraude which might be committed against his intention: whereunto the corporall punishment of some forced the others to obey.

Some thought that these bitter proceedings should soone alter the peace of Veruins: yet it continued and remained firme and irremouable: neither was there any breach, but some complaints which the two Kings made one of another. King Philip beganne, being offended, that the French going voluntarily to serue the Estates, prolonged their Rebellion, and delayed the reduction of Ostend: That the King did succour them with money and men, with other necessities belonging to warre, and that hee had forbidden his Subiects to trafficke into Spaine and Flanders. But it is impossible for Princes to impose such strong barres vnto their subiects, but they will passe them to get and conuey themselues into forraigne Countries, and it is sufficient satisfaction, that they disaduow such as dispence with themselues to goe and serue

A serue another without leaue, as the King did them which went to serue the Estates. That if he did assist them with money, hee did but restore that which they had lent him, and did pay by reayle the grosse which he had receiued in his necessitie. As for the defence of Trafficke, it tended to no other end, but to force the King of Spaine and the Archduke, to discharge that intollerable Imposition, & to make him know that France can better liue without the commodities of Spaine, then Spaine without those of France.

The King for his part complayned, but with Iustice and Reason: For (sayd he) I impart my desseignes to very few men, and yet they are presently discovered to my enemies. B The King of Spaine will he neuer leaue to corrupt the fidelitie of my subiects: will he alwaies intertaine some traitor within my Realme? my Ambassador complaines vnto me by his letters, that he is so ill informed of affaires, and so late, that the King of Spaines Ministers know of them before him! As his Maiestie was much troubled to know from what Spring did rise this pestilent liquor of trecherie, behold, God doth lay open the iniquitie of Judas, by meanes which humane wisdom could not foresee. Villeroy (that great French Oracle, who deliueis the answers of the affaires of the Realme, who knowes the most secret, and doth mannage the greatest) was serued by one Nicholas Lofse borne at Orleans, and with the more confidence, for that his father had spent most of his yeares in his seruice. La Rochepot going to reside Ambassador in C Spaine, Lofse desired to be entertained by him, and to serue him as a Secretarie, and to fashion himselfe to affaires. The recommendation of Villeroy gaue him an easie access, by the which in few moneths he made himselfe so capable both for the language and fashion of the countrey, as he might well be taken for a naturall Spaniard. The Ambassador hauing sworne the Treatie of Veruins in the name of the most Christian King, the King of Spaine presented him with a rich chayne of Stones, and with sixe others of gold of an hundred and fiftie crownes apiece, to honor so many of his chiefe Followers. The pride and presumption of this young man made him thinke he should be of this number, seeing that a companion of his had beene found worthy, and his master did not thinke that his youth and small experience, did so soone merit to bee placed D in the first rankes of his seruice.

As the Humors of Bodies that are altered, do insensibly peruert the health: So the diuell insinuates into the hearts of men, if they giue him any little entrance. Enuy and Icalousie were the windowes by the which he slipped into the soule of Lofse. Vanity, Lying, Pride, Luxurie, and excess of youth gaue him full entrie. He had spent all his money to purchase the loue of a Curtizan, and saw no great meanes how he should bee able to furnish this great expence of luxurie, the which notwithstanding he would not giue ouer. His Masters disdayne had made him mad, but he knew the secrets of his cabiner, and discovering them to the King of Spaines Ministers, he giues 2. strokes with one stone: he is reuenged of this contempt, and preuented the shame which followed E him, not to be able to continue his amorous bountie. With this desseigne he makes himself knowne to Don Francisco, one of the Secretaries of the State, & shewes him the consideration for the which he is resolu'd to giue certaine proofes of the seruice which he had long vowed vnto the Catholike King, the which hee could easily performe, hauing the charge of the dispatches which the French Ambassador receiued and sent vnto the King his master. Don Francisco heares this proposition, as coming from a yong man whose braine was not so well settled, as it did merit much credit; or it may bee abhorring the trecherie of this bad seruant, who held him like vnto himselfe. The Catholike King sayd he (but coldly) hath so good correspondencie with the French King, as he desireth not to know of his affaires, but so far as his Ambassador shall informe him. F Lofse yeelds not at this repulse. He knowes that mens spirits beeing diuers may produce diuers aduises, and beleues that some other will lend him his care with more attention, and his heart with more affection. Talague another Secretarie of Estate, considering how much it did import a Prince, to know his neighbors secrets: That by reason of State they must buy them with Gold that can reueale them, and must try a meanes 1603. means to effect it: That the contempt of so rare an encounter wilbe against his masters seruice, and the duty of his charge: he gaue care to the reasons of this Traiour, and tasted them: He exhorted him to persist in this good affection, which he shewed to procure the contentment and seruice of the Catholike King: hee promiseth to make the report vnto the King his master, and giues him his word that this affection of his should be rewarded with a bountifull recompence.

The Councell thinks it fit that Loſte should be heard. T. diagues makes him to speake with the Duke of Lerma, whome lately they called Marquisse of Denia. Hee shewes him the Alphabet of Cipher, by the which the Ambassadour his Master did write vnto the King. And for a prooffe hee deciphered vnto the Secretarie his Maiesties last dispatch. The Duke invites him to continue to produce the effects, whereof he had giuen his word: He causeth twelue hundred Crownes to be deliuered him as an earnest-pennie of the bargain, by the which this Traiour sold both his Master and the King, and assures him of the like yearly Pension: and of so large a remuneration as hee should haue cause to extoll the bountie of Spaine. From hencefoorth the French Ambassadour receiueh not any dispatch, but the Councell of Spaine is duly informed thereof. But Rocheport beeing called home, as wee haue sayd, it depriued this Traiour of all means to continue his Trafficke, and by consequence to merit the payment of the Conventions which hee had made and ratified. He must therefore discouer the secrets of the Councell in France, and find means to returne into his first masters seruice: C But he was kept back by a controuersie which Villeroy had with his mother, vpon some remainder of Accompts. Notwithstanding, he was farre engaged in the affections of Spaine, and had rather beare this losse out of the portion which fell vnto him by his father, then to see himselfe by his mothers disgrace excluded from all entrie into his fauour which he affected. The Ambassadour also hauing at his instant suite giuen testimonie of his fidelitie and diligence, made his returne ealie into his masters cabinet. Beeing thus restored, he becomes more subiect, more actiue, and more diligent, then all the rest: yea he offers to helpe his companions: but with a desseigne, that hauing also knowledge of the dispatches which passed through their hands, he might giue the better aduise to the Ministers of Spaine, and assure them of his deuotion to their seruice. D He did often visit and conferre with Taxis Ambassadour for Spaine; and after his Ambassage ended, with Doctor Balthazar of Suniga his successour, yea so fitly as the dispatches came sooner to the Councell of Spaine, then to Des Barreaux Ambassadour for France, who aduertised the King, that when he propounded his Maiesties commandements to the Councell, he found them as well and sooner instructed then himselfe, neither could he discouer by what practise it came. It must be of necessitie (sayd the King) that one of my Councel hath great intelligences with him of Spain, and yet I know not whom to suspect. The eternall Providence doth often draw very good effects from exceeding bad causes; as one nayle drives out another: so hee suffers that the wicked shall discouer the trecheries one of another. Loſte had had secret conference with one E Raffis, who had beene sometimes Secretarie to Lansac, and a fugitiue into Spaine, for many disloyalties which had made him become a Pensioner to Spaine. But they had begunne to shorten his pension since the treason of Fontenelles Gouvernor of Dornueneſt in Brittanie, whereof he had beene one of the chiefe instruments: and as by the discouerie of this treason, Raffis had no more means to serue the Councell of Spaine, so they held him for an vnprofitable mouth, and cutte off his pension. From that time hee receiued no other commodities but a free acceſſe and vncontroulable admittance vnto some of the chiefe of the Councell, who notwithstanding did not looke on him with so chearefull an eye, as when they drew from him instructions conformable to their intentions.

Raffis finds himselfe now reduced to that extremitie, as he is ready to fall into great pouertrie and miserie, on the other side he sees a goodly occasion offered to prevent it. and a great gate opened, not onely to returne into his countrey, but also to merit an abolition of his faults, with a notable recompence for so great a seruice which hee might

A might do vnto his naturall Prince. He therefore directeth himselfe to one in whome the Ambassadour did much relye, and tels him how much he is grieued to haue beene a dea- 1604. ler in the troubles and Rebellions of France, whereof he did confesse, that God had alwayes shewed himselfe Protector against all assaylants: That he desired to deface the memorie thereof, and to repayre them by a notable seruice, which did very much import the King, France, and all Christendome. That although he did little esteeme the hazard of his life, for so iust and holy a worke, yet would he not aduenture it, but with a generall abolition of that which made him guilty towards his Maiettie. This report made vnto the Ambassadour, hee heares Raffis, who tels him in generall termes, that the King is betrayed, that his desseignes and most secret affaires are discouered, but hee would not name the Traytour, but vnto his Maiettie himselfe. That his Pardon beeing come, hee will free himselfe both heart and bodie from those which hee hath sufficiently knowne to bee sworne Enemies to the Realme. The Ambassadour doth aduertise the King hereof by a confident man. The King giues him authoritie to treat with Raffis. He could not verifie his accusation, but by two Letters written by Loſte, to a great friend of his named Blas, a man of the same mettall, the which hee knew were in a boxe which Blas had, who lodged with him, for the getting of them they find means to send Blas vnto the Escuriell. In his absence Raffis and Descartes the Ambassadors Secretarie, breake the Boxe, and take out the Letters, by the which Loſte did C greatly extoll the bountie of the Spanish Ambassadour, as exceeding the merit of his seruices.

With this iustification, and the French Ambassadors dispatch, Raffis made shew to go vnto a Monasterie neere vnto Madrill, there to passe the Feast of Palme-Sunday, as he had beene accustomed to do at sollemne Feasts, beeing opposite to the way of France, to take away all suspicion: but hee came to Bayonne with Descartes at a certayne day. Blas returned, the Feast-day beeing passed, his Boxe beeing opened, and his Companion absent, made him thinke what it was. The King of Spaines Ministers are presently aduertised; who instantly dispatched two Curriers to the Ambassadour, to let him know that there was one gone, who without doubt would discouer the In- D telligences and practises of Loſte: That hee should haue a care of his safetie, that being not able to be auerred but by his mouth, he should be instructed (if he were taken) religiously to obserue the lawes of Silence.

Descartes and Raffis beeing come to Paris vpon Easter Twesday, they shewed a great fidelitie, but not so much discretion as a businesse of that importance did require. Villeroy went the same day to lye at his house, to bee the next day at Fontainebleau, where the Court was. And hauing met them at Iuvisi, they did accompany him vnto Villeroy, but did not aduertise him on the way of the cause of their coming, nor speak of the Trechery of his man, but in deliuering their dispatch at his arriual. Without doubt he would haue neglected all other affaires, to assure himselfe of his traitor, who E then finished his deuotion at the Charter-house Convent.

The next day he doth earely acquaint the King with the comming of Raffis, and the detestable and vnexpected Treason of an vngratefull wretch, whose father and himself had neuer had better fortune but in his house. As he returnes to his lodging, he vnderstands that two Spanish Curriers are come to the Post-house. He commands one of the Deputies of the Post to carrie them into a chamber, and that no man might speake with them: and to Descartes to watch for the comming of Loſte, and not abandon him but presently to aduertise him thereof. But both the Deputie and Descartes do commit a great error: for Loſte being come in Post about Noone, this vnadvised Deputie tells him, that there were two Posts come out of Spaine, who inquired of him, and had letters for him: and to adde more to his indiscretion, hee suffers him to go vp to their chamber, and to see them. Hauing saluted them, one of them told him in his care, that hee was vndone vnlesse he fled, and that Raffis had discouered him. Terror, amazement, his conscience (whereof he could not suffer the testimonie) and the horror of the iust punishment of his wickednes, do easily perswade this wretch to fly, whom the F

Furies of hell do violently pursue. Yet he assures his countenance as well as he could. A He goes out with an intent to take horse, & to recover some place of safetie. Descartes & Raffis find it. Descartes salutes him; who (it may be, thinking himself sufficient to give an account of his person, was not curious to aduertise Villeroy, who was then in his Cabinet with the Bishop of Chartres. The presence of Descartes was troublesome to Losse: to be ridde of him, he sayd, he would go to his master who attended him. Descartes offers to accompany him: he then pretended that he had not dined, and thinking they had done at the lodging, he would seeke it in a Tauerne. Neither haue I (sayd the other) we will dine together. Finding Descartes to follow him in this manner, hee seekes another euasion. I am wearie (sayd he) my Bootes trouble me: Descartes addes, B that he desired to drinke with him, and that he would be better after dinner. Thus discourting together, they entred into Villeroys lodging. Descartes leaues him in the chamber, being ignorant that the Curriers had spoken with him, and drawes neere vnto the Cabinet, thinking that hee had brought him into the snare. But when as hee found himselfe free, he goes downe into the Stable, where finding his horse saddled, hee flies directly to Paris. Villeroy is in the meane time aduertised that his man is come, he commands that he should enter: but they find him not, nor his horse in the Stable; neither can they coniecture which way hee is gone. Villeroy aduertiseth his Maiestie of his escape: and they send out of all sides to follow him. Losse comming to Paris about nine of the clocke at night, he went to take counsell of the Spanish Ambassadour, and before the break of day he departed disguised like a Spaniard, with the Ambassadors Steward to conduct him, taking the way to Meaux to recover Luxembourg in poste.

To encourage all men to seeke after this Traytor, it was giuen out, that one of Villeroys Secretaries had attempted against his Maiesties person. They described his stature, his age, his apparell, and his horse. The Prouosts of Marshals went to field. They had forbidden all Poste-masters to giue any horses. But hee of Meaux had giuen notice too late; hee was alreadie on horse-backe. But when hee beganne to galloppe, his horse falling, gaue his rider a heauie presage of some occurrent ill. Being re-mounted, hee seemed so amazed, as the Guide thought hee had committed some wicked act, for the which he fledde. Hee aduertised his master thereof at his returne, D who remembring the defence which had bene made, presumed that this was he which was in question. He presently went to the Prouost Marshall, who prepared to pursue him. Passing the Riuer of Marne, the Prouost learns that he could not be farre from the first Poste: and comming to the second Boate neare vnto La Ferte vnder Iouarre, he findes that he was then passing the riuer: but the force and feare which those Run-aways offered vnto the Ferri-men, preuayled more then the Prouosts commandements and threatens. Being past, they thought their Poste-horses would bee presently ouer-taken by the great horses which they imagined to be at their backs, who leauing their Guide, commit their safetie to the swiftnesse of their feet, during the darkenesse of the night, through the thicke bushes which did grow vpon the banks of Marne. E The Prouost disperfeth his Archers, makes fires in the field, and sets the countri-men to search. The Spaniard got away: Losse went creeping from bush to bush, so terrified with the apprehension of Iustice which hee could not auoyde, as hearing the Prouost & his men beating the bushes with their swords, he desired rather to free his body from the feeling of the punishment which his treason had deserued, and to abandon his soule to the iudgement of God. At the breake of day his hat being scene betwixt two postes whereas the current of the water had staid it, made them presume that the carcase was not far off. He was found there by the Abbesse of Iouarres men, who (as Lady of the Iustice of that place) required that the processe might be instructed and made by her Officers. The Prouost of Paris & he of the Kings house did also contend to haue knowledge thereof. In the end it was reuoked and retayned in the Parliament by a decree made the 10. of May: the body was drawne from the Chastelet (where they had exposed it to ignominie; according to the Custome in such actions) and carried to the prison of the Conciergiere, and the fiftenth day following, was dragged and layd vpon a hurdle

A hurdle into the Greue, and drawne in sunder with foure horses, and his quarters set vpon foure wheeles at the chiefe approches of Paris. A worthie reward of an vnworthy Trecherie, which he deserued, if the eternall Prouidence had not otherwise disposed, that he should haue bene sensible of those torments, whose desperate death was happy for those which could not hope for any health, if any other more pittifull end had giuen him meanes to discover their practises.

This was very displeasing vnto the King, for that this wretch had smothered with his life, that which might haue giuen him light in many things importing his seruice; but exceeding grieuous vnto Villeroy, for that the full knowledge of the Traytors B seignes, and of the wickednesse of his Confederates was forbidden: moreover, that hauing bred him vp, and bound him by the effects of his fauour and loue, he was so sensible of the ingratitude and trecherie of this monster; as hee could neither eate nor sleepe. Besides, as the greatest dignities are most subiect to enuie and slander, hee did foresee that his enemies would take occasion to taxe his loyaltie, to blemish his reputation, and if they could, to ruine his fortune. Yet he had this great consolation, that although he held the estate of this Realme as it were in his hand, the King knowes that he doth not breath any thing, but what is of his seruice. His Maiestie visiting him to confirme him in this consolation, would haue the world know, that he hath alwayes carryed the marke of a good seruant; and the integritie of his conscience did serue him as C an inexpugnable rampar against all his ill-willers.

Soone after the King discovered a new practise against his seruice and the Daulphins. The winds are inuisible, but they that blow them to gather these cloudes together were well knowne, and from what coast they came. They were but sparkes of fire, as soone quenched as kindled. The King did write vnto some of his chiefe and principal seruants in these termes: You must take it for a good signe, that you heare so seldome cc from me by letter, for it is a signe that all is well, God be thanked, as wel for my person, cc as for my affaires. The Spaniards would willingly haue more matter and oftener, for cc they cannot desist from their ordinary practises to corrupt my seruants. I haue of late cc discovered some new desseign, in the which my Nephew the Count of Auvergne and cc D the Seigneur of Entragues are named, the which they haue willingly adoued and cc confessed. But I haue taken so good an order as no inconuenience shall happen. cc

The ninth of Iune, the Pope created eightene Cardinals, not according to the passion of great Princes that had intreated him, nor to the liking of his kins-men, knowing that his Predecessours had conferred those dignities vpon vnworthy persons, set E Scarlet hats vpon heads without vnderstanding, and giuen Pasquin occasion to complaine, that some approached neere vnto Saint Peters chaire that were more stones, and had lesse braynes then he had: The King had recommended many great Prelates of France to bee remembered at the first promotion, to supply their places that were dead. Among them that were newly created, there were two French & two Spaniards.

The Spanish Ambassadour made great instance to haue more, and not to haue his Master equalled by the French King. The first in the list was Seraphin Olinari Patriarke of Alexandria, by race an Italian, but born at Lions, one of the most iudicious Prelats of his age: onely vertue advanced him to this dignity, and the K. made great instance for him by Bethunes his Ambassadour. James Dawy Bishop of Eureux receiued the like Honor by the Kings recommendations. His seruices in reconciling the King with the Pope, his learned Writings and his knowledge in Diuinitie, did worthily purchase him this honour. The rest were all Italians except Bernard Mauziatouschi bishop of Cracouia a Polonian. Cardinal Alobrandin did also aduance Herminio his Secretary to this honour, of whome there is so much spoken in the discourse of the Warres of Sauoy. F Anselme Marzat a Capuchin of Monopoli was forcibly drawne into the number by the Popes expresse commandement, hauing once refused this dignitie, and protesting with teares of the iniurie that was done vnto Saint Francis and the strict rules of his Order. Of all the eightene that were made Cardinals, there was not any but this Capuchin but did affect it, and many others that did expect it were disappointed. There was some feare least the controuersie betwixt the Count of Fuentes and the Grisons A should draw a ciuill Warre into Italy, vnder the pretext of Religion. The reason of this trouble grew, for that he would force the Grisons to breake the allyance they had made the last yeare with the Venetians, and to make that which they had with France fruitlesse. The King aduertised of these practises, commanded De Vic his Ambassador to go vnto Coire, and to represent vnto that people the wrong they should do vnto their reputations in forsaking their faith and obseruation of their Treaties. Out of the discourse which De Vic did vnto them, to perswade them to the keeping of their word, these poynts were collected of the inuioable firmenesse of their word and oath. There must be many acts of vertue to purchase and maintaine a great and good repu- B tation, one onely action to the contrarie doth ouerthrow it, and smoothers the remembrance thereof. It is gotten by many commendable and vertuous actions, but that which proceedes from constancie and generositie in the obseruation of promises, is so much the more commendable, for that it is grounded vpon Faith and Religion which bee the two pillars that do assure and maintaine Estates.

The Ancients haue sayd that Faith was the foundation of Iustice, the honour of hea- uen and earth, without the which the world could not continue in peace, and they e- rected her Altar neere vnto that of thundring Iupiter, to shew that God is the reu- enger of the breach of Faith. And Religion is so proper to Man, and to the society of Men, that as Man cannot be Man without it, so there is no Nation how barbarous foe- C ner, that liues without some shadow of Religion. As they haue the best part of essence and the sollemnitie of Allyances and confederations, in the which God is called on as a witnesse and Iudge of their intentions that do promise and bind themselves; so is hee greatly wronged in the breach of promises. And therefore the commendations that are giuen to many Nations are held vaine and ridiculous beeing separated from this constant and immutable affection of keeping their faith. As the Greekes haue beene commended for many actions of Valour and Vertue, the which notwithstanding van- ish away shamefully, in the reproch which hath beene made vnto them, to deny their words easily, and neuer to bind themselves, but with an intent to hold. And contrariwise, the memorie of the Faith and constancie of the Romaines is immortall, D who abhorred the breach of promises, and held it an inexpressible crime to violate Tre- ties. It is not armes alone, but the constancy of Religion and their faith giuen, that had raised them to so great a power, as they held in their hands the Reynes of all the Pro- uinces of the habitable Earth. In the beginning, the neighbor-people did not esteeme them as a city, but rather a campe of Theeues, a nest of Tyrannie, and a cittadell in the midst of them, to trouble and practise all the furies of their ambition. But when as they understood that Faith onely and a simple oath (all feare of punishment layde aside) did gouerne the cittie, they grew to such Reuerence and Respect, as they held it a greater happinesse, to obey a people so generous in their actions, so constant in their words, and so religious in their oathes, then to command ouer others. The formes of E the Common-weale of the Grisons haue great conformities with the politicke and militarie Lawes of the Romaines: and as it yeelds nothing vnto them in Valour and Generositie, so hath it alwayes preferred (like vnto them) the Religion of their word and promise, holding publicke Faith the Foundation and Ground-worke of Estates, as Trecherie is the Plague and Ruine thereof. This sufficeth to shew how odious the perswasions or rather practises and Inchantments of those should bee, that coun- sell them to reuoke the Allyance, made and sborne with the Common-weale of Venice.

Wee must cherish and respect the counsels and remedies of such as loue the sicke Patient, but wee must suspect all things that come from the hand of a Neighbour that F is an enemy, they minister nothing, how sweete soeuer, which causeth not great mo- tions and alterations in the bodie. His Hony is worse then that of Cholchos, which did not infect the heart, nor trouble the vnderstanding but for a day. In the distinction and choice of aduice, wee must preferre those that preferre Honour and augment

Archie, before those that dissolue the concord and quiet of an Estate. Those (sayd a great Orator to the Athenians) are to be credited that counsell to entertaine Allyances with friends: for there is nothing more besitting a free City, then the care and loue of Equi- tie and Iustice. Those that by their policies and roughnesse, would separate the Grisons from the allyance of their friends, haue happely some desseignes vpon their libertie, the which they cannot execute better then by cutting off the number of their friends, the which can neuer be too great, how great and mighty soeuer they be: And if they haue not this desseigne, yet their counsell is alwaies vniust; seeing the effect concernes the shame and ignominie of this Nation, which cannot go from the truth of their pro- mises, vnlesse they wilbe generally taxed for trecherie and basenesse. A reproch so much the more to be feared; beeing certaine that as soone as a Common-weale hath B giuen any subiect to doubt of her Faith, she must inuent new formes of Religion to purchase credit with other Estates; and vnknowne people, to trust vnto their promi- ses: for such as know the deceiuers will auoyd the deceit. And although among the corruptions of our age sayning and dissembling be esteemed vertues, and haue in the opinion of the vulgar, notable qualities and operations, yet among those that haue contayned themselves within the bounds of ancient Integritye; and know not the pol- licies and deceits of the new-come, the people that are defamed for trecherie and dis- loyalty loose all their friends.

C And in the end this allyance hath bene sborne by the most sollemne acts of Religi- on. The name of the liuing God (who should not be taken in vaine, and is polluted by the lightnesse of an oath) hath bene called vpon. It is an extreame impietie, to make that Soueraigne spirit, that Infinit, Immutable; and Incomprehensible Essence, who is all Iustice and all Truth; a witnesse of our basenesse and lying, that the Holinesse of his name should couer our dissembling; his Iustice, our wrong; his Truth, our deceit, and approoue that which naturall Reason cannot allow of. And this bond of faith gi- uen, is of such necessitie, as it must be kept euen with enemies, whereof that great cap- taine Iesus hath left a memorable example, refusing to breake the Treatie which he had made with the Gabionites, Pagan Infidels: although he had discovered their Deceite, D and was intreated by the chiefe of the army to loose their allyance. The answer he gaue them, was grounded vpon Reason, saying: That they had giuen them their faith, and that they must feare least the furie of God (by whose name they had sborne) should come vpon them.

There was great difficultie to retayne these people inclining to change, vpon the huge and copious promises made them by the Count of Fuentes. They could not re- solue in their Councels. The weight and burthen of will and hope carried them away. He would reduce them to extreame necessitie, taking from them the Commerce of Milan, without the which they could not liue. The Grisons estate is meere popular, consisting of fixe and twenty Communalities, the which are diuided into three E Cantons. It is a difficultie to find any thing equall, constant, or well-aduised among so many Heads bredde vp in the Maximies of a Democratic. The Count of Fuentes had debauched foure; who had like to haue corrupted and polluted the rest, as a little Leuaine marres a great lump of Dowe. For they stucke onely vpon money, which the one demanded and the other offered. Hee gaue so good intertainment to the Am- bassadors that came to him to Milan, as they passed as many Articles as he pleased, ap- plying themselves to his humour of Peace, which beeing dishonorable, is of worse condition for Free-men then Warre it self. But when at their returne they would haue drawne the people to allow thereof, the Ambassadour of France arrived so happily, as hee let them vnderstand the preiudice and wrong that they did vnto themselves. So F as the best-aduised beeing informed of this surprize, resolved not to stray from the obseruation of the Allyances of France and Venice, nor to depend for their passages, vpon the aduice and command of the Count of Fuentes nor of his successors, as hee had bound them by his Articles, presuming that he could defend with the sword, that which he had gotten with Gold. True it is, that they made offer to enter into a new Capitulation of all that might bee without prejudice to their Alliances, to assure a good Neighbor-hood with the State of Milan, so as the Count of Fuentes would demolish the Fort within fixe moneths vpon their Frontier. The great Cantons of the Suisses were actors in this businesse, perswading the Grisons to trust rather to courage then to the safetie of their mountaines. Matters continued in great suspense. They sent often to Milan, and what was concluded there was dissolued in the Assembly of the people, by the friends of this Crowne, and by the wisdom of the Kings Ambassador, who sayd plainly that his Maiestie would leaue their Alliance, if they made not a Declaration that might content him. Those iudgements that were found and not preiudicate, found it reasonable, and in this reason the honor of their faith and the reputation of their estate, as contrariwise they thought it could not be an act of glorie to sell their alliance, as it was not commendable for the Spaniards to buy it, if they were of the Romaines humor, who neuer sought that by gold, which they might do by the sword. But against these apparent reasons, the Count of Fuentes had so many trickes and deuises, as the Ambassador of France had much ado to retaine this people, who promised in words not to forsake the allyance of France and Venice, doing the contrarie in effect. In former times it was incredible that the Suisse, so great an enemy to the House of Austria, from whose subiection they had reuolted, and the Grison so contrarie to the Spanish fashions, would incline that way, and contradi& the very feeling of Reason and Nature. The Truth hath freed the doubt, and let vs see that it is of this people as of vineger, the which neuer freezeth for that it is extreemly cold. The Suisses and Grisons (for that they are enemies to the Spaniards) will not haue the power of Spaine to be their enemy.

An allyance purchased dishonestly.

The bad successe of this businesse did not concerne France and the Venetians alone, the best-aduised did fore-see that it might draw a ciuill Warre into Italy, vnder the pretext of Religion. Many Commanders and Captaines Grisons, not able to endure the rigour and threatens of the Count Fuentes, were solicited by them of their Beleeve and Religion (lurking in Italy) to hold good, and to attend vntill the Lord came from Edom to disperse their enemies, and to beleeue that as there is no warre more glorious then that which is vnderaken to free their Countrey from seruitude, so there is none more iust then that which is made to deliuer Consciencs from Tyranny, and that both in the one and the other occasion, it is a great happinesse and delectation to sacrifice their liues. The King sent aduice thereof to Rome for the consequence and danger of Religion. He did also pacifie the diuision of the people of Valais, who were in Armes, and ready to come to a generall combat for the same quarrell. In the meane time the Grisons remayned betwixt the doubtfulnesse of Warre, and the discomforts of Peace, and as in the breeding of such Diuisions, free and curious spirits cannot retayne their passions, they made Pasquins in Italy vpon this subiect, and the Spanish braueries were not mute, the which the Grisons answered with the like humour. If the Venetians who were the cause of all the mischiefe, would haue spoken and set their hand to the worke as they ought, the Count of Fuentes (who did more by example then by any authoritie) would haue intreated the Grisons more mildly. But besides, that Common-weales are not good for an offensive Warre, these Seigneuries who would not hazard any thing, but preferre present and assured things before that which was past and perillous, would haue bene content to haue enioyed that which they desired without any trouble.

There was a generall assembly held at Illant, at one of the corners of the Grisons, where after great diuersitie of opinions, it was concluded by the greater part, that (seeing the Ambassadors had through their auarice defamed their Legation, and suffered the Count of Fuentes to bind the libertie of their aduice with chaynes of Gold, and had exceeded the instructions that were giuen them) the last Treatie made at Milan, should bee declared voyd, and of none effect, if the alliance of France and that of Venice were not expressely referued. The Nobles of Spaine had wrought wonders, giuing motion to the most heauy, and speech vnto the dembe, to fauor the Count of Fuentes intentions,

A intentions, with a Nation that loues money beyond all measure. But in the end the consideration of their owne health, and the ruines of their liberty were of more force, making them to chooe the hazard of armes, and of all discomforts, rather then to suffer the fort which the Count of Fuentes had caused to bee built, to stand vnruiued. And for that (incensed with this resolution) hee had made shew to seize vpon Valteline. they made a leauy of eghteene hundred men in six companies to oppole against him. The Kings intention was, that the Treaty of Milan should not alter the alliances of the crowne of France, and Venice. But if the Grisons should breake with the French, and dishonor their reputation with so foule a defection, the French had no great reason to regard it, seeing it were a losse but of inconstant friends, whose faith was ruined by the same meanes it was preserued. True it is they should loose a goodly passage into Italy, but when they had any desire to goe thither, it should not bee by the Grisons. The French armies were neuer led that way to passe the Alpes. It is true that when the Kings of France held Milan, this passage was necessary for them to draw in Suisses and Germaines, for their seruice. But enioying this no more, they need not to care much to loose that which cost them so deere to maintaine. This was the beginning of the thirteenth yeere of Pope Clement the eight sitting in the pontificall chaire. In his youth a Mathematician told him, that hee should bee a Cardinall then Pope, and should sit in the seat twelue yeeres. A friar had told Leo the tenth as much (hauing saued himselfe in Mantoua after the battaile of Rauenna) assuring him that hee should be Pope, before he came to the age of forty yeeres. A terme which made this prediction seeme ridiculous and impossible, and yet it was true, for after the death of Iulio the second the yong Cardinalls being banded against the old, choose him Pope. The Astrologian, hath spoken very truly in the two first aduentures of this Pope, but hee hath misteckned himselfe in the third, yet some feare it is but one yeere, for this which wee shall shortly beginne is full of bad constellations vpon that sea, as they hold that haue studied the booke of the Abbot Isachim. About that time there was a Iesuite that maintained an opinion that was held very bold throughout all the Catholike Church, but most dangerous at Rome. That it was no point of the essence of faith to beleeue D that Clement the eight was the true and lawfull successor of Saint Peter. Hee was committed to prison, and if the Ambassador of Spaine had not delt in it, he had spied worse, and tried that the body hath often reason to complaine of the paine which the spirit causeth. An other Iesuite propounded a proposition which was held very strang for the nouelty and the consequence thereof. Which was. That confession might bee done by Letters and by Postes. These with some other questions were decided before the Pope and the Cardinalls in the following yeere.

Predictions of

questions.

There fell out halfe a sedition in Rome by the meanes of Cardinall Farnese. One beeing pursued by the Officers to bee carried to prison, fled into the Cardinals Pallace as into a Sanctuary, where he found a backe doore to escape. This flight was fauored by the incounter of some of the Cardinalls Gentlemen, who walking in the court and seeing the Sargents make a noise at his escape whom they thought to apprehend, they gaue them bad words with some threatens, for the small respect they had borne vnto their Maisters house. The Pope was aduertised thereof, and the Gouvernour of Rome went thether with his Officers. The Cardinall Farnese beleeued that all the consistory was offended at this affront, the which troubled all Rome. They had giuen the Pope to vnderstand that this did concerne the authority of his Iustice, without the which the city could not continue happy. They had laied open this boldnesse vnto him by many considerations of his owne priuate interest. They sayd that this did but increase the discomforts which many had conceiued against the house of Aldobrandin. The tumult grew so great, as one sword drawne had put all the city in armes. The Ambassadour of Spaine came to the Cardinalls Pallace with all his friends, and there spent the whole night, looking on the Romaine Gentlemen that plaid in the Hall: and asking who had wonne or lost, they told him that the Duke Gaetan had lost six hundred crownes: Seigneur Duke (sayd hee in Spanish) assure your selfe that you loose nothing this this night for the notable seruice you do vnto the King. He was often heard to say these words, the which were fuller of vanitie, then of necessitie or reason, aqui quiero morir, as if the Pope, who had no forces, would come to besiege him.

The next day the Cardinal Farnese retired himselfe to a house of his called Caprarola five and twentie miles from Rome, whither he was accompanied with the principall men in Rome. The Pope sent the Governor vnto him to receiue his gouernment from him, as if he had lost it for that he had entred into his Palace with his Sargents. He quenched the heat of those sferie Spirits with his teares, and complained that they did not loue him as he did loue, and that therein the intention of true friendship was deceived. But he commanded his Montio in Spaine to complaine of the King of Spains Ambassador, who had openly discovered his passion against him. In the end, the Duke of Parma brought backe the Cardinall to Rome, and all was pacified. As he came from Monte-cauallo where the Pope was, he was well accompanied and followed into the court of his Palace, with cries of ioy. Viva la Casa Farnese. These were the peoples violent passions, not so much for any loue of him, as in hatred of the Cardinall Aldobrandin. But none of them trusted to this reconciliation. The Cardinall, the Duke Gaston, and many others of the greatest of the citie went out of Rome. The Pope caused six hundred Corles to come, and two hundred Harguebuziers on Horse-backe for the guard of Saint Peters Bourg, and if he had had the Spirit of Sixtus the fift, or of Popes that were Predecessors to Paul the third, this small beginning had bene the cause of great accidents.

The Iesuits restored.

The King having promised to restore the Iesuits, Father Cotton came to Paris by his Maiesties command, with father Armand the Prouinciall, and father Alexander. They not onely found all things easie, but beyond their conceiued hopes: for the King grew presently into such a liking with Father Cotton, as he did nothing but he was called, and in the end his Maiestie granted their returne vpon certaine conditions, and the Edict made for their establishment, (notwithstanding any oppositions made vnto the Court to hinder the confirmation thereof) was confirmed in the beginning of this yeare, and their colledges restored at Lions, Rouan, Bourges, and Dijon. The Seigneur of Varenne (controllor generall of the Posts, and now Gouvernour of the Towne and castle of Angers, who loued them of this company) besought the King to build a new colledge at La Fleche in Aniou, with priuiledges like to the other Vniuersities of this Realme, the which the King made of a royall foundation, and gaue them his owne house, with pensions, for the instruction of a good number of young gentlemen, whom his Maiestie would haue bred vp, and instructed there in all Professions, Tongues, and Exercises.

Iesuits at La
Fleche,

The Edict was: That they might lawfully reside in the places where now they are established within the Realme; that is, in the Townes of Tholosse, Auch, Agen, Rhodes, Bourdeaux, Perigord, Limoge, Tournon, Puy, Aubenas, and Beziers. And moreover, to settle themselves in the Townes of Lyon, Dijon, and especially in his Towne of La Fleche in Aniou, there to keep their residences vpon the conditions which follow.

That they shall not erect any colledges nor residences in any Towne or places of this Realme, countries, Territories, and Seigniories of his Maiesties obedience, without his expresse permission, vpon paine to loose all that is contained in this present grace.

That all they of the said Societie, beeing in this Realme, together with their Rectors and Prouincials, shall be naturall Frenchmen, and that no stranger shall be admitted into their colledges and residences, without his Maiesties permission: and if there be any at this present, they shall be bound to retire themselves into their countries within three moneths after the publication of these presents. The inhabitants of the Towne and countie of Auignon beeing not comprehended vnder this word of Strangers.

That they of the said Societie, shall haue neere vnto his Maiestie one of their company, which shall bee a Frenchman, with sufficient authoritie to serue him for a preacher, and to answer for the actions of their companies vpon all necessarie occasions.

That

A That all Iesuites within the Realme and others which shall be receiued into the sayd society, shall take an oth before the Officers of those places, not to doe nor attempt any thing, against his Maiesties seruice, the publike peace and quiet of the Realme, without any exception or reservation whereof the sayd Officers should be bound to send the sayd acts vnto the Chancellor. And if any of them present or to come should refuse to take the sayd oth, they should be forced to depart the Realme.

That hereafter all they of the sayd society aswell such as haue made the simple vow, as others, may not get any immouable goods, either by purchase, donation, or otherwise without his Maiesties permission. They may not also receiue any succession bee it direct or colaterall, no more then other Religious men. And in case hereafter any shall be dismissed from the sayd companie, they may returne into their rights as before.

They shall not take nor receiue any immouable goods from them which shall enter into their society, but it shall bee referred for their heires, or for such to whom they haue disposed them before they entred.

They shall also bee subiect in all things to the lawes of the Realme, and shall be tried before his Maiesties officers, like vnto other Clergie and Religious men.

C The sayd company shall not attempt nor doe any thing, neither in spirituall, nor in Temporall things, to the preiudice of Bishops, Chapters, Curates, and Vniuersities of the Realme, nor of other Religious men: but shall conforme themselves to the common Lawes.

In like manner they shall not preach, administer the Sacraments, neither confesse any but those of their owne society, if it bee not by the permission of the Bishops within the iurisdiction of the Parliament where they are established; That is of Tholose, Bourdeaux and Dijon.

D The which permission shall not extend to the Parliament of Paris, except the townes of Lyon, and La Fleche. Where they are suffered to reside, and exercise their ordinary function as in other places which haue bene granted them. And to the end that they of the sayd society, which are now restored, may haue meanes to liue in their Colledges and Residences; his Maiestie suffereth them to enioy their rents and foundations present and past, with a full discharge of all seizures which haue bene made.

E The Iesuites beeing thus restored, many others demanded leaue of the King to receiue them and to giue them Colledges; as Rouen, Bourges and Amiens. The Vniuersities of Orleans and Poictiers could not like of them, notwithstanding they sought much to bee receiued their, they returned in the end by the Kings fauour and clemency, into their couent of Saint Louis neere vnto Saint Paul at Paris, and had restitution of all their goods, and of their Colledge of Clermont in Saint Laques streete, to enioy their reuenues without instruction. Then the goodlie spirits of their order begonne to steepe into the pulpit, and were heard with great applause in diuers Churches.

F During these great Royall fauours, father Cotton tasted of some priuate disgrace, for returning one night somewhat late (about the end of February) and passing by the street of the new bridge, to goe vnto the Louvre, there were certaine Pages and Laquais, which calling for him at the dore of the Carosse, wounded him with their rapiers, hauing one great wound in the shoulder going towards the necke and the throat, whereof notwithstanding hee was soone after cured: There was great search made for this attempt; but the King himselfe discovered presently whence it might proceed. The Pages and Laquais of court had bene whipt by commandement for their insolency, in crying with diuision, Old well, old Cotton (vpon the complaint of certaine Princes and Noblemen.) Those that say this blow was premediated by the enemies of the Iesuites, were deceived, and his Maiesties onely opinion (who iudged that it came from the Pages and Laquais) was true. Some were taken and examined, the King himselfe heard the examination; first they excused themselves of the fact, then they sayd that they meant onely to strike the coach man, to whom they had cried to goe farther off, and and that hee would hurt them, comming so neere the wall, the which hee would not A doe, and that thinking to strike the Coachman, they had hurt father Cotton. If father Cotton had not bene an earnest suter vnto the King to pardon them, it had gone ill with them, but notwithstanding they were banished the Court, and forbidden euer to come there vpon paine of death.

A chanel from the riuier of Seine to Loyre.

This yeere the King besides in his goodly buildings, which shall make his memory commendable to posterity, would also shew vnto future ages, that he had a care of the good of his subiects, who for the commodity of their comerce and trafficke, caused a chanell to be made, by the which all merchandise should bee carried from the riuier of Loyre into the riuier of Seine. At the same time when as hee began his channell from B Seine to Loyre, which will cost a hundred and fourescore thousand crownes in three yeeres. They propounded vnto his Maiesty, an enterprize of greater difficulty, to ioyn the two Seas together, and to make the navigation from the one to the other through France, and not to passe by the straight of Gibraltar. By the meanes of a channell more easie to be made betwixt the two riuers, which passe the one from Tolouse into the Ocean, & the other from Narbone into the Mediterranean sea, then that which is made to ioyn the riuers of Seine and Loyre together. The vndertaker offered Caution to ioyne the navigation of the sayd two seas by this chanel, within one yeere for 40000.
crownes only, the which should carry a vessell of foure fadome breadth from one sea vnto the other, for a certaine prooffe of his desaigne. VVhich was to make ships to passe C afterwards, within a small time, and for little more charge.

New inuentions of workes brought into France.
Making of Cipers.

There were many new inuentions for workes deuised and brought into France this yeere by strangers, as weauing of gold after the manner of Milan, and the making of cloth and lines of the barke of white Mulbery trees, more easly then of nettles or any other trees, and more strong and of longer continuance then any other, the which was inuented by Monsieur Serres in Prouence. The making of all sorts of Cipres both curld and smoth, and of all other sorts, which were not made before but in Italy, is now established in the castle of Mantes. Hangings of guilt leather, of all sorts and collours that may be wished, fairer then Imbroidery, better cheape, & of greater continuance, for the easinesse and inuention to make them cleane, and to amend, they D are in great shops in Saint Honores, and Saint Iames suburbs, to set poore people on worke. There were cutting-milles inuented, and set vpon the riuier of Estampes, where they cut iron into many peeces, and into what forme they will, the which was not done before but by the smithes. The turning of iron (whereof France abound) into fine Steele, the which they were forced to seeke in Piedmont, in Germany, and in other strange countries, for fise or sixe soulz the pound, hauing neuer found any thing in France but iron, the which for the excellency they call course Steele of Brieor or Saint Desfer, the which is sold for two or three soulz the pound, at the most. The fournaises are to bee seene in Saint Victors suburbs: vpon the mouth of the riuier of Bieure, the which deserves to bee admired for the excellency thereof, the making E of white Leade, the which is a kind of drogue or quintessence, drawne out of Leade, very necessary and common for Painters, Farriers, and many other vses, the which they were forced to seeke and buy deerly out of France, is new made there, better and better cheape.

Pipes of Lead without folder

The like inuention there is of pipes of Leade, as long and as bigge as you will, beaten, & as light as iron for Cuirasses, stronger and more lasting then the ordinary pipes of Leade, and better cheape, and which make the waters that passe through them more holsome for the bodie of man, by reason of the ingredients of the folding which corrupts the water that passeth by them. Besides the folder doth still leaue some little tongues or drops perced, the which staies the slime of the water, and makes the pipe to bend, with many other secrets and commodities that depend thereon, inuented by F Ferrier, dwelling in the suburbs of Saint Germane. Some parts of France as well as of Sicillia were this yeere much afflicted for want of come. The Dukes of Guise and Vantadour besought the King that hee would bee pleased to suffer Prouence and Languedoc

Scarcity of

A Languedoc to bee supplied by the other Prouinces of his Realme, where there was abundance. The King hauing giuen liberty, there passed great store by the city of Lions, who fearing to fall into the like want, besought the King to reuoake his grant of the passage. The Kings answere seemed to proceed from the heart, not of a Prince onely, but of a father, who desires to prouide equally for all the necessities of his family, and hath a care that nothing be wanting. The principall reasons were, that there is nothing more necessary for the well ordering of an estate, then to entertaine communication betwixt Prouinces to succour one another, and to haue the trafficke as free and as easie as may bee: Nature hauing so framed them, as they haue need one of B another, for if the one restraines of the one side, the other may doe the like on the other side, so as if one Prouince anioies another, it may also receiue the like anoyance from the n: as if they stop the passage of corne at Lions, they of Languedoc and Prouince, may keepe from them; oyles and spice, and many other necessary commodities.
That the city of Lions hath no interest in this passage, being lawfull for them, to make what prouisions of corne they please, in Bourgongne, and other places. That he must also haue care of other Prouinces which haue need of releefe, whom they might easily perswade that this liberty of passage, depended vpon the fauour and good will of them of Lions, and not vpon his commandement.

There wanted nothing in France, but permission to trafficke in the King of Spaines C and the Archdukes dominions. The sea townes endured great discommodities, and in the end, if this prohibition had continued, they would haue sayd of the greatest, as was sayd of Megalopolis a great city in circuit of walls, and little in number of Inhabitants. Magna Ciuitas, magna solitudo. A great city, a great wilderness. The Spaniards found this Inhibition much more greuous and insupportable: there was nothing to bee heard amongst them but publike complaints, for that all things grew extreame deare, and the Artisans desperate. This greuance depending vpon the execution of the Treaty of Veruins, the Pope commanded his Nuncio to deale in it. The King would not yeeld to any thing, before that the Spaniards who had troubled the water, did make it cleere againe in reuoking the Imposition of thirty on the hundred.
D Therein hee forced his nature, for beeing so good, as hee desired onely the good of his people, and feeles in his soule that content wherewith God himselfe cannot be satisfied, he could not heare speake of this commerce, if the King of Spaine did not discharge that Impost of thirty for the hundred, which made the liberty of trafficke an extreame feruitude, and the profit an assured losse. This was most fetere and rigorous. There is not any but is bitter to the Marchants, couetousnesse hauing changed the first cause as well as the quantity of Impositions and Customes. In former times they were not payed, but for the safety and liberty of the passage from one place to another, and for that Princes haue publike waies in their protection, which for that reason are called The Kings high-waies, they haue acknowledged this right of protection with some E consideration.

In like sort when the Nauigation was vndertaken to the Indies, into Arabia and Ethiopia, the Emperour for the purging of the sea Pirats and Routers, imposed the Gabell or Custome of the red sea, for the entertayning of ships of warre against the attempts of Pirats, with the money that should bee raysted thereby. Such Impositions for so necessary occasions cannot bee but iust. Others are not so, and yet they must beare them, beeing no more lawfull for the subiect to murmure against the customes, and Imposts, wherewith his Prince doth charge him, then against the hayle, raine, stormes and tempests of Heauen. Obedient children kisse the rod wherewith and firmenes of their Lawes, and not to be taxed of lightnesse, applying themselves to A the time and occasion. But they must endure it, and the Deputies of the two Kings, and of the Archduke beeing resolu'd vpon that point, there was no difficulty but that the commerce was restored to the first liberty. The Constable of Castille returning into Spaine, came to the King at Fontainbleau. The King sent to receiue him at the entrie of Paris by the Duke of Montbasson, who was well accompanied, and the next day at the entrie of the forest of Fontainbleau, hee found fifteene Carosses full of Gentlemen of the Court, who left them to offer them to him and to his traine, and so mounted vpon their horses which did attend them. It cannot bee spoken how Royally the King receiued him.

Amongst many testimonies of honour and affection, this was not ordinary. Zamet B inuited him to supper, beeing ready to wash, the King accompanied onely with Belle-garde and Roguelare enters, saying that hee would sup with them. The Constable offered him his napkin, and would haue kneeled, the which the King would not suffer, saying vnto him that it was not for him to yeeld honours but to receiue them, for hee was of that house, beeing allied to the house of Velasques, to whom the dignity of the Constable of Castille and Leon is hereditary, and is an honor in a manner equall with a Soueraigne; the Emperor Valentinean finding no other place wherewith to honour and aduance his brother Valeme.

The commerce which had beene forbidden for some monethes, beeing restored, C there was nothing contain'd in the Treaty of Veruins but was duely executed, but that which concerned the priuate interest of the Earle of Saint Paul. As for the General, all went so well, as it might bee sayd the two Kings had neuer had better correspondence, and that their wills (although contrary) had beene like vnto wine and water which cannot bee seperated. As for the affaires of the Realme, the King found so great respect and obedience in all places, as if there remains any passion in the hearts of his Predecessors, they must be greued that they were neuer so well obeyed. The Marquis of Rhosny, going to take possession of his gouernment of Poitou, was at Rochelle, where hee was receiued with all sorts of Honours, causing his Maiesties intentions to be entertayned and executed with so great affection as as it did amaze them that knew D that since King Francis the first this towne had not beene so obedient as the rest. There are secret murmurings, discontents and distrusts; but they are cloudes without water. These are corrupt vlcers which draw vnto them bad humors, but the disposition of the body is no whit altered nor changed: In shew all goes well, and we haue nothing else to care for, for men are commonly satisfied with that which seemes, as well as with that which is. It sufficeth that a Prince be well obeyed, be it either for feare or for loue. France beeing neuer so miserable as when shee had Kings that cared not to bee well obeyed.

And what wants a Prince, that is at peace within his Realme, admired of Strangers and redoubted of his enemies, who hath so great designs in hand, for the increase and beautifying of this Estate, as his Predecessors durst neuer thinke of them? E One Arcenall alone can furnish him a hundred canons, with poulder and munition for a hundred thousand shot, armes for ten thousand horse-men, and fifty thousand foote, and Treasor ready to pay a greater number. This Prince who knew what it was to make warre without money, will neuer vndertake it without a iust cause, not beeing in want. Warre which is attempted without cause is seldome happy and successefull, and although they be iustificable yet is there alwaies some scruple. Hee spent the best part of the yeere at Fontainbleau, and found his abode there so pleasing and the season so faire, as hee sent for the Daulphin. It was the first voyage to the place of his birth, and the second by Paris. Hee made shew that hee did participate of the Fathers good disposition, for he neither feared nor felt sonne nor Serein, although it bee much felt in that place. Thus the yeere past, when as France could not furnish where- withall to make a perfect Narration. Wee may now say as it was heretofore sayd of the Gauls that they were more giuen to tillage and to the Gouernment of their families,

A of their families, then vnto Warre and Armes. The most factious thinke of nothing now but of planting of their Orchards. The Grisons doe still pursue the demolition of the fort. They talke of a truce in Hungarie, and of a Treaty of Peace in the Lowe Countries. This will be matter to write on the next yeare following.

But we may not forget the enteruewe of the Duke of Sauoy with the Duke of Mantoua. It ministred matter of discou'se, and made the Princes of Italie some-what lea- Enteruewe of lous: to see two Princes send Ambassadors which had continued so long in badde the Dukes of termes, and two Princes that were Neighbours, which had this aduantage to haue Sauoy and made war in person, was not without scruple. And although in shew they talked only Mantoua, of Peace, yet are they not the first, that haue had Peace in their mouthes and War in their hearts. Machiauel sayth that a Prince of his time, neuer talked but of Peace and Faith, and if he had kept either of them he had lost his estate and his reputation.

These two Princes haue Lands lying of either side of the Riuer of Po. The Duke of Sauoy was discontented that the Duke of Mantouas people had vsurped something vpon his subiects. This was a great dispute of their confines, the which notwithstanding was soone reconciled, the Accord is neuer difficult betwixt persons neere allied. The Duke of Mantoua came to Montferrat, which gaue the occasion of this enteruewe, whereof the cause is vnknowne, if it be not for the marriage of his Sonne to the Dukes second Daughter. They met in the open field on Sunday the 12. of December. The Duke of Sauoy was in Carosse, and the Duke of Mantoua and his Son on horse-backe. They lighted to entertaine and salute one an other. The Noblemen and Gentlemen which followed them made a great ring, in the which these two Princes did walke and talked together two or three houres. The Duke of Sauoy feasted him at dinner the Tewf-day following, in a little house vpon the fronter of the Marquisate of Salusses. They continued together vntill night, when parting the Duke of Sauoy gaue vnto the Duke of Mantoua foure goodly Horses with very rich furniture. To conclude this yeares worke there was new matter presently, but it is alwaies bad, when as the princes Clemency is forced to yeeld vnto his Iustice, when as France doth bring forth Spirits so easie to corrupt, as intelligences with the Enemies of this Crown are not held for crimes, & their honor as vaine smoak, the which notwithstanding should be so carefully preferred, that rather then to see it blemished or charged with any reproch, they should desire & offer themselves to death. The King offered with the practises of the Count of Auvergne, commanded him to come vnto him, & to trust vnto his Clemency, the which was not vnknowne vnto him. Descares made some iorneyes vnto him, from whom he brought nothing but delaies and excuses.

C The Kings Iustice was once contented to make him change the ayre for a time. It was the best Councel his friends could giue him: it was the surest resolution he could take: for it was better to be absent with the Kings good liking, then to be retired and in disgrace. The King was wonderfully grieued at this relapse, and did impute it to an error which great courages detest more and pardon lesse then all other faults: E for compare Vice with Vice and Euill with Euill, Ingratitude is the most odious and the worst. This Prince notwithstanding (who cannot leaue pardoning) sent Descares backe vnto him to cause him to come. He promised to goe if they would bring him a pardon formally made. The King disliked of this kinde of Capitulation, whereas his owne Authority was wronged and his worde held deceitfull. A great King so much feared and obeyed, and of so great Authority, should haue his words as much credited as an others oath. It is not with this Prince as with some of his Predecessors, who vnder the most smyling and calme countenance smothered most dangerous and troublesome tempests. Hee sent him his Abolition in the same forme and manner as he desired, conteyning all the euill that he had done, and all that hee would haue done. It toucheth the Honour of a Prince to iustifie himselfe, when as F his Innocencie is any thing mistrusted or suspected of his King. In these Incounters he must leaue the charges which he holds, as Caius Menenius did: he must returne in the midst of his voiage like vnto Mark Anthonie, he must quit all Legations to pre-to slander. But he that hath once offended his Prince hee hath no other remedy or refuge but to his Clemency, or to flight.

This pardon had a condition that hee should come vnto the King, without the which the effect thereof should bee suspended and without assurance. Hee got nothing in growing obstinate not to goe out of Clermont, representing vnto him selfe that hee could finde no better Councell then in the remembrance of his last Emprisonment, as Cresus did in his miseries. He did build much vpon the Loue of the inhabitants of Clermont and of the Country. But he did not consider that although he had many hearts at his deuotion, yet should he hardly draw them all together to oppose them against the Kings commandements, when it should please him to seize vpon him in that City, and that it were more safe for him to be free without the Vyniard, then to remaine there, not being absolute Maister thereof.

The King therefore seeing that hee would not come but with conditions that did not agree with a perfect obedience, resolved to haue him, by one meanes or other. The first Ouertures were made to the two Brothers of Muras, the one Lieutenant Generall in the Presidiall Court at Ryon, the other Treasorer extraordinary of the Warres, both vehemently affected to the Kings seruice, and for this reason greatly suspected by the Count of Auvergne, who to let them vnderstand the actions that hee would haue knowne, did often confer with them of his affaires, but in like manner as Princes doe communicate with Ambassadors and Spies, and the more freely for that hee thought they were not men to lead him to Paris. But there were others, to execute his commandements, and more then of one condition, all resolute to take him, yea though hee were shut vp in a tower of brass. So there must bee some to take him and others to conduct him when hee was taken. It was necessary that such as had the Kings authority in the Prouince, and the disposition of his forces and of Iustice should deale in it. The Kings intention was imparted to the Vicont of Pont du Chasteau, to D'Entre Lieutenant of the Duke of Vendosmes company, to the Baron of Camillac, to La Boulaye Lieutenant to the company of the Marquis of Verneuil, to Nerestan Colonell of a Regiment of foote, and to so many others as it is a wonder it was not diuulged being in so many heads. In this action all shewed the duties and affections of good men which respected their Honours. Many meanes were attempted, but they were incountred with great difficulties and crosses. True it is that if Nerestan had not come with reuocation of the Kings first commandements, his taking had bene certaine when as hee went a hunting to la Tour of Buissiere, where as a Gentleman should haue bidden him to diner. The Order was changed for that he had given the King to vnderstand that hee had meanes to do him a great peece of seruice in the discouery of great secrets. Some daies past in the expectation of this miracle, but in the end it proved nothing. The Kings patience being wronged would beleeue no more, but commanded that they should force him to come, and if his bounty had not restrained him, wee should haue seene him as extreame in reuenge, as hee hath alwaies bene in bounty and clemency. He earnestly recommended vnto his subiects the execution of this prize, as a thing of great importance for his seruice, for the preseruacion of the State and the assurance or safety of my Lord the Daulphin. The surest meanes (and that wherein there was least trouble and scandall) was the mustring of the Duke of Vendosmes Company, who by the aduice of the Count of Auvergne him-selfe, and to please a Lady who desired to be reuenged of some County-men, dilloged from Saint Porcin to come to Balsac and to Vormie, where shee intreated her guests in such sort as they left not prouision for three daies to some one that had bene furnished for three yeares.

D' Esurre who prest Muras ( Treafour extraordinary of the Warres ) to pay his company a muster, intreated the Count of Auvergne to see it, to the ende hee might assure the King that hee had Gallant men and good Horses, and that all his Companions should bee wonderfully honoured with the presense of their Coronell. I will part to morrowe sayde the Count of Auvergne to hunt at Alezou, and will returne againe

A againe on Monday at night, I pray you bee here at supper and lodge your company at Normaine, to the end that the next day after that we haue dronke, runne at the ring and dined, we may see it.

This was done as he had appointed, and it seemes hee was an Actor in his owne misfortune, & an instrument of his misery, not being able to discouer the bitterness of those Golden-pills which they presented vnto him. D'Enrre came to Clere-mont on Monday at night, and goes vnto him where he supped in one of their houles that managed this businesse. When as he espied D'Enrre a farre off, he said vnto him; Woe'st thou, am I not a Man of my word? D'Enrre thanked him for the paine it had pleased him to take to see his Companions, beseeching him to thinke that he desired it with great affection, to the end the King might know they were not in so bad estate as at the voyage of Metz. The next day the ninth of Nouember the morning was spent in running at the Ring, of foure courses he tooke three. He had intelligence that they ment to take him, and distrusting all, he had resolved to com so early to the place of musters, as not finding the company there ready, he should be excused if he did not attend them, meaning to passe on a league farther, where a Lady that loued him did expect him. D'Enrre hauing fore-seene all, leauing nothing to hazard that might be gouerned by iudgement, vsed such preuentions, as the subtilties of this spirit preuayled nothing. Hee commanded Lady Marthall of the company to see his Companions in order. He aduertised Nereftan and the Captaines that did assit him, of the place whether they should come, and wrought so, that diligence and courage, which are the wings of great executions, were so supported by the secret of discretion, as none of the Troupe once drempt of that was to be done.

They went to dinner, and it was we'll obserued that the Count of Auvergne had some distrust. He hath since confest that he was ready to call the two Brothers of Murais into his Cabinet, and to cause them to be searcht, for that hee was well aduertised that they alwaies carried the Kings Letters and his commandements. But a great resolution thinking that there is no more harme in fearing, then in the thing that causeth feare, feares extremely to make shew that he hath any feare. After Dinner D'Eurre asked, If it pleased him to goe to horse to see the Musters. He answered him; That it should be presently, and that he should vse speed. He retyred him-selfe sonne after into his Cabinet, and went downe being followed by Maisonville onely, and Liernec, mounted vp on a Scottish Horse (which Perry had giuen him) the which would haue outrun all the Horses of France. Hee would not attend the other Noblemen for that hee distrusted them, hauing an intent to passe on, if he found them not ready. But being come to the place, hee found the company in battell. This great diligence made him some-what iealous, and they might perceiue him, that pulling vp his Cloake, hee drew his Sword foure fingers out, yet without any amazement.

E D' Eurre seeing him make euen the reynes of his Horfe, came to him trotting, with his Hat in his hand, and hearing him sweare with a great oath that he had beene very diligent. You see my Lord (answered he) I haue caused my Companions to aduance, for that I would not trouble you with attendance. Monsieur D' Eurre (replied the Earle) you are one of my Friends, I cannot make any long stay here. To whome D' Eurre said. All my Companions are not yet here, but if it please you, you shall see this troupe, and iudge of the whole by a part. Herevpon he sees some Horfe-men come and demands what they were. D' Eurre told him; That it was Nerestan who had beene at Ryon about a fute of his daughters. He beleeued it, for he knew that Nerestan had staid some daies at Ryon, and yet his heart began to suspect more. But it was too late, he was enuironned on euery side, and hardly can one resist many. Nerestan lighted to salute him, and hauing enterrayned him with some discourse vpon the occasion of his stay at Ryon, or of his returne to Court, he went presently to Horfe-backe, and thrust on one of the Lack-quaies with his foote, for a signe

F and token of the beginning of the execution.

A peece shot into the ayre by chance, made him to doubt worse measure, so as hee intreated D'Enrre that he would not vse his Pistolet, D'Enrre freed him from these apprehensions, intreating him to resolute vpon the Kings will, and not to force them to intreat him otherwise then they desired. Well said hee, I yeeld, what will you haue me to doe? that you mount vpon the trompets horse, said D'Enrre. It was feared that he would not haue suffered him selfe to bee taken so easily nor so quietly, as wee haue seene many great courrages choose rather to be cut in peeces, then to see them selues reserved for some shamefull end, and others that haue willingly died, for that they would not die by force.

Before hee had gone a hundred paces, he intreated D'Enrre to lend him one of his troupe, to carry some message of his remembrance, and of his misery, to a Lady that attended him. De Pleche had the charge. Shee who had not prepared her heart to withstand the assaults of a most extreame and sensible greefe, tooke D'Enrre for the obiekt, against whome she poured forth the fury of her passions. If I knew (sayd shee vnto this Gentleman,) that I might saue him in forcing through your troupe, I would willingly doe it, and if I had but tenne Men of my courage and resolution, you should not carry him where you thinke.

But I will neuer die vntill I haue giuen D'Enrre a hundred shot with a pistoll, and to Murat a hundred blowes with a sword. These were the passions of her loue, transported with a resolution beyond her sexe, and which did participate of a Man, of a troubled minde, and of Loue. This last makes miracles of maruells, and maruells of miracles, in wills that are equally toucht with his inspirations, so it is neuer perfect, if it bee not full and neerely toucht with the accidents of both fortunes, as the Moone is not pleasing, but when it is at the full. Shee loued him well, and was well beloued, for the Count of Auvergne had bene heard say, that if the King did let him at liberty, and send him backe to his house, vpon condition that he should not see this Lady, hee would rather desire to dye. She presently ordered the affaires of her house, the disposition of her furniture, and the retreat of her seruants. This passion going from the memory to the thought, from the thought to the heart, from the heart to the eyes, made her to powre forth so many teares, as shee lost the sight of one eye for a time.

The Count of Auvergne
writes vnto the King.

Being at Aigueperres hee writt vnto the King. At the same place he told the Baron of Camillac, that hee was acquainted with the desseigne of his taking. It is true sayd hee, I knew it well, and I beleue you thinke I am a very honest man. Hee said that hee submitted himselfe to all the rigours of the Kings iustice, if hee had sayd, done, thought, or attempted any thing since his Abolition. All the way hee seemed no more afflicted, then when hee was at liberty. Hee told youthfull and idle tales of his loue, and the deceiuing of Ladyes. Hee shott in a Harguebuse at birds, wherein hee was so perfect and excellent, as hee did kill Larkes as they were flying. Sometimes hee would cast forth words of apprehension to enter into that great heape of stones of the Bastille, where hee had already tried his patience for the space of foure or fve moneths. Desceures mette him at Briarre, and there hee entred into a Carosse, and was guarded and ledde vnto Montargis, and from thence hee was imbarcked vpon the riuier, and presently conducted vnto the Bastille, without passing by the Arcenall: And entering into the Duke of Biron's Chamber, hee knew his bedde with some

A some feeling of greefe, and taking leaue of them that had conducted him, hee assured them that he would goe out of that place as he had entred, and if thy found him more guilty then he had said, hee desired them not to pittie him. Entering in hee said vnto Ramirre, that hee had rather lodge in a Tap-house in Paris, then in the Bastille. Those that beleue that he is not lodged there to get out, so soone as hee did the other time, thinke also it is the worst that can happen vnto him. But it shall bee an incomparable misery to be alwaies depriued of the Kings grace and fauour, without the which the best conditions are most lamentable, and a life of this manner how short soeuer, is a tedious and a languishing life, it is no life, it is to languish and to abuse life.

B The happy discouery and so fitly, of all that was done, and in a manner thought against the Kings seruice, is no small signe of the prosperity of his Raigne, and of his Fortune; and an assurance that those heads which shall strike against this rocke of Diamant will proue Glasse. The desseignes of his enemies haue sometimes shewed themselves like vnto fixed Starrs in the Firmament of their ambition, and in the end they haue proued but Comets and Exhallations, which drawne out off the earth, haue bene lost in the Ayre of their Vanity and Imagination. All these practises in the end were like vnto those poore wretched Cottages, built vp of Durt and couered with Stubble. And if all the Conspirators bee not yet taken yet they doe nothing, being discouered and knowne to the eyes of the Kings iustice. Conspiracies are like vnto Coales, which in the shadow do flame, but when as the Sunne shines on them they fall into ashes. The Conspirators amazed

C It is not the seuerity nor the rigour of his Iustice, neither the terrour of examples and punishments, that hath discouered these Conspiracies. He hath not caused the Bell of Ramirre King of Spaine, to bee rung to terrifie all the Conspirators with the sound thereof. This King being offended with the Conspiracies of his Subiects, sayd, that he would show them a Bell, the which he had caused to be cast, the sound whereof might be heard throughout al the whole world. Curiosity made them goe, and they found in a great place the Heads of the principall men of the Realme, set one vpon another in forme of a Bell. It is the great obedience that is yeilded vnto the King, euen by them that are least inured to obey, that hath discouered these practises: It is the great wisdom of his carriage, and the Order hee hath taken to be aduertised of all and to know all. It is the Authority and respect which neuer was so absolute and perfect in his Predecessors as in him. This apprehension was a famous president. For the time was when he must haue had more men to take the Count of Auvergne and to conduct him vnto Paris without let.

Wee may obserue in this apprehension many things that may breed Admiration and amazement, and which shew that Men do in vaine furnish themselves with wisdom against heauen, and with intelligences against the King. The Count of Auvergne had aduertisements from all places that they should take him, and that the Kings Pen-sioners were in the field to that effect. His most inward and neere friends, and among others Floras knew it, and said nothing vnto him, preferring his duty to his Prince before all affection. He must bee deceyued, and the King well serued. As mint-maisters say that it is impossible to refine gold of twenty foure Carats, without a little of some other Metall, so it is impossible to make an execution perfect, if there be not dissembling mixt with friendship, deceit with wisdom, neither must the tong alwaies speake according to the heart.

The Constable was also as well informed thereof as any other, and yet hee made no shew thereof. A shew of great Wisdom. His duty prescribed him a Law to all the bounds of Nature; so there is not any one but is more bound to the seruice of the King and his country, then to his owne health, or to that of his children. A Gentleman being at his Table speaking of this taking, sayd, Sir if the King should command me to take you I would doe it, although I be your most humble seruant, that you march in the first rankes of Greatnesse in the Realme, and that all things touching armes, depend vpon your commands. I beleue it (answered the Constable) else you should do ill for the King is both

the Constable

1604- your King and mine. I am your friend. There is no loue nor affection to dispence any A one from the Kings Commandements.

The Count of Auvergne long before and since his taking, hath not said nor done any thing whereof the Kings seruants haue not kept register. He complayned of those that were daily about him, that they sayd nothing vnto him, and they all answered, that they were too honest to tell him any thing. He is a Prince of great vnderstanding, capable of all sorts of desseins, of a quicke disposition, warlike, vigilant, and full of inuentions and subtilties. But all this auayled him nothing against the King, of whom we may say that he hath wicked wretches inough in his Kingdome that would deceiue him, but they are not cunning enough to doe it.

D'Antraques committed to prison, and his daughter, the Marquis of Vernueil retained.

Soone after that the Count of Auvergne was lodged in the Bastille, D'Entraques B Gouverneur of Orleans was committed to the Concergerie of the Pallace, and the Marquis of Vernueil his daughter garded in her house, by the Knight of the watch. She tried, that he that is capable to loue earnestly, may also hate extremely. We can say nothing of the causes of this change, but what may bee learned by the issue of the Processe. They be affaires which concerne the King, his Person and his State, and if it be tollerable to heare what is said, yet is it not lawfull to speake or publish it. His Maiestie himselfe hath not yet declared the cause of the Count of Auvergues restraint, and in the letter which he did write vnto the Gouverneur of Lions vpon that subiect, he did onely send him these wordes, Tom haue vnderstood how that I haue againe caused the Count of Auvergne to be apprehended, being aduertised that he continued still in his bad C practises, and that hauing sent often for him, he would not come. At the least, I will keepe him from doing ill if I can.

The Kings letter to la Guiche from Fontainebleau, the 15. of Novemb. 1604.

They doe basely abandon their honors, which flye to the practise of strangers who embrace all occasions with vehemencie to trouble the tranquillitie of the Realme. In cases of this quallitie suspicion makes the Crime: yea the children suffer for the iniquitie of their Fathers, and wiues of their husbands, as we haue said. Notwithstanding the King suffers the beames of his naturall bountie and clemencie to shine. He proceeds not rigorously in a notorious Crime. He obserues as he alwaies hath done D the order of his Iustice. He giues time and place to the guilty to know themselves, and to flye to his mercy. He seekes himselfe all meanes to iustifie them, for knowing that the Earle of Auvergne and Entraques, were found guilty of Crimes, which deserued the seperation of their bodies from their soules, and that by a sentence giuen by the Conrt of Parliament the first of Februarie, they were condemned to die, and the Marquise to be led with a good garde to the Abbey of Religious woemen at Beaumont neere Tours, there to be strickly kept vntill the Kings Proctor general should informe more amply against her: his Maiestie addes now to all his victories that of clemency, he causeth the Execution of the sentence to surcease, and changeth the Punishment into perpetuall Imprisonment for the Earle and Entraques, the which he did also moderate for the last, suffering him to remaine in his house of Bois Malefherbes in Beaulie, hee did also suffer the Marquise to remayne in her house at Verneuille. E

Decree of the Court of Parliament.

Changed by the King.

At the same time, when as the Count of Auvergne was taken, the brute was that the Duke of Bouillon had like to haue beene surprised. When as he could find no other refuge for his affaires, but to retire himselfe out of the Realme, he hath vsed the liberty of his retreat wisely, and hath alwaies sought the Kings fauour, for the assurance of his returne. Some forraigne Prince of his friends aduised him not to returne to Court, to hold al reconciliation suspect, and to beleue, that when a Prince is once offended, he is neuer quiet vntill the offence be reuenged. That he must not trust to that which he promiset, nor to that which he sweares houlding both the one and the other lawfull for reuenge. That the word of a Prince that is offended, is like vnto Zenxis cluster F of grapes, which takes Birds, but his oth is like vnto Parrasius vayle. Men. Those which haue lost the fauour of their master (for that they had intelligence with them, whom they could not serue without Crime) are alwayes in continuall distrust

A distrust, the which follows the offence, as the boate doth the ship, vntill they haue quenched and smothered the cause, and made it knowne that they are diuided, and enemies to all their wills, that would distract them from their duties, for men that are double and dissemblers, are neuer tamed, no more then a Barte, which is halfe a Ratt, and halfe a Bird, or the Chastor which is flesh, and fish. The Duke of Bouillons patience hauing giuen the King time enough to consider of his intentions, is readie through the Kings clemencie, to obtaine all that he could desire, to returne to a greater fortune, in the which lesse is allowed then to a meaner estate.

The Duke of Bouillon.

He hath beene taxed with many capitall crimes, whereof the cheefe accusations, B were to haue beene a partaker of the Marshall of Biron's conspiracie: And although they had seuerall desseignes, and were of very different humors, yet they were both of one minde to ruine the King, and haue their shares in his spoile, by the meanes of the King of Spaine. It is true, there are no letters found written from him to the King of Spaine nor his Ministers, nor from them to him, but those that were mediators for the other dealt also for him: and he was more cunning to couer his intent. It is no sufficient iustification to say, that he did neither write nor receiue any letters, the treatie was made without writing: wherevnto he made his answer.

Ans. Touching the conspiracie of the Marshall of Biron, and intelligences with the King of Spaine, there needs no other answer, but a plaine and true deniall, grounded vpon the Duke of Bouillons religion; vpon his conscience; his honor, his alliances, C vpon the quallities and dignities which he holds, vpon the incompatibilitie of humors of the complices which they giue him, and the small likelihood, neither shall it euer be found that he hath spoken or written of these things.

Accu. To take away all suspicion of intelligence with the King of Spaine, which had beene odious to them of the religion, the Duke of Bouillon should seeme to borrow the money which he should receiue, and to make thereby a double gaine, taking money from the King of Spaine, and causing the Churches to pay it him againe.

Ans. To giue some collour to the borrowing of money, all they that had dealt either in the loane or in the caution, must haue beene of the intelligence. In which case the negotiation had beene much lesse secrete, then if the King of Spaine had caused double D pistolets, or Lingots of gold to haue beene brought from Luxenbourg directly to Sedan, hauing no other Princes countrie to passe, and there it might haue beene coyned. Moreouer the summes being great, they must haue agreed vpon a place to receiue the money, and to make the vsuall contracts, which could not be done without giuing occasion to suspect some extraordinary desseigne.

Accu. To this end there were certaine men leuied, when the King was in Sauoy, and he fought by all meanes, to withdraw them of the religion that were with his Maiesty, yea he did write to mounsier Des Diquieres, that for certaine there was a bloody desseigne against them of the religion, and that the forces which were in Sauoy (whilst he was busie there) would fall vpon Daulphiné and the townes of their party.

E Ans. This Article being a matter of fact is easie to auerre, for a leuy of men cannot be made without the knowledge of any: If there can be any one witness of credit found, he will yeeld himselfe guilty, submitting him selfe wholly to the testimony of Mounsier Des Diquieres, as a Knight of honour, and a man of great quality and merit, who he assures him selfe, will not speake any thing to preiudice his honor and reputation.

Accu. Hee should haue caused them of the religion to take armes, to the end that he on the one side with them, & the Marshall of Biron on the other, sayning to make war for religion, should seize vpon the townes, & dispossesse his Maiesty: To make them of the religion to enter into warre, the Marshall of Biron should like a most zelous Catholicke, ruine some Churches in Bourgondy, and moue the Huguenors to reueng being in feare of worfe, making them beleue that it was done by his Maiesties commandement, or at the least by his consent.

Ans. Hee is so well acquainted with the sincerity of them of the religion, to thinke that they will fly to armes without apparent iniustice and extreame necessitie, the the which is well knowne vnto the King: That for the effecting of such a desseigne, there A must be negotiators with the Townes, Maiors, Gouvernors, Captaines, Consistories, and Ministers, and by consequence an infinite number of witnesses.

Acc. These things were treated vnder pretext of a marriage of the Duke of Bouillons daughter with the Earle of Auvergnies sonne, to disguise the matter: and it was the said Duke who inuented this deuise, and sent it to the Earle of Auvergne, the which is manifest, for that hauing written vnto the King of this motion, the Earle of Auvergne told his Maiestie that the Constable prest it much, saying, that hee desired it, & the sayd Constable said, that he had neuer heard speake of it, and found it strange.

Ans. As for the marriage, it was a true subiect and no pretext: The proposition had beene made openly, as the said Duke had aduertised the King; yea Comblat offered him B at Turenne, to bring him the Earle of Auvergnies sonne to bee bred vp with him. If it had pleased the King to haue caused Comblat to bee rackt, as hee was be-sought by the Duke of Bouillon, torments would haue wrested out the truth, better then the pardon which was giuen him.

Acc. To proue his ill meaning, it is said, that during his aboad in France, hee did what he could to incense the Princes against his Maiestie, and to breed iea-lousies among them: for prooffe, talking one day with the Earle of Saint Paul, after many bitter speeches, hee told him that hee and the other Princes were ill-aduised, to spend their meanes and their trauell in his seruice that gaue them no thanks: but if they would retire them-selues, and let him know that they could liue without him, he would C then seeke them.

Ans. The Duke answered that he had vsed no such speech to the Earle of Saint Paul, or to any other, tending to alter their affections and duties to the King: If the Earle hath said any thing of him vpon this subiect, it cannot bee but some light complaint by way of greouance, for that hee did not see him intreated according to his merites: which speech cannot be taken for treason, neither had it beene well directed to the said Earle in that quality, considering the testimonies of his fidelity to the Kings seruice.

Acc. He hath promised and vnder-taken to pacifie the Estates of Holland and the vnitied Prouinces, for the which he hath done and doth all he can. D

Ans. He hath neuer vnder-taken to treat for the Estates: the which if hee had done, hee doth not thinke he should haue incurd the Kings indignation, for that hee would haue done it with assurances fitte for the Estates, as well for their Religion and Liberty, as for the honour and dignity of the house of Nassau, where-with the King could not iustly be offended: But he protests that he hath not done it.

Acc. He hath laboured in Germany to aduance the authority and credit of the house of Austria, with the Protestant Princes, and sought to ruine all his Maiesties intelligences, in speaking the worst he could.

Ans. He hath found so great a respect and affection in the Protestant Princes to the Emperour, as it was not needfull to dispose them by his mediation. As for the breach of his Maiesties intelligences there, he doth not aduow any, calling the said Princes to E witnesse, who will maintaine that they haue neuer heard him speake, but as was befitting a good Frenchman and a faithfull subiect to his Prince.

Acc. He hath hindered the Princes, namely the Count Pallatine from comming to visit his Maiestie at Metz, notwithstanding that they had giuen him some hope.

Ans. As for the letting or comming of the Princes, namely of the Elector whome the King attended at Metz, he assures that this expectation came not from Heidelberg, knowing this Prince to be so iust in his promises, and so constant in his resolutions, as if he had giuen the least assurance of his comming, hee would not haue failed for any thing: wherefore the said Duke is not to be charged to haue diuerted him from a thing F whereof he neuer thought.

Acc. They blame his proceedings, for his iustification to haue sought forraine Prin-ces, not onely for intercessours, but in a manner for Iudges: and the King is offended that the Cont Palatine hath written, or caused to be spoken, that he was wel acquainted with

A with his iustification and innocency: and in case there were any other accusation then those which hee had heard, hee did offer in a maner to iudge them. That hee would choose Iudges at his owne pleasure and incapable, considering that beeing Marshall of France and Duke, his true and naturall Iudges bee they of the Court of Parliament of Paris, as also the Court of Peeres.

Ans. As for the maner of Iustification, hee thinks he hath not erred, presenting himselfe before Iudges not chosen by him, but established by the King, by vertue of his Edict, which comprehends all them of the religion without exception of person or causes: his retreat vnto the Elector was, not to oppose a Rampar against the King, being well acquainted with the affection of this Prince to his maiesty, and the B crovne, but onely to shew herein his humility and obedience to the King, hauing heard that hee thought it fit hee should depart the realme to auoyde all suspect of Ielousie, hee could not choose a more fitting retreat, then to a Prince to whom he had the honor to bee allied, who hath so much respected his maiesty as hee hath al-ways suspended his iudgement in the Duke of Bouillons cause, and to this end hath sent his Ambassadors to Court, to learne the truth, hauing alwayes offered to fauour iustice more then alliance.

Acc. That hee doth not answere to the accusations which were made against him, but by reproaching the accusers and witnesses, the which is not receiucable in crimes of high Treason.

C Ans. That hee could not answere to his accusations but in generall tearmes, by reproching of his accusers, hauing neuer knowne the cheefe poyntes in perticular whereof hee was accused, to answere directly vnto them.

Acc. If hee were Innocent, why went hee away after that he had solemnely promised the King by his letters to come and iustifie himselfe, but at the same time hee did write to others letters of a contrary stile.

Ans. As for the causes of his departure and of his sayling to come vnto the King: Hee will one day make them appeare most iust, vnto them that do now blame him, hauing done it for good respects.

Acc. As also hauing confest something vnto his Maiesty, and demanded leaue to D write to his friends at Paris, to aduertise them that his Maiesty was satisfied, hee wrote to Monsieur De La Tremouille quite contrary.

Ans. Hee knowes not what it is that hee should haue confest vnto his Maiesty, and therefore cannot answere distinctly thereunto.

After these crimes had beene disperst and publicly spoken of to his dishonour, beeing also priuately aduertised thereof, hee wrote a letter of protestation to the King, to iustifie his Innocency in these tearmes.

Sir hauing more carefully examined the consequence of these horrible conspira-cies, whereof faulse imputation doth cause me so many true miseries, among the E which I may iustly hold for the greatest, and most insupportable, my debarring from your presence, and the interruption of the faithfull seruice which I owe vn-to your Maiesty: God in the end hath sent me this consolation by Mounseigneur De Montluc who hath informed me perticularly of that which the common brute of the world could not teach me but in generall termes and confusedly. I giue God thanks who hath by this speciall knowledge made me an easie way to satisfie your Maiesty more perticularly, hoping that hee will dispose the cares and heart of my King and maister to giue a fauorable beleefe vnto the true Iustification of his most humble seruant.

I vnderstand then from him, that I am accused to haue had intelligence with the Marshall of Biron. That I haue treated with him, or others, to receaue money from F the King of Spaine. That I was resolu'd to quite my religion. That I had attempt-ed to treat a peace betwixt the King of Spaine, and the Estates. That I was ac-quainted with a conspiracy against your Maiesty, the Queene, and my Lord the Daulphin, and that I made secret Leuiies of men without authority. To all these crimes

The most humble, most obedient, and most faithfull Subiect and seruant,
HENRY DE LA TOUR.

The Duke of Tremouille ended his fortune by death. Hee might haue dyed when as the King would haue lamented the losse of him more, for hee was not now well pleased

A sed with certaine words which had beene reported vnto him, and if hee had liued, hee 1604.
would haue beene in paine to excuse himselfe of the commandement hee had made Death of the
him to come vnto him to answer it: From hence springs two fruitfull considerations, Duke of Trethe one, that there is nothing so fearefull and terrible as the threatens and disgrace of mouille. his King, the other, that it is alwayes dangerous to speake ill of his Prince. For the first, Cassander greatly feared Alexander, euen when hee was dead, for that hee had seene him once transpored with choller against him. And although that after the death of Alexander hee was aduanced to the throne of Macedon, yet walking in the city of Delphos, and hauing seene an Image of Alexanders, who was now rotten in his graue, he did so tremble as his haire stood right vp, his knees failed him, and the palenesse of his countenance shewed his amazement, by the terrible assault which his B memory gaue him: for the second, when a free speech hath once escaped against the respect of the Prince, he must haue a great and a strong city as Lisander said to defend his liberty of speech. They haue neither friends nor counsell against the King, and if their misery finds any shadow or protection, it is but like vnto Jonas gourd of one night. Let them not flatter themselves in the greatnesse of their houses nor their alliances, this quality doth but increase their offence. Princes are not so much moued with that which the common people do, as with the licentious words of great men. Caius disguised himselfe into as many fashions as he imagined there were Gods. A Cobler seeing him set in his Pallace like Iupiter, with a scepter in one hand, a thunder-bolt in the other, and an Eagle by his side, burst out in a great laughter. Caius causing him to come neere, asked C him why he laught. I laugh at this foolery, answered the Cobler. The Emperour laught also, suffering it to passe freely without choller, yet punishing other speeches severely which came from persons better qualified.

To end this yeare, the King made a Declaration, containing a dispensation of the forty daies, granted by his Maiesty in fauour of all the officers of this realme, that desire to Ten deniers inioy the benefit thereof, paying euery yeare foure deniers vpon the Liuer, or two shil- make a penny.
lings vpon the value of their offices, as shalbe set downe by his Maiesties counsell.

Vpon the demonstrations made vnto the King in his Council, by some of the chiefe Edict for pay-and most ancient officers of his seuerall courts of Parliament, and other companies of ing of the D this realme, that it would please him to set downe some order, for the demissions and Pauler, resignations of their offices: and also auoiding the losse of so notable a summe, as the value of their said offices, they may be no more constrained when they grow old, and by consequence are more capable to execute them worthily, to put them into the hands of yonger men & of lesse experience. His Maiesty hauing caused this to be propounded in his counsell, and desiring to testifie his loue and fatherly affection to all his subiects and seruants, hath ordained in his said counsell, that here-after all the offices of this realme, aswell of Iustice, finances, as others of what quality soeuer, falling voide to his benefit, and being subiect to the rule of forty dayes, except those which shall be found comprehended in the contracts of ingagement, and concessions made in conse-E quence of those lands which haue bin heretofore alienated, aswell by his said Maiesty as by the Kings his predecessors, shal hereafter be dispensed with from the rigor of the said forty daies, which euery of the said officers should suruiue after the resignation made of his said office, accompting from the day & date of the quittance, for the mony paid in:
to his casuall parties, euery one paying yearly (that desire to inioy the sayd grace and dispensation) foure deniers vpon the Liuer, of the value and estimation made of their sayd offices, according to the order which shall bee set downe by his Maiesties Counsell: That is for the next yeare, within the moneths of Ianuarie, and February, and for the following yeares in Ianuarie, and vntill the fifteenth of Febru-F ary, comprehending the sayd day, which beeing past they shall not be receiued, vpon payment of which money if they shall chance to dye during the said yeare, their offices shall not bee declared voide to his Maiesties profit, but shall bee kept for their behoofe to whome they haue resigned them, in regarde of the offices subiect to suppression: and for those which are not subiect, to their widowes and heires, who

who may make their best profit thereof as they shall thinke good, as a thing belonging vnto them, paying only into his Maiesties casuall parties the eight denier by the said officers or their widowes and heires, for the resignation thereof, to be taken of the valuation which shall be made. All which officers which have thus purchased the said right, shall inioy the dispensation of the said forty dayes, during that yeare, shewing onely an acquittance for the payment made by them for the said right of dispensation, duly signed by Maister Charles Paulet, Secretary of the Kings Chamber, and Farmer vnto his Maiestie, aswell of the reuenues of the said right, as of his casuall parties, together with an acquittance of the eight denier paid by them. Vpon which acquittances, his Maiesties pleasure is, that all necessary letters of provision shall be granted, vnto the said officers, their widowes and heires, or others to whom they haue resigned, to inioy, the said offices fully and peaceably, with the same honours, authorities, prerogatiues, preheminences, freedomes, liberties, fees, rights, taxations, profits, and emoluments, which those officers which were last in possession did inioy, so as they bee found sufficient, capable, and pleasing to his Maiestie. And if any of the said officers shall negle& in any one yeare to pay the said right of foure deniers vpon the Liuer, they shall bee deprived for that yeare of the said grace and dispensation of forty dayes, to the which notwithstanding they may be restored the following yeares, paying the said rights yearly by the fifteenth day of February. And the more to gratifie and fauour the officers, which shall pay the said rights, his Maiesties pleasure is, that when as they shall come to resigne their offices, they shall not be bound to pay aboue the eight deniere of the iust value, instead of the fourth deniere, wherevnto resignations were accustomed to be taxed. And as for those which haue not paid the sayd right of foure deniers vpon the Liuer, they shall be bound at their resignations, to pay the fourth deniere of the iust valew of their said offices, as hath beene alwayes obserued. But for that there may be many fraudes committed by some, who abusing his Maiesties bountie and fauour, will not resolute to pay the said right of foure deniers, but when as they haue an intent to resigne their offices, that by this meanes they might be discharged in paying the eight deniere instead of a fourth: his Maiestie desiring to set some order therein, intends that this next yeare, all they that shall pay the said right of foure deniers vpon the Liuer, shall inioy, if they resigne within that yeare, the grace of the eight denier, but if in the following yeares they shall discontinue the payment of the said right of foure deniers vpon the Liuer, they shall be deprived of the said grace of the eight deniere, vntill they haue payd the right two yeares together, after the payment whereof, although they haue discontinued some yeares, yet may they inioy the sayd grace of the eight deniere, that yeare wherein they haue begun to pay the right of foure deniers vpon the Liuer, within the time prefixed.

And as for those that without paying the said right shall chance to dye, before the accomplishment of the forty dayes, the sayd offices shall remaine void to his Maiesties behoofe and profit, as it is now obserued: But to the end the sayd officers may be eased of their paine and charges, being forced to take the said right of dispensation from the sayd Paulet, his Maiestie doth allow him to establish one or more deputies, in euery generality of this realme, who by vertue of their quittances, may within the said time, receiue the mony due for the right of dispensation, from such officers as desire to haue the benefit thereof. And to preuent the abuses which are committed by concealments in many of the Prouinces of this realme, many offices which fall void by death to his Maiesties profit, whereof notwithstanding he is frustrate. His said Maiesty doth command all his Bayliffes, Seneshals, Lieutenants Generall, and all his other royall and ordinary Iudges, as also his Proctors, and their substitutes, to transport themselves, with the deputies of the said Paulet, at the first instance they shall make, into the houses of the said officers, thus dead and concealed, whereof they shall bee bound to make a certificate, the which they shall deliuer vnto the sayd Deputies, who shall send them vnto the sayd Paulet, to haue them put to the taxe, and for an exemplary punishment of the sayd concealment, his Maiesties pleasure is, that the rigour of the ordinances shall shall be exactly obserued, against the widowes and heires which haue committed such faults, by all due courses, as for his owne proper money and affaires, notwithstanding all oppositions, or appellations whatsoeuer. And vnto the end that all officers may be informed of the grace and fauour granted them by this present Decree, his Maiesty doth expressly enioyne all the sayd Bayliffes, Seneshals, and their Lieutenants generally, Prouoosts and other his Royal and ordinary Iudges, euery one in his iurisdiction, to cause it to bee read and published in open court, whereof they shall be bound to deliuer certificates vnto the bearer hereof, enioyning them expressly, to haue a care to the enraynement of the sayd Decree, the which his Maiesty will haue inuolably obserued in euery point, according to the forme and tenure thereof, notwithstanding all oppositions, or appellations, whatsoeuer, whereof if any shall happen his Maiesty hath reserved the knowledge vnto himselfe: forbidding all his courts of Parliament, and other his Iudges whatsoeuer: made in the Kings councill of State held for the Finances. At Paris the seuenth of December 1604.

The King hauing receiued sundry complaints from his officers, and household seruants, of the breach of their liberties and priuiledges granted vnto them aswell by himselfe, as by his Predecessors, hee therevpon made a declaration of his intent and pleasure, after this manner.

Notwithstanding any letters patents, heretofore granted by vs, aswell in forme of an Edict as otherwise, for confirmation of the antient priuiledges, granted by Kings our predecessors of happy memory, to our household officers, and seruants, yet wee receiue daily complaints, of the infinite troubles and vexations, which they suffer in the enioying thereof, by the officers of Iustice, Maiors and Maistrats of our townes, where our sayd officers are abiding, who haue instantly required vs, to prouide some conuenient and necessary remedy. VVherefore desiring rather to augment, then to deminish, the fauours and priuiledges granted in former times, to those which haue had the honour to approach neere vnto the persons of our sayd predecessors, and to take away all difficulties, which doe arise to stay the execution of our will, to the end they may not bee of worse condition then those which haue gone before them, who were no more carefull of their charges then they are; For these causes and other good considerations vs mouing; of our speciall grace, full power and Royall Authority, and with the aduise of our councill, wee haue to our sayd household seruants, to them of the Queene our most deere spouse, our deere and wel beloued sonne the Dauphin, of our most deere and wel-beloued daughter, and those which haue heretofore serued the Kings our predecessors, the Queenes our most honoured Ladies mother-in-law, and sisters-in-lawes, our most deere brother-in-law the deceased Duke of Aniou and our most deere and onely sister the deceased Duchesse of Barre, which haue beene or shall bee hereafter inrowled in our court of Aides, and to their widowes during their widowhood, continued, confirmed and approoued, and by these presents (signed with our hand) continue, confirme and approoue the sayd priuiledges, freedomes, liberties, Immunities and exemptions, graunted vnto them by our sayd predecessors.

Wee will and our pleasure is that hereafter, without any other recourse then these presents, that all our sayd officers, and others aboue named, with their widowes during their widowhood, shall fully and peaceably enioy these sayd priuiledges, and shall bee free and exempt from all manner of contributions, both in generall and particular, borrowings made to bee made aswell for vs as the sayd townes: and in like manner for the prouision for victuals, and munition for warre, conduct money, and from all Taxes, Aydes and Impositions, Watches and Wardes of Townes, Ports, Bridges, Passages and Straites, furnishing and Contribution for Staples, and for lodging of Souldiers both of horse and foote: And generallie from all other subsidies, contributions, and subuentions, made or to bee made, for what cause soeuer, although they bee not here peticularly exprest; whereof wee doe free, acquit and exempt them, notwithstanding there be mention made in the commiffions granted to the Kings household

seruants.

ssions sent and to be sent, of exempt, and not exempt, priuiledged and not priuiledged, A and that they haue omitted to make expresse mention of the exemption, exception, and reseruatiō of our sayd officers and household seruants, with their widowes during their widowhood, meaning not that they should bee comprehended, but that they should peaceably and quietly enioy the sayd freedoms and liberties. Enioyning our faithfull Councillors, the Treasurers of France, Generals of our Finances, and our welbeloued Prouosts of Marchants, Sheriffes and Captaines of our city of Paris, and all Bayliffes, Scheneshals, Prouosts, Esleuz and Controulers for matters of subsidies, Mayors, Iurats, Capitous, Consuls, Sheriffes and Captaines of other townes of our Realme, Farmers of our Aydes, and other subsidies whatsoeuer: That in the enioying hereof they shall not trouble nor molest them, vpon paine of confiscation, with the charges, damage and interest. We do also expressly forbid, al Maiors, Sheriffes, Consuls and Comunalties of townes, Churchwardens, and Collectors of Parrishes, not to tax any of the sayd officers, hauing a good and sufficient certificate, which if they doe they themselues shal pay the sayd taxes. Wee also command our faithful counsellors holding our courts of Aides, Bayliffes, Scheneshals, Captaines, Esleuz & Controllers, of our Aides and taxes, and others to whom it shal belong, to keepe and obserue our present graces, gratifications, continuations, confirmations, approbations, freedoms and exemptions, and to publish and inrole it wheresoeuer it shalbe needfull, causing the sayd officers, and their widowes during their widowhood, to enioy them fully, peaceably, and perpetually, and to discharge them of the sayd impositions, aides and subsidies, causing all lets and troubles to the contrary to cease; for such is our pleasure. Notwithstanding al Edicts, Ordinances, Decrees, Orders, Commandments, Defences and Lettes to the contrary, to the which for this regard only, and without preiudice to other things, wee derogate by these present, and to the end it may bee firme and stable for euer, wee haue caused our seale to bee set vnto it.

Giuen at Fontainebleau in May 1605. The like exemptions and freedoms, were granted vnto the officers and household seruants of the Prince of Condé, and of the Duchesse of Angoulême, which did serue them actually and had their names inroled.

A speech made by the Ambassadors of Germany to the King on the behalfe of the Duke of Bouillon.

Sir, the Electors, Princes, Common-weales and Earls most desirous of your prosperity, and of my Lord the Daulphins, whereon they thinke the whole state of your Realme depends, haue deputed vs vnto you to renew the vowes of this sincere and hereditary affection, which they protest alwaies to maintaine most carefully. The reason which now moues them to make this protestation, is, that some finding themselues bound by alliance, and others tide by the bond of cordiall friendship, to participate in the long and painfull suffering of the Duke of Bouillon, Marshall of France, who they know is much grieued, to see himselfe depriued of the fauour and honour which your Maiesty hath heretofore so bountifully bestowed on him: and breathing no other thing in his languishing, then the recovery of this felicity by your fauour. To obtaine the which hee doth continually call vpon God, and humble himselfe vnto your greatnesse. Our Masters ioyn their prayers with his, to the one and the other, that it will please him who holds the hearts of Kings in his hand, to mollifie yours, towards one of your most faithfull subiects and seruants, and to restore him to that which his misfortune and no crime committed hath made him loose. We beseech your Maiesty to beleue that they which haue sent vs cannot receiue a more worthy Testimony of the esteeme you make of their loue and affections, then by the fauourable reception of their request in this behalfe: and moreover it will bee an assured prooffe vnto them that the enemies of Religion haue laboured in vaine to bandy your desires, and designs against them that make profession thereof.

Behold

A Behold the third yeere which good men see him banished from your presence, fauor and Realme! This exile is not felt by him alone, wee know that the griefe extends to your most faithfull subiects of either Religion, who participate of his affliction: His house makes him allied to the greatest of your Realme, who will take the like part in the happinesse of his reconciliation as they doe now in his disgrace, and wee doubt not, but they would haue beene ready to second our Petition if they thought it would haue beene pleasing to your Maiesty, the which hath made our masters the more bould to vndertake it. It is an exact search which they haue made of the behaviour of the sayd Duke since he left your Realme, the which hath giuen them such knowledge of his integrity as they assure themselues that there will neuer bee sufficient prooffe to touch him in any fort.

We also assure our selues that the Testimonies of so many great Princes and common-weales, whose faithfull affection vnto your person and crowne hath beene so well knowne, being put in ballance against the doubts and ielousies of those who louing neither the person nor the Religion of the sayd Duke seeke to incense you, will easily ouerway them and preuaile, considering that any man of widome and discretion which shall take the paines to examine the crimes imposed vpon the sayd Duke, will finde them incredible, as well for their enormities, as for the contradictions: And it is no matter of light consideration in the mindes of our masters the oth made vnto your Maiesty by the sayd Dukes letters, deliuered into the hands of the Lord of Sillery by the Seignior of Montleer whereof they haue a copy, and which they thinke should be of greater weight then all the suggestions made to the contrary, if they bee not verified by proofes as cleere as the day. These reasons with the precedent declarations made by your Maiesty that you would pacifie your displeasure if some formalities were obserued by the sayd Duke: makes vs hope that you will yeeld to the intercession of our sayd masters, ordaining what shall bee necessary for the sayd Duke to doe, to attaine to his former dignity, whereby they shall receiue so great a contentment by the fruite of this Legation, as they would make no difficulty to interpose their Cautions betwixt your Maiesty and the sayd Duke if need were, to giue you full assurance of the fidelity which may proceed from the hand, tongue and heart of him whom God hath made your subiect, and is an officer of your crowne by your fauour, to imploy himselfe wholly to your Maiesties seruice, for your Royall prosperity and for the whole Realme: for which bounty and fauour our Masters will hold themselves for euer bound to ioyn their vowes and hands, to witness their deuotion as truly by effects as they haue now begunne to represent it by mouth vnto your Maiesty. To whose speech the King being somewhat discontented, made answer.

E That it was the third time the Elector had prest him vpon this subiect, but hee could giue him no other answer then the former. That it rested in the Duke of Bouillon to come, and confesse his faults and to demaund pardon, the which if hee had done hee would willingly haue receiued him with open armes as a father doth his children. That Bouillon had done him bad seruices, and did continue them still. That hee was accused, but hee desired that the accusations might not bee verified as they are; That their informations were not good, as Monsieur the Elector knew well, neither was it needfull to tell it vnto them. That hee was not bound to giue any account to them, their Masters, or to any others. That they should remember where they were, and in what estate he was.

F That Monsieur de Bouillon was his subiect, and that hee desired not that they should offer their Cautions for him, or that they should deale with his affaires, no more then hee would with any others.

To conclude if Monsieur de Bouillon desired restitution hee should come and submissiue craue pardon. That hee had giuen his promise by word vnto the 1605. Electoꝛ Palatine. That hee made no doubt of the continuance of their Masters affeſſion towards him, who hee confeſſed had aſſiſted him at his neede, and that they ſhould not repent them to haue done it, that hee for his part would alwaies remained their friend.

Pyramide of the Ieſuites ruined.

The Ieſuites doe cunningly make their profit of this goodly humour wherein they now ſaw the King vpon the termes of clemency. They had obtained their repeale as we haue ſayd at the voiage of Metz: but the Pyramide ſet vp for an eternall marke, of a moſt deteſtable Parricide, and a perpetuall memory of a iuſt publike reuenge, was a very troubleſome moate in their eyes, wherefore they would not returne into Paris vntill they had obtained a demolition. In the end it was granted them in the moneth B of May at the inſtant purſuite of father Cotton. Juſtice had cauſed to be built, and mercy to be ruined, a blow with a knife giuen vpon the face of our great King, had cauſed it to bee ſet in the moſt eminent place of the world. All men thought it ſhould haue ſtood after a thouſand Ages, but it ſcarce continued one age. Such is the certaintie of humane things: Thus the ſtrongeſt reſolutions are ſubiect to change: Thus coun- cells alter according to occurrents.

But wee muſt ſubiect our ſelues to the pleaſure of the Prince to whom his eſtate is generally bound to will what hee wills, and not to accuſe any one for this demolition, leaſt we ſhould accuſe his commandement, who hath onely right to ſay amongſt his ſubiects, Such is our pleaſure. But from ſecond cauſes let vs aſcend to the firſt and So- C ueraigne, who gouernes the hearts of Kings by himſelfe, and diſpoſeth them to receiue ſuch counſells as hee thinkes good. The eternall prouidence provides for accidents ac- cording to the neceſſity of the ſtate, and the continuall vigilancy of our Henry knows the motiues which preſſe him to the reſolutions which hee takes. It is not therefore lawfull for any to iudge of that with impaciency which they vnderſtand not. The King perſwades himſelfe that if the Ieſuites haue heretofore bene blemiſhed in their honours, the remembrance of his bounty and fauour will binde them the more hereafter.

Marquis of Vernueil ſet
at liberty.

The like fauour hee alſo ſhewed vnto the Marquis of Vernueil, for ſhee hauing the ſpace of ſeuene whole monethes effected the intention of the decree giuen againſt her, D his Maieſty thought that his Proctor generall, had not only had time enough to bring new informations againſt her if there were any; but alſo that her actions and cari- age had giuen an ample Teſtimony of her innocency. Shee therefore beſought the King to giue her leaue to take her courſe in his Court of Parliament, and required that a breefe delay might bee giuen to the Proctor generall to furniſh her accusation, and to make his proofes: And that for want thereof he ſhould bee no more receiued, and the declared innocent of the crimes wherewith ſhe had bene charged.

Thus his Maieſty holding it not reaſonable that his clemency and accuſtomed boun- ty, ſhould ſuffer the Marquis to paſſe the remainder of her daies in the doubt- fulneſſe of ſuch an accusation, and that ſhee ſhould be expoſed to the perill of the ha- tred and ſlander of any one that ſhould haue will to any her: hee declared by his letters, giuen in September at Fontainebleau; that as ſhee had not forgotten her ſelfe in the particular affection wherewith he had honoured her: So had ſhee made prooſe of the obedience and fidelitty which ſhe did owe him, deſiring nothing more then to bee iuſtified of the fact for the which ſhee had bene called in queſtion: In like man- ner hee would not forget the affection hee had borne her, and the naturall children hee had by her. Wherefore he ordained that all purſuits and ſearches againſt her ſhould wholly ceaſe, and that from that time ſhee ſhould bee reſtored and liue in full libertie of her perſon, and goods, in the ſame manner as ſhee had bene before the beginning of the Proces. Hee did abſolliſh and ſuppreſſe for euer the memory of the crimes wherewith ſhee had bene charged, ſo as ſhee hath no feare hereafter to be called in queſtion by the iuſtice: And hee diſpenſed with her for not preſenting her ſelfe in perſon to cauſe theſe letters of Abolition to bee regiſtred in the Court of Par- liament, the which were verified there the ſixth day of September.

The

A The taking of the Count of Auvergne had ouerthrowne one of the ſtrongeſt pillars of this towre of confuſion, which threatned to aduance it ſelfe againſt France: but the whole building was not like to fall at this blow. For many wrought ſilently vpon the foundations which the Marſhall of Biron had laied in diuers Prouinces of Guienne, namely in Perigord, Quercy and Limoſin, and they ſprong vp alſo in Auvergne, where as the coales did yet ſmoake which the chiefe fire-brand of this combuſtion had lately kindled. Languedoc was not free. The Luquiſſes and others their Adhe- rents had diuers enterpriſes vpon the townes of Narbone, Agde, and Beziers; the which were diſcouered by a ſingular fauour wherewith the Soueraigne Protector of this Monarchie hath alwaies bleſt it, and the confederates rewarded according to their merits.

B There were already a thouſand or twelue hundred Gentlemen which had giuen their faith to declare themſelues vpon the firſt occaſion. The faction fortified daily; This Gangrene did hourly ſeize vpon ſome new member, and might in the end cor- rupt the whole body. The Seigneurs of La force, Themines, and others who comman- ded in thoſe quarters vnder the Kings Authority, had charge to croſſe the attempts of theſe mutines. La force hauing intelligence of an aſſembly which was made in Gaſco- ny whereas ſome of his owne allies did aſſiſt, preferring the publike intereſt and his Maieſties commandement, before all other reſpects, hee came ſodainly vpon them, C tooke foure or fiue, and diſperſed the reſt, ſome heere ſome there. Themines was as troubleſome vnto them in other places. Belin a captaine of Gaſcony, of the fac- tion of Guienne, a bold and reſolute man, promiſeth to kill him. But God would make him an inſtrument to diſcouer ſome part of this cabal, which was not yet well knowne. His courage failed him, beeing ready to doe the execution: And finding his deſeigne diuerted by ſome heavenly motion, hee came ſecretly to the court, where caſting himſelfe at his Maieſties feet, he demanded pardon, the which he obtained, and declared that the praſtice was great and common to many Prouinces, but as yet they had no other deſeigne, but to ſend ſome of their company vnto his Maieſty to make complaint of the peoples charge, and of the bad Juſtice which was adminiſtered by D his officers, and other things wherof they would demand reformation. Theſe were ordinary and goodly pretexts for ſuch as ſought to fiſh in a troubled water, and vnder the ſhew of publike good make themſelues far with the wretched pouerty of the people, alwaies more ſuſceptible of bad then of good impreſſions.

The Diſcouery of praſtices within the Realme.

The King cauſed one thouſand and two hundred Frankes to bee giuen to Belin, hee commanded him to returne amongſt them, and to diſcouer particularly the Au- thors and their motiues. Hee returnes ſoone after, beeing gratified with a ſecond liberallitie for the ſecond voyage: He reported, amongſt other particuliarities, that aboute twentie of the conſpiratours were at Chappelle Biron with the Lord of the place; That ſending them a pardon they will giue ouer the enterpriſe, who might in- E forme his Maieſtie of more then hee, who could not perce into the depth of it. The- mines carries it them in forme, and doth ſummon them to returne to their obedience, from the which they had fallen to their owne ruines. They anſwere that the pardon muſt bee generall for them of Auvergne and for the reſt of Guienne: that moreouer hauing not attempted any thing againſt the Kings ſeruice, they did not thinke they had need of any pardon.

Sixteen
thouſand ſtarling.

Notwithſtanding ſome companies of horſe and foote, ſent by his Maieſtie to quench theſe firſt flames of rebellion, and to aſſiſt a Chamber of enquiry appointed by the King at Limoges, conſiſting of the Parliaments of Paris and Bourdeaux, cauſed moſt of this troupe that was readie to reuolt, to come before the puniſh- ment, and not to grow obſtinate againſt force and ductie. Some offered to come and demand their pardons in perſon. And his Maieſtie knowing that great offences haue not alwaies great puniſhments, but in the moſt culpable he was contented that few ſhould ſuffer the puniſhments due to the raſhneſſe of many.

and Chassain, Perigourins, and capitaine Mathelin base brother to Calucirac lost their heads. Chappelle Biron, Tayac, Gymerac, Bassignac, Lugagnac, and Reynac, were executed in Picture, and some others imprisoned, did coole the courage of many hot braynes that were ready to reuolt, and restrained such as finding no worse houses then their owne, sought and tooke an occasion for a cause to better their priuate affaires by a publike reuolt.

The Prince of Orange reitorred to his principallty.

The Churches which carry the title of Reformed in France, were for their affaires assembled at Chasteleraud. Maurice Earle of Nassau, takes occasion to write vnto them in fauor of Philip Prince of Oranges his brother, and to complaine that many as well of the Nobility of the country as of the Inhabitants of Oranges, did seeke to hinder the restoring of his authoritie, which the liberty of the last troubles had expelled, although that he had often promised, and did now passe his word, neuer to alter any thing touching their safety, but to suffer them to enioy the like liberty that the other Churches of France did, and to deliuer the gouernment of the castle into the hands of a Gentleman, whose piety, zeale, valour, and integrity might not be called in question. Blacons a Gentleman of Daulphiné, held it by succession since the death of his father. Neither Philip nor Maurice had any occasion to leue him: for he had alwaies neglected their requests and reiected their commandements. The Prince had often complayned that hee couered his pollicy with the cloake of Religion, to vsurpe his goods and authority, and that hee had lately thought to preoccupate the Deputies of the sayd assembly, to giue them an impression of a sinister intent of their lawfull and naturall Lord against the Church of Oranges, contrary to the declarations and promises which he hath often giuen them.

Count Maurice doth now make himselfe caution for the assurance thereof: and in treats the Synode to assist his brother with all fauour for his restitution to the Inheritance of his Grandfathers, & to take for assurance the faith which hee gaue them by his letters; and which he promised to giue more expressly (if need were) to any one amongst them that they should choose to receiue it from his mouth. That by the dismission of Blacons, and the change of the Gouernment which he called tiranous, into one that should bee lawfull and well ordered, there should bee nothing altered nor diminished concerning the safety of the Church of Oranges, nor any prejudice done to the Kings seruice, who had long desired that the Prince of Orange should be put in full possession of his principallty. Thus the Prince countenanced by his Maiesties expresse commandement, together with the Testimony which the Earle gaue them, touching the intention of his elder brother, recovered that which hee had long sused for, and afterwards hee married Elenor of Bourbon, sister to Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Condé first Prince of the bloud, and first Peere of France, a faire and vertuous Ladie.

The death of Theodore Beza.

They of Geneua doe now weepe for the death of the first and most ancient pastor of their Church. They loued Theodore Beza liuing, and they lament him dead: for God had adorned him with graces which may make a man amiable, profitable and recommendable amongst men. He was borne the foure and twentieth day of Iune in the yeere of our Lord 1519. at Vezelay in Bourgundy, his father and mother being Noble, hee was bred vp by Nicholas de Beza his vnclé, a counsellor of the court of Parliament at Paris vnder the discipline of Melchior Polmar a Germaine, professor of the Greeke tongue in the Vniuersity of Orleans, and afterwards at Bourges. Vnder whom hee profited so well in seuen yeeres, as at fiftene hee not onely gaue a good and sufficient reason of the Doctrine contained in the most famous authors of Greeke and Latine, but also did answere pertinently in all humane and liberall Sciences. Hee had a naturall inclination to Poetrie, and being very young, did publish some licentious Epigrams, whereof hee sought to deface the memory, as of the first flowers of his Spring.

At the age of twenty yeeres, hee was made Licentiate of the ciuill Lawe, and was furnished with good reuenues in benefices, but hee left all, to retire himselfe where

A where that he might liue according to the Religion, which did then multiply in Christendome vnder the name of the Reformed. He serued the Seignurie of Bearne for the space of ten yeeres, as professor of the Greeke tongue in their Vniuersity of Lauzanne; and that of Geneua, in quality of Minister and Professor in Diuinity, from the yeare 1560, vnto the 13. of Ianuary 1600. On which day he expounded for his last Sermon, the third Petition of the Lords prayer, Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heauen, in the eightieth yeare of his age. For he would not suffer his decrepit age to liue in idlenesse, as long as he should haue any strength to labour in his vocation. Hee concluded the rest of his course with a firme iudgement, a sound vnderstanding, and a memorie not altogether decayed, in prayers, meditations, and serious discourses: giuing alwayes graue and solide reasons of that which was propounded vnto him, either in matters of Diuinitie, or in Politicke affaires: saying howerly with Saint Augustine, I haue liued long, and sinned long: Blessed be the name of the Lord. And, Lord finish that which thou hast begunne, that I suffer not shipwracke in the port. And thus repeating many other Oracles, drawne out of the Authoritie of the holy Scripture, vntill that the Eclipse of the Sun, which was in October, had some-what increased his infirmities, yet without paine. His Colleagues thought it fit, that at least two of their company should alwayes bee about him, to assist him with their faithfull exhortations, and recommend him to the grace of God. Thus attending the last will and pleasure of God, the 23. of October, hauing caused himselfe to be taken vp about seuen of the clocke in the morning, hee made his accustomed prayers in his family, and walked a little vp and downe his chamber, then as it were feeling the time come wherein he must end the trauels of this life, he demanded if all were well in the towne, being answered, yea, he caused himselfe to be layd in his bed, whereas his senses did suddenly fayle him in the midst of a prayer made by Perrot a Parisien, one of his Colleagues and neighbours, hee yeelded his soule happily vnto God, without pangs, without convulsion, and without sighes, hauing liued four-score and sixe yeeres, three moneths, and nineteene dayes. A man of a reuerent aspect, of a sound iudgement, and happie memorie, learned amongst the most learned, alwayes readie to resolute suddenly vpon all questions propounded, practised in any thing that did concerne the Church and Gouernment; capable of all abstruse matters, wonderfull eloquent, high in conceptions, quicke in his deliuerie, and graue in his carriage and discourse, but of an affable, sweet, and most pleasing conuersation.

Comets for the most part are prodigious, sayd an ancient Poet. Their Decrees are Martiall and Mercuriall, that is to say, violent, cruell, fatall, mortall, vncertaine, diuers, mutable and warlike. All that followes, threatens nothing but stormes and tempests. The beginning of this yeare hath giuen vs one, the which shewed it selfe, the third of October the yeare before, in the seuenteenth degree of Sagittarius, Iupiter holding the nineteenth, Saturne the cleuenth, and Mars the two and twentieth degree of the same Signe. At which time there was scene in Hungary, a Rain-bow as red as bloud, which staid at diuers times vpon Cocker, vpon Strigonia, and vpon Mount Saint Thomas, and then vanished away. This bearded Starre was neere in greatnesse and likenesse to that which was obserued in the yeare 1572. whereof France, England, the Netherlands, Spaine, Portugall, Hongary, and in a manner all Europe in generall, haue felt but two mournfull effects. Many vnfortunate constellations which meet together, make the Astrologians foresee that it shall produce in that yeare and the following, great and diuers euents, which are so many Trumpets to summon vs to reforme the peruerse actions of our liues, so many warnings of the wrath of God, vpon those Nations which cannot vse those graces well which he giues them in his peace: yet his diuine Prouidence hath alwayes a watchfull eye, to guard those Princes whose Raignes he blesteth.

That seditious mutinie in Guienne, that fearefull and prodigious powder-Treason in England, the violence whereof he hath so miraculously diuerted, are sufficient Lessons for them whom he lately threatened. Behold now another, which teacheth vs, as at many other times, that the blowes of a secret enemy are hard to auoyd, and that they must must equally esteeme the conscience and friendship of those that shall breake it, at the first advantage which treason or infidelitie shall open vnto them, without consulting with their consciences, whether it bee lawfull to put the syckle into anothers mans corne, to reape the fruites which they haue not sowne; and whether with their honors they might treat with the subiects of another Prince to the preiudice of the publicke peace, and the faith sworne in the name of God. Doubtles such practises are more dangerous then the force of an open enemy.

Ambassadors are sacred persons, and must be so held and intreated: but it followes not that their priuiledges are not restrayned within certayne bounds and limits, the which they may not infringe without forcing the law of Nations, they are not to bee blamed if they be carefull to aduertise their Masters of all occurrents. The very duty of their charge, the loue and seruice of their master, and charity to their country doth excuse them, when they bind those vnto them which may fit them with intelligences. But cursed bee those subiects whom couetousnesse and ambition transport to practises of Rebellion and Trecherie.

Conspiracy of Mairargues.

Don Balthazar of Suniga, Ambassador of Spaine, will not haue the King his master think him lesse industrious then his predecessor, to win those vnto him that would open their eares and hearts to the inticement of Strangers. John Taxis hath conferrd all he could with the D. of Sauoy, and the Erle of Fuentes, in corrupting many of the best qualified within the Realme, and others of meaner sort, as the course of the Historie hath obserued. Suniga hath imitated them but too much since his comming into the Realm: as the Treaty of Entragues, and the last of the Erle of Auvergne do witness. They haue reaped nothing but shame and confusion, as bad counsell is alwaies worst to him that giues it. He is now suspected to haue raised a Leuaine of the same Dow, whereof he shall eate the cake with bitternesse.

Mairargues a Gentleman of Prouence, was deputed vnto the King by the States of the countie. But he was not long at Court before he made it appeare that they had giuen the purso to the veryest theefe. Some yeares before hee had propounded vnto his Maiesty to haue two gallies armed, for the defence of the port of Marseilles, and the coasts thereabouts: one of the slaues in these gallies; a man of spirit and cunning, giues him inuentions to play the Pirate, with great profit and small shew, and hee puts them in practise with happy successe. Thus Mairargues finds him to be an aduise vnder taker, and thinks him fit for some greater enterprise. He therefore vnfolde vnto him the web which he was weauing with the ministers of Spaine; to deliuer the towne of Marseilles to K. Philip: a matter (sayd he) which would not be hard to effect, seeing that by meanes of his gallies, hee was master of the port: besides to make his desseigne the more easy, he had by his practises gotten a promise to be chosen Viguier of the towne for the next yeare, by which office hauing all power at Marseilles, with the keyes of the ports and forts in his hand, he shall hold the towne at his deuotion. The Galerien makes himselfe capable to vnderstand all the Quintessence of this Caballe, and of the meanes which the author pretended to follow for the execution. Being well instructed in euery point, he lets the D. of Guise vnderstand, that if it please him to mediate his pardon and liberty, he will discouer a matter vnto the King which imports his Estate, and addes withall, that he will desire no liberty if it be not found true. The Duke giueth aduise vnto the K. and the King commands him not to neglect any thing; that he should learne all that might be knowne: for in matters of that consequence, he must seeke all meanes, and set all stones to worke. So the King is aduertised that Mairargues drawes from the King of Spaine the pay for the whole entertainment of his Maiesties gallies, and that euery yeare he puts the Kings pay into his coffers, besides the pension which hee hath from the Spaniard, of whom he is (as it were) Admirall in the King his masters vessels. That he hath so aduanced his traffick, as he was within a short time to make the K. of Spaine master of Marseilles. At the same time Mairargues came to Court: the King causeth him to be secretly knowne to La Varenne Gouvernor of Angers, who vnder color of this familiarity, obserues him, and sets such watches ouer him, as the ordinary going and comming

Discouered by a Galerien

1605.

A comming of a Flemming named Bruneau Secretarie to the Ambassador of Spaine into Mairargues lodging, made them iudge that they hatched an egge, which would bring forth a bad Rauens. In surprizing them they might by the same meanes surprise the papers and instructions of their negotiations. La Varenne and de Fontis Lieutenant to the great Prouost, had the charge from the King. They do it so discreetly, as the fifth of December, being aduertised that the Secretarie was entred into Mairargues lodging, at the Signe of the Pantofle in the cloyster of S. Germaine of Auxerois, they go and enquire to speake with him about nine of the clocke at night: but vpon his seruants answer, that they could not speake with him, being busie with one in his cabinet touching some affaires, they caused one of the Archers to intertayne his man with a tale, and in the meane time go vp to his chamber, whereas they heare at his Study dore a part of their discourse. Comming out of the Study, de Fontis layd hold vpon Mairargues, who euen then pronounced his owne condemnation. I am a dead man (sayd he,) but if the King will giue me my life, I will discouer great matters vnto him. The Secretarie would haue drawne his sword, but they put him presently into safe keeping. The President Iuin being appointed, which Sillery Keeper of the great Seale, to examine them, in the presence of Lomenie Secretarie of State, they discovered that they should soone put in execution, that which they had long before projected. The Secretary was caried prisoner to the Chasteler, and Mairargues to the Bastile. The papers which were found aswell in Mairargues chamber and study, as about the Secretarie being hidden vnder his garters betwixt two stockings, did sufficiently prooue the fact.

Mairargues taken with this Span. Ambassador's Secretary.

Notwithstanding his Maiesty according to his custome tempering the seueritie of his iustice, with the mildnesse of his clemencie, knowing, that Mairargues was allyed to the Duke of Montpensier, and to the Cardinall of Loysse, by reason of his wife, he sent them word, that in respect of them, and for their sakes, he gaue Mairargues his life, but he should remaine in perpetuall prison. Their answer merits to be registred in our Historie, being generous and like true French-men: to serue for a lesson to posteritie, that the Princes seruice, and the loue of our countie, is to be preferred before all respect of friendship, allyance, or kindred. They most humbly thanke the King, and beseech his Maiesty not to breake the course of Iustice in fauour of them; That they should be alwaies glad, that France should be freed from such troubles: That trecherie is so hatefull vnto them, as they themselues would be the executioners, if there were not any other to be found. So the Procresse being already instructed in the Councell, and by the great Prouost, it was sent to the Court of Parliament to be finished according to the accustomed forme. The Ambassador hearing of the detention of his Secretary and of the cause thereof, he demands audience: where he complains, that by his Maiesties committment, his Secretary was committed to prison: he cries out with great vehemency, that it was to violate the priuiledges of Ambassadors, & to do him great wrong by imprisoning him, a greater in detayning him, but most of all in examining him. That he had not practised Mairargues; but contrariwise Mairargues had very importunately sought him. That neither the Ambassador nor the Secretarie of a forraigne Prince, are bound to refuse the Kings subiects to haue access vnto their house; nor to forbear to heare such as would make propositions and offers vnto them, for their masters seruice. That they are bound to aduertise him of such offers, and are not tyed to reuale to the King of France the bad seruices of his subiects. That there is not any good seruant nor minister of the King of Spaine, which doth not wish and procure by all his inducements, the increase of his greatnesse, yea of the absolute Monarchy of the whole world if it might be. That the King of Spaine their master, hath not made so great brui of an enterprise made by the French in Granado, vpon some places of importance. He doth not storme at their ordinary practises in Nauarre, Biscay, in Flanders, and other places of the Arch-dukes country, nor the succors of men, mony, artillery and munition, which the King doth visibly giue, vnto his masters rebellious subiects. That the King of Spaine was little moued, to heare that the K. reioyced too openly, at the good successe of Cont Maurice and the Estates, and was grieved at their losses. That the world will witnesse with the Catholike King, that he doth patiently beare the bad offices which A are done him daily by the Kings subiects, to the preiudice of the peace sworne betwixt France and Spaine. That La Boderie beeing with the Arch-dukes for the Kings seruice, had sought to practise the Earles of Vanden-bergh, and a Secretarie of the Arch-dukes, yea by the inductions of his Maiesties chiefe Councillors and Secretaries. And yet neither the King of Spayne nor the Arch-dukes, did euer make any complaint or demanda iustice. To conclude, that hee neuer made any motion to Mairargues, but to haue him to go into Flanders. That his Maiestie should be better pleased to haue them fauour that partie, rather then that of the Enemies of the Catholike Religion. And that if his Secretarie were not deliuered, he protested of violence done to the li- bertie and safetie of his charge, which is the greatest offence that may bee done to the King his master in his person.

But he that will haue credit giuen to his words, must beware, that his writings do not contradict them. The instructions lately surprized sing another note of a contrary tenor. And who knowes not that the King of Spaine, since the peace of Veruins hath openly supported the Duke of Savoy his brother-in-law, against the King, to maintaine him in the possession of those places which he had vsurped of this Crowne? how much doth the Fort built by the Earle of Fuentes import his Maiestie, not onely for that it doth annoy his Allies, but also for that it doth hinder the passage and intercourse of the French into Italy? What be the ordinarie practises both open and secret of the Ministers of Spaine, to distract the Swisses and Grisons from the Kings friendship? The onely trecherie of Loſte, who discovered all the secrets of the Councell, hath hee not done more wrong to his Maiesties seruice, then all that which the Spaniard can pretend against vs? The defection of the Marshall of Biron corrupted by the presents and hopes of strangers, is it not a sufficient prooffe of the small esteeme, which King Philip makes of the oath which hee had sworne to obserue the peace? A stranger to be found treating at an vndue hower, with a trecherous subiect, against the publike Faith, against the dutie of an Ambassadour and Minister to a King, who makes profession of friendship with ours, to cause him to loose one of the most important Townes of his Realme: and shall there be no lawe to assure himselfe of his person, nor to cause him to be examined, to discover the truth, and vncloude the face of Dissimulation in a matter of such consequence? The priuiledges of an Ambassadour are not so general, but they are restrayned, not to seeke by sinister meanes to suborne the Subjects of a Prince, neare vnto whom hee doth reside: and vnder colour of Peace and Friendship, to practise against his Estate. Notwithstanding, the King assures him by the vertue of his royall word and promise, there shall bee no wrong done vnto his Secretary: hee is too great a friend and fauourite to iustice and Equitie, to violate the Rights of an Ambassadors charge.

Finally, as the ministers of Spaine haue giuen the King great occasion, to hope for little friendship from them, since the peace of Veruins, hauing either begonne E or nourished so many fatall Desseignes to the prejudice of this Estate, and the publike tranquillitie, as the truth of the Historie doth teach vs: so future ages will not find it strange, if hee hath desired that they should not subdue them, whom they tearme their Rebels. In this consideration, his Maiestie hath beene more ready and willing to restore them the money, wherewith they had supplied his wants during the warres. Hee hath not in truth made shew to desire their ruine and destruction: yet hath hee not assisted them with artillerie nor munition, as the Ambassadour pretends. Many of his subiects bredde vp in martiall Discipline, go to seeke their fortunes in Hungarie with the Arch-dukes, and with the Estates, neither is it in his Maiesties power to make them change their inclinations, to serue the one rather then the other. The warre of the Low-countries hath not Religion for the object. It is a meere warre of State, couered with a goodly and plausible pretext to giue the greater lustre to the cause of the assaiant. This maske cannot serue him any longer, to disguise the truth of his conceptions. And if there were any question made to fight for the Catholike Religion,

A Religion, France would neuer attend to haue a summons from Spaine: she would al- wayes display her Ensignes first in field, as she hath euer done in former ages. As for the Conspiracies pretended by Suniga, against the Estates of King Philip and the Arch-dukes: it is well knowne, that some broken by the Racke, and excesse of torments, others terrified with the horror of threats, and some wonne by the promises of recompence, haue babbled something. But what likelihood is there, that a people which knowes not how to pardon, would haue sent backe so many prisoners, if they could haue conuicted them of any crime? The King denies not but he hath sometimes suffered his seruants to make such propositions of themselves, to haue wherewithall A need to crosse the ambushes and bad offices of the King of Spaines ministers. Yet it can neuer be verified, that his Maiesty hath commanded them to proceed, nor that he hath caused his Ambassadors to make Treaties to the preiudice of the Princes, where his Maiestie doth enterraine them, as the Ambassadors of Spaine haue often done, and now lately with Mairargues the prisoner. The question is not now of going to serue in B Flanders; and if there were no other crime, is it not capitall in a subiect which goes to serue a forraine Prince without the liberty of his Soueraigne? The Arch-dukes Agent had likewise engaged Terrail and many others, without any respect that he was a household seruant to the King, and particularly bound to the company of my Lord the Dauphin. The Gouvernor of Perpignan hath done the like with the Luquisses and their C companions, to deliuer many places in Languedoc, to the Spaniard. As for Boderies treating with the Earles of Vandenberg his Maiestie is ignorant thereof: vnlesse he did happily let them vnderstand how much he did esteeme their valour and generositie: Neither are they held to be borne subiects to the Arch-dukes, but Germanes. La Boderie did feele the Secretaries pulse, that it was with his priuie; but with no other des- seigne, but to learne newes by his meanes, the which is not reprochfull in Ambassa- dors, who seeke to serue their masters well in like cases. His Maiestie doth excuse the Castilians for the corruption of Loſte, to whom he knowes they adrest themselves to the like end. But when these Treaties passe vnto practises, such as they haue pursued with Mairargues, the Luquisses, and others named in the Historie, at diuers times, who D had no other end, but to ouerthrow the Realme vpon his Maiesties head, and to ruine it quite. An open warre would be more honorable for Princes, and more profitable for their Estates, then to nourish vnder the ashes of a fained friendship, fuming fire- brands to kindle a horrible combustion vpon the first occasion in their Estates, who thinke themselves assured vnder the shadow of publike tranquillitie.

The Ambassadors words had mooued the King beyond his owne nature. But be- hold he is now stung to the quicke by the Castilians reply. The King of England (sayd he) in that which concerns the estate of the Netherlands, doth better obserue the peace and friendship which hee hath promised vs, although hee be of a contrary Religion. Some man thinks to reuenge a shame, which doth increase it. All comparisons are E odious: and this doth not serue his turne that did alledge it. His Maiestie did ruer this nayle with such quicknesse and vivacitie, as he would gladly haue recalled his words: For (sayd the King) the King of England hath begun betimes to know what trust may be expected from the Ministers of Spaine. I thinke all o that hereafter I shall haue the like occasion to commend them. Notwithstanding, as I am content to entertain peace and good correspondencie with your master if he giue me occasion: So I shall alwaies be readie to encounter him that shall inuite me. I will cause my selfe to be informed of the grounds and truth of those things wherewith your Secretary is charged, and will afterwards cause you to be aduertised thereof, to know if you will aduow them or not, and according to your answer, aduise what I haue to do. Thus the Ambassador retired, discontent on the one side, that he could not returne home with his Secretary, but on the other, beeing forced to admire his Maiesties courage and wisdom, who doth not any thing in matters of consequence, but with wise counsell and mature delibera- tion. Great men do easily preferre the aduantage of an apparent profite before the breach of Faith.

Our Henry doth gouerne himselfe after another manner. He knowes that Faith must A be inuolably kept euen with enemies, seeing it is the ground and foundation of humane societie. This Bruneau convicted of crime, he could not bee honestly aduowed by his Master, and to disauow him were to deliuer him into the hands of the Kings Iustice. But he is so moderate and temperate a Prince, as he can quit part of his Right to them, that he could bring into a tragicke Theater, to play a part there fit for so audacious an enterprise. Mairargues alone suffered the punishment of his offence, being condemned the nineteenth of December. The same day he lost his head at the Greue, and his body was quartered, the which were hung vpon the entry of the chiefe portes of the Citty. His head was carried to Marfeilles, and set vpon a Lance ouer the chiefe Port of the Towne. His goods were confiscate to the King, reseruing 12000. Livres to the poore, 12000. to the reparation of the pallace, and 12000. for the Ports and Ha- B uens of Marfeilles. Yet his Maiestie disposed a great part of this confiscation in fauour of the widow. Great summes, which shew that the trecherie of this Gentleman, is so much the more detestable, for that hee had good reuenues, and was well allyed: and that the holy Scripture doth name Couetousnesse the roote of all euill, ioyned with Ambition and Trecherie, pernicious Councillors of State, verifying the Oracle: That man hath no miseries but what he procureth by his owne vice.

He might haue ended his dayes as gloriously vpon the theater of vertue, as he died shamefully vpon an ignominious scaffold. Active spirits which cannot containe them- C selues in the calme of peace, find wherewith to make their courage famous, if any generositie animates them to actions which the spurre of Honor excites in the noblest resolutions. The example of Guy Earle of Lauall inuited him to this tryall. Age and Force had scarce brought this Nobleman to this commendable ambition, to learn the art of those whom Nature had bredder of that qualitie to runne this Fortune. But behold, he goes to seeke some schoole of Mars, to be as well instructed in the schoole of Honor, as he had bene in the differences of Religion, against the precepts of his birth and first institution. He obtained leaue of the King, and parted from Paris the nine and twentieth of August, being followed by fifteene or sixteene Gentlemen, with a trayne fit for his quality; vnder the conduct of Marrolles, a Gentleman of Sologne, being fa- D mous for that he had slaine in single combat with a Lance Lisle Marivaault, displaying to follow the deceased King his good master: the King had lately made choice of him, to temper the violent heate of this young apprentice, and to keepe him from running into danger vnadvisedly. He was honoured by the Duke of Lorraine at Nancy: from thence he tooke his way by Strausbourg, Stuckart, Vlme, Newbourg, Ingolstadt, Ratisbone, and Vienne. He saluted the Arch-duke Mathias in a country-house, (whether as the bruite was the Plague had drawne him) who seemed to adde something extraor- dinary in the honors he did him, it may be by reason of the house of Arragon, where- vnto that of Lavall is allyed. The thirteenth of October he came vnto the Imperiall armie, which camped about Comorth, to weake to rayse the siege of Strigonia, E which the Turke did presse: to the Noblemen of the armie, and especially George Bass Lieutenant generall of the Emperour, receiued him with all the honour and demon- strations of loue they could.

Strigonia being yeilded by the trechery of the Germanes; the Turkes disbanding, by troups gaue him occasion, to make prooffe of the affection which he bare vnto this holy warre, in many encounters, skirmishes, alarmes, taking of places, and other Stratagemes, whereas men of honour shew their resolutions. The five and twentieth of Nouember gaue him a fauourable oportunitie, wherein he did shew himselfe the true sonne of his father, who with the greatnesse of his courage surmounted the smalnesse of his bodie: and Grand-child to a Grand-father, who in the flower of his age, had purchased the title of Knight without feare. Fourteene or fifteene thousand horse charged F a Regiment of Reistres, which made the retraite; when as the French & Wallons with the whole army following stayd their fury, & made them to recouer the top of a moun- taine: yet often turning head, and witnessing that Feare had not put wings to their feet. In

A In this retreat the Earle of Lauall was noted to haue done as much as any noble spi- rit encouraged by the sight of an enemy might doe, alwayes the last with his fol- lowers in the reetre-ward, and the first to make head, if the enemy did offer to charge.

But hee had scarce made the first flames of his heate to shine, when as behold the third of December quencht him in an instant, when as they began to promise more glittering beames. The Turke came to charge the fore-warde in the morning: at this alarm hee armes, but so hastily as hee gaue his people no leasure to make fast the garter which should tye his tassets at the knee. Hee leapes into the saddle, and runnes with his traine into the hottest of the fight. The ioy hee had to bee in so good an in- counter, making him to loofe all apprehension of danger. His Armes beeing guile, B made the enemy to note him for a man of quality. They discharge a shewer of arrowes, and shotte vpon him: one pierceth the neather plate of his tassets hanging loose, and so past through his thigh into his body. Le Frainsay Lieutenant Collonell to Cont Rhingraff, who ledde the French and Wallons, and Captaine Bourg-le-Roye, who commanded a company in this regiment, are commended for that they desired to succour him beeing thus charged, if the marshall of the campe had not forbidden them to breake their ranks, vpon paine of death.

The enemy some-time chasing, some-time chased, desired nothing more then to retire, seeing all the Christian armie to aduance: when as the Earle of Lauall breaching more courage then life, returned to the charge, and pursued them a good league, vnto a riuers side, whereas there were one thousand and five hundred slaine and drowned, and nine Cornets, with many good horses taken. The riuer, and the great- nesse of his wound stayed him sodainely: hee began to stagger. They layde him vpon the bare ground, and finding him selfe to growe faint, hee called for a little Wine, the which hee had no sooner taken, but lifting his eyes, and hands to heaven, hee ended the trauels of this miserable life, to exchange it with the rest of the most blessed. Happy to haue dyed in the bedde of honour, in a iust and holy quarrell, which many of his ancestors haue sealed with the same seale; and most happy to haue left that commendable memory to posterity, neuer to haue giuen any man subiect D to complaine of him. His body was honourably conducted to Vienne: his follow- ers did not forget any thing, to let those nations know, in what ranke they held their Maister. His bowells were solemnly interred in the most honourable place of the quire in the Franciscans Church, iust by the Queene of Frances tombe. The body was conuayed with honour and respect into France, and doth now rest at Lauall attending the coming of the Soueraigne Iudge.

If there bee an arme to roote out the wicked, there is another to maintaine the good. Three yeares of imprisonment in the Bastille (as wee haue shewed) haue giuen his Maiestie leasure to know, that there was nothing in the actions of Mom- barot, contrary to the fidelity which hee hath heere-to-fore sealed by many worthy actes, in occasions which had bene offered for the establishment of his royall author- E ity. His onely sonne had many times cast him selfe at the Kings feete; beseeching him, that seeing his fathers enemies could not conuict him of any crime, it will please his Maiesty to giue him that liberty, which slander, the cruellest torment which a generous minde could feare, had taken from him: Or to suffer him that by by his com- pany hee might comfort him in his misery, by the seruice which nature bindes the sonne to doe vnto the father.

The King moued with the pittie of the sonne, and the innocencie of the father, verified by so long a tryall: Hee presently dischargeth Mombarot in the moneth of December, from all subiect of his detention, disanulling all pursuities, all decrees and iudgements giuen vpon this subiect, so as hee might neuer bee molested, nor F it prejudice his reputation, no more then that which had bene done by him heere- tofore within his gouernment, during the troubles past, for his Maiesties affaires, restore him to his full liberty, and to the possession of all his goods with-out further trouble. But not to his gouernment, wherevnto (to auoide ieaiousie, and to entertaine concord among his officers) hee had aduanced the Siegneur of Bethunes lately his Ambassador at Rome.

Thus the King hauing disperst the clowds which threatned France with a Chaos of diuerse confusions in generall, and taken away the subiect of great parci-alities for the gouernment of the towne of Rennes, there is nothing now that doth afflict his spirit but the affaires of Sedan; beeing resolute to bring him to that estate as his Maiestie should not need to haue any feare hereafter on that side, no more then on the other, whereas he hath lately quencht the first flames which might haue caused a B dangerous fire within the realme.

The King prepares with all the speed hee may, for the siege of Sedan; whilest the people of Paris view the rich beautifyings and new decorations of their capitall city.
 It hath the last obligation to maister Francis Myron councillor of state to the King, Lieutenant ciuill in the Preuostie of Paris, and heretofore Prouost of Marchants. Digi-nities where-with the noblest families of the Citty thinke themselues honored, as with the first publike Magistracie of the first city of the world; Paris doth now glory to see her towne-house beautified with a pleasing fore-front, and other goodly buildings. To see her publike commodities increased, with a stately Port at the Tournelle, and that of the temple repaired, which the miseries of former ages had kept shut aboue forty years. C
 To see before the gate of the sacred temple of roial iustice, a goodly Fountain spring-vp, which doth wath that foule and detestable fury lately marked by a Piramide, for a monument which they presumed should haue bene eternall. To see the corners of the streetes watered with many other Fountaines, which will for euer refresh the memory of their restorer. Many streetes opened, and paved to voyde the filth and corrupt waters. Many bridges of Stone made. Many Portes built a new, and paved for the common ease: and many waterings restored. Finally, Paris commends him to haue done more for her ornament in two yeares, then his predecessors had scarce done in two ages: and doth honour so many actes done by Myron, of pietie towards the poore, and strangers, to the sicke and diseased, and to the Church; of wisdom and fi- D delitie to the common good, to the adiministration of the publike Treasure, in his good husbandry, and employing it for the beautifying of the city, in discharge of her debts, in the charges and rents of her demeans, for his loue to his country, and his care and diligence to produce so many goodly effects, which recommended his Magistracie, for his painfull indeuours, for the which hee hath made this abridgement of the world to florish. For his great affection, by the which knowing that his own health was ioyned with that of the common-weale, hee hath not respected enuie, nor hatred, which doth commonly follow vertue (as the shaddowe doth the body) in regarde of that pleasing contentment which a good conscience brings to man, whose actions feare neither censure, nor Ostracisme, to that sweete consolation to leaue his charge E with lesse gaine, but more honour, and to haue by his commendable actions, giuen the King himselfe subiect to propound vnto the successeur, the example of his predecessor when as hee went to deliuer into his Maiesties hands the keyes and scales of the towne. A graue and sufficient testimonie of honour, whereon slander can take no hold.

Supplications of the Clergie
 to the King.

The Kings
 answer.

His Maiestie at the same time gaue audience to the petitions and declarations of the Clergie beeing assembled at the Augustines in Paris. They insisted vpon the afflictions of the Church which was troubled. They required with great vehemencie to haue the councell of Trent receiued. They shew the abuses of symonies, and confidencies: And doe recommend the choise of capable men in elections. The F King acknowledged that all which they had sayd was true. The Church is afflicted: so hee desires to doe any thing that depends of him for the restoring thereof.
 If

A If the publication of the Councell be sufficient to restore it, he hath desired it, and doth desire to see the effect: but humane considerations doe many times crosse them of heauen, notwithstanding he will alwaies employ both blood and life, for that which shalbe to the good of the Church and Seruice of God. As for Symonies, and confidencies, his Maiesty did exhort them to begin the cure by themselues, and to prouoke others by their examples to doe well. They are witnesse how hee proceeds in elections. Those which he hath established differ much in sufficiency and merites, from others of former times; and the report which the Clergy it selfe hath made vnto his maiesty, will double his courage to doe better hereafter.

B To conclude the King assured them as a good Prince, of his affection and sincerity to anything that did concerne the peace of the Church, and the protection of them which serue at the Altar. But withall hee spake some words vnto them like a good father: that he was offended at the length of their assembly, at the great number of deputies and the factions that were among them. Remember (said his Maiesty) that you are now redy to enter into Lent, what your charges be, and that your presences are necessary in your Churches. By your tediousnesse you driue the poore Curats to hunger and dispaire. I will ioyne with them, and with the honestest of your company, to take order for the long time which you haue spent in your assembly, finally make accompt of my firme affection, to the seruice of God and to your protection. The Marshall of Bouillon had in the meane time by his submissions disposed the King to impart

Duke of B. ul-

C vnto him an equall or greater fauour, then before his disgrace: but his Maiesty did not yet finde them so free, as he might conceiue a full assurance, for the intercessions of the Queene of England, in the beginning of his retreat, of the Cont Pallatine, of the Marquies of Brandenburg, of Anspach, of Bade, and of many cantons of the leagues, by expresse Ambassadors, together with the Marshalls long stay without the Realme, as wee haue seene made them presume that hee had fortified him-selfe with diuers foraine friendshipes, so as the King would haue him come in person to iustify him-selfe, and to free him of this imagination, His Maiesty doth Sommon him like a good maister and his best friend, and being alwaies more inclined to clemency then severity, he desired rather to induce him by amiable callings, then by Soueraigne Authority, or lawfull D comandements.

Heretofore hee had sent Montlouet vnto him; and of late daies La Noue to that end, yet their perswasions were not of sufficient force to disperse all the subiects of distrust which he had conceiued: neither could he resolute to come but with speciall warrentise.
 his friends do what they can to entertaine this good will which the King doth now wit-nesse vnto him: but withall they know what his Maiesties resolution is if he obeies not, and exhorting him speedily to content his bounty, by a full and not limited satisfaction, they incite him to follow his duty, and to fly his daunger. The King was well pleased with the mediation of the Princeesse dowager of Orange, by whome his Maiesty grants him freely all that hee demands, so as (saith he) he doth witnesse by his actions that hee E desires my fauour. But it is reason (addes the King) that granting vnto the Duke of Bouillon all the assurance he requires, he should giue me such a pawne of his fidelity, as I may not hereafter doubt of his duty. This pawne which the King demands, is the gard of the Castle of Sedan; giuing his word not to place any gouernor, nor garrison but of the religion receiued in the estate of Sedan: and not to preiudice the quiet of that Church, nor the rights and reuenues of the Lord; but onely to be assured that this place hereafter shall not be in case to hurt him.

The King
 grants him sh assurances he demands.

The Duke of Bouillon is amazed at this newes, he thinks that to deprive him of this possession, is to exclude him from all tollerable conditions. He makes many offers. He beseecheth his maiesty to take both his person and the Soueraignty of Sedan into his F protection. Hee offers to receiue his Maiesty with all the honor that is due vnto him, with what company he pleased, without limitation, without restriction, and to beate downe the Castle Gates for his entry, the conditions of the protection beeing by the Kings good pleasure concluded, signed, and verified as they ought. He consents that the M m m m m 2 gouernor

He demands a pawne of his fidelity.

1606. Gouernor of the Castle should take an oath of fidelity to the King conformable to the Articles of protection. And in case the Duke should infringe it, the gouernor should be freed of the oath which he owes him, to keepe the faith which hee hath sworne to the King. That the like oath should be taken by the garrison, and inhabitants of Sedan. That he will absent him selfe if it did not please the King he should remayne there, and would lodge his wife and children, in some one of his houses within the realme, to serue for an assurance to his Maiesty with all his goods, and remaine so much the more bound to the full obseruation of faith which he owes vnto his said maiesty.

But for all this the King will not receiue him into grace, nor trust him vnlesse hee may haue this caution in his hands. The Duke on the other side will by no meanes dispossesse himselfe of the gard of his Castle, and will rather indure all fortunes, all extremities: for it is noe lesse troublesome vnto him, to be spoyled of this place, then to be seperated from his owne moiety, from his flesh and bones: his Maiesty then resolues to constrain him to quit that by force which hee will not doe by free-will. The inhabitants of Sedan are much troubled, now they hold the wolffe by the eare they know not how to keepe him, nor how to let him goe. The Duke of Bouillon is their Lord: his affliction is theirs. Can they or may they abandon him whome God hath giuen them for their Lord? but on the other side shall they growe obstinate against a mighty King, who is alwaies victorious, a King against whose force they confesse themselves to be but dust? they therefore humbly beseech his Maiesty to spare a people, which heares nothing in their assemblies but vows for his prosperity, who see nothing but the Flower Deluce vpon the Castle gates, who breath nothing but seruice, and desire nothing more then to spend their bloods for the increase of his estate, and who abhor to be reduced to that extremity, as to defend themselves for their owne preservation. His Maiesty giues them his word, yea with an oath, that if hee should take the place by assault, he would leaue the inhabitants of Sedan in the same Estate they were, and would maintayne them in the same priuiledges, where-with hee did gratifie them of his Realme.

That he had iust occasion to be incenced against a subiect, who runnes voluntarily to his owne ruine, for a thing without the which he might well subsist. That he will take this place from him to take from him, the meanes to doe ill; and will not touch the priuiledges of the towne, nor meaning to appropriate another mans inheritance vnto him-selfe, for hee knoweth that the Lord giueth portions to nations, and seperates the children of men one from another; hee will not that any man shall remoue his Neighbours bounds.

The place imports his Maiesty aswell for the situation, as for the strength. It is seated vpon the frontire of France, much stronger then any of that quarter: and by consequence fit to trouble the estate of the realme, and to breed ambitious counsellors in them which seeke for all occasions of innouation. Out of doubt these were strong reasons: but both the inhabitants of Sedan, and the Marshall of Bouillons friends, together with those that desired to haue these matters managed after some milder course, produced other reasons, considerable both for waight and number, to diuert this desseigne. Sedan (said they) is fortified vpon a rocke, inuironed with goodly great Bastions, and deepe ditches cut out of the rocke, the which cannot bee taken, but by filling of them vp: you must come vnto it by degrees to take the outward part, the which cannot bee kept by reason of the good countercarries, flanked of them selues, and flanked more-over by the Castle, and by the Bastions, so as it cannot be taken but by length of time, with great expence of mony, munition, and losse of men. The importance of this conduct will force the King to be there in person: for he knoweth that he is neuer so well serued as in his owne presence: and can no more assure him-selfe of the fidelity of many, then of their sufficiencies.

And the furniture for 50. canon which his Maiesty prepares, with an army answerable led so neere to the Low-countries, almost into Bourgondy, shall they make so little bruit as the

A the King of Spaine will not startle thereat? will he not bee carefull to man his frontier with an other armie? for Princes conclude their safeties more by that which they see, then by that which they heare. And hee which gapes after all occasions of greatnesse, who thinkes he hath more iustice to succour a Soueraigne assailed within his estate, then they haue to assist his rebellious subiects against him: will he let passe this opportunity if hee can, to make the Duke of Bouillon stand obstinately vpon his defence? will hee faile to suggest all necessary meanes, to crosse him whote prosperitie hee doth not behold, but with a malignant and enuious eye? Is it not credible, that both he and the Archdukes had rather haue the present possessor for their neighbour, then so mighty and redoubted a Prince. And is Sedan at this day lesse able to kindle dangerous combustions, then it did betwixt Francis the first, and Charles the fifth. So much needy

B Nobility which bow their necks vnder the burthen of the last warres: so many malecontents which thinke they haue merited more then the King thinkes hee owes them, would they not go to field to foster their old desseignes, and to breed new. A royall army planted in one of the corners of the realme, can she extend her wings far enough to couer the remote Prouinces? His Maiesties Lieutenants are they all of one temper? a change of affaires, may it not change their affections? doe they all loue, are they equally beloued, to hope for equall seruice, equall fidelity? will nor the season make them vary their reason? The ashes of former combustion, doe they not couer some little fire, which some may take delight to kindle, when as the armie shall haue least C meanes to bring water to quench it? But what a displeasure were it to be forced to raise a siege from before another mans towne, to goe and plant it before one of his owne assailed by the stranger. There is danger to loose the principall for the accessorie?

As for strangers, England is so wonderfully scandalized at the monstrous attempts, lately discovered against their Princes; as they will neuer like of a warre begun against them of their beleefe, what lustre soeuer it carry. Italy promisseth it selfe great assistance of the French against the desseignes of the Earle of Fuentes: but it hath not so great prouision of courage, but it will bee much danted, seeing their forces turned another way. The Suisses will blame this desseigne, some for that it is against a Noble man, and an estate of their confession. Others, for that they will say they are abandoned to the Sauoyard and Millanoys. The Grissons are in the same predicament, and saile in the same sea. The Estates of the vnited Prouinces will feele a great preiudice in their affaires, by the cutting off the commodities of France, being appointed for other places: The Empire will grow iealous of this approach, and the Germanies by the peace of Hongary which they hope for, shall want neither care to thinke of it, nor meanes to preuent it. The French armie shall haue Liege behinde them. The people are already iealous. The conquest of Sedan doth also purchase a title to the Duchie of Bouillon. They desire neither the one nor the other: and will crosse the first all they can to bee assured of the second.

All these inconueniences may bee auoyded. Sedan hath serued the Kings of France no lesse profitable vnder the title of protection, then can bee hoped for vnder that of possession. And the Duke of Bouillon recouering the Kings fauour, brings vnto his seruice both his place and that which is more precious, his great sufficiencie, well knowne to his Maiesty, and to all men, well knowne to the counsell of Estate, and to the affaires of warre; so as a perfect Amnestie may assure his returne. But the King cannot rest assured of the Marshall of Bouillon, nor of Sedan, but by the yeelding of a Castle; and the placing of a Gouernour, and a choise garrison. His troopes marche, with an intent to haue fixe and twenty thousand men, and more if need were, with artillery and munition necessary to do a great exploite. There were many commissions granted to leuie horse and foote: yong men came from all parts; he was not held the sonne of an honest woman, that did not desire to make his apprenticeship of armes vnder so famous a Captaine, and to shew his valour in this warre of Sedan: yet this warre was not like to be very violent. The King knowes better the state of Sedan, then those which haue distasted him, and the Duke of Bouillon who knowes that the shortest 1606. follies are the best, will not loose his Maiesties fauour by his contumacie, the which he A will willingly redeeme, at a higher price then the towne of Sedan: rebellion fittes not, but with such as are borne for the ruine of their country. The King before his departure from Paris declared openly and freely, that hee marched towards Sedan, with an intent to receiue the Duke of Bouillon with open armes. Doubtlesse the best way to vanquish an enemy, is to doe him good when we may.

These gracious words gaue them occasion (who were greeued, to see his Maiestie marche against a place where the trauell and danger seemed more certaine, then the purchase might be profitable, considering the discommodities of the country, and the difficulty of the place) to sollicite with great vehemencie this businesse which they saw in so good termes. Netancourt a Gentleman of Champagne, noted for his piety, B moderation, and integrity, shewed so great zeale and affection in this negotiation, as then the King thought him capable to serue him, according to his hart in this action.

The Duke of Bouillon makes his accorde,

The which beeing well advanced, his Maiestie deputed the Lords of Inteuille (Gouernor of Champagne) and Villeroy, both wholly adicted to procure the good and tranquillity of his estate, and his Maiesties seruice. The Duke of Bouillon went to meete with them at Torcy, the last village of the realme, and there all conditions being examined, debated, and imparted vnto the King, without any act of hostility, effusion of bloud or sweate, his Maiestie knowing that mildnesse is the best remedy to cure the wounds of an estate, and tempering his lustice by his clemency, and practicing that goodly oracle: that hatred must bee mortall, and friendship immortal: He gaue two great blowes with one stone: for he assured himselfe of a place which would haue troubled him, being at the deuotion of men enuius of the prosperity of this realme, or iealous of his greatnesse: and restored vnto his fauour so much desired, one of the cheefe Noblemen amongst his subiects, the second officer of his crowne, a great man of state, active in counsell, and well practised in warre, and whom the triall of a long aduersity, will make him more fit to doe his maiester good seruice. In worldly affaires if some crosse of affliction should not temper the spirit of man, in the end prosperity will make him drunke. Hee came vnto the King being at Douchery the eleuenth of Aprill, and presented himselfe vnto him in the morning before his rising: Hee deliuered vnto him by mouth, the humble submissions D which his Maiestie required, and demanded an abolition in forme according to the treaty. His Maiestie receiued him as graciously as if the Sunne of his fauours had neuer bene eclipsed, before his fortune. The Queene shewed him as good a countenance, as shee was affected to this reconciliation.

The Duke of Bouillon comes to the King.

Their Maiesties being accompanied with the Princes of the blood, the officers of the crowne, and others, entred into Sedan. The Syndics and Sherifes receiued him vpon their knees, protesting generally, that they had neuer attended or desired any more assured protection then that of his Maiestie: to which end they wished all prosperity to Henry the fourth, King of France and of Nauarre, most christian, most mercifull, and most victorious. To the Queene, the happinesse of his long and fortunate company. E To my Lord the Daulphin, encrease of vertues, and the fathers felicities. And they receiued from this sacred mouth, the answer which a people might hope for, beeing transported with the ioy and cordiall loue of a Prince, louing his subiects, as a good father doth his children: I haue nothing diminished (sayd hee) nor altered, the loue and affections which I haue alwayes borne you: I will neuer diminish it, whereof I will alwayes giue you good proofes.

The King and Queene entering into Sedan.

Then were the canons heard (which seemed to bee planted for the defence of the towne) to applaud by their thundring this vnusuall action. The aire did ring againe with cries of ioy, & with acclamations of God saue the King, God saue the Queene, God saue my Lord the Daulphin, sent vp to heauen with vowes of eternall prosperity: and the inhabitants & Burgeses did not breath any thing, but a generall fidelity. Their Maiesties were much moued with the affections of this people, the which did merite this testimony from the King: See how this people loues mee, (speaking to the Princes, which did assist him) F

A him) I know they loue me. The Bonfiers which were made at night in the streets, and publike places of the towne did witnesse that they were pure and free from dissimulation and fraude. The thanks which they gaue sollemly vnto God, did shew that they tooke this warning for a threatening of his diuine punishment, or an exhortation to a more holinesse of life, and a continewance of the fidelity, which both the Soueraigne Prince and the people of the towne, and lands depending, owe vnto his Maiesty. The preaching and ordinary prayers made in the accustomed places with all liberty (whereas many of the Court assisted) are the certaine effects of the inviolable promise giuen by his Maiesty, that the Church of Sedan should suffer no alterations nor change in the liberty of conscience.

The small traine where-with the Duke of Bouillon presented him-selfe before his B Maiesty and the company which the King had when hee gaue him this fauorable reception, did witnesse the assurance they had one of another, a good Maister receiues a good seruant with an open heart. A good seruant prepares him-selfe to yeeld vnto his good Maister the good seruice which hee hath promised and doth owe him, finally the gratifications, and shewes of loue which the King had made vnto this people lately trembling, and now assured, made them know by experience, and confesse by effect, that they had no lesse subiect to praise God for the Fatherly care which his diuine providence had now as here-to-fore, of their good and preservation. They commend the kings wisdom and graue iudgement, being able wisely to discern C the capacity of his Subiects, fit to serue him in great affayres. Hee left Netancourt for gouernour of the place, whose meritts were noe lesse pleasing to the Soueraigne then to the subiects of this Petty Estate, and on the third day hee tooke his way toward Paris.

The Duke of Bouillon did accompany his Maiesty vnto Mouzon with a small train: and the next day he returned to giue order for his affaires, within few daies after he came to hold his ancient place in Court, as he returned into the Kings hart, who to witnesse the effects of his loue, did abolish and suppress the memory of all things done, knowne, or spoken by him against his Maiesties seruice vnto that day, so as neuer any further search might bee made. And by his especiall grace, full power, and royall authority D hee defended with him for his appearing in person, in his Courts of Parliament, to haue his letters of abolition registred. By the which also hee was confirmed in the same estates, honours, and dignities which hee had held and did yet hold within the Realme.

There is nothing more lawfull nor commendable, in a well gouerned estate, then to provide for the necessities of such as for a marke of their vertue remaine lame, and haue no meanes to liue, after they haue serued the Prince in his wars wel and faithfully. Our Kings haue alwayes desired to acknowledge their meritts: but by the iniurie of time, or the negligence and fraud of officers, their ordonances haue bene without effect, to the shame of martiall discipline, which greeues to see many poore gentlemen and other souldiers made vnprofitable to carry armes, and for all other functions, by wounds, losse E of limbes and decreipt age; or that haue consumed their meanes in paying their ransomes, in charges to be cured of their wounds receiued in their seruices, or of other infirmities and defeases which the toyles of warres doe breed, were reduced in their declining age to a miserable and vnworthy kind of begging.

The King desiring to make them feele the effects of his bounty, to giue them meanes to passe the remaynder of their daies in rest, and to incourage his other subiects of all qualities, to serue him the more willingly in all future occasions, vpon hope of the like remuneration. He giues them by an irreuocable edict.

The Royall house of Christian charity, and the mony growing vpon the remainder of F accompts of hospitalls, almes-houses, leprous-houses, and other such companies, and of the usurpations, and alienations of the reuenues thereof; reuisions of the said accompts, and abuses and disorders committed in the gouernment and administration of the said places, together

Pensions appointed for men lame in the Kings seruice.

1606. Together with the money which shall rise of the places and pensions of religious lay-men, in every Abbey and Priory of this Realme, being in his Maiesties nomination: As is contained at large in the Edi&t verified in the great Councell, the tenth of July. So as all Gentlemen, Captaines, and Souldiers maimed, in doing his Maiesties seruice, in his companies of men at armes, light-horsemen, archers, or harguebuziers on horseback, taking certificates from the Captaines and Collonels vnder whome they haue serued, containing the time of their seruices, their valour, with the combats, perils and dangers wherein they haue beene, and in what action of warre they haue beene maimed for his seruice; the which they shall bring vnto the Duke of Montmorency, Peere and Constable of France, to be verified exactly by him, to make a liste signed with his hand, and to note in the margent what annual pension euery one may merit in his opinion, according to their qualitie, valour and wounds. And those which haue serued in the regiments, garrisons, and companies on foote, shall bring the like attestations to the Duke of Espernon, Collonell generall of the French foote, or (in the absence of the said Constable and Collonell) to the two eldest Marshals of France which shall be then in Court, to make the like liste, and in the same forme, verified by the great Almoner of France, one of the Secretaries of State, and the Lords of Souuray, Chasteauvieux, and Rochepot, Knights of the order, and councellers of State; which listes being brought vnto the King, and deliuered into the hands of one of the Secretaries of Estate whom he shall appoint, there shall euery yeare a rolle be made of maymed men, and others, whome his Maiestie will entertaine, and of the Pensions which shall be assigned to euery one, payable by him that shall haue that charge, vpon the paines contained in the order of his Maiesties Exchequer, who to iudge of differences according to the accustomed formes of Iustice, hath erected a Soueraigne chamber, consisting of the sayd Noble men, and other worthy personages, as you may read in the originall.

Wisdom of the King to maintaine his people in concord.

From this godly and charitable Act, we passe vnto another, which doth witnesse that the King, as a common father to all his subiects, will not only maintaine them in peace in this age, but will also continue the quiet of their soules, seeing that our ayre cannot be purged from trouble, without the cleanness of consciences in diuine seruice. His Maiestie hath lent one eare vnto the Clergie; and now on the nineteenth of August, he opens the other to the humble petitions of them which professe the religion granted by the Edi&t of Nantes: and desiring to make them enioy the contents of his Edi&t, and the priuate articles granted in consequence thereof, hee ordaines that the modifications, and restrictions which haue beene made by his courts of Parliament, chambers of account, and other officers, contrary to the tenure thereof, shall be taken away, and to that end all letters, and necessary commandements should be made. Moreover he did enioyne his said courts, to inrolle the said Edi&ts and articles (if it were not done) in their Bayliwikes, and Seneschallies. And commanding all Bayliffes and Seneschalls to send them into their iurisdiccions, to the end that no man should pretend cause of ignorance. Inioyning all Iudges, Proctors generall, and their substitutes, to cause them to be exactly obserued, and for default thereof, to answer it in their proper and priuate names. And granting to them of the said religion, many demands and speciall orders which rise from the Edi&t: His Maiesty enioynes them on the one side, to carry themselves according to the Edi&t, auoyding all occasion of scandall: and on the other side to Catholikes, to carry the like moderation and wisdom for feare of stumbling. Thus hee makes knowne how desirous hee is, that all his subiects should enioy with concord, the peace which hee hath heeretofore purchased for them with so much toyle and sweat.

Ceremonies of the Dauphins christning, and of the Ladies and Givers.

As the King seekes by his bounty to entertaine his people with concord, and so to raise them to the top of prosperity and happinesse: So we now see that God doth giue him euident signes of the fauour and loue, which he powreth forth vpon Princes which raigne according to his heart. He doth now seale to vs in particular the wonders of his loue to this realme, by a gage which makes our hearts to leape with consolation and ioy, 1606. A ioy, to remember the feare wherein wee lately liued, seeing our selues in danger to fall into the miseries which threaten estates wanting an assured successor. And retiring vs from the valleys and gulphes of this misery, hee hath giuen vs an ample subiect to acknowledge his free bounty. For one of the greatest blessings which heauen can poure vpon man, is to haue many children, which carry the Image of the father, and make him as it were to reuiue in their birth. So as from a liuely roote grow new plants, which produce the like fruites vnto their stock. The Soueraigne protector of this monarchie, hath now supported the peace and quiet of France, with three pretious pillars of his bounty, and we behold them as firme supports of his grace.

Their birth hath made them children to mortall Princes, whom the holy Scripture honors with the title of Gods; and hath opened vnto them the gates of realmes, and transitory principallities: but it was expedient, that by a spirituall regeneration they should become the children of the great immortall God; and that baptisme giuing them entry into the church of Christ, it should open them the way also to the immortall and celestiaall heauen, printing in their faces the characters of the children of God, as vpon their fore-heads, the Image of God himselfe. The Sacrament of Baptisme had beene giuen them within few dayes after they were borne; but the ceremonies were deferred vntill an opportunity. The King had long desired it, if many encounters had not crost the complement. The death of Pope Clement the eight had staied it. Leo the 11 (before Cardinall of Florence) did in a manner see the last of his dayes with the first of his Papacie; Paul the fifth his successor, being aduertised that the celebration of the ceremonies and solemnities was appointed the fourteenth of September, hee wrote vnto Francis Cardinall of Loyeuse; That he would haue them done by his Ministry in the blessing of the Lord: and that seeing he could not assist in person, he had made choise of him to performe this complement, according to the dignity of the Apostolike See, and of the children of the eldest sonne of the Church; seeing that by the honour of his ranke, by the nobility of his blood, by his wisdom, fidelity and experience in affaires, he was pleasing vnto the King, and acceptable vnto the Realme.

The Princes and Noblemen in court did contend who should exceed each other in brauery and expence. A small patterne will make vs to iudge of the whole peece, omitting to relate it all in particular. In the hilt of a stately sword which the Duke of Espernon caused to be made, there were set eightene hundred Diamonds, whereof the richest was at twenty crownes price, and the least at foure or fife, which hilt (as the gold-smith said that made it) came to thirty thousand crownes. Our Ladies Church in Paris was appointed for this royall spectacle, but by reason of the infection, it was translated to Fontainebleau, which the good King Saint Lewis called his desert and solitary place.

Thus the fourteenth of September, being a cleare and bright day, was notwithstanding lighted with many torches and tapers: and the ceremony was performed about fife of the clock at night in the court of the dungeon, (for neither the chapell, nor the greatest hall in the castle, was capable to containe so many thousands which came to this rare sight) vpon a great and high Theater, hung about with rich and sumptuous tapestry; in the middelt whereof was a square with fife sadome in compasse, inclosed with barres couered with tapestrie, and carpets vnder foote. In the front thereof was an Altar richly adorned with the ornaments of the order of the Holy Ghost, and couered with a cannopie of the ornaments of the sayd order. Behinde the table there was a degree of three steps couered with tapestrie; and in the middelt thereof a kinde of great stoole, adorned with cloth of siluer, vpon the which were placed the Fontes couered with an exquisite towell, and ouer them a cannopie. On eyther side of the Altar was a scaffold prepared for the musicke. Beneath it, and one the right hand, was a forme couered with tapestry for many Prelates. Among others there were three Archbishops, nine Bishops, and three Abbots. On the left hand were the Noblemen of the councell: And before the Altar the Cardinall of Gondie, enuironed with 1606. with many Almoners and Chaplaines, and a great number of beholders, seated as they are in Theaters. About the Theater were all the Suisses of his gard, every one holding a burning Torche in his hand.

My Lord the Daulphin, and the Ladyes his Sisters were in their chambers, vpon great beddes made like a Tribunall, after a royall manner, vnder a cloath of Estate, with coverings of powdred Ermines, and they were carried to the square table, their gentlemen seruants going before, every one with a waxe candle in his hand, being followed by the Gentlemen of the Chamber, with Drummes, Fifes, Trumpets, Howboyes, Herald, and the Knights of the Holy-ghost, with the three honours following.

First, for the yongest Lady, the cup, the bason, the pillow, the candle, the creame, and the salt-seller, were carried by the Baron of La Chastre, by the Lords of Montig. B ny, Rochepot, Chemerauld, Lien-Court, and the Marshall of Feruaques; the Marshall of Boisdaulphin, carried the Lady, being followed by Charles Duke of Lorraine the God-father, and by D. John de Medicis, brother to Ferdinand great Duke of Tofcane, representing Christierne, daughter to the Duke of Lorraine, and wife to the great Duke, after whome marched the Duchesse of Guise, the Countesses of Guiche, and Saulx; the Marquise of Montlaur, with other Ladies.

The Marshalls of Lauerdin and La Chastre; the Duke of Suilly ( before Marquis of Rosny ) the Dukes of Montbason, Espernon, and Esquillon, did the like office for the eldest Lady. The Lord of Ragny carried her in the place of Diana Duchesse of Angoulesme, who represented the Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, Archduchesse of Austria, being followed by the daughters of Rohan, Montmorentie, and Mayenne, who were Virgins, and the Duchesses of Rohan, Suilly, and others.

The third honour for the Daulphin, was serued by the Earle of Vaudemont, the Knight of Vendosme, the Duke of Vendosme his elder brother, ( both base children to the King. ) The Duke of Montpensier, the Earle of Soissons, the Prince of Conty, all three Princes of the blood. The Daulphin was carried by the Lord of Souray his Gouvernour, in the place of the Prince of Conde, the first Prince of the blood, who by reason of sicknesse, could not doe him any other seruice but to holde him by the hand. The Duke of Guise carried his traine; and the Cardinall of Ioyeuse, followed him, representing Paul the fifth being Pope: They were attended on by Elenor, wife to Vincent Duke of Mantoua, and the Princesses of the blood, richly attired.

The Daulphin being brought to the square Table, the Cardinall of Gondy being appointed to performe this ceremonie, hee came neere vnto him, and hauing heard him answere pertinently to questions hee asked him, according to the ordinary forme, and to rehearse the Lords Prayer and Creede in Latine, hee was blest, and annoynted, and called Lewis by the Cardinall of Ioyeuse the Popes Legate; at the naming of whome they might see ioye appeare in the Kings countenance, shewing by the exterior, the inward contentment hee receiued, remembring that Saint Lewis the ninth of that name, King of France, is the author of that family of Clermont, E from whence is issued that of Bourbon, sitting at this day in the Throne of his holy predecessor: and the ioy of the assembly did witness, that his name is very pleasing and of a good presage to France. The Ladyes were afterwards carried to the Table one after another; and the eldest was named by the Duchesse of Angoulesme, representing the Archduchesse her God-mother without a God-father, Elizabeth: ( which the Spaniards call Isabella ) the yongest was named Christierne by Don John of Medicis, for the great Duchesse.

At the banker, the King was serued by the Princes of his blood. The Prince of Condy held the place of Butler. The Prince of Conty of Cup-bearer. The Earle of Soissons had the place of Lord Steward, And the Duke of Montpensier of Caruer. The Duke of Guise, and the Earle of Vaudemont, serued the Queene: and the Duke of Suilly, the Legate. The God-fathers and God-mothers were ten, and then the Princes, Ladyes, and Noblemen. At the dancing, the Duke of Lorraine did preced by A proceeded by the Kings order, in consideration onely that he was a good and gracious Father.

The next day was spent in running at ring, and the Duke of Suilly caused an assault to be giuen by night to an artificiall Castle, with an infinite number of Squibs, cannon shot, and other fireworkes. But there was neuer any thing more admirable to the eye, nor more incredible vnto the eare, then the beauty, brauery and luster of the Princes and Ladies of the Court. Mans eye could not indure the shining of the gold, the brightness of the siluer, nor the glittering of the pearles, and pretious stones, which couered their robes, and the Princes and Noblemen were attired in the most rare and precious stuffes that could be found out. The Queenes robe hauing two and thirty thousand Pearles, and thirty thousand diamonds, made it to bee without peare and without price.

This yeare about Easter, there were such violent winds and stormes throughout all France, as the tops of houses being cast downe, many were slaine and sore hurt in Paris, so as they could not goe safely through the streets: In the country old growne trees were torne vp by the rootes, but although there were a great spoile of men, houses, and trees at land, yet was it not so fearefull as at sea, whereas many suffered shipwracke and perished in these tempests.

In May the riuer of Seine being much risen by the abundance of raine which had fallen, the King and Queene comming from Saint Germaines, the Carroch being in the passage boate and comming to land, the horses going forth thrust backe the boate with the force of their feete, and ouerturned the Charroch into the riuer, so as the Queene was in great danger of drowning the Courtiers leapt into the riuer to rescue her, but Casteneyre, ( a Gentleman of a Noble family ) advanced the rest, freed her from danger and brought her to land, to the Kings great content: she rewarded her deliuey with a rich chaine of stones.

In Iuly the Prince of Conty tooke to his second wife Chatherine of Lorraine, daughter to the Duke of Guise, that was slaine at Blois, and of Catherine of Cleues, who was one of the daughters and Coheires of the Duke of Neuers, uniting the houses of Bourbon and Lorraine in mutuall loue by this allyance, whereby it seemed all future ielousies being taken away, both houses would hereafter continue good friends, for there is no greater bond to tye Noble families together, then marriages, and the frutefull issue which descends of them.

The infectious plague hauing begone to disperse it selfe, by reason of their stolne burialls, and the little care they had to preuent the danger, in Autumne it grew very violent, and to be generally dispersed ouer the whole City: Such as had meanes were forced to retyre them-selues to their farmes, and country houses, to auoide the danger.

The straightnesse of their Pest-house did increase the mischefe, being easely gotten when as they did liue and conuerse together, for such as were infected did infect others being not lodged a part: the which was not foreseene in time by the Magistrates: besides the Pesthouse being in the furthest end of Saint Iagues suburbes, such as were infected on the other side of the City, not able to endure so long a carriage, died by the way, and some yet breathing, were buried for dead by them that carried them. To preuent the like inconuenience hereafter they began to thinke of an other Pesthouse of an admirable struature, in an other part of the city, as you shall hereafter heare: winter comming on the Plague ceased in Paris, and was dispersed into the country, whereas many were toucht that had fled from it in the City.

I wil be bold to relate a memorable accident, though out of France, yet neere vnto the frontier. A gentleman of Sauoy called Charmet, going in September after his accustomed manner, into the next woods to hunt some wild beasts, hauing noe other armes but a peece and a dagger,

and

1606. and for his compaion a fierce dogge, of a mastie kind, which would hunt vpon the sent, A and find out their dens: hauing wandred long in this wood: and lost his way, being very penfue hee comes at last againe into his way the day being neere spent; hee not gone farre but hee was incountried by foure theues, who with their swords drawne came to assaile him, who finding him selfe vnable to make resistance against soe many hee incourageth his dogge, and with his peece kills one of the theues; the other three presse him in such sort, as hee studied how hee might flie from them, his dogge takes another of the theues by the throat and staies him; beeing thus intangled by the dogge; the Gentleman gets a way his sword, and then resumng courage hee chaseth away the rest, whome the dogge pourfued with all eagerneffe, but his Maister beate him backe, who beeing thus freed from theues, hee went to the next village called Saint A. B bain, where hee tells his misfortunes, and shewes both his and his dogges wounds, perswading both the Iustice and the inhabitants to pursue these theues, whoe presently went into the woode, and followed them by their footing, hauing bene often molested by their theeuing; They could not bee long hidden; In the end they found three young men in an hoftry standing out of the way, beeing a receptacle for such people: one of them beeing hurt in the arme argued their guilt, so all beeing carried to Chambery, they were broken and laid halfe dead vpon wheeles, suffering a condigne punishment for their murders and thefts.

Birth of the Duke of Orleans.

The King had an other Sonne, a great increse for France, the Flower de Luce is neuer in danger when there be Males, they bee the ruine of home-bred seditions, and a perpetual support of the Salique Lawe: this last borne son had the title of Duke of Orleans giuen him. It is one of the goodliest Dukedomes in the whole Kingdome, and is next vnto the Daulphin; the City of Orleans stands vpon the riuier of Loyre; It is very ancient, as appeares by nationall Councells, and decrees of Popes, and in the first race of our Kings it had the title of a Kingdome, when as Clouis diuided his Realme to his three Sonnes. There were bonfires and shooting of ordinance for the birth of this Sonne, and all France did reioyce, to see the old decayed tree, reuiue againe and grow yong, by these new plants, vnder whose shadow they should finde refuge, in heat raine and tempestuous wether.

Henry the fourth, when hee was but King of Nauarre, enjoyed goodly hereditarie possessions, as well in Gasconie, Guienne, Vendosme, and generally through-out the realme, as in the Lowe-countries, and other forraigne parts, beeing come to the crowne of France, and to a greater fortune, hee made an Edi&t in Aprill, one thousand, five hundred, ninety and two: by the which hee would haue all those his reuenues of Nauarre, with the rest managed distinctly and a part, hauing a charitable care of his onely sister, whome hee loued deere, and of his creditors, to whome hee had engaged his lands before his comming to the crowne: wherefore vntill this money were payed, hee held it no Iustice to vnite those lands vnto the Crowne. The Kings Pro&tor opposed him selfe against the Kings will, saying; That by the lawes of France, all that was the Kings, did accrewe vnto the Crowne, as small streames E which fall into great riuers, and those into the Sea, loose their names. But when as the King had lost his sister (who dyed with-out children) and had payed those priuate debts, this yeare in Iune, by his Edi&t, hee vnited his realme of Nauarre, with those other dignities and possessions which hee held from his ancestors, vnto the Crowne, as they might not afterwards bee diuided. So as his officers of Nauarre lost both their places and fees.

Death of Bellieure Chancellor of France.

Pomponius Bellieure Chancellor of France, and the Nestor of our Age, left the corruption of this world, to get an incorruptible life in Heauen; Hee dedicated the first fruits of glory vnto the Senate of Lyon his natie country, but beeing called to Paris that great light, hee was well knowne vnto Kings, and finding himselfe more fit for the secret councells of Court and difficult affaires of the Kingdome, then to plead causes notwithstanding that it was his profession and had supplied the place of president, yet following

A following his owne humor he gaue his mind wholly to forraigne employments, beeing sent in many Ambassages, the which he did happily performe. He was buried with as much honor as could be desired for a man of his fashion, being followed at his funerall by many Bishops, Knights of the Order, and the whole Court of Parliament, Fenoillius appointed Bishop of Montpellier, made his funerall Sermon: hee had a Monument of Marble erected, on the which was grauen this Epitaph in golden letters. 1607.

In France, to the end that future ages might know, there is a kinde of men whose Parents were neuer knowne by name, when as they come with their griping Tallents to manage the Publike or Princes Treasure, they sodainely become all gold, as if they had bathed themselves in the riuier Pactolus; in their diet, apparrell, traine and pallaces, they exceed the greatest Dukes, how rightly many doubt, how freely all men know, yet they are terrified by an Edi&t made euery third yeere, but as it were with a still lightning, paying a small reuenue out of a great prey, beeing freed from all their villanies, they giue themselves more bloodily to theeuing.

Edi&t against them that rob the publike.

D This yeere Iudges were chosen to presse this sponge, or rather appointed to reuenge these publike thefts, abundance of wealth was now fatal vnto the owners, neither wanted they any other witnesses, then to enquire of their birth, patrimonie, and what they had gotten together, capitall questions were not troublefome, the matter was apparent.

The Marquis of Allegre had during the ciuill warres traytorously murdered Hallot at Vernon vpon Seine beeing vnarmed, comming vnto him vnder a collour of saluting him, beeing armed and with a traine of souldiers: Hee presently left the Kings partie (the which hee had maintained constantly) and fled to the League: And to the end hee might free both himselfe and the rest that were guiltie of this foule murder, hee E procured that a young man who had serued him as a Page should publicly carry Saint Romans Chase, not without the emulation of other malefactors. As many as had bene consorts in this murder were by the court of Parliament condemned and executed in Picture; and as many as could bee taken, died for the fact: for the suruiuing wife with an incredible charge did offer vnto him the bloud of the guilty, or of those which with a drie hand and ignorant of the Treason were present at the fact; after the restless rage of a couragious wife, at length this young man La Mot fell into her hands, beeing in bonds hee pleads his cause before the Parliament at Rouen, hee seeks to prooue his innocency by his tender age, by his dutie to his Lord; by his hands that were not imbrued with bloud, hauing not at that time euer drawne sword, it is not F any guilt for him to looke on, that could not auoide it; the Law doth not condemne any but such as when they might haue forbidden it, would not: The dishonour lies vpon them that behold and wincke at violence offered, and not vpon them which are vnable to repell force, but must of necessitie bee silent and still, Piso cried out to his companions which beheld his ruine, By your stilnesse you make the guilt common.

La Moss Aduocate did adde, that his case was far otherwise, then that which Iohannes Papa describes vnto Lewis the Emperour: He offends as well as the actor, who when hee can correct, neglects to amend: notwithstanding La Moss being doubtfull of his life, and loth to rely too much vpon the conceiued hope of his innocency, he hath his refuge vnto the Altars and Churches, as if they were safegards for wickednesse. Whilst his cause is in question, he appeales vnto S. Romane the reuenger of a pardoned crime, he calls the Arch-bishop Ioyeuse, and the Chanoins of Rouen to assist him in this controuersie, and to defend the priuiledges of their Saint. If it be a guilt to sin with the eyes for him whose hands were free from murder, notwithstanding although hee were the most detestable murderer liuing, by the only carrying of this chafe, the offence being pardoned, there was no more question to bee made vnto him; the ancient priuiledges of Neustria were broken, force and reproch was offered vnto their household-god, the custome had bene obserued for many ages, not newly inuented, when as by the Hebrew law, euery yeare before Easter their custome was, to set a malefactor free: neither were some citties in Palestina vnlike to Romulus Sanctuary, being built as a refuge for offenders. Gregorie of Tours doth generally in his Annals witnes, in what reuerence the Altars and Churches of the gods were, and how many offenders haue by that meanes escaped present and capital punishments. Crimes are not wiped away with blood only: there is nothing of greater efficacie to pacifie Gods wrath, then repentance, and how acceptable it is, our Saviour teacheth, when as he set the Adulteresse free, who was ready to be stoned by the seuerity of Moses law: whilst he liued vpon earth, hee did not condemne any malefactor, but did blesse, even the most wicked with his companie and table: as Paul (who was afterwards the light of the Gentils) Publicans, as Mathew Adulteresses as Magdeline. He did so often wipe away the reproches of insulting circumcised men, as he did publicly confesse, that he came into the world to cure the diseased, and that the whole had not any need of a Phisition. It is no fable that is reported of S. Romain, who slue that monstrous dragon, which annoyed Normandie, as of Hercules and his Lernean snake with seuen heads. Saint Romain drew this raging monster out of his den, and as it were made tame and bound, brought it to a publike fire in the midst of the cittie, with the helpe of a malefactor. It hath bene a custome obserued for many ages, that euery yeare an offender should be set at libertie, and haue his life giuen him.

Antiquitie is a great testimonie, and of more force then any Records: it came vnto posteritie by tradition: in the affirmation of miracles the faith of Antiquitie is more ancient then all monuments. Saint Augustine to the end hee might confirme the faith of miracles, did thus write to them that doubted. I haue not seene Christ, who was seene and did appeare, neither haue I seene them that saw him, but I haue beleued the confirmed opinion of Nations, and the report which is very authentike, this was commanded from heauen, this was deliuered vs by our Auncestors, and hath bene obserued vnto our time, so seeke to alter and peruert this, is nothing else but to seeke a sacrilegious way to Religion.

It hath bene obserued in all ages, that malefactors were freed from punishment vpon the sight of their gods. Ninus did first erect Statues, whither offenders might flie: he did set vp an Image like vnto his father Belus, whither if any one came, hee was pronounced free from the crime and punishment. The Athenians had an Altar of Mercie. The Ephesians gaue refuge to malefactors in Diana's Temple: Osiris to the Egyptians, Apollo to the Assyrians, Insiper to the Itacenses, Mynerua to the Lacedemonians, who were their Tutelarie gods. Finally, they falsly attribute to Diuels, that which Christians do now giue vnto the true God. At Rome the day before the Assumption of our Ladie, there are two offenders brought forth to execution, and giuen to the Virgin, who left examples of mercie to bee imitated, and presidents of Christian clemencie to be embraced and followed. On Palme-sunday Eue there is one deliuered out of the Chastelet at Paris.

At Vendosme in the Abbey of Saint Triade, a Malefactor, after that hee hath gone naked with a great Torch on his shoulder through the towne, being followed by the whole

A whole Clergie, and admonished by the Cryer to leade a better life, he is not only freed from his bonds, but being refreshed with good victuals, is set at libertie. The new Bishop of Orleans, at his first entrance into the Cittie, sets all criminal persons at libertie. This was giuen to God, not that through hope of impunitie offenders should grow more bold; but that their liues not being taken away, they should acknowledge to haue receiued them againe from God. Who will thinke that our wise fathers (as some malicious people say) being abused, would so long haue endured this Imposture? as if this age (which is but a step-dame to the Ancient, and hath fallen into heresie) had discovered this fraude. But we (a more wicked generation then our fore-fathers) are not wise in heart and beleeve, but with our eyes only: We giue not credit to that we see, but what we seele with our hands, when as Faith comes by hearing: neither do we approach so neere vnto God by any vertue, as by Mercie, which consists chiefly in sparing of the guiltie: For as Seneca sayd: The whole world should perish, if mercie did not temper anger. There was much more pleaded by the Aduocates for La Motte, and in defence of the ancient priuiledge of the Cathedral Church at Rouen, the which for breuitie sake I omit.

On the other side Ha's incensed wife, an implacable reuenger of a wicked murder, powred forth many bitter words: That the Altars of the gods were much defiled with this rabble of wicked men: that they were better pleased with chastity and cleanness then with sacrifices, and therefore it was vsuall among the Ancients, before they begun the sacrifice, one cryed out with a loud voyce: Go farre from hence ye men that are prophane. And the Heathen thought that the gods dwelt in their Temples: neither was it vnworthily spoken of one, The true power of dedication is that which brings in God, and sets him in his appointed place: It is not lawfull for euery man to do this, but for such as haue chaste hands, and holy hearts. And who would endure the Temples of the gods to be polluted by wicked murderers and theeues, who defile all they touch and breath on? They wrongfully produce many examples out of the Heathen, Hebrewes, and Christians, when as all Sanctuaries were instituted to protect them onely that were guiltie of murder committed by chance, or an vn-premeditated crime: for so God the Reuenger commanded: If any one bating his neighbour, hath layd waite for his life, and hath slayne him flying, and then shall fly vnto one of the aboue named Citties, the Elders shall take him, and deliuer him vnto his neere kinemen, whose blood he hath spilt, and he shall dye. Neither was the seueritie of the Churches in old time to be remooued, when as Meroue mooued with the hatred of Fredegond his step-mother, had fled vnto Saint Martins Church, (which was then very religiously worshipped by all men) King Chilperic his father (yeelding too much to a bloudie woman whom he loued) wrote a threatening letter to Gregorie of Tours: Cast that Apostata (sayd he) out of the Church, or else I will fire the whole countrey. The Emperours would not haue their Statues to protect any other, but such as were oppressed by the enemy, and power of their enemies. Lucius the 3. commands that publike theeues and way-layers should be excluded from the immunities of the Church. Vidas Papa, the light of the French lawes in his age, makes mention, that being Councelor in Daulphiné, there were two murderers drawn from the Altar to execution. The Ancients did rightly call that the Altar of mercie, to the which they were delected by the stormes of angry Fortune, & vnable to farishe: or that had vnwittingly stricken, or fallen into any other casuall crime, had fled. Neither were pardons granted but to them that were guilty of vnpremeditated murders. When as Constantine the Great at the birth of his children granted the kind of graces, he excluded murderers, way-layers, witches, and adulterers: They that maintaine this wonder of S. Romain, to absolve offenders, haue it not confirmed by any Annals and Records, but only by Antiquity. What ancient Writer (being then in a maner all Monks) would haue past ouer in silence so great a miracle of a diuall power? hauing set downe most frivolous things, yet no man writes of this serpent, which was brought downe to a publike fire, whereby we may rightly beleue there was not any such wonder. Neither is it credible, that vnder religious Kings, one malefactor or carying the chaine, a multitude of wicked men should be freed from bonds and punishment, which is the synew of ciuill A gouernement, especially vnder Lewis the ninth, who was most sparing of pardons, and if he did with a trembling hand grant any, yet he still made his Almoner, who was his Confessor acquainted therewith. But let vs allow that which is written of the most hidden secrets of the Hebrewes, that it is neither recorded in parchment, nor grauen in the barks of trees or stones, least Time should weare it out, but left vnto vs by our Fathers by long Tradition: yet in maintayning the priuiledge, the abuse is to bee corrected, euen by S. Romaines will, who when as in that worthy act, hee had but one malefactor for his companion, would haue but one afterwards to be pardoned. But in our age what a scumme of wicked men, being protected by this brazen wall, do freely laugh at publike Lawes? For by this the company of offenders is freed, any one that is past B shame, that respects not his reputation, and blusheth not at the faces of men, submitting his shoulders to this holy burthen, which he had so often subiected to the Stake, by his onely act he frees all the rest from ignominie, and absolues the absent, the which were insolent with all other Nations. Wherefore the widowes aduocate demanded La Motte head, with a longer speech, as a sacrifice to the ashes of her deare husband: the cause had many hearings, and much was written by the Clergy of Rouan for the defence of their priuiledge.

A wicked act.

In the towne of Metz there was an Ensign of the garrison called also La Motte, an insolent man, and dissolute in his life and conuersation, who being extremely in loue with C a yong virgin within the towne, resolved to win her by all allurements: if not, to get her by force. In this wicked desseigne he employed a drunken gossip, whose profession was to be a bawd, she abusing this virgin with an honest shew, brings her into the souldiers house, like a sheepe to the wolfe and slaughter, being shut vp into a prison, he rauisheth her: her miserable parents are continually tormented for the want of her: they run vp and downe weeping and crying that their daughter is stolne away: they moue the Iudges to seeke her out and to reuenge: they hauing sent for the Captaines of the Garison, who were suspected of this rape, aduised them speedily to deliuer the virgin vntoched vnto her complaining parents. La Motte the rauisher stood by, who being struck D with the Prætors voyce, and the horror of his offence, trembles and apprehends the punishment of his fact: he goes home, & resolves to adde one wickednes to another, and performes it; if he should restore the virgin deflowred, there were no meanes to escape punishment: wherefore the first villany must be hidden by another. This cruel man, who had learned in warlike slaughters not to feare blood, doth not keep his cruel hands from the murder of this virgin: he bereaues her both of life and honor: and left there shold be some markes of this murder to discover him, he cuts the body in peeces, and putting it into a sacke, casts it into the next riuer. This foule fact lay hidden vntill that this libidinous Ensigne-bearer had taken away another mayd from a garrison souldier with the like lust, who not bearing this indignity, complained to the Gouverneur. La Motte E with the bawd (who was accustomed to corrupt yong mayds) and the bawdes seruant, were committed to prison, they refuse to be tryed by the Iudge of that place, but soon after the first fact, which hee thought Time had worne out of memorie, beganne to breake forth: for the bawde and his seruant being examined apart, the truth be-ganne to shew it selfe, but there wanted a competent Iudge to proceede in the cause.

At length the matter was referred to the great Councell, there to be tryed: and they were all carryed bound to Paris, where being put to the Racke, the Bawde and her seruant not being able to indure the extremitie of the torments, did willingly con-fesse all the fact, whereupon they were condemned to the Gallows, and La Motte to loose his head, who hearing of this farall sentence, beganne to storme, and refused to bee bound and ledde to the place of execution, hee striues with the Hang-man F and Sergeants: in the end being cast vpon the Ground raging like a madde man, they bind him and carrie him out vpon their shoulders, and put him into a Cart, being come vnto the Scaffold, hee shewed no more mildnesse, but much lesse modestie

lence of a confused man.

1608.

A modestie and resolution then was befitting an Officer that professed Armes. He renues his rage and violence, and presseth his friends that were about him to go to the King to sue for his pardon: He that was now dying did still liue in hope. The Duke of Esper-non, remembring his valour, had sued for his pardon: and Queene Marguerite going late to the King at night, had bene very importunat for him, but the King, ouer-come with no prayers, commanded he should dye. La Motte being told that the King would not be moued for his pardon, and being aduised to take his death resolutely, and to forbear these intemperate humors which did not become a gallant Souldier, the which in publike were taken for signes of basenesse: That he which had so often B sought death in the thickest troupes, should not now feare a Hang-man. Being at last made more calme, he kneeled downe, suffered his eyes to be couered, submitted his necke to the blocke, and lost his head.

In the beginning of this yere the cold was so violent as it killed Corne, Vines and Trees, especially those that had any pith. There had not bene so hard a Winter scene in many ages. The swiftest riuers were so frozen, as Carts laden with great Burthens, went as freely ouer them, as vpon the firme land, the stockes of Vines euen to the very Roote withered away, with the force of the cold, neither did they spring againe, vnlesse they were cut off, all Nurres although they were old, and had very hard shelles withered away, and which is wonderfull, Medlar trees and other which are most firme C dried away. The breath going hotte from the mouth, grew presently white with cold, water taken hotte from the fire grew presently hard, and the Wine which was in the Caves would not runne out of the Vessels: so as in many places they were fayne to cutte it with Hatchets: as Bellay reports happened in his time, when as the Kings Armie wintred in the Duchie of Luxembourg. The riuer of Seine was so frozen as the King and Courtiers attending vpon him, passed it daily ouer without feare or suspi-tion of danger. The people who liued vpon their daily prouision, were much opprest for want of wood.

Henry of Bourbon, Prince of the bloud, Duke of Montpensier, and Prince of Dombes, hauing languished two yeares of sicknesse, and wasted to the very bones, D being not able to receiue any sustenance, was nourished (as they say) with womans milke. A little before his end the Duke of Orleans, the Kings second sonne, was made sure to his onely daughter, his house hauing this support, by the perswasion of father Angelo his father-in-law, hee left all worldly cares, and applied himselfe to heavenly meditations. The sharpenesse of the Winter did hasten his lingring end: for the force of it was so piercing, as it not onely dried vp his bowels being weake, but many (the cold growing milder) went away suddenly, as the Phisitions sayd. Being then of the age, which makes a man of a goodly representation, rich in wealth, fauoured by his King, followed like a Prince, and abounding in the gifts of fortune, and the vertues of the mind, remayning still constant in the Catholike Faith: He dyed in the armes of his E Father-in-law and wife, without any motion, like vnto a Lampe whose oyle is spent.
His funerall pompe was prepared: an Image of Waxe was made like vnto himselfe liuing, and layed in a stately bedde with golden furniture, and the Armes of the House of Bourbon about it, where as his Table was serued eight dayes together in the same State and magnificencie as if hee had bene liuing. His funerall Rights were performed in our Ladies Church.

Petrus Fenossius the Kings Preacher, and appointed Bishop of Montpellier, did after the accustomed manner commend the Prince, with a learned Oration, where as all the Courtiers mourned. But his death happening about Shroue-tide, all their v-suall sports were layd aside, many grieuing at the cost they had bestowed for this F pompe. The Dauphins maske with the young Noblemen about him (for that it had bene importuned in this time of mourning) was deferred, till that Montpensiers obsequies were ended according to his dignitie: which done, his body was carried to his house at Champigny in Poistou, and there layd in the Graue with his Ancestors, with the like princely pompe.

Iesuites admitted to go into Nauarre.

The Iesuites could not be containd in one kingdome: as they had beene receiued A into France, so they did desire to haue free access into Nauarre, and Bearne, for the propagation of Religion: That there was no cause of difference why they should not be admitted into the one Realme as well as into the other, seeing they were subiect to one Lord. They of Bearne opposed themselues with all violence, who hated the Iesuites, no lesse then Philip did Demoithenes, and the other chiefe Cittizens of Athens, who were the defenders of the Atticke Libertie.

The King beeing at Blois in the yeare 1599. granted by the Edi& to them of the Religion of Nauarre and Bearne: That no Iesuite should come within their Confinnes, least they should breed some innouation that might trouble the publike quiet: yet the B Bishoppes in the Countrey requiring the contrarie, the King changing his resolution, decreed, That they should be admitted into all places as well as the other Orders, abrogating the contrarie Edi&: and protesting that his meaning was to send the Iesuites thither, to assist the Bishoppes to re-plant the Catholike Faith. All the Iudges and Officers in the Countrey were wonderfully discontented; for they hated the Iesuites about all Creatures living, keeping them farre from their limits, and in former times they put them to death like Spies, if they found any: but the Maiestie of Henry the fourth, is growne so great, as his power is feared as well at the foote of the Pyrennee Mountaines, which distinguish France from Spaine, as in Paris, and is as willingly obeyed. A rare felicitie of a Prince, which happens not to many, whose presences are respected but when they are retired, they are like vnto the Sunne, which beeing set cloudes arise, so do Fa&ions by their absence.

Francis Fauna
a cunning Impostor.

We will relate a memorable fact, and the fatall end of a most wicked man and cunning Impostor, of whom all Europe hath spoken. He was another Proteus, and transformed himselfe into sundrie shapes. Sometimes he called himselfe Cesar Florio, another time Francis Fauna; sometimes a Geneuois, another time a Neapolitane: sometimes he counterfeited himselfe a Phisition, and sometimes a Marchant, but at his triall he termed himselfe Francis Fauna, which we will keepe. He was borne in a little towne called Capriola, in the territories of Genoua; he spent his youth in many voyages, professing Phisicke: beeing foure and thirtie yeares old, he came to Nouara, and there making gaine of his phisicall profession, he becomes a Suter to a Marchants daughter called Catherina Oliua; the father fearing that this stranger had another wife, desired to haue some certificate of his countrey and parents. He who was exceeding cunning in counterfeiting of any hand, draws an instrument himselfe, annexing a seale vnto it, whereby the Iudge of Saint Seuerin, a little towne neere vnto Naples, doth certifie all men, that Fauna was borne there, a frugall man, of the Tribe and family of Fiori, the which was an ancient, and not obscure house. The Marchant of Nouara knowing no deceit, giues him his daughter in marriage, beeing at length wearie of the place and name, hee gettes him into a Towne of the Iurisdiction of Placentia, called Castelarca, with his wife and three children remayning, and small store of stufte: and beeing impatient of his fortune, finding himselfe vnable to maintaine a family with so little means, he gaue his mind to incredible villanies, and hauing gathered together fifty Crownes in Gold, he comes to Naples, whereas when he had fought out among the Bankers, that Alexander Bossa was the chiefe, he gets him a long gowne, and counterfeits himselfe an Abbot. He insinuates with this Banker, and perswades him that he hath a Nephew at Venice, which dealt in his businesse, desiring him to make him ouer fiftie Crownes to be payed at Venice by exchange by his Correspondent. Bossa who suspected no deceit, writes his letters, and hauing receiued the mony, deliuers them to this Impostor, who doth imitate it daily, vntill in the end he could counterfeit Bossa's hand. After fiftene dayes he restored the letters againe vnto Bossa, and receiued his own, pretending that his Nephew, hauing ended his businesse, was gone fr& Venice. Conuersing thus with the Banker, he gathered vp some straggling letters, which lay disperfed being of no moment. And he being from home, he goes vnto his booke-keeper, and desires him to lend him paper and a seale, hauing good oportunitie to write vnto his friends, 1608.

A friends, the messenger beeing in halt; hauing good leisure in the absence of Bossa, being a speedy writer, hee writes six letters soderly, and seales them with Bossa's seale; he deuised this fraud that he might obserue the forme of his paper, and the manner of his seale. Finding no such paper at Naples, hee buies the like at Ancona, and counterfeits the seale, the which hee keepe for to effect his villany.

During his aboad at Naples, he was encouraged by a pardon granted for the like offence; there was one that had counterfeited a Bankers letters condemned to be hanged, going to execution, and meeting with the Viceroy of Naples, and the Cardinall of Agnanina, hee was deliuered, so as hee expected the like grace if he were taken in the like offence. Soone after hee came to Padoua with a shauen crowne, counterfeiting himselfe to be a Priest. In this habit he goes in the euening to visit the Bishop of Concordia, and faines himselfe to be the Bishop of Venafrey in the Kingdome of Naples, who was forced to flic his country, vpon suspicion of adultery with the Duke of Caietans Neece, whereof hee was falsly accused by his ill willers: that being banished from his country and house, hee had beene at Rome to purge himselfe vnto the Pope of so foule a fact, but the hatred of his great enemies had made him to yeeld to their enuy, who hauing often sought his life by poyson and force, hee had secretly escaped out of Rome in a poore Priests habit, and had fled vnto him as vnto a Sanctuary and safe refuge. Hee intreates him to fauour a miserable man and a vagabond, and that hee would finde him some trusty man, vnder whose name hee might safely receiue at Venice tenne thousand ducates of gold which hee had left in trust at Naples with Ian Baptista Carraciola Marquis of Saint Elmi: That in his aduersity the sayd Marquis and the Archbishop of Bari his brother, had beene his great fauourers: and that he might requite this kindnesse with some good turne, hee had betrothed his Neece vnto the Marquis with a doury of a hundred and fiftie thousand crownes, and the money which hee had left in deposito was to buy chaines, iewels and other ornaments for women, whereby hee might purchase his returne into his country. The Bishop of Concordia greewing at his misfortune, promifeth him all helpe, and to giue him a faithfull man to negotiate his businesse, namely Anthony Bartholonius a Banker, by whom hee might D safely receiue the money at Venice which hee had left at Naples. This counterfeit Priest answered that he thought it very conuenient, and hauing giuen him thanks he retired himselfe secretly.

This practise was confirmed by one of the Bishop of Concordias seruants, who sayd hee had seene him at Rome, in a Bishops weed, so as if there had beene any suspicion of fraude, the Bishop by the Testimony of his old seruant had easily freed it. Fauna faines that hee had written to Naples to Caracciola, and letting passe so many daies as a post might goe from Padoua to Naples, and returne from thence to Venice, hee giues a packet to Ossauio Oliua his wiues brother, being acquainted with his cossenage: the which like a flying post hee brought to Angelo Bossa at Venice, beeing vnle to E Alexander at Naples: hauing opened the packet, hee read the letter that was written vnto himselfe, and other three written from the Marquis Caracciola, whereof one was to the Bishop of Concordia, an other to him of Venafrey, and the third to Anthony Bartholonius.

These three letters are sent from Venice to Padoua, to the Bishop of Concordia: hauing read that which was written to himselfe, hee sends for the counterfit Bishop, and deliuers him his, the third vnto Bertholonius beeing then at Venice, with charge that he should receiue the money for his fellow and friend the Bishop. All these letters were counterfit, and written by Fauna, that written by Alexander Bossa, was of that paper which hee had bought at Ancona, and sealed with his seale, the other of the F Marquis of Caracciola was as cunningly counterfit. Alexander Bossa's letter to Angelo contained these words. You shal understand that the Marquis of Saint Elmi, within three daies after that the Archbishop his brother shalbe come to Naples, is to deliuer unto mee tenne thousand ducates, to the end that you deliuer so much to Anthony Bertholonio a Marchant at Venice, to buy pearles, precious stones & other iewels of that kind. This 1608. The letter to the counterfeit Bishop of Venafrey was written in this sence,, I haue A understood by your letters, that you are safe in the Bishop of Concordia house, who hath promised you the helpe and assistance of Anthony Bertholonius a Marchant at Venice, by his meanes you shall receiue ten thousand ducats, which you left with mee, within three daies after that my brother the Archbishop shalbe returned to Naples, I will send a letter vnder Bertholonius certifying, that you may receiue that money for the buying of Jewels. That which was written to Bertholonius contained these words.

 * I understand by the Bishop of Concordia that I am to pay ten thousand ducats to buy Jewels; within three daies hee wilbe here that should deliuer the money, hauing receiued it, I will presently deliuer it to Alexander Bosfa, from whom I will take a bill for the payment B of so much to you at Venice.

Within three daies after Faua suggests that hee had receiued five other letters by a Post one was written to Francis Bordenali factor to Alexander Bosfa, an other from the sayd Alexander to Angelo, the three others to himselfe falsely called Bishop of Venafrey, to the Bishop of Concordia, and to Bertholonius, all counterfeit. The bill of exchange went in these words,, Hauing read this letter, within three daies after or sooner, without expecting any other aduice, pay vnto Anthony Bertholonius a Marchant and Banker of Venice, ten thousand ducates, the which we haue receiued from the Marquis of Saint Elmi, to buy pearles and Jewels, and if Bertholonius will exceed C this summe, doubt not to giue it him, for the Marquis hath left a thousand ducats more in deposito with vs. The letter which was written to Bertholonius spake thus,,
 I send you billes of exchange for ten thousand ducates, whereof I made mention in my former writing three daies since, you shall deliuer it to the Banker, and hauing re-ceiued the money, you shall buy precious stones, pearles, gold chaines and such like, according to the direction of my Lord Bishop of Concordia. Hee aduiseeth Faua to to goe himselfe to Venice, and to make choise of that rich ware, wherein there was much deceite: hee yeelds to his aduice, and hauing letters of commendation to Be-rtholonius, taking for his companion Ianus Peter Oirua another of his wiues brethren, he goes to Venice, salutes Bertholonius, and deliuereth him the Bishop of Concordias letters. He not knowing what a Scorpion he did nourish in his bosome, entertained D Faua for his guest, and did reuerence him as a Prelate: hauing receiued the bill of exchange from him hee presents it to Angelo Bosfa, who accepts it, and promiseth paiement accordingly, whereupon Bertholonius goes about to make choise of his pearles, he giues a scantling vnto the Gold-smith, hauing seene the ware, hee paies the price that was agreed vpon; During this businesse this counterfeit Bishop staid some daies in Bertholonius house, where hee carried a very religious shew, hauing alwaies a Breuiary in his hand, still mumbling his praies like an Ape, so as he was held to be very deuout; And when as he went abroad, he put on such a countenance, as hee was taken of al men for a reuerend Bishop, and was much esteemed by the General of the Venecian Gallies, hauing carefully inquired of Bertholonius of the fame and life of this Pre-lat. And to the end he might more safely abuse Bertholonius, he told him of his misfortunes, of his proscription, of the mallice of his enemies, and repeats vnto him what hee had sayd vnto the Bishop of Concordia, adding that he had an intent to goe to Turin to speake with the Marquis of Este, who was going into Spaine about the marriage of the Duke of Mantouas son, with the Duke of Sauoies daughter, to intreat him to procure him letters to the Viceroy of Naples that he might be restored to his country & Bishoprike. Whilst hee remained with Bertholonius hee discoursed of matters of State, especially about the controuersie betwixt the Venetians and the Bishop of Rome, seeming often to take their parts, yet with such moderation as hee dissented from the Ve-necians only for religions cause. He often and very fitly talked of accidents which happened vnto him, that he had bin sent Nuntio from Pope Clement the 8. vnto the Emperor Rodolphus, that besides his intertainmēt, he had spent of his own in this Ambassage 15000. crowns, for the which charge he had receiued no grace, when as by the Iudge-ment of the Archbishop of Barry & other states men he had deserued a Cardinals hat;
Bertholonius

A Bertholonius looking wishly on him at the Table, sayd vnto him; Unlesse I be much acceused I haue seene you else-where, the which Faua did affirme, and unlesse my memory and mine eyes wander, I thinke it was in the Marquis of Palauicines Palace, vpon the riuier of Sallo, where wee did recreate our selues with fishing.

True it is that Faua was neuer there, yet whether that hee had learned of some other that Bertholonius had bene in the Marquisses house, and there taken delight in fishing, or that hee had some diuining spirit, hee did so intermixt truth with his lies, as Be-rtholonius was forced to confesse that which had neuer happened. The businesse being thus effected by this counterfeit Prelate, he writes vnto the Bishop of Concordia, that the Jewels being bought according to his desire, he ment to depart the next day early, that they might bee at Padoua before noone, desiring Bertholonius that going into Piedmont he would let him haue Martin his oldest seruant for a companion. Bertholo-nius hauing taken a discharge from the Bishop of Concordia, deliueres all the Jewells to Faua who gaue him a note for the receite thereof. Faua hauing packt vp all, hee offered Bertholonius a large reward for his paines, besides his brokedge, the which in regard of the Bishop of Concordia hee would by no means receiue. But heare the villany of a most wicked guest, who fearing if for want of money he should make sale of any Jewells, hee should discouer his fraude by his want: Whilst hee lay in the Venetians house, hee had obserued that there was money in a chest in the Chamber where hee was lodged, hee pickes open the locke, and steales fiue hundred crownes from his hoste, and lockes the chest againe, so as his theft could not be discouered. Hee goes to Padoua with Bertholonius, who was ignorant of this villany, and hauing giuen many thanks to the Bishop of Concordia, and commended his care who had giuen him so carefull an hoste and factor, being impatient of all delay, making hast as hee sayd to Turin, hee retired himselfe. Bertholonius returning home, and opening his chest, hee found it empty, but to suspect the Prelate of this, his dignity and profession did forbid him.

The next day Bertholonius receiued nine thousand ducates from Angelo Bosfa: but behold there comes a Post with all speed from Naples, to aduertise Angelo that his D Nephew Alexander had giuen no billes of exchange to the Marquis of Saint Elmi.
 The fraude being discouered, inquiry is made for Charles Pirritus professing himselfe Bishop of Venafrey, and a warrant granted to apprehend him. Bertholonius and Bosfa certified the Bishop of Concordia, how they haue bene all abused, so as they hunt ouer all Italy for him but in vaine: And they giue notice vnto forraigne Nations of the villany of this man, of his theft and flight, but they make perticular mention of the Jewels, and of the weight of the pearle, with the collour and forme of the scales. The description of this theft is sent to Lumagne a Banker at Paris, who giues notice thereof to all the gold-smithes.

Faua went not to Turin, as hee made shew, but gets him home, and acquaints his E wife and children with his intent to goe into France, that hee had store of gold and pretious stuffe, whereupon hee instantly changed his aboad, and went backe againe to Venice with his wife, three children, and Ostauio and Peter Olinia his wiues brethren, and Ostauio misliking this voyage into France returned home. Passing from thence with all his family through the Grisons and Suisses, hee came in Nouember to Paris, and there hired him a chamber. Faua thinking himselfe in a safe country, studied where hee should settle himselfe, not at Paris, by reason of the concourse of Italians and other Nations, alwaies fearing the misfortunes which fell vpon him, but at Poyctiers, or Angiers; He writes to Francis Corfina, who gouerned an Apotaries shop at Brusselles, requiring him to come speedily to Paris, that hee had store of gold wherewith they would buy drugs and set vp a shop for Phisicke, and that hee should F haue an equall share in the gaine. Whilst he expects an answer from Corfina, hee offers some Jewels to sell to a Gold-smith called Bourgoing, intreating him to helpe him to a broker by whose meanes hee might make sale thereof; The Gold-smith pro-miteth him his owne labour, and receiues foures cafes, for the which hee giues him a note

note of his hand. He shewes one of them to Maurice and Turket, two Jewellers, who viewing by their notes the forme and red collour finde it to bee stollen: They make an agreement betwixt them to diuide the reward which was promised vpon the recovery of the goods, and then they acquainted the Lieutenant Criminall therewith, who leauing his habit did counterfeit himselfe a Marchant, and attended Fauas returne, who came soone after, inquiring of the Gold-smith, if he had found out any one to buy his Jewels, yes marry haue I sayd he, very sufficient and wealthy men, the which Faua, thinking to be true, he that had often circumuented others, fearing no deceit in this counterfeite Chap-man, he drew forth his cases of Jewels, the which by the marke that came from Venice were knowne to bee the same. Faua seeing the Marchants to obserue the seales very precisely beganne to feare, and to the end hee might withdraw himselfe, he pretended that hee had some present businesse with another Marchant at home, and that hee would returne presently whilest they were viewing of the Jewels. But the Iudge discovering who hee was, apprehends Faua, hee examines him of his other cases, who doth not deny but hee had tenne more, the which could not bee hidden, wherevpon the Iudge went with Bourgoing the Gold-smith to Fauas lodging, where they finde the number of the cases, and the waight of the gold and Jewels, and take an Inuentory thereof. This cunning wretch seeing himselfe brought into these straights, intreates that he may not be ouerthrowne with the losse of so rich Marchandise, when as his life, good name, and the helth of his wife and children were vnder the protection of the Law and Iustice.

Faua seeing his villany discovered thus dies how to flie.

Examination of Faua.

The day of his apprehension hee was examined of whence hee was; how old hee was, and of what profession? Hee answered that hee was called Francis Faua, borne at Capriola, a towne in the territories of Genoa, that hee profest physick and was five and fortie yeers old. That although his chiefe profession was physicke, yet he had bene accustomed to deale for Rings, Jewels and pearle: that hee had bought this Marchandise at Placentia, from one that was knowne, and two other vnknowne, to the end hee might sell them againe in France and the Low-countries. Beeing examined againe the thirteenth day of Ianuary, hee falls vpon his knees and craues mercie of the Iudges, saying that whatsoeuer hee had formerly confest was false, that hee was guiltie of the theft which was in question, and so relates the whole manner of it, as you haue heard.

Faua confes-seth the fact.

But hee determyning to doe that vnto himselfe, which hee expected from the Iudges, hee resolued to preuent the infamy by a voluntary death: Beeing wrapt vp in his cloathes and couerlets, to the end the warme blood might flowe more freely in the cold of Winter, hee cut the veines of either arme with a penknife: but the violence of the cold congealed the blood, and forced him to liue, that would gladly haue died, his strength sayling him, hee calles for his keeper, his armes were bound vp, and his life saued.

Faua seekes to kil himselfe.

In the meane time Postes flie to Venice with newes of his taking: They presse him daily with new questions, and bid him tell why hee demanded Martin of the Bishop of Concordia to accompany him in his way? Hee answered, hee did it that hee might more cunningly hide his fact. Beeing asked why hee returned to Venice after so memorable a fact; Hee answered that hee had made choise thereof as his safest waie, and that such as pursued him would thinke hee had bene gone farre from thence. The Iudge inquiring whether his wife were guiltie of all these villanies; Hee answered, that the secrets of such waighy businesse were not to bee committed to a womans wit; that shee was of an innocent life and conuersation, as all Italian wiues bee, to whom marriage is a willing seruitude: that shee had bene alwaies modest and obedient, and neuer questioning of his affaires, notwithstanding the vife (as if shee should bee a vvinnesse) vvas confronted vith her husband: shee hung about his necke, and could not speake for sobbing, but hee hauing more courage spake thus vnto her. O wife either my life shall be saued or I shall haue a certaine death; if I liue, thou shalt enioy a louing husband, if I die, thou shalt loose all cause of sorrow.

A When as he viewed the cases with the Jewels and pearle, he accused his want of Iudgment, hauing still left them with the same waxe and seales as hee had receiued them at Venice.

But beeing often vrged that it was not his owne worke and industrie, to counterfeit so many letters and hands, for that when he had written to a Bishop, he did vse pontifical phrases; to a Marquis he wrote like a souldiar and Courtiar, and to Marchants hee vsed their owne stile: Hee answered that hee himselfe was the inuenter of all those deceits; that hee was not ignorant of their manner of speaking, and could so well counterfeit any mans hand, as it should not be discerned from the right; he had no lesse skill in seales, as he contended with any grauer in his arte. Whilest his cause was in question, Corfina comes from Bruxelles, hee visits the prisoner, and promiset him al helpe and assistance. Faua craues onely this fauour that hee would aduertise him daylie what past in the Venetian Ambassadours house concerning him. Vpon the siue and twentieth day of February Corfina informes him that there was a Post come from Venice, assuring that Bertholonius would bee there the same day, and therefore he should speedily resolue of his escape. Faua hauing conferred with Corfina, hee bewraies his minde vnto him, how hee ment to escape; that hee would slippe into the keepers chamber in his absence, and to get downe into the court, if hee might bee assisted with a Ladder of roapes, hee would get vp to the top of the wall, and so into the streete, Corfina, or some other fits his turne, and makes fast such a Ladder vnto the wall about six of the clocke at night, and casts a roape into the court, with the which Faua should draw the Ladder vnto him.

Hee confesseth himselfe to be a notable counterfeiter.

This practise had like to haue taken effect on the seuen and twentieth day of February in a very darke night. Faua hauing sent a seruant of the house, forth to fetch him wine, in the meane time hee gets into the keepers chamber, strips himselfe, and with a roape slips downe into the court, beeing there hee was long searching for the roape which was tied to the Ladder, for that the night was darke and raynie, hauing found it, he goes vp, but beeing too short, hee could not get to the top. Whilest hee strues to come to the top of the wall, hee that went to fetch him wine returnes, and finding him not there, hee tells the keeper, hee with his seruants finding Fauas clothes, take him hauing one foote ouer the wall, and shut him vp close: they presently goe forth with lights to search where this Ladder was cast, and meete with a man flying with his sword drawne. The keeper examines Faua of his premeditated flight, and of the Ladder, and hee freely confest all, yet hee knew not whether Corfina or any other had provided him this meanes to escape.

Bertholonius comming to Paris with letters of commendation from the State of Venice, hee is brought vnto the King by the Ambassadour, who giues him a fauourable hearing, and promiset him to doe him Iustice, commanding the Chancellor that hee should not suffer this wickednesse to goe vnpunished. Bertholonius to proue him E guilty, produceth all things that might descouer the fact. Herevpon at the suite of Angelo Bassa his processe is made. Faua despayring of all helpe, beeing weary of his life, hee seekes all meanes to die; The fourth of March hee tends for a Barber to cut his hayre; hee intreates him to helpe him to halfe an ounce of Arsenicke, currans, roses and sugar, with the which (beeing mingled with the whites of egges) hee would make a medicine for the swelling of his eyes. The Barber did as hee willed him, but when as hee saw the poyson mixt with all, the keeper looking on, hee told him what it was, the which beeing taken from him, and asked to what end hee made it; hee answered for the paine in his eyes, and although that Antimonie vvas taken for a poyson, yet beeing beaten and tempered it lost his force; that hee vvas so farre from offering himselfe violence, as euer since the cutting off his veines hee had sought to preserve his helth. Hee did abhorre to bee condemned to the Gallies, rather wishing death then seruitude, finding himselfe vnable for that labour by reason of his vvwounds.

comes to examine.

All proofes beeing made his processe vvas ended the twvo and twentith day of March.

1608. March. Fana hauing some notice that his sentence drew neere, hee resolved to pre- A uent his Ignominie by a voluntary death: The violence of the cold had stopt his bloud, poyson had bene taken from him; and he had cast it vp often hauing drunke it: hee must not now attempt death in vaine; hee intreats his wife to make him a certaine cake, the which hauing sent by his eldest sonne, hee brake it in peeces, and rowling it in Arsenicke hee swallowed it: soone after the poyson wrought on him with great torments; hee telles his wife that his last houre approached, but hee speakes nothing of the poyson, and requires a Priest to haue pardon of his sinnes: the violence of the poyson increasing, hee desired to be layed out vpon the straw, and soone after died on the foure and twentieth day of March.

Fana poysoned
himselfe.

Sentence gi-uen agai-nt
Fana.

His bodie was opened and the poyson found in his bowels, wherevpon they gaue sentence against his carcassee. Fana was found guiltie for that hee had changed his name, counterfeited other mens handes, stolne gold and Iewels, and poysoned himselfe: his bodie was condemned to bee drawne groueling vnto the common Gibet, and there to bee hanged by the heeles: His goods were forfeited to the King, hauing first paid the price of the Marchandise: There was a warrant graunted to apprehend Ossanio and Peter, who had bene companions in all his villanies. It may be I haue bene tedious in relating of these Impostures, but I thought good to set downe this notable villanie particularly, that hereafter other men may take heed of such cousiners.

Mussardus
commits a crueltie.

I will adde an other without any fraude or deccite, but more cruell. Valerianus Mussardus not vnknowne vpon the frontiers of Picardie for his valour, during the combustions of France, impatient of peace, and to liue quiet in his owne home, hee murthers a Gentleman his neighbour, his poore mournfull widowe casts her selfe at the Kings feete, and sues for reuenge for the murder of her husband. The Prouost of the Kings house had charge to apprehend the murtherer, whereof beeing aduertised hee presently flies into a stronge castle called Moyencourt, and there hides himselfe.

Hee was summoned by a Trumpet, to yeeld himselfe vnto the Kings mercy the which hee refuseth to doe, vnlesse hee might haue his pardon granted vnder the broad seale, or that Mounseigneur de Crequi, or the Earle of Saulx his brother would passe their word for his safety. The Prouost seeing he could not bee perswaded by good words, sends for all the garriison souldiers thereabouts, with an intent to force him, approaching neere, hee shot fise or sixe of them; Being thus obstinate, they sent for Artillerie to Noyon, but before they planted it, they summon him againe to yeeld vnto the Kings mercy, who had long hands which no priuate man could escape; but they talked to a deafe man.

Beeing againe thought fit to mooue him by the parrish Priest, who discourfing vnto him of the cares and contempt of this present life; of the future blessednesse, or of the eternall paine, hee lost all his labour: They then resolved to attempt that by E force, which they could not effect by faire meanes. Whilst they prepare to force him, they sent the murtheresse mother (who had bene a companion to him in his Impudencie and villanie) vnto them, beeing let into the castle, shee intreated her daughters and her siter with teares to yeeld, assuring them of the Kings mercie, but the vn-fortunate old woman not able to mooue either of them, returned; telling the Prouost that they were both resolved to die willinglie, and to prevent an ignominious death.
Hee first let downe a boy and a girle in a basket to the end they might be preserued, then shewing themselves, and intreating the lookers on to pray for them, they went into a pinacle, where seeing they had no longer time to protract their yeelding, the gates beeing forced, they shot one another through, and died. The castle beeing F forced, their carcases were found bloody and halfe burnt (for they had gathered much straw about them to the end they might bee consumed with fire) and were balmed to the end they might be refered for publike infamy.

The

A The fise and twentieth of Aprill the Kings third sonne was borne at Fontainebleau, on the same day that Lewis the ninth his Predecessor was borne, hee was titled Duke of Aniou: we looke for a fourth who shalbe called Duke of Alanson: I do not read that there hath bene more Sonnes of France. Henry the second had so many, but their liues were short, and their ends were not happie: but our Queene is fruitfuller and more blessed then the first Medicis, and promisseth more, which is the true meanes to settle the quiet of the Kingdome, to blesse their friends and confederates, and to curbe their enemies, enuironning it as it were with strong towers and defences.

1608.
Birth of the duke of Aniou

On Saint Iohn Baptiste Eue, about three miles from Paris, and one from Meudon, certaine Sorcerers met, hauing long before chosen this place fit for their deuotions, B being out of the way in a Valley, compassed about with woods and pooles, commonly called Porcher Fontaine. A certaine Priest, to the end he might do his Ceremonies there, had gotten leaue from the Vicar to say his Lyturgie secretly, but it was discourred: for it happened that one of the Parish (with whom I was well acquainted) came vnexpected, and lest the villany should be discovered, he goes with the Vicar to a house standing farre off in the fields. The gates beeing shut he sayes Masse, and feeds with holy bread a Stone-cutter, whose name was Iustine, a companion of his wickednesse; which done returning to the former place, this wicked Priest finds a Beetle with many legges, vpon the banke of the poole called Clagny, and being readie to tread vpon it, C he gathers it vp, and wraps it in a paper. The Vicar asking him to what end he kept so filthy a thing, he answered, it was to please his euill spirit with that morsell: A little before night this false Priest, Iustine, an Empericke, a certaine Gentleman, and many others, (whose names I willingly spare) two Shepheards, a Printer, and others, hauing got a white Pigeon without any spot, at night they get them into a thicke wood of the Celestines, they do their deuotions, call vppe Spirits, and as they say had many wicked conferences with them.

Sorcerers decouered.

Baterers.

My friend seeing this multitude of vnknowne men going vp and downe day and night, hee conceiued there was some villany: Hee presterh the Vicar to con-fesse what it was, and what these men attempted, hauing no businesse in this strange D place, hee suspected the Vicar, who beeing before vnknowne vnto them, was so daime-lic growne familiar with them: He thought they had bene theecues and murtherers which two daies before had slaine a victualer, hee threatned the Vicar to haue him to prison if hee concealed this wickednesse. Hee brings him vnto mee, and admonished him to discouer the matter and saue himselfe; It may bee this wicked assemblie, was against God and the King, which reuealing hee should not onely bee freed, but haue reward, otherwise he were in danger of punishment.

Beeing fearefull, hee presently reueales all, and addes, that asking that wicked Priest priuately what hee ment by those secret sacrifices and deuotions, hee answered that before the yeere were ended, there would bee great warre; that the common peo-E ple were miserable through peace, that in the former warres there was greater store of money in France; that the treasure was hidden in the ground, the which must bee brought forth if they should goe to armes. To descouer the whole matter the Priest must be apprehended.

In the meane time least the Vicar should denie that which hee had willingly confessed, wee carried him before a Iudge, where hee did verie constantlie maintaine what hee had sayd. But that diuillish Impostor was gone farre off to the like de-lusions, and was absent for the space of a whole moneth. Beeing aduertised of his returne, and seeking carefullie for his lodging, wee vnderstood that hee was gone into a parrish not farre from Saint Germaine, commonly called I.uisiana, and there hee was become a Curate, thether they sent certaine Officers, and take F him earlie in a morning, and bring him awaie bound. Beeing examined by the Iudge, hee doth not denie nor stand in contradiction concerning his practise in Magicke, but that it was innocently attempted by him, to the end hee might discou-er money by the reuelation of spirits, and to the end hee might finde it out, Ooooo hee

1608. hee had on good Friday gone into a hollow caue neere vnto Saint Landries Church, A digged deepe into the ground, and called out spirits, but for that hee had not obserued all ceremonies, they would neither bee seene nor speake: Beeing often demaunded where hee had hidden his bookes of Inchantment, with all his Magicall stuffe, in the end, hee bewraies the place where he had laied his cheft, the which being brought into the Iudges house and opened, there was presently found a mixture of the Negromantike art, three bookes for the calling vp of spirits, the skinne of children borne before their time. Deaths heads, parings of nayles, tables markt with many crosses, lines and circles; rings tied together with strings of leather, and needle and keies, with many other things which are not to bee spoken, but to bee buried in eternall forgetfulnessse.
 There was a contract with the diuill, written in small letters, by the which they were both bound, and if the Priest were weary of the bargain, substituting an other, hee B should be discharged. He confessed that he had sayd Masse nine times after a preposterous order, and inuerterd the praiers, as well in the wood of Bolonia, as where male-factors are commonly hanged. That hee had offred sacrifice to the diuell, not farre from the Abbay of Malenoue the which the foulnessse of the fact forbids to relate. In-fine was first condemned to bee strangled and then burned. The Priest after along imprisonment, was, the fifth of Iune the next yeere, brought before our Ladies Church in his shirt with a torch in his hand, where hauing abiured his wickednessse and asked pardon of God, he suffered the like punishment.

Ambassage
from Spaine.
 In Iuly Don Pedro of Toledo was sent Ambassador from the King of Spaine to the French King, hee was entertained at Fontainebleau, with all the delights and sports that the Court could afford, being gluttoned therewith he went to Paris, where either the beauty of the place, or the importance of his Ambassage stayed him long.

This yeere the countrymans prouerbe was found true, That after a sharpe Winter folloes a hot Sommer; as passengers were frozen with cold, so did laborers in Sommer fry with heate, and many were smothered, as if they had beene in the Deserts of Arabia, so as the extreame cold of Winter and the violent heate of Sommer spoiled their Vintage, hauing scarce had any raine in three monethes. This yeere the Duke of Vendosme, the Kings base sonne, was made sure to the Duke of Mercuers only daughter. D
 The marriage had beene concluded at Angers in Aprill 1598. and a great penalty imposed vpon him that should detract.

Sentence for a clandestine marriage.

I doe not hold it vsfit for the History, nor to bee left to posterity, to relate the memorable Decrees of courts, wherein you may obserue their great equity and severity, whereby young people may bee terrified from whorish and vnequall marriages, and contempt of Parents by the example of the parties condemned. James Drouet a Gentleman borne, sonne to an Auditor of the accounts in Normandy, being seduced by the perswasions of Ioan Andrew a base woman, hee marries her secretly, the Parents complaine to the Court of Parliament against the woman for the rape of this young man, pretending that such marriages were forbidden by the Law of God, and an Edict made at Orleans, without the consent of the father, and sufficient witnesses, and all Priests were forbidden to consummate such stolne marriages: the Parents say that a youth yet vnder the rod, had beene abused by the Inchantments of a base woman and of a doubtfull fame, that their sonne was not to dispose of himselfe, and that hee was forced. That these clandestine marriages had beene often punished, and that it was a rape.

In the end at the great Instance of the Parents, and in severity of publike discipline, the Parliament decreed that the stolne marriage betwixt James Drouet and Ioan Andrew was voided and of no effect, being made without the consent of the Parents, and against the Lawes of the Kingdome. Ioane was condemned to goe with a torch in her hand, her face couered, and a halter about her necke, and to aske pardon of God, of F the Parliament, and of the Parents of Drouet, then to be whipped three daies together at the corner of euery street, and so to bee banished the Realme, or if shee did not obey this Decree, to bee hanged. All her goods were confiscate to the King, hauing first

first paid the charges of the sute. James was also deprivied of all the inheritance which hee could pretend from father and mother, and condemned to a yeeres imprisonment, vntill that his Parents should bee sutors for him. Drouet and Ioane were forbidden euer to see one an other, or to speake together, by word, writing or messenger, and not to renew this marriage. Those which had contaminated this clandestine marriage contrarie to the Decrees of the councill of Trent, and the Edict of Blois, were also condemned to come into the court, and vpon their knees with a torch in their hands, to craue pardon of God, the Parliament, and the Parents, being also condemned in a great fine.

Punishment
of Priests.

B It was also decreed that the Edicts of Henry the Second, and Henry the Third made at Blois vpon that same subiect, should bee euery yeere published on a certaine daie in all the inferiour Courts of Normandie, and commandement giuen to obserue them strictly, nor to suffer the banes to bee asked by any hired Priests or Vicars, but to pronounce them themselues in open pulpit, three Sondais in the presence of the Parents. The Officials were also charged not to admit of these banes vnlesse they were required by the Parents and Kinsfolkes. James, Ioane, the Priests that were condemned, and the Clergy of Normandy, ioyning altogether, make great instance to the Kings priuie councill to haue this Decree disannulled, and declared voided, but it was irreligious to offer violence to so Religious a Decree, yet with this moderation, C as the King was moued to pardon the pecuniary fine, and the banishment of this wretched woman.

The Clergy of France had by their Deputies held a long assemblie at Paris the yeere before: their conclusions (which were then kept verie secret) burst now forth into a great complaint made vnto the King by the Archbishop of Bourges, in the presence of the Cardinales of Ioyeuz, Gondy, Sourdis and Perron, and thus hee spake in the name of the whole Clergy.

Complaint of the Clergy
vnto the King.

Most inuincible amongst mortall men, if it bee lawfull for sorrow to speake;
 if nothing afflicts miserable men more then imposed silence, the Church plunged in so many calamities and miseries, so that it is overflowne and drowned in a sea of D griefe hauing no passage but through thornes and bushes, whose cup is worme-wood and bitter dregges, shall receiue no small comfort this daie, if it shall please your most sacred Maiestie for to lend a fauourable and atentue care to their iust com-plaintes. The Edict hath exceeded and farre extended it selfe beyond the torments and crueltie of Iulian the Apostata, who forbad Christians to sigh and weepe, and did enuie this bitter comfort to wretches, more wicked then the heathen which sung.

Flere meos casus, est quedam flere voluptas, Pacatur lachrymis egeriturque dolor.

Bewaile my case; weeping brings some content;
 Sorrow by teares findeth both ease and vent.

But now the Church hauing overcome tyranous Impiety, and being laden and crowned with the spoyle of her enemies, adorned with the fauours of Emperours and Kings, and supported by their power, is not afraid to shew her bloudie woundes vnto the King. To the King I say whose Predecessors haue graced and beautified the Churches wedding with a Ring and other Jewells; an eternall monument of the Kings, and of France her pietie. And for that thou hast more then once F heard her sighes and groanes being vnworthely intreated, and receiued her (bee-ing assailed) into thy armes, shee comes more confidentlie relying vpon your helpfull fauour, being againe deformed with the impuritie and corruption of the world, and with teares of griefe, doth prostrate her selfe at your most Royall feete; she speaks vnto you not fearefully, but with a free voice, being worthily bound

1608. vnto her; hauing powred forth so many teares and praers vnto Almighty God, for A your preferuacion and aduancement vnto the crowne, hoping you will not bee vnmindfull of so great a pietie.

But oh! Henry thinke there is nothing more worth of a King, then a care to plant, preferue and propagate Religion: It is the eye of an Empire, the life of Government, an arme of thy arme, and as I may say in a word, a Kingdome hath not a more firme support. The Kings of Persia held it most true, or else their hethenish superstition did not suffer the children to bee aduanced to the Kingdome, before they had learned the Misteries of their fathers Religion. Religion and Government are the two supporters of humane society, happy is the coniunction, if one requiring an others B helpe, they concurre friendly. The Tribes of Israel how did they flourish when as Moyse praised vnto God and Iosua fought and vanquished? They are much deceived which impute the ruine of Kingdomes to climactericall and farall yeers: Farre bee it from the thoughts of Christians, who should rather beleuee that the fates of King-domes depends of Religion, the which beeing maintained, stand firme, but neglected they goe to ruine: It is a parcell of Gods fauour, and a coniunction of mortall and immortall spirits, and a seale, and bond of the eternall couenant, the which the fates conspiring cannot dissolue: And therefore the wise Romaines would haue the names of their Tutelarie Gods, kept from their enemies, least they should goe into foraine C Cities, they had an Imagination that Sagunt could not bee forced, vnlesse the God which did protect it were called away. Wherefore the heathen did thinke the coniunction of Religion and Government to bee an inexpugnable fort.

Beleuee oh most Christian King! that thou art lincked vnto God by Religion, and that there is no greater signe of a declining estate, then when Religion is banished, beeing apparent by many ancient examples that God flies the companie of mortall men, when as Religion and his worship is neglected. Thinke oh King! that thy state is not settled by any polittike Government, or by wise counsellors; there is a secret power from aboue which rules it, euen God who giues and takes away Scepters, hee watcheth for thy safety, preferues thee from thy enemies, and makes thee a spectacle D to all Europe by thy victorious triumphs. The same God hath broken the yoke vnder which France lay bound, wiped away the reares, pacified the ciuill warres, erected the ruined Altars of peace, cured the woundes, restored the Lawes, and (least I should bee tedious) reuiued France that was almost dead, and hath made it a terrour to other Nations. Thy glorie is so great as thou hast brought this ship beeing readie to bee cast away by the violence of the storme, into a safe port, thou hast broken the confederate armies, and passing so many daungers dost shine with the spoiles of thine enemies, thou hast releued languishing France, which despairing of all helpe rannewillinglie to ruine, if thy inuincible courage had not exceeded the greatnesse of her extremities.

These, oh Henry! bee the Monuments whereby thou hast bound future ages vnto E thee. But this is not all, to make thy glory immortall, there rests one thing the which the Church must finish and make euerlasting; Namely that thou wilt command the Decrees of the councill of Trent to bee obserued, whereby corruption, filthinesse, si-monie, bargaines made in trust, and such like wickednesse may bee punished. The Synode was celebrated by a generall assembly of the world, confirmed by the Pope and is obserued of all Christians; The which if you shall refuse to publish, that vndeuided garment shall not be cut with any other sheeres, nor the Vale of the Temple rent with any other whirlwind.

Antiquitie which is an incorrupt witnesse, hath worthily honoured France, for that it hath alwaies assisted the Church and saued it from tempest and shipwracke: A field F which the Heauenly husbandman hath manured with his owne hand, and purged it from Tares, and Darnell, that the Lillie may flourish, vnder whose shadowe it might rest secure from all heate and stormes; a garden set with most pleasant and sweete flowers, neither is there any Nation more obedient to their Pastors and Ministers

A Ministers. France should loose these goodly titles, if it should reiect the councill of Trent. 1608.

The Astronomers hold that the Planets are governed by the motion of the heauen: " onely the Moone they affirme hath a peculiar and contrary motion. It is most cer- " taine that sacred Oracles doe in like manner depend vpon Generall counsels, and " that the wheele of Gods chariot (which Ezechiel saw) is greater, the which forceth the " rest with his violent motion. The councill of Trent is like a Sphere, which doth gouern " the Planet of the French Church, to sequester the which from Synodall Decrees by " the pretence of priuiledges & priuat Immunities, what is it else, but to giue it a priuate " and opposite motion like vnto the Moone? They that looke into the secrets of Nature, " say that the eye, which is the window of mans body is iniured with seuen Arteries, " by whose violence it mooues, yet the eye is not vnwillingly mooued. It is not vn- " like the liberty of the French Church, the which depends of a greater motion, neither " should priuiledges make it proude, and moue against the eye whose beame it is, but by " the motion of Synodall constitutions. It is the Load-star of the vniuersall Church, " according to the which the French must direct her course. Your Maiesty is not pre- " judizid hereby, neither doe wee with any other expostulation sigh at the taking away " of elections: If wee complaine with more bitternesse, the thing it selfe giues vs leaue " to speake; for this sheeld taken away, sacred and profaine things are confounded; the C gouernment of the Church is troubled: the censor is taken out of the Priests hands, " the wall which diuides the Holy Vestry, is broken; and the mysticall oyle of the Taber- " nacle is spilt.

It rests in your singular Iudgement to make choise of Pastors, not according to " the ambition of the Court, giuing men to spirituall liuings, and not spiritual liuings " to men: By this choise the Church doth shine, thou hast made choise of corner stones " to support it: thou hast provided wise Mariners for this mysticall ship, and now the " Order of the Leuits beeing clenfed, defends the Altars and holy things: Although in " this age there are many things required to purge the Church, yet the glorie is to bee " attributed to the hauing aduanced worthie Prelats, so as vertue hath no contest at D all to complaine that shee is neglected, the which it may please you for to loue and " imbrace still, and to prosecute it with honours and rewardes, that it may glorie and " shine in all good artes and discipline. There remains how much wee are grieued, " and how iustly wee exclaime against Symonie, the poyson of spirituall liuings, the " reproach and pollution of the Church, Gihez trafficke, possession of spirituall reue- " nues giuen vnto Lay men; Alienation of Church-lands, contempt of the Ecclesiasti- " call iurisdiction, and eronious appeales, received with all impunitie, so as that which " was held a great offence, custome hath made it nothing. It is like vnto the Leuia- " than, or Iobs euill spirit, which doth no more lurke in darkenesse, but shewes it selfe " bouldy: these sinnes (like vnto Abels innocent blood) crie for reuenge. Lewis the E Godlie hauing polluted himselfe herewith, and straying from the steppes of Charles " the Great his Father, treading Lawes vnder foote, hee was not onely a reproach vnto " France, but also a contempt and scorne to his children, whose rashnesse God did " reuenge.

That all peering eye of heauen, which lookes into the secret sinnes of mortall " men, with what an angrie countenance doth hee behold the Holie pledges of the " Church, the price of sinners, the godlie deuotions, the bread of the hungry, and the " cloathes of the naked bestowed vpon Lay men, and employed to filthie vses, as in the " time of the Gentiles by a wicked King in despight of the Christians, Adons Idoll was " set in Christs place, the Holie Ornaments of the Sanctuarie so prophaned, in the " banquets of the Kings of Assiria, as the Almighty hand of Heauen did by the lear- F ned wall denounce reuenge.

Pardon mee oh King, if I say that Adons Idoll is now set in Christs place, that " the Holie Ornaments are polluted, the Sanctuarie defiled, and the corner stones " shaken and pulled away, if you shall any longer suffer the proposition bread and "

1608. the Holie eorne to bee stollne from the Altars by married men, knights and fouldiers, whose hands are fitter for armes and murders, then for incense and mysticall things.

In the Canticles the mysticall Spouse complains that falling amongst fouldiers in the night shee was spoiled of her Ornaments: The goods of the Church, proceeding from the bountie of Religious Kings, may well bee taken for the Ornaments of the Church: and if you shall suffer her Reuenues to bee wasted by Courtiers, what is it else, but to abandon the Spouse to bee spoiled by fouldiers: and although it were with the consent of the Clergy, too indulgent to this mischiefe, yet there are many reasons which should perswade you not to fauour it. Adam as soone as hee had tasted of the forbidden fruite did presently blush at his owne nakednesse: the Reuenues of the Church is like vnto a tree, which God hath forbidden to touch, whose fruits being once gathered, our nakednesse is presently discovered.

There are many things wherof wee might complaine vnto your Maiesty, but least I should bee tedious, I will end with this petition in the name of all the Prelates of the French Church here present, that you will confirme that which hath bene graunted to our order, the which hath bene often neglected. Vnto the end your affaires may prosper, that God may blesse you and your Kingdome, and that your Empire may bee permanent, and haue no setting but the whole world, stretch forth your assisting hand to releue the Church which faints, helpe her, greene at her misfortune, ease her afflictions, and cure her wounds. Looke vpon so many hundreds of Parishes with pitty, who whereas they feede their flockes with the food of Angells, they scarce eate the bread of mortall men, living most hardlie, so cold is pietie, and so sparingly they offer vnto God. Wherefore vow vnto God that you will hereafter be a sacrifice vnto him, and labour continually at his Altars, leauing a Testimonie to posterity that Kings should haue a continuall care of the Church and worship of Almighty God.

The Tribes of Israel were forbidden to contract marriage out of their kindred, only the Tribe of Iuda had a prerogative, for that it did gouerne the rest, to marry with the Tribe of Leuie, the which had the Gouernment of the Altar and Priest-hood: By this Simbole the Hebrewes did fitly obserue, that the Priest-hood and Gouernment were fittly ioyned. But oh most Christian King! shall it bee lawfull to speake vnto thee as the Israelites did vnto their King? Flesh of my flesh, blond of my blond, and boanes of my boanes: Let vs hereafter bee one, and an vndiuided comple, thy weepings are teares to me, thy sobbes shall force mee to sigh, and being conuerted one into an other, I can comfort thee with these wordes. Daughter of Syon full of sorrow, leaue of thy teares, I am hee that will free thee of thy sack-cloth and mourning weed, and wipe away thy ashes and deformity, and will make thee shine with Balsamum and sweete smelling ointments. And as the Hebrew daughter-in-law did thus flatter her King. I will that posterity shall knowe that I haue clad thee with purple and scarlet, and enriched thee with the first frutes; thy Sabothes and Holy daies haue become worshipped by mee: I haue armed thee with the target of the stronge: I haue girt thy thigh with the sword of Ionathan against thine enemy, which cannot bee blunted, being accustomed to bee goared with his blond. Giue then oh King! vnto the Church her rights and Tributes; reioyce with thy mother, who hath called thee her first begotten sonne, and hath giuen thee the first kisse, whom aboute all others shee would haue rest in her bosome. For so many worthy titles grant shee may bee free. That if Thyaneus the Phylosopher did sometimes say of Titus Caesar. Titus did vanquish Iury, and Appolonius Titus; the Church may speake thus. Henry crowned with victories and happinesse, hath ouerthrowne and conquered all his enemies Armies, but the Church hath vanquished Henry with her teares and supplications.

Entry of the Bishop into Orleans.

I may not forget the reception of the new Bishop of Orleans, being rare and singular aboute all the Prelates of France. Aubespine being chosen Bishop the first day of September, hee caused a Proclamation to bee made that on the fourteenth of the sayd

A layd moneth, after the ancient manner, he would make his entry into Orleans, promising impunitie to all malefactors, not onely to such as had slaine men accidentally but euen for premeditated murders, and for all other crimes whatsoever. Thither flockt the most wicked among men: On the thirteenth the Bishop lay in the Abbey of Saint Hubert, where the next day the Abbot hauing sayd Masse, he put on his Myter and other pontificall ornaments. Staying there, the Chanoin of Saint Croix came vnto him, with the Doctors and Officers of the Vniuersitie, and the Magistrates of the city. The Bishop goeth forth bare-footed, being come to Saint Anians Church, the Chanoin receiue him: who holding his hands close together, protest that they are free from his Iurisdiction: yet they bring him to the Altar, after which, his feete are washed and cleansed, and white shooes of silke put on: then hauing taken an oath not to attempt anything against their Rights & Priuiledges, hee is carryed by foure of the chiefe of them in a chayre without the walles of the towne, there they call forth foure Barons, who are subiect to the Bishop by their fees, and are euery yeare bound on the day of the Inuention of the holy Crosse, to bring foure great waxe-Lights in form of garters, euery one weighing an hundred pound waight. These Barons presented themselves to carry the Bishop, but he of his grace freed them of this seruice. Then the Clergie went before in order, being come to Bourgondie gate he, was met by the President, the Bayliffe of Orleans, the Lieutenant criminall, and all the Councillours of the prefdiall Court. There all malefactors were let out of prison, who with great acclamations cryed for mercie. The Bishop commaunded the Iaylour to say if the prisons were emptie, and whether there were not some malefactors detayned, who beeing assured that all were freed from bonds, two of them were commanded to go before all the rest: beeing come to Saint Croix, the Bishop rung a little bell, and then hee made himselfe readie to say Masse: which done, he dined apart with the Chanoin, the Iudges were feasted in another roome, and all the malefactors in the Bishops hall. After dinner the Cryer being a Diuine, makes them a sharpe admonition, and wils them to liue better hereafter: the Bishop confirms his speech: which done, they cryed often for mercie. In the end, the Bishop giuing them his blessing, dismissed them with this charge, That they should pay all Fines and the charges of Sutes. Thus by the coming of the new Bishop, there were aboute an hundred freed from the Gallows: the parents, children, and widowes grieuing that they were deprivied of all meanes of reuenge.

Father Angelo of Ioyeuse going out of France, had past the Alpes bare-footed, by the commandement of his Superior. At Turin a feuer tooke him, the which when hee felt, being no longer able to go on foot, he caused himselfe to be carried in a Litter to a religious house of that Order at Riuoli. The Duke of Sauoy hearing of his sicknesse, sent his chiefe Physicion, and an Apothecarie with all kinds of comfortable things fit for the recouerie of his health, and Cookes to dresse his meate, being so carefull of his health, as twise a day he sent men in poste to be aduertised thereof. There was nothing omitted that the art of man could inuent: but the violence of his feuer did make frustrate all their skill. The tenth day of his sicknes, being the five and twentieth of September, his soule leauing the prison of his bodie, went happily to heauen. He died as he liued, not in the Court of Turin, nor in a bed of Downe with rich furniture, but in his garment of haire, and coucht vpon straw, in the prison of his Conuent he left the burthen of his flesh. Remold VValter, one of the Presidents of the Kings great Councell, being there by chance to negotiate some busines for a Prince of the Bloud, as he had bin deare vnto him liuing, so he was still by him in his sicknesse, and receiued his last-dying words. His body was embalmed and layed at Riuoli, vntill that France his natue contry, should require it, as it did the yeare following. VValter aduertised the King on the feuen and twentieth of September of the whole manner of his sicknesse, of his happie end, of the Duke of Sauoy's singular care, and of his last words, by the which he would haue his farall hower made knowne vnto the Duchesse of Montpensier his daughter by father Ioseph of the same societie. So the good father did fore-see his daughter might receiue the easier wound: he knew well that Ioseph was an excellent artift to pacify minds thus

the river of Loire.

thus plunged in sorrow, and without doubt he did much mollifie the bitterness of this A fatall message.

The river of Loire did this Autumne swell so suddenly, as breaking the bankes it ouer-flowed the whole countrie with strange whistle-pooles, rooting vp corne, woods, and old trees, drowning heards of cattle, and ouerflowing houses and farmes, or what soeuer withstood the rage of it. At Blois, Amboise and other townes the arched bridges beeing broken, and the river swelling suddenly, many were drowned. The Duke of Sully receiued great losse by this inundation, when as he feared nothing that the violence of the river should any way hurt his castell standing vpon Loire, behold it swels suddenly with such whistle-pooles, as it ouerthrew some towers of the castell which were very strong. Some countrie-men were seene escaping vpon tables, some climbing B vp trees, and to the toppes of mountaines, and some by swimming laboured to sic dearth. And to speake in a word, all was sea. The ruine and spoile it made, mans wit could not estimate, the which was fatall to the husbandmen for many yeres, their fields being so spoiled with stones, sand, and bushes, as they could not cleanse them but with an incredible charge: for the river arising out of the mountaines of Auvergne, fragments of rockes came rolling downe which made the land barraine: much vnlike to the river of Nile, whose mudde doth make their fields fat, whereupon the countrie-men say, Egypt is fertile without raine.

Duke of Ne-
uers sent to the Pope.

The most Christian King sent an honorable ambassage to Pope Paul the fift, to ac- C knowledge his obedience, by Charles of Gonzaga Duke of Neuers. Having made great preparations at Paris for his iourney, and taken his leaue of the King, he came to Marseilles, where he was transported with his whole trayne in foure of the Kings galleys, and landed at Sauona, from whence he went to Genoua, where the Duke and common-weale receiued him with great honor, sending forth troupes of souldiers to meet him: being come into the city, he was brought into the Senate by foure Senatours, set in the highest seate, and had leaue to giue his voice. Having giuen thanks to the Genouoi's, he went on his iourney, and came to Ciuita-vechia, (a towne belonging to the Church) where the Popes Officers receiued him with a princely entertainment: and that nothing might be wanting, Fabio Gonzaga the Duke of Mantoua's Lieutenant, D with many other Noblemen, came to congratulate his comming, at their departure, he presented them with a great chayne of Gold, the which they refused, not in disdayne of him that offered it, but that they desired no reward from the Kings Ambassadour, but his loue. The Duke proceeding on his iourney, he was met by Monsieur De Brenus, the Kings Ambassadour resident at Rome, the Marquis of Malatesta, the bishop of Abrincences, Marchimont, and all the French Nobilitie which was then in the citie. Comming neare to Rome, there went forth to meet him, the Duke of Carpineta, the Marquis of Pallauicino, and Marke Anthony Victorio the Popes Nephew, whom the Duke of Ne-uers did much respect, him he tooke into his Caroch, and entertayned him very famili- E arly. The Cardinals stood at the entry of the citie to receiue the Duke, with the Archbishops and other chiefe Prelates: the Pope had sent forth trumpets, and troupes of horse, with his Guards and an hundred Suisses (being in all two thousand armed men) to guard him. The Duke of Neuers was accompanied with about three hundred of the French Nobilitie, all mounted vpon Gennets of Spaine, Barbary horses, and coursers of Naples. He entred the citie by the gate, which goes to castle Saint Angelo: after the shooting off of the Ordinance, there was all sorts of musicke: the windowes were full of Senatours, Gentlemen and Ladies, and the streetes pestered with people: having rested himselfe two dayes, hee had audience of the Pope, and deliuered the Kings letters, the which beeing read, he was brought vnto Saint Peters Pallace, where he was lodged with the French Ambassador at the Popes charges. The feasting being ended he had a F second audience, treating of matters of great importance, then after much honor done him by the Pope he returned.

There was a troupe of desperate theeuers, which did wonderfully anney the Prouin-ces of Poictou, Aniou, Brittain, and the neighbour countries with their murders and spoiles

1609.

A spoiles, whole insolencie and power was such, as they durst encounter the Prouost Marshall with their armed Archers, who beeing too weak, these theeuers (who were called Guillerienes of their Leader) had free liberty to continue their theeuing: beeing accustomed in the ciuill warres to cruelty and theft, hauing no meanes to intertayne their licentious life at home in peace, they returned to their former villanies. They drew into woods, and vncouth places, Bankrupts, Forgers, men branded for villanies, Raskals, Theeuers, and the skumme of all the world. They say that Guillerie the elder brother (for there were two of them) shewed some greatnesse in his theeuing, for if he did chance to meet any poore passenger, he tooke nothing from him, but gaue the poore man so much as he thought would suffice his iourney. If a rich man fell into his hands, and had no present money for his redemption, hee would take his Bill, and so dismisse him, with this charge, that if he fayled to make payment at the day appoynted, he would remit no kind of crueltie to be reuenged of their breach of promise. This elder Guille-rie did so despise them that fought after him, as he would often mocke them. He came into an Inne, whereas the Prouost Marshall of Rheimes with his Archers was lodged, alighting from his horse, he fate downe with them, and entertayned them with discourses and playing at Dice, till it was very late, rising earely in the morning: hauing payed for his and their charges, hee willed his host to tell the Prouost and his Archers, that they were improuident, seeking in vaine for Guillerie, with whome they had supped the last night, who hauing wonne their money at Dice, had payed for their supper. Hereby you may coniecture what a bold and vndanted theefe this Guillerie was: But now heare in what denne this Cacus lodged, in a deepe Valley, and in the furthest part of athicke wood, hauing no ordinarie passage vnto it, where he had built him a lodge like vnto a Fort. Hauing taken a Gentleman of good note: hee brings him thither blindfold, beeing come in, he shewes him all his thefts, store of victuals, and a good armo-rie, with a wall, rampier and ditch to repell force: Hauing dined well in his denne, hee dismisseth him, taking an oath that hee should not bewray what he had seene, hee keeping his faith, for that he could not discouer what he had not seene, yet he obserued the wood, and all the passages, and by this threed they went into the Minotaur, who could D not be drawne forth but by a seerge, and foure or fife field peeces. Seeing himselfe inuiroed by the Prouost Marshalls, the Nobilitie, and the whole countrey, and prest with smoke, fire, and sword, going forth with his Horse-men, hee breakes through the thickest Troupes, but beeing kept backe by their shotte, he forced them vnwillingly to kill him, for that he threatened death to them that prest him. The younger Guillerie and about threescore others were taken, the rest escaped, who finding no safetie at land became Pyrates: the prisoners were carryed to Xaintes, and from thence to Rotshell, where they were broken vpon the wheele, and executed according to their merits and deserts.

This moneth, that which was sometimes called the Millars bridge was finished and E beganne to be passable: That which was drowned in the river, is now made more beautiful, from ruine and shipwracke, it hath receiued increafe and glorie, beeing before contemprible for the base vse, it is now famous for the worthie trades, beeing despised before for the ruinous houses, it is now glorious for the vniformitie of the building, losing the antiquitie and the name both together: it hath not his name from milles and grinding, but from the shapes of birds which distinguish the houses, or from the builder, as passengers may obserue by these two verses.

Millars bridge at Paris.

Pons olim submersus aquis, nunc mole resurgo, Mercator fecit, nomen & ipse dedit.

I was a bridge late drown'd with flood, now rais'd in richer frame, Marchant was he that made the worke, and gaue the work his name.

But now hearken to an admirable and bloodie fact, proceeding from blind loue:
Peter Arrices Bourdeus, a Spaniard borne, an Augustine Monke, beeing for his great learning

Learning made publike Professor of Diuinitie at Tholose, before all his competitors: who besides his schollership, exceeded all others in preaching of the word, honestie of life, and sinceritie of manners. In the presidiall Court there was an olde counsellour called Franciscus Geraldus, an obseruer of the law, free from fraud, and of good fame; but mans life is not knowne but by the last act. Both beeing austere in their manners and behauiour, fall in loue with a yong maide: shee was borne in Portugal, and came to Tholose with her father and familie; her name was Violentilla of Castro, whose bewitching eyes and alluring countenance, had set on fire the weake and decayed counsellour, and this Stoicall Monke. Neither doth loue disdain white haire, nor withered cheekes; and although loues fire doth flame in this old man, yet he ioynes with the Monke, they diuide Violentillaes loue and embracing betwixt them, and only these two coriuals agree together, admitting no other competitor: they had both one care, to enioy the wench with equall libertie. In the end they thought it fit, to hide the stolne and vnchaste fire vnder the ashes of wedlocke. Geraldus he procures the marriage, with a young Aduocate borne in a towne neere to Tholose; the marriage is concluded and consummated, and these two Solicitors pay the dowrie. The feast beeing ended, the new spouse resolues to carry his wife home to his friends; these two Sutors repining at it, especially Geraldus, who promised to procure him many clyents in the court of Parliament of Tholose, or at the least in the presidiall court. But he/whether finding himselfe vsit for the city eloquence, or doubting of his wifes honestie, by reason of these riuals) stood firme in his resolution to carrie her to his owne home. But they storming at the departure of the woman, for that the marriage procured for their stolne loue, had not succeeded according to their intents, they studie how to drawe them backe to Tholose. Geraldus followes the married couple, he feasts there with them a moneth together, and perswades them to returne to the citie; but finding his words to be of no force, hee returnes much grieued at the husbands imperious command, relating to Bourdeus, the mans austere disposition, and the poore womans seruitude: they consult how they may recouer their old loues, and take a way the mans life. To attempt it by poyson they thought it not safe, they therefore resolued to doe it by the sword: and to the end it might be the more easily effected, they call the husband to Tholose, vnder colour of a suit which was then in question. Geraldus agrees with a scholler, or rather a murtherer, called Candolas, and an other named Esbaldis to kill him, and paises them halfe the price of this wicked bergaine. The vnfortunate husband, beeing ignorant of the plot came to Tholose, and was inuited to a solemne feast by Geraldus; the guests were Bourdeus, Candolas, and Esbaldis, where there fare was great, and their entertainment in shew answerable: after supper Bourdeus retires himselfe, and the rest went forth to walke, beeing in the heat of Iulie: in the meane time Geraldus entertained the husband with a long discourse vntill it was late, left the light should bewray the murtherers: at length being darke, he was let forth, and soone after was taken and led into solitarie and vnknowne places, where he was murthered with seuentene wounds. The perswader of this murther hearing thereof, cries out that his friend and guest had bin set vpon by theeues, who seeking to take away his purse, and he resisting, had slaine him. He sends for the officers of the citie, and the captaine of the Watch. Esbaldis sweating, and terrified with the fowlenesse of the fact, was taken flying, the dead body was brought into the Towne house: the Monke hearing that one of these murtherers was apprehended, hee resolued to flee presently with Candolas the other murtherer, going without his Frocke to Tonins a towne held by them of the Religion. Beeing still tormented with the testimony of his owne conscience, he demanded of a Minister, whether he might safely remaine there? but being doubtfull of his life, hee presently fled to Millau, and from thence hee went to Nismes. This mans flight, and the casting away of his professed habit, made the Court to hold him guilty of the fact, sending forth letters to apprehend the monke. The President Verdon giues charge to the Prouost Marshals to make diligent search after

A after them, the Monke was apprehended at Nismes, where they of the Religion tooke him from the publike Magistrate, pretending that he was of the Religion, that hee was maliciously accused for that cause, and that he could not be tryed but by the Chamber of the Edict, wherein they preuayled so much, as he was deliuered to the Iudges of the sayd Chamber, both Courts contending for their right.

The President Verdon hauing by his letters informed the King of this controuersie, there was at length a Decree made by the Kings priuie Councell, by the which the capitall question was referred to the court of Parliament of Tholoufa, they of the Religion complaining that the Edict was broken. At the length Bourdeus and Candolas beeing taken out of prison from the Chamber of the Edict, were brought bound to Tholoufa, the Court was diuided vpon Bourdeus triall, some concluding for his present death, others requiring a stay, vntill that Candolas (beeing put to the racke) should discover the whole matter: But in the end they resolued not to protract his punishment any longer. Bourdeus hearing his sentence read; and seeing the Racke before him, hee layd open the whole matter as we haue reported it. He accused the Councillour as the perswader and companion of the murther, hauing with him payed the murtherers for the fact. He commends the Court for the equitie of their iudgement, and giues God thanks, who by a momentarie punishment, had recalled him from a sinke of sinne and heresie whereunto he was running, hauing fled to them of the Religion only with hope of impunitie: he accused Candolas and Esbaldis, that with their bloudie hands they had done that premeditated villanie. He was carried to execution with teares in his eyes, and a contrite heart, detesting much the fact: passing by the Augustines, he stayd awhile exhorting his fellow Monkes to a more holy life, and intreating them to pardon him, for that he had so much defiled their Order by this foule fact: and being come to the place of execution he made a long prayer, and so had his head cut off, and his body quartered. After the Monkes execution, the Councillor denies the fact so obstinately, as if he would haue all men beleue he had beene free from this wickednesse: he was put to the racke, yet the bitternesse of the payne could not draw a word from him: remaining thus wilfully silent, the first President by a witty fiction, and without any force, wrested the truth from him, hee threatned him that his sonne should be tortured: to whom the father answered, that his sonne had not deserued it; that he was an innocent and altogether ignorant of the fact, then being vrged to declare the matter and to free him from the present danger, the father was more moued with a fatherly affection then with all their torments, confessing himselfe to be guiltie, that he might free his son from danger; who relating all as Bourdeus had done, was condemned to the like punishment. Bourdeus was executed the fifth of February, Geraldus the twelfth, Candolas the thirteenth, Esbaldis the fourteenth, and Violentilla the sixteenth, beeing the onely cause of the adulterie and murther. Shee comming to the place of execution, made this speech vnto the companie.

Bourdeus executed.

Geraldus condemned and executed.

E O you that assist at this fatall spectacle, to you my friends I speake, hauing obtained contulciance from God to suffer death, I do now intreat the helpe of your prayers at my approaching end: Learne by my vnfortunate mischance, how deceitfull and fraile vanitie is, behold I am she who euen now abused with the alluring baites of Beautie, despising others, preferred my selfe before all, thinking that for beautie and wit not any one did equall me. But see the fruites of vanity and pride which I now reape. The enticing baytes of the world, bankets, dancing, and such like follies did bewitch me, and haue forced me to act this fatall Scæne, an eternall reproch in respect of the world, but to God-ward a testimony of a contrite and penitent heart. I giue him thanks, whome it may be in some other kind of death I should haue forgotten. These are the fruites of my youths wantonnesse: hauing not past the age of fixe and twenty yeares, I dye a scorne to the world: But I would to God in the beginning of my being, that my cradle and funerall had beene inseparable. O fortunate and happie death! if my life had beene longer it had beene more wicked; and more yeares had increased my sinnes, dying a naturall death I should scarce haue repented: Good God pardon a sinner, pardon her I say, who

Death of the
D. of Cleues.

This yeare in March the Duke of Cleues hauing languished long of ſicknes, hoping of ſome recouery, was intercepted by death, going a hunting, to the great griefe both of his ſubiects and neighbors, for that dying without children, he ſhould leaue a doubt-full contention to them that pretended the inheritance, which did ſeeme to threaten war and deſolation, the ſparkles which did ſhew vpon his death, gaue cauſe to feare a great fire, as you ſhall after heare.

Discourſe of Terrails apprehenſion and execution.

I muſt now relate vnto you an enterpriſe vpon Geneua, made by Lewis of Combourſier, Seigneur of Terail, and other places, Vicount of Rauell, Knight of the Order, Corner to the Daulphin, and Baron of Moyſſac. Being executed there the ninth of Aprill. About three years ſince there was intelligence giuen, that Terrail being much diſcontented, that the Spaniards had not aſſiſted him well in his enterprizes in the Low-countries, foreſeeing that in the end they would ruine him, he gaue it out that he wold ſerue the Gobet (for ſo he called the Duke of Sauoy) ſaying openly that he had a notable enterpriſe vpon Geneua. Soone after he came to Paris, vpon colour to recouer the Kings fauor, but they were aduertified that he ſhould come into Sauoy. His deſſeignes were then diſappointed by the murder which he committed in the Louvre before the King, who treated of his peace with the Gentleman whom he ſlue: ſo as to ſly the Kings indignation, he returned to the Arch-duke, where he remayned, vntill that hee vndertooke a voyage to Loretto with La Baſſide an Enginer, whome hee had taken to aſſiſt him in his executions. They went on foot, and in their returne had conference with the Duke of Sauoy. Notwithſtanding that the Earle of Fuentes had diſſwaded Terrail, telling him that the Duke would ingage him in his enterprizes againſt Geneua, and that it would be his ruine. At which time the Duke imparted vnto Terrail and his man, his deſſeignes vpon Geneua: from which time they continued in Sauoy, hauing made two voyages to that effect to Thurin. They of Geneua grew preſently into iealouſie, hauing had ſundry aduertifements of a great and almoſt ineuitable enterpriſe againſt them, managed by Terrail: being in this perplexitie, God ſent them ſome more light, the which did ſerue them as a meanes to enter into the ground of the buſines, and to conuiſt Terrails man, and afterwards himſelfe. Hauing played at Tennis at Chambery, and being hot he retired himſelfe into a chamber, where lying vpon a bed, a ſeruant of the tennis-court aying a ſhirt, he ſaw La Baſſide and ſome others, preſent a paper to Ter-rail, (which was a plot of the towne of Geneua) diſcourſing ſecretly as of affaires of importance. This ſeruant hearing them name ſome of the Forts of Geneua, gaue more attentive eare, and perceiued for certaine that they deuifed of ſome enterpriſe againſt the towne, hearing Terrail (after a long diſcourſe) make no difficulty, but of the means to draw a ſufficient number of men together for this enterpriſe: wherein being ſatiſfied
 by

A by the aſſiſtants, he ſayd openly: They are taken, they cannot auoid it. This being vnder-ſtood by the young man, he hauing a brother in the gariſon of Geneua, and deſirous to ſaue him from this danger, went and diſcouered al to a Burgeſſe of Geneua, who was then at Chambery. This Bourgeſſe made a faithfull report vnto the Magiſtrates of Ge-neua, and to the yong mans brother, from which time they ſet ſpies to obſerue Terrails actions. In the end they were aduertified that they were paſt the mountaines, conferred with the Duke of Sauoy; and that he returned by the lake Lemman, whereof they aduertified them of Berne, ſending all the markes of Terrail, and intreating them to ſeize vpon his perſon if he paſt through the country. The which they had expreſly commanded, hauing notice of the D. of Sauoyes praſtiſes againſt Geneua, their ally, and againſt B their owne country. It happened at the ſame time, that a Deacon of Yuerdun, a towne belonging to the Bernois, nere to the Frontier of the County of Bourgondy, being at Geneua, came to ſalute the ſecond Sindic of the towne, and brought him letters. After ſome other diſcourſe, he acquainted him with the aduertifements they had receiued, of the enemies enterprizes againſt Geneua, and the country of Berne, but eſpecially vpon the towne of Yuerdun, a place very important, being the key of the country ioyning vpon Bourgondie: he gaue him alſo the markes of Terrails perſon, whole picture they had gotten at Geneua, doubting that he himſelf would come to view the towne. Some dayes after Terrail returning from Thurin, he paſt the lake, but with ſome ill preſage by C the falling of his mans horſe into the water, which made him in a manner reſolue vpon his returne, yet in the end being perſwaded by his man he paſſed on, he came into the country of Berne, but not into any frequented places: paſſing through their countrey, he diligently obſerued the places of moſt importance, neuer lodging in any towne, but in villages, hamlets, and peſants houſes, vntill he came to Yuerdun, where he ſtayd not, but paſſing the bridge he found the Bailiffe and others, whom he ſaluted, but they ob-ſerued him not. Hauing paſt the bridge, ſeeming to ſtay for ſome other cauſe, he turned towards Yuerdun, and viewed the ſituation and defences of the place: the which was wel noted by them that were yet vpon the bridge, thinking ſimply that he had ſtayd vpon ſome other occaſion: but hauing paſt a little further, the foreſayd Deacon beeing D in a garden, ſaw him come a far off, and hauing obſerued his countenance, he began to doubt that it was Terrail, and the better to diſcouer him, knowing that he was bald, hee made him a low courtſie, to moue him to vncouer, the which he did, & the Deacon being now aſſured, ran ſpeedily to the Bailiffe, deliuering his opinion. All the Aſſiſtants which had noted the countenance of the man to haue turned and obſerued the place, perſwaded the Bailiffe to ſend after him, the which he did by two men onely, who ſhould obſerue what courſe he tooke; that if he went not toward Bourgondy, they ſhould return without any farther pourſute, but if he went that way, they ſhould follow him to his lodging, without making ſhew of any thing, and obſerue particularly the markes which he gaue them of his perſon. There hapned another act of Gods prouidence, Terrail hauing E paſt a village called Villeboeuf, which is within halfe an houres iourney of Bourgondy, meaning to lodge that night in the country, paſſing through a quag-mire, where his horſe being mired, he returned & went ouer a plank, vpon the which his horſe ſtumbling hurt himſelfe which made him halt: this made him reſolue to lodge that night at Villeboeuf. Being lodged there, the two which were ſent from Yuerdun, obſerued him diligently, and one of them returned ſpeedily to carry newes to the Bailiffe, who preſently ſent foure horſemen led by the Captaine of Yuerdun to bring him backe, giuing them charge alſo to require ayde of the peſants: arriuing in the morning, they found Terrail ready to go to horſe, to whom the hoſt and others, being aduertified of the fact, had ſayd F that he could not paſſe the mountaines, where there were two great gards, which ſtayd all men that had not giuen an accompt to the Bailiffe of Yuerdun. This was confirmed by them that came in the morning: & although that La Baſſide ſtormed at this affront, yet Terrail ſeemed willing to returne to Yuerdun, with 4. or ſix horſe, whom he might haue defeated, if he had foreſeen his calamity. After his detention, hee repented him often that he had not ſhewed his great courage at that time: but God blinded him, for P p p p p from

1609. from that time he shewed no signes of valor or dexterity, whereby he might often haue A escaped, as we shall see. Being returned to Yuerdun, and examined by the Bailiffe who was witty and of great experience, he answered, that he was a Gentleman of Daulphiné, called Paul of Conflans, and that he went into Lorraine to follow a sure, which did import him much, intreating the Bailiffe to dispatch him presently. His answers hauing no greater ground, bred more ieaiousie in the Bailiff, so as he resolved to seize vpon his person, vntill he had better aduice: whereupon he demanded his sword, the which he deliuered, and caused him to be lodged in an Inne very carefully garded by foure men. Among other causes to breed suspition, being at Villeboeuf, seeing that he must returne, and that there was no meanes to escape, the passages being garded, he called for a candle, with the which he burnt a long letter written on both sides. Being demanded thereon, he answered, that it was a letter written to Monsieur de Crequy from his kinswoman, to be a mediator vnto his Maiestie for him; the which he still maintained, and that hee burnt it, lest his name and quality should be knowne. The Bailiffe for his better satisfaction sent presently to Geneua, to haue some one that knew Terrail: to whom they sent one of the Magistrates of the towne and a souldier, who had serued vnder Terrail in the Low-countries, and had giuen many aduertisements of his enterprises, whereof hee had the knowledge from his owne mouth, by the meanes of some of his seruants. These two being come to Yuerdun, it was held good the souldier should enter suddenly into the lodging, where Terrail was at supper: he enters, and at the first sits downe at the table without making shew of any thing. Terrail seeing him, was much troubled, seeming to be very ill, and desiring them to warme his bed: thus hee retired to his chamber much dismayed, whither he sent for the sayd souldier, whome he entertayned very courteously, intreating him to tell if he were not sent to discouer him, the which the souldier hauing iustified, he began to vse strange speeches vnto him: That he knew not why they of Geneua did malice him: That he had had diuers aduertisements from Chambery, that they layd waite for him at Geneua: And that they would employ the sayd souldier to discouer him: That he should die a gallant Knight and an innocent. That the Earle of Fuentes, the King of Spaine, and the Arch-duke would reuenge his death: That he neuer had had to do with the Duke of Sauoy, who he sayd was an vnworthie and an ingratefull master, witnesse the end of Albigny: He beganne to suborne the sayd souldier to helpe him to escape, promising him a thousand crownes, if with all speed he would write to the Earle of Fuentes, and go into Bourgondie to the Earle of Chanite, to aduertise him of his extreame danger. And La Esclide would haue deliuered the sayd souldier an hundred crownes which he refused. Terrail intreated him to returne early in the morning, for that he had matters of importance to deliuer vnto him. In the meane time the Bailiffe beeing aduertised of the truth, and finding it not fit the souldier should confer any more with him, caused him with his man to be conueyed to the castle, where they were lodged apart, and well garded. They of Geneua hauing notice of his detention, the Councell resolved to send to the Segnieurs of Bearne to demand him, giuing E the charge to one of the Sindics of the towne, who beeing first heard in the Councell of siue and twenty, he let them vnderstand, the great and iust grounds they had at Geneua, to desire to haue Terrail: that they had certaine proofes of his practises: that the witnesses which they had at Geneua, could not bee without danger transported: that the cause of both Townes allyed was common: that the enterprises concerned them inseparably: that in the like case, they of Geneua had deliuered prisoners to Bearne: that the Kings men not long since had granted them a prisoner for the like, attempt: that the consequence would be very great to diuert vndertakers, if they saw they could not without danger come about Geneua. In the end the petty Councell of Bearne, beeing perplexed in this businesse, assembled the great Councell of two hundred, where the like matters beeing propounded with vehemencie, it was generally concluded, that Terrail should be deliuered into their hands with his seruant and goods. The Kings Ambassador residing at Soluerre, did greatly allow of this resolution.

The aduice of this grant beeing come to Geneua, they vsed wonderfull diligence, and

A and dexterity, to perswade his brother (which dwelt in the Tennis-court at Chambery) to go thither to fetch him with goodly promises: the which he effected faithfully and speedily, so as within 3. dayes he was at Geneua, and did serue much in the discouery. They also sent the souldier which had known Terrail to Monluel, neere to Lions where they knew there was a souldier which had sometimes bin his horse-keeper, and had heard his speeches touching the enterprises of Geneua, the which he had oftentimes told to Baleine, (which was the souldiers name of Geneua) but the horse-keeper was absent: but the sayd Baleine found another souldier at Lions, his Camerado, who assured him that the sayd horse-keeper had often confer'd with him of this busines, whereof the sayd Baleine took an act by a Notaries hand. Terrail was deliuered to the Sindic of Geneua, & conducted with a guard from Yuerdun to Morges, a little towne seated vpon the lake Lemman, 8. leagues from Geneua, where he was deliuered in gard to the Bailiffe of Morges vntill they should send for him to Geneua by water. This was done by a Decree of the great Councell of Bearne, with this prouiso, that before he went out of their territories, they should send them letters vnder the Scale of Geneua, that it was done without prejudice to their iurisdiction, and of meere grace and curtesie. Terrail was brought alone from Yuerdun, his seruant remaining behind, lest they should confer: vpon the way he vsed strange speeches to the Sindic, asking him often: of what death will ye make me to die at Geneua? he seemed to feare much to be deliuered into the Kings hands, for which C he had changed his name and fashion: that the King hauing him he will keepe him long in the Bastile, whereas being far off, he might make his peace with greater aduantage; yet since seeing himself taken, he sayd he had no wil to fall into the hands of them of Geneua, but to be deliuered to the King, hoping by this means to make his peace very easily. He sayd also, that he had dissuaded the D. of Sauoy from the enterprise of Geneua: but with such friuolous reasons, as they might easily see they were inuented of purpose. Being at Morges, he so bewitcht the Bayliffe with goodly words and promises, as he refused him to them that came the next day to fetch him to Geneua by water, giuing Terrail means to escape, if God had not depriued him both of courage and iudgement. There were some of M. Des Dignieres men which past by Morges, intreating the Bailiffe to keepe him D vntill he had a new warrant from Bearne, whether they went to that end: there was a weak gard in Morges, he had the liberty of the castle, and meanes to speake with whom he pleased, and to write to his friends, hauing sent a very artificial and passionar petition to the Seigneurs of Bearne. He had also won the fauor of the people of Morges, by his good behaviour, iustifications, and bounty, so as if there had come but twenty resolute men to his rescue, he had bin safe: and this had bin easie to execute, the lake in this place being but three litle French leagues ouer, and right against Morges all being the dukes. if he had had the assurance to haue gone out of the castle, he had escaped by the means of them of Morges it selfe, so much they fauored him. They of Geneua sent speedily to Berne to complaine, and to re-demand him, the which was confirmed with much indignation against the Bailiffe of Morges, who before any answer made to the Segnieurs of E Geneua, had receiued letters of iniunction, commanding him speedily to deliuer Terrail vnto them, the which he was forced to do. For which contempt the Bailiffe was in disgrace, and there were presumptions, that Terrail had promised him tenne thousand crownes to keepe him from going to Geneua, or at the least that his man might not come: the which the Bailiffe had promised faithfully, hoping to effect it by the meanes of his great credit and alliance, but it fell out otherwise. The Earle of Fuentes, the Catholike Cantons, and Terrails kinsmen laboured much at Bearne to saue him, but some came too late.

He that was sent from the Earle of Fuentes, was intertained till the after-noone without audience, vntill that Terrail was deliuered into the hands of them of Geneua. F The Segnieurs of Bearne did carry themselves very affectionate and zealous in this action. Terrail was conducted in an armed Frigate: vpon the way one of the chiefe of the Towne which did accompanie him, intertained him with very honourable and kind words: That if hee would declare that which concerned the safety of the towne,

he promised him in the name of the Seigneurie, pardon, libertie, courteous vsage, and intercession to the King: but he denied all, yet he was much perplexed, sauing that hee was no man of yron, and if they put him to the Racke he should speake any thing. Being come to Geneua the fourteenth of Aprill about midnight, hee was lodged in the Town-house well guarded, the next day being sent for to the Councell, they did in like manner let him know how desirous they were to saue him, requiring him to speake freely, and to helpe himselfe, for that they had sufficient in ther hands to conuict him, promising him libertie and all good vsage, if he would voluntarily declare the businesse. This was repeated aboue ten times vnto him: but still he persisted in the negatiue, with great execrations and oaths, so as in the end they told him, that seeing hee would not saue himselfe there was no more grace for him. Whereupon they caused him to answer criminally, vsing some rough speeches vnto him, which amazed him much: being confronted by Balleine the fouldier, he denied all, yea that which was most apparent, so as they began by his doubtful answers to discouer the whole truth. On munday morning being the 17. of Aprill, he was led from the Town-house to the prison: about the same time the sayd Sindic with a Secretarie of the State, brought his man from Yuerdun to the prison, and presently brought him to his answer, causing the young man of Chambery to see him, from whome they had had their best intelligence, who hauing viewed him, affirmed confidently that this was the man which had presented the paper to Terrail, and had vsed the aboue-mentioned speeches vnto him. This young man being examined apart, what apparell La Bastide did weare then, he told what he had seen, the which La Bastide did confesse, but he denied the paper and the speeches, and so did Terrail. In the end, seeing that the young man did constantly maintaine his saying, it was resolu'd that La Bastide should be put to the Racke; who hauing indured the strapado twice, being ready to be put to it the third time, he sayd he would confesse all. This resolution to put him to the Racke was also grounded vpon an another occasion, for that a Burgesse of Geneua hauing by chance seene La Bastide the same day in the Court of the prison, did wites that he supt one night with him in a neere Village, and that in the morning the host had told him, that La Bastide had handled many mappes, and plots of Fortification, before he parted, so he was knowne by the host to be an Enginer, to whom he confessed it, and yet in prison he denied all. After La Bastides confession, he was confronted with Terrail, who began to disauow him, but La Bastide persisted in his confession, whereupon Terrail being presented the Racke, with teares in his eyes he confessed the whole act voluntarily, and had no torture: The French King, and the Estates of the vnited Prouinces, were presently aduertised of that which did concerne them. La Bastide confessed that he was an Enginer, hauing long serued the Archdukes, that since he had giuen himselfe to Terrail, to execute the enterprife of Geneua, and that he had sometimes beene a scholler. He was gallant of his person, and cunning in matter of fortification. That about foure or siue moneths past, returning from pilgrimage with his master, passing by Thurin, the Duke discourfed with them, both of Geneua, and of the great desire he had to be master thereof, demanding their aduice: he resolu'd to assaile it, not by seege or open force, but by enterprife, wherein they offered him their seruice, the which he accepted, with many thanks and promises, giuing to Terrail 700. Duckets, and a Jewell of 300. crownes price, and to La Bastide 280. Phillips Dollors. To effect this desseigne, the Duke gaue them charge to view the gates, Guard, Port, and state of the Towne, whereupon La Bastide vndertooke to go into the towne, where hauing viewed all, he brought vnto the Duke a plot of all that which had bene reformed in the fortification, since the Scalado, according to the which, the Duke did renew his ancient plot. That Terrail and La Bastide going to Thurin, they could not agree vpon the meanes of the enterprife, Terrail inclining to surprise a gate, with a pettard or otherwise, and La Bastide shewing that it was a matter of infinit danger, by reason of the great number of defences which were at the gates, and their careful guard. After some dispute, the Duke inclined to La Bastides opinion, to attempt the Port, where there was not so strict a Gard, and the which being surprized by a sufficient number 1609.

A number of men, they should be in the heart of the towne, and could not bee in danger before they were entred: the which being executed, La Bastide made no difficulty, to accomplish the enterprife, being very easie (as he sayd) to seize vpon the Port De Riue, which was neare. Terrail hauing heard all, yeelded to his opinion, and went with La Bastide to passe the Lake about Euian, where he remayned eight dayes, informing him selfe particularly, from all the Water-men which went to Geneua, touching the disposition, guides, and defences of the Port, visiting of boates and other things belonging to the nauigation of the Lake, by whom he discouered many errors in the Guard: and to be the better assured, he caused La Bastide to go ouer the Lake to Morges, to the end that he might passe in one of the Barkes of Geneua, which on certaine dayes go thither to marker, and obserue the state of the port, and enter into Geneua without ialousie; the which he performed so cunningly as no man suspected him. The like spy had bin taken some two yeres before, hauing grossely visited the chaines, who being amazed, and wauering in his answer, confest by force that he had bin sent to view the place, nor knowing any more of the enterprife, nor who had sent him, for the which he was hanged. Some think he was of Terrails faction. From that time they had fortified the fort with another ranke of double chaines, but that did not serue to warrant them against this last enterprife. Terrail and La Bastide (who returned vnto him by land) hauing againe visited the port of Riue, by the which he past, he returned to the Duke, assuring him of the certainty and facility of the enterprife, taking vpon them to be the Leaders and conductors of the execution. The enterprife was plotted after this maner: Terrail and the D. had made their desseigne to prouide 4. or 5. great flat-bottomed boats, such as do usually carry wood vnto the towne: especially in May, when as they make their provision, and to lodge vnder the wood an 150. or 200. choice men in euery boat, the which should approach without suspicion, for that their counterfeit water-men should be attired like vnto them of Geneua. As for the search which was heretofore made within the towne, they did not regard it, hauing resolu'd to kill the searchers suddenly, and to leape altogether out of their boats: they should at an instant gather their troupes together, farre from the commerce of them of Geneua, and at a prefixed time ship them, when as they should see a fauourable Northren wind arise. Terrail should be in the first boat, and the Duke or his eldest son in the last. The first exploit being done, the D. or his son should also haue other troupes, especially horf-men ready, the which might well bee drawne together, vnder colour of the Duke of Nemours marriage, which should be celebrated at Anisly in Sauoy, eight leagues from Geneua: and although the stay of the sayd marriage did cause some difficulty, yet they had so many other incouters as they held the enterprife infallible: the facility was, in that they might imbarke them secretly, a fauorable wind carrying them in a quarter of the time that is required by land: they thought that 500. men or more being entred, would be able to stay all the people, and seaze vpon the Canon at the Port, and also at the Port de Riue, by the which the Duke or his sonne should enter with their land-troupes. The enterprife was appointed at such a time, when as the towne seemed to be most vnfurnished, by reason of their country labors, and at dinner time, when it seemed euery man retires himselfe. They haue confest also (since their condemnation, that their voyage through the country of Bearne, was to obserue it, for the pursuing of their victory, after the taking of Geneua: for although the Duke entred alone into this enterprife, and that the Earle of Fuentes, had not discouered him selfe to be of the party: yet Terrail sayd, that the D. had assured him, that the Spaniards which were in Sauoy, had commandement to follow and obey him, as he pretended, in this enterprife. Terrail went into the Low-countries to take his leaue of the Archduke, to retire such meanes as he had yet remaining there, and to bring some of the best executioners that he could find, with some Mariners. He and La Bastide agreed both in their confessions, being examined apart, whereby they had drawne from them the grounds of the enterprife, against the which they themselves did afterwards giue them direction to defend themselves, especially Terrail, made a draught in paper of the meanes how to preferue any Port from the Pettard: he sayd, that the D. was so bent vpon this execution that that notwithstanding his imprisonment, if they kept the confessions close, and gaue it A out that he had not dicouered any thing, but continued in prison still, vntill that time, the Duke would continue his enterprife, and might be easily taken both he and his son: but this was a forged meanes to delay his punishment, and to giue time to the intercessions which he knew would be made for him, by his kinsmen of Dauphiné, the expedient also was too dangerous. Being demanded if they knew not that it was a capitall Crime, to make like Desseignes in a time of full Peace, sworne and well obserued: the which they both confessed freely: Terrail desired that hee might be kept aliuie betwixt foure wals, and La Bastide intreated, that they would not make him lose his soule by some cruell punishment: being both condemned, La Bastide disposed B himselfe to die with a constant resolution: being vpon the ladder, he sayd vnto the Spectators: My masters I pray you pardon me, I am more ioyfull to die here ignominiously, then if the enterprife which I had in hand had succeeded: pray vnto God for me that he will pardon me, for the loue of his Sonne, who shed his blood vpon the crosse for me and for all true repentants. Terrail was condemned to lose his head, vpon the place of Molard, where he was executed the 19. of April, and La Bastide was hanged at the same place the 21. They both died very resolutely, especially Terrail, who neuer changed his countenance, neither shewed any gesture vnworthy of his fore-passed life: La Bastide was much grieued that Torture had made him accuse Terrail, of whose death he vnderstood, desiring rather to haue bene drawne in peeces with foure horses. Terrail was C interred on the Bulwarke of Loy, whereas the heads of those which were executed at the Scalado were buried. If Terrail had made vse of the grace which was offered him in the beginning he had bin saued: but he did not thinke they should be able to conuict him, relying vpon the promises of the Bayliffe of Morges, that his man should not be deliuered to them of Geneva, as indeed he was stayd at the instance of the sayd Bailiffe vntill a second voyage. It was held for certaine that the gouernement of Sauoy, had bin promised by the Duke vnto Terrail, if the enterprife had succeeded happily.

Conference betwixt Du Moulin and Gontier.

On the eleuenth of Aprill there was a conference betwixt Monsieur du Moulin, one of the Ministers of the Reformed Church at Paris, and Father Gontier a Iesuite, being seconded by the Barronnesse of Salignac: after which it was bruted abroad, that Gontier D had confuted du Moulin in diuers points which they of the Religion did hold, Gontier himselfe writing a glorious letter vnto the King to that effect. Du Moulin finding his reputation touched, and the truth mis-reported, was forced to publish a true discourse of the whole conference, after this manner.

Monsieur du Moulin hauing about three of the clocke in the after-noon mett with Monsieur de Lienbrune before his doore in the street of Marez, he was intreated to go vp into his chamber, the which he found full of Ladies and Gentlewomen: at his first entry one of them intreated him to expound the 31. Article of the confession of the Faith of the Reformed Churches. Du Moulin answered, that if it pleased her to come vnto his lodging he would indeuour to satisfie her; whereupon another Lady sayd, that E we should be alwaies ready to giue an account of our faith: and that Du Moulin should not refuse instruction to them that demanded it. Du Moulin answered, that he knew wel they demanded no instruction, and that to dispute of Religion with women, who speake all together, and then publish what they please, were to do wrong to the truth of Religion. One of them replied, that she was much troubled vpon this Article, and that they often objected vnto her, that the Ministers could not giue a reason of their Mission & Vocation. Du Moulin answered, that he wondered shee had not demanded of them that laboured so therein, a reason of their vocation, and that shee should haue found them much more troubled. That euery man that busieth himselfe to demand a reason of anothers vocation, must be well assured of his own, and ready to yeeld a reason. Herupon F enters Father Gontier with two others who had many bookes: Gontier demanded at his first entrance, what is the question? Du Moulin answered, that the Lady demands a reason of my Mission, and I told her she should require a reason of yours.

Gont. That is but an Euasion.

Du Moulin

A Du Moulin. It is no Euasion: For whosoever will demand the reason of anothers vocation, is first bound to giue an account of his owne. If you will confesse that you cannot defend yours, I doe offer to defend mine presently.

Gont. Be not in choller I denie it.

Du Moulin. I say nothing but what is cleere, and will first prooue, that you haue no vocation.

Gont. Who hath giuen you commission to speake thus vnto your superiors.

Du Moulin. You are not my superior, but I maintaine that you haue no charge. For you say you are a Priest, and haue receiued this Order of Priesthood after this maner. B Which is that the Bishop hauing anointed your fingers, and imposed his hands, saith vnto you, Receive the power to offer Sacrifice to God, and to celebrate masse, as wel for the liuing as the dead. By this meanes he hath made you a sacrificer to sacrifice Iesus Christ. I would demand then in what place of the word of God Bishops haue Authority to make sacrificers in the Church.

Gont. That is easily proued by the second and fifth Chapters of the first of Tymothie, bring mee a new Testament. Wherevpon they brought him one, and hee read these two chapters with great expectation of the assistants: but finding not that which he desired, he sayd vnto one of his owne coate which did assist him, goe and fetch mee my concordance, the which being brought hee turned it ouer a long time and spake C not a word.

Du Moulin being weary to attend, sayd vnto him: If this disgrace had befallne mee to bee put to silence; and to bee forced to send for my Concordance, I would neuer shew my selfe in such good company. Wherevpon Monsieur Lienbrune sayd vnto Gontier, Sir, I am much amazed to see that I see: for you haue told mee that the Ministers were not able to stand before you, and now I see you put to silence.

After halfe an houres silence, I sought sayd Gontier, a passage where it speakes of the Imposition of hands.

Du Moulin sayd vnto him, I will ease you of that paine, shewing him presently the passage which is in the fourth chapter of the first of Tymothie.

D Gontier read the passage which is this, despise not the gift that is in thee, which hath bene giuen thee by Prophecie, by the imposition of hands by the companie of Elders: adding that these Elders were Priests, and that the Greeke word did beare it.

Du Moulin. That doth not prooue that Bishops haue Authority from God, to establish sacrificers in the Church.

Gontier in steed of answering takes the Bible, and turning towards Monsieur de Lienbrune sayd, that he would shew, that vnder the new Testament there were alwaies Sacrificers in the Church.

Du Moulin. That is nothing to the purpose, wee speake of Authority of Bishops to make Sacrificers vnder the New Testament.

E Gont. Wherevpon Gontier calling for paper, pen and incke, the which being brought, he began to write without speaking any thing, then putting out what hee had written he held the company in suspence.

Du Moulin sayd vnto him: you winne time; and vnder colour of writing you take leisure to thinke of some thing to saue your selfe. Wherevpon he leauing his writing, intreated Du Moulin to set downe his proposition: who at his request wrote these words: shew mee that the Bishops of the Church of Rome haue Authority by the word to establish Sacrificers in the Church.

Gont. I will prooue that the Apostles were Sacrificers.

Du Moulin. That is not the question, neither doe you prooue what I demand.

F Gont. It is sufficient I shew you that the Apostles were Sacrificers.

Du Moulin. Seeing you like their, and that I can draw no prooffe from you of the power of Bishops to make Sacrificers, because wee will not be at a stand, let vs see how you can prooue the Apostles were Sacrificers.

Gontier takes the penne and writes as followeth: The word to Sacrifice signifies to doc 1609 doe an holy thing. The Apostles were established to doe a holy thing, therefore they A were established to sacrifice.

Du Moult. The question is not heere of the Etymologie, but of the sence, and how the word to sacrifice is taken in the Romane Church, that is to offer really vnto God the body of Iesus Christ in a propitiatory sacrifice for the liuing and the dead. To pray vnto God is to do a holy thing, and yet euery one that praies is not a sacrificer in that sence. So, as your conclusion followeth not, for that you take the word to sacrifice in another sence then the question is here.

Gont. I approue what was needfull to proue.

Du Moult. I deny it: it is nothing to the purpose: you sticke vpon the word to tie B the thing.

Gont. I haue done sufficient and you haue granted what I demanded.

Du Moult. I haue granted nothing, and take the company to witnesse, if any one hath hether to heard a word from Maister Doctor which proues that Bishops haue Authority from God to establish sacrificers in the Church: Or that the Apostles were sacrificers to sacrifice Iesus Christ.

Gont. No man speaking any thing, Gontier sayd that Iesus Christ had sayd vnto his Apostles, doe this: whereby he commanded them to sacrifice.

Du Moult. I deny that doe this signifies to sacrifice.

Gont. He commands them to doe his bodie.

Du Moult. Admit that it were so; yet to doe the Lords bodie is not to sacrifice it. C

Gont. In the sixe and twentieth of Saint Mathew, the blood of Iesus Christ is shed for the remission of sinnes: But where the blood of Iesus Christ is shed there it is sacrificed; and all which serues for the Remission and forgiuensse of sinnes is a Sacrifice.

Du Moult. I denie it, if that were true, Baptisme were a Sacrifice, seeing it serues for the Remission of sinnes. It is also false that whereas the blood is shed for the remission of sinnes there it is a Sacrifice, vnlesse his blood bee offered vnto God, for there is no Sacrifice without offering vnto God. Moreouer to make this effusion of D blood, a Sacrifice, it must bee done by death. But in the Lords supper, you cannot shew mee that this blood is offered vnto God, nor that this effusion of blood is made by death.

Gontier. In the 26. of Saint Mathew it is sayd expressly that the blood of Iesus Christ is shed, whereupon he framed this Argument. The blood shed which is ioyned with death is a Sacrifice. But the blood shed in the Sacrament is ioyned with death. Therefore it is a Sacrifice.

Du Moult. You still suppose that which you must proue, which is that this blood which you say is shed in the Sacrament, is offered vnto God. Secondly I answer that captiously, you adde to that which I haue sayd this word conioyned. That in the 26. E of Saint Mathew hee speakes of blood which is conioyned by nature with his death. But I say that if our Sauours blood were really shed in the Sacrament, yet should it not be shed by death.

Gont. By this answer the Maior is granted.

Du Moult. You speake nothing, neither haue you produced any thing yet for to proue that our Lord Iesus CHRIST hath offered his blood vnto God in the Sacrifice.

Gont. I haue done it sufficiently; there needs no more.

Du Moult. Proue it, or say you cannot.

Gont. Whereupon Gontier takes the penne and writes. The blood shed for the remission of sinnes is contained in the institution of the Sacrament in the 26. of Saint Mathew the 28. verse.

Du Moult. That doth not proue that Christ did offer his blood vnto God in the Sacrament.

Gont.

A Gont. Therevpon after some silence, and the Ladies importunity to speake of some other thing, in the end Gontier recouers himselfe, and frames an Argument which hee would not write, but Du Moult did write it, hee repeating it; Then he read it before him, and this it was. The blood of Iesus Christ which is shed for the remission of sinnes, must necessarily bee offered vnto God. But in the institution of the Sacrament contained in the 26. of Saint Mathew, verse 28. the blood is shed for the remission of sinnes. Ergo it is necessarily offered vnto God.

Du Moult. I deny that the first proposition is alwaies true, for admit the very blood of Iesus Christ should be shed in the Sacrament it selfe, it followes not that it were offered to God in Sacrifice: for it might bee offered or presented to the communicants and not to God. It was sufficient that he was offered vpon the Crosse.

B As for the second proposition, I acknowledge that the blood of Iesus Christ was shed, but hee meanes vpon the crosse: as the Bible of the Church of Rome and the Masse it selfe doe witnesse, who turne it to the future (Effundetur) that the blood of our Lord shalbe shed. I demaund now of Maister Doctor if hee disauowes his Bible, and his Masse. When Christ sayd drinke all of it.

Gontier hauing taken the paper, blots out part of that which Du Moult had written: whereat hee complaines, and represents it vnto the company: Gontier excused himselfe, and sayd hee had done it vnadvisedly: Then hee beganne to write these words.

C The Oblation made vnto the Communicants cannot be. Then hee staied, and blotted out that which hee had written, beginning to speake of the second Article of Du Moult answers: who intreated him to answer to the first Article. Gontier sayd that hee would not, and that in his answer hee would impugne that which hee found weakest. Du Moult prest him againe, saying that Gontiers conclusion, sayled, when as one of the propositions was denied.

Gontier refused againe. Some of the assistants which came late prest him, but hee persisted in his refusal. But vpon the second Article hee sayd that Du Moult denied the Bible, the which sayd is shed, and not shalbe shed.

D Du Moult answered that our translation was faithfully done according to the Greeke, but that should be no let, that the exposition of the Church of Rome, and the Bible onely allowed by the councell of Trent, and what the Masse it selfe doth bring should not be true.

Gont. Then Gontier caused a Greeke Testament of Robert Stenens to bee brought, and to weaken the Authority of the Greeke Text, he sayd that many things had beene changed, and that in the end of the booke was an Index of aboute fise hundred diuers readings.

Du Moult answered that these diuers readings did not change the sence: That all this inuectiue against the Originall of the new Testament did not helpe any thing to proue that which they could not yet proue, which was that Iesus Christ had offered his blood to God in the Sacrament, pressing Gontier againe to proue it. Gontier persisting still in his deniall, and their disputation beeing at a stay: all the Ladies to gratifie him, intreated them to speake of some other thing, saying that it was to deepe for them.

One of the Ladies then desired them to expound these words of Iesus Christ: this is my bodie. New matter propounded.

Du Moult tooke the word, and sayd: That no man doubted of the truth of those words: that they must beleue the Scripture according to the exposition it made of it selfe: that these words, this is my body, are thus expounded by the Apostle Saint Paul, the first to the Corinthians the 10. verse. the bread which wee breake vnto you is the Communion in the Bodie of Christ. An exposition which the Church of Rome rejects, not beleueing that it is bread, or that wee breake bread: Neither that the bread broken bee the Communion in the bodie of Christ, seeing it was the very bodie of Iesus Christ. Besides the Euangelists with one consent doe witnesse that Iesus Christ did breake and giue bread. Hee tooke bread, brake it and gaue it. The which the Church

Church of Rome denies not beleueing that hee gaue bread. Moreouer it denies A these words, this is my bodie. For seeing that the word this, signifies, that which I giue you, and seeing that he gaue bread, the sence of these words, this is my body, is, this bread is my body, the which the Church of Rome denies.

Gontier on the other side opposed that Saint Paul had sayd in the Sacrament, that the bodie of the Lord is broken for vs. That the bread whereof he speakes saying, the bread which wee breake, is his flesh, as it is sayd in the sixth of Saint Iohn. The bread which I will giue thee is my flesh.

Du Moulin interrupted him saying, that therein hee did contradi& the Church of Rome, the which did not beleuee that the bodie of our Lord is broken in the Sacrament, demanding of Gontier if hee would set it downe vnder his hand, that the Church of Rome did beleuee that the bodie of our Lord is broken in the Sacrament. That Gontier by this word bread, meaning the bodie of Christ, made the words of Saint Paul ridiculous, causing him to say that, the bodie of Christ which wee breake is the Communion in the bodie of Christ. That in this passage of Saint Iohn hee speakes not of the Sacrament, but doth promise to giue himselfe vnto the death as it appears by the words which hee addes. The bread which I will giue is my flesh, the which I will giue for the life of the world. But he gaue not himselfe for the life of the world but in his death.

Gont. Herevnto Gontier answered not any thing, but that this word, I will giue, being twice repeated is taken in two diuers significations. Then beeing required to signe that the Church of Rome did beleuee that the bodie of our Lord is broken in the Sacrament, hee tooke paper and wrote, Iesus Christ in the Sacrament hath broken his bodie. Saint Paul 1. Cor. 11. verse 14. which was not that which was demanded. Therevpon being required to speake freely if the Apostle Saint Paul, spake the truth in saying that wee breake bread, hee answered freely that hee would make no answer therevnto. The which moued one of the assistants called Mounseieur Pompart, who came in the end of the conference, to say vnto him, we brought our eares to heare but you haue brought no tongue to speake. Gontier beeing then prest againe to proue that Iesus Christ hath offered his blood vnto God in the Sacrament, he quits the combat and retires himselfe ashamed into a corner of the chamber, where hee beganne to write what he pleased, the which hauing shewed vpon the Table, he afterwards rent it, hauing retired it out of the hands of the Ladie of Liembrune who would haue kept it. Gontier hauing thus quit the place, the Barronesse of Salignac entred the Lifts, whose words were, that shee had forsaken the Religion in the which shee had bene bread vp, after knowledge of the cause, hauing spent foure whole yeeres before shee could resolve: That she had read all the Fathers in Greeke and Latin, and had had a man by her to translate them. That shee had found that the Fathers of the foure first ages were conformable to the beliefe of the Church of Rome: that shee had relied thereon, and that her conuersion had serued others.

Du Moulin sayd: Madam, seeing you vnderstand so well what you doe, giue mee leaue to aske you if you doe not call vpon the Virgin Mary, and if the forme of your praier bee not Aue Maria &c. yes sayd shee. Then Du Moulin sayd vnto her, you doe not then vnderstand what you doe, for in speaking so, you thinke to pray to the Virgin Mary, but you pray vnto God for her, saying God keepe thee Mary, the Lord bee with thee &c. Moreouer Madam, I thinke you remember wel the causes which haue moued you to this change. As for example, can you shew vs the texts wherein God doth command to paint God, and to make Images of the Trinity in stone. The sayd Lady answered, that shee would not vndertake to proue that in the presence of a Doctor. Norwithstanding Du Moulin shewed her the fourth of Deutronomy vers. 15. where God forbids to make any Image of his likenesse. Shee on the other side produced the Images of the Cherubins: But Du Moulin sayd, that hee spake of Images of God, and that the Cherubins were not God.

As for the Images of creatures, hee demanded of her, if when shee changed her Religion,

The Church of Rome beleuee that the body remains whole and that the accidents only which they call kinds are broken.

Conference with the Lady of Salignac.

1609.

A ligion, shee had scene any commandement from God to doe any seruice vnto the Images of creatures.

Gontier did releuee her a farre off, crying out of his corner where hee was retired, Madam, obiect vnto him the serpent of brasle, the Image of Iesus Christ God and man. Also hee sayd that they did Sacrifice and cast Incense before the Cherubins.

Du Moulin answered that the brasen Serpent was no Image of Iesus Christ, but a figure of his Office and sauing vertue. But admit it had bene the Image, yet was it not the Image of his Diuinity, besides it is not found that the Israelits did it any seruice but in committing Idolatrie, he also denied that they did doe Sacrifice or cast Incense before the Cherubins, hauing a vaile interposed.

The Lady fell againe vpon the Fathers, affirming that shee had read them all. Du Moulin told her that it was impossible considering the multitude of bookes and the difficultie for her, which vnderstood neither Greeke nor Latin. That twentie yeeres were not sufficient, and for her shee must haue double asmuch time; intreating her to name some one father amongst the rest which shee had read. Shee gaue him for example Chrysostome, wherevpon Du Moulin intreated her to repeat some one passage which shee had learned there. Then shee was brought to a stand, saying, that being the mother of a familie shee had no leisure to attend it altogether. Then shee repeated a long list of the fathers, whereas shee tooke the Greeke for the Latin, saying that Tertullin had bene Disciple to the Apostle, that Ciprian had bene his Disciple in the yeere of Christ one hundred and fifty, wherein shee was reprehended by Gontier, who heard her a farre off, who rising easily from his place, tooke his leaue of the company.

Du Moulin sayd vnto him at his going forth: Sir, if wee were lost and damned as you teach, yet Christian charity would binde you to haue compassion of vs. And I wonder how that you, who shew your selfe here to bee of so tractable an humour, yet preaching nothing but bloud and sedition as they tell mee that goe to heere you.

Gontier answered, you are ill informed, I haue yeelded an account of my doings vnto the King: and would expose my life for your helth: so after some complements the company retired.

Two daies after Mounseieur De Liembrune hauing met with the same Ladies at Saint Nicholas des Champs, hee inquired of them what the reason was that father Gontier had bene so much amazed, and so troubled to answer. They told him that father Gontier sayd, that he would therein support Madam De Liembrune who wept, fearing to affli& her more.

On the nineteenth day of Aprill beeing Easter day, the vines hauing thrust forth their blood vnseasonably by the forwardnesse of the spring in March, were withered with the mornings frost, and the sonne rising, burned them vp quite, so as that moneth which doth open, and gaue them great hope, did presently extinguish it, and they were deceived of their vintage, especially about Paris, the which was the more grieuous for that three yeeres before they had had small store of wine, so as the poore laborers were terrified from the charge: wherevpon they drew so great store of Brewers of Beere out of the Low countries to Paris, as the signes of Alehouses were more ordinary then of Tauerns.

France is not vnlike vnto a fat fertill soyle, the which with corne puts forth Cockell, Darnell and such like, so as that kind of Vulturs more greedie then any Farmers of Imposit, who make trafficke of Diuine and humane things, and know nothing but to sucke the marrowe from the poore people, employing all their policies, cares and counsell, to scrape what is remayning and to shake the whole State of the Kingdome by their dangerous inuentions, like vnto Horseleaches, which neuer leaue the skinn vntill they burst with blood: They were the Authors of new Edicts, the which when they had bought for little, they opprest the subiects, ruined and spoyled them vterlie. Some of these blood-suckers perswaded the King to abate his coyne both in goodnesse and waight, by which wickednesse all mens fortunes fortunes would be shaken, and both ours and forraine trade vnterly ouerthrowne. This A publike infection had so posselt the King, as hee was fully resolu'd to alter his coyne, and an Edict being vpon the presse, should presently be published, yea against the will of the Court of Parliament.

Vynes burned vp.

The King perswaded to alter the coyne.

1609.

They in whose perpetuall garde the Kingdome is; made it knowne vnto the Kings council how dangerous it would bee to alter the old coyne, and what clamors and innouations it would breed. That they had read of examples in former times of great ruine which had growne thereby, the which should make them more wary to runne into the like: Next vnto ciuill warres and a generall desolation, the abatement of coyne is the greatest mischiefe: By this sinnew, trafficke is maintained, the which beeing dis- B solued France would languish, like vnto the Artires which want nourishment. In the end the courage of Achilles pretailed, or rather the eloquence of Harley, that Nes- tor of our France, with whom the whole council assented.

The King heard his speech willingly and commended it, chasing those catterpillers farre from him.

There was a kinde of people who hauing gotten great credit by their great trade, taking vp great summes of money at interest (they finde many desirous rather to liue vpon the vse of their money, then to purchase Lands) In the end finding themselves opprest with vsurie, and vnable to make payment of their debts, they are forced to breake and to runne away. They are the wickedest amongst men, who hauing pur- C chased places of Authority for their sonnes, and married their daughters with great dowries, hauing conuaid great store of gold, wares, plate and stuffe into forraine parts, they change their soyle: the which hath happened often within few yeeres. But the boldnesse and impunitie of these publike thecues, which in others haue bene neglected was punished in one. It was a Marchant called Pingre, verie well knowne for his great trade, whom the fame of his former life, and his abundance of Marchan-dize had purchast great credit vpon the exchange. Hee hauing defrauded his creditors, and conuayed away his goods and his state to his friends and neighbours, and beeing fled into the Low countries, was found by his creditors at Valentia and was brought backe to Paris, where hee was called in question before the masters of re- D quests, his Proesse beeing made, hee was condemned, to come into the court in his shirt and a torch in his hand, and to aske forgiuenesse, then to bee carried through Saint Denins streete where his house had bene, hauing hanging at his backe these words written in great letters, A TREACHEROVS DEFRAUDER OF OTHER MENS MONEY. Wherevpon there was and aduertisement made touching this crime, in these termes.

As good Lawes spring commonly from bad manners, so wee from two great mis-chiefs which beganne to grow in this Realme, see two very holosome Edicts made in one moneth, to suppress so many Duells, which tend to the ruine of the flourishing Estate of the Nobilitie, and to preuent Bankrupting, which wee see so ordinary, or at E the least to punish such as shalbe conuicted thereof, with their complices and adhe-rentes. Leaving Duells for a more ample discouise, wee wil only speake a word vpon the subiect of the Decree against William Pingre, condemned for Bankrupting, and fals-hood, both foule crimes, the which draw others after them, as theft, coulenage, the robbing of the publike treasure, and counterfetting, all capitall. There hath bene some doubt vpon the interpretation of these words, to punish them extraordinarily, and capitallie, by the Tennor of the Ordinances of Orleance and Bloyes:
If the new Edict which it hath pleased his Royall Maiestie to send vnto his Court of Parliament this moneth of May in the yeere of our Lord 1609. had not taken away all cause of further doubt, appointing death for such offenders, to the great content of F all good men.

But for that no Law is good or commodious to euery man, and that Iupiter himselfe (as the old prouerbe saith) whether hee send raine or faire wheather, cannot content all the world: I will yeeld some apparant reasons to them, which hold there is,

Punishment
of a Bankrupt.

1609.

A to great seueritie and crueltie in this Iudgement, and more in the Kings Maiesties Edict.

They say there must bee some pittie and commiseration had of those, who hauing lost their goods not by prodigalitie or fraude, but by some great force, or by mis-chance, or by the breaking of some one of their Creditors; and that our custome and the Ordonances haue often allowed them, respits, delaies and surceasings by letters or Iudgements, which the Soneraigne Courts haue confirmed. But admit it were so; and that there are some which are not vnworthie of the miserable remedie of cession of their goods, carrying the marke which is a greene bonet and hat, I say a B greene hat; to preuent the fraude of such as hauing made cession doe still were a blacke hat; and a little greene nightcap vnder it, so as it can hardly beescene. Yet can wee not too rigorously punish, not onely with a ciuill death, which is the losse of their goods and honour, but also with naturall death, those that are duely conuicted to haue by fraude and dissembling taken and carried away great summes of money out of diuers good purses, and then fle into forraine countries, where they enioye their spoyles, an infinite number of good families beeing ruined, and brought to beggerie.

These are (saith Tacitus) the fruites of vsury, whose byting is like vnto the woundes of certaine serpents, whereof hee that is stunge seemes to feelee no paine in C the beginning, but in the end it brings them to a death full of anguish and paine.
There is not any Bankrupt, but hath bene an Vsurer, a tiue and passiue in diuers sortes: And if Cato compared an Vsurer to a murderer, wee may well say that a coufener is a verie theefe, seeing hee doth with a fraudulent intent get, and maliciously carrie away the goods of so many poore men, and that by subtil and malicious practises, whereof the fraude depends, the which shalbe called cossenage, if there be no other more significatiue.

Robbing of the publike Treasure, is not often found, as it was in the dealing of this Pingre, yet most doe deale in it that mannage the publike Treasure, whence growes the shame of either side, as well his that takes, as his that giues.

D There remains the most grieuous cryme of all, which is fals-hood, whereof no man breaking fraudulentlie, can excuse himselfe: for in steed of making good and loyall bookes of accoumpts, they make them false: If they say that all such faultes that are not punishable with death, as in a Notarie, Register, or some other publike person, and that by some Iudgements they haue bene content to cause them to burne the daie: I answere that by the Romaine Lawes such Registers of Bankers which are called Argentarij, Argyropoista, Mensularij, and Cernasista, of whom Se- neca speakes in the preface to his Declamations, is a sufficient Testimonie in Iudge-ment, and it hath bene Iudged by infinite Decrees that their Iournall is a good prooffe.

E Hee then that falsifies that rule, or makes it double, merits no lesse punishment then forgers, by a capitall punishment, not onely by the losse of reputation and credit, but by losse of life, as the Edict will haue it, and is practised in some soueraigne Courts, namely at Rouen.

But the equitie and necessitie of this Senatus consult, fortified by Edict, will ap-peare and defend it selfe, and the profit and commoditie will appeere hereafter more and more. To stoppe the passage to all those that prepare themselves for the like fraudes, and to coole their heate, who to affect a greater gaine vpon the place, contemne all honest meanes to imploy their money, either in purchasing of Land, F which is the most safe, or else in buying of rents by constitution, which is lawfull both by the Lawes of God and man, which is the only honest meanes to make profit of money with a good conscience.

The King therefore to preuent these false-hoods published an Edict in May as followeth.

1609.

An Edict to limit Bankrupts.

HENRY by the grace of God King &c. To all present and to come greeting. Desiring to provide for the disorder and most frequent crimes, which the corruption of manners proceeding from the liberty of the forepassed troubles, hath brought in, and to restore Iustice to her authority, and former beautie, to the end that vnder her our subiects may be preferred and maintained in their duties. We haue considered that one of the things which wee are speedily to redresse, is the abuse and apparent deceite which is committed vnder the name and pretext of playing Bankrupt, to the prejudice of poore Widowes, Orphelins and other of our good and louing subiects, by the meanes of which crime, which is growne frequent and in a manner common, for want of being punished as it deserues, the publike faith and trust amongst our subiects is greatly diminished, and the trafficke and commerce almost wholly decayed.

And for that the ancient Kings our Predecessors, haue ordained small punishments against Bankrupts, for that during their reignes, infidelitie and corruption of manners had not so fully crept into the hearts of their subiects. King Francis the first our most honoured Lord and great vnckle, vpon the aduice which was giuen him in the Citie of Lyons, ordained in the yeere of our Lord 1536. that they should proceed extraordinarily against Bankrupts, which did breake fraudulently, their factors and dealers, by informations, confrontations of witnesses and all other extraordinary means, and the fraude being discovered, the culpable to be punished corporally, by condemnations, asking forgiveness, to the profit of the parties interested, standing on the pillory, or otherwise, as it shall be determined by the Iudges, and to be kept close prisoners vntill they had made full satisfaction. And King Charles the ninth also our most honoured Lord and brother, vpon the complaints which were made vnto him in the assembly of the Estates held at Orleance, that the sayd crime of Bankrupting grew too common: Hee ordained that such as should fraudulently breake, should be punished extraordinarily and capitally, which Ordonances the last King deceased, had confirmed by an Edict made at Blois, in the yeere of our Lord 1579. and declared his intention to be. That they which should fraudulently breake, or make cession of their goods, should be punished exemplarily. The which hath made the sayd crime so familiar, as many of our louing and loyall subiects haue suffered, and doe suffer daylie great losses. Desiring therefore to make these complaints which haue bene made vnto vs to cease, after mature deliberation, wee haue held it verie fit and necessary to renew and augment the sayd punishments against bankrupts and cessionaries, which haue broken in fraude.

For these causes and many other considerations vs mouing, with the aduice of our counsell, and of our certaine knowledge, full power and royall Authoritie, by this our present Edict perpetuall and irrevocable haue sayd, decreed and ordained, and doe say, decree and ordaine, will and our pleasure is, that according to the Ordonance and Lawes of our sayd Lord and Brother, vpon the complaint of the Estates held at Orleance, they shall proceed extraordinarily against Bankrupts and Debtors, breaking and making cession of their goods to defraude or beguile their Creditors, their Factors and Dealers, of what estate, quality and condition soeuer they be, and the fraud being proued they shall be exemplarily punished with death, as theues and publike affronters.

And notwithstanding for that most commonly the sayd Bankrupts breake with intent to inrich their children and heires, and the better to couer their malicious designs, make transports and cessions of their goods to their sayd children, heires, or other of their friends to keepe them for them. Wee haue by the same meanes declared, and doe declare such Transports, Cessions and Sales and Donations of goods, mouable or immouable made to defraude or beguile the Creditors directlie or indirec[tly] to be voyde and of no force at all. Forbidding all our Iudges to haue any regard thereof: But contrariwise if it shall appeere the fore-

A sayd transports, Cessions, Donations and sales shall be made to defraude the sayd Creditors: wee will that the Cessionaries, Donataries and Purchasers, shall be punished as complices of the sayd frauds and breaking.

Wee will also and it is our pleasure, that they which, contrarie to the truth, shall iustifie themselves to be Creditors to the sayd Bankrupts, as it often happens by Monopolies and Intelligences, to the end they may draw the true Creditors to composition, shall be also exemplarily punished, as complices of the sayd frauds and bankrupts: forbidding all men expressly to retire the sayd bankrupts, their cautions, factors or dealers, goods, mouables and papers, nor to giue them any comfort or assistance in any sort whatsoever, vpon paine of being punished as Complices, as is sayd. Wee doe also inioyne all those that are true creditors (vpon paine of loosing their debts and actions) not to make any accords or contract, or to giue any time vnto the sayd bankrupts, or their mediators, but to pursue them by the course of Iustice according to our intention. Allowing any one of our subiects, yea without Decree or Warrant, to staie any bankrupt flying away, and to present him vnto Iustice, notwithstanding all Iudgements, Decrees and Customes to the contrarie. Wee command our louing and faithfull counsellors holding our Court of Parliament at Paris, Bayliffes, Seneschals and all other our Iudges to whom it shall belong, to cause these presents to be read, published, inrowled and obserued, according to their forme and tenor.

And to our Proctor Generall and his substitutes, to haue a care thereof, and to certifye vs of the contraientions which shall be made to our present Edict, as they will answer to the contrarie, for such is our pleasure. And to the end it may be firme and stable for euer, we haue caused our seale to be set to these presents.

Giuen at Paris in May. 1609.

Signed Henry.

D

The King at the same time being much troubled with the daylie combats of his subiects one calling an other to field vpon euery light occasion, whereby many Gentlemen of Noble families did vntimely loose their liues, by the aduice of the Princes of the blood, the Constable, the Marshalls of France and other Officers of the crowne he made an Edict to suppress it, as followeth:

Edicts against Duels.

HENRY by the grace of God &c. To all our subiects greeting. The Kings our Predecessors and wee haue made diuers Edicts and Ordinances, for the restraining of the too frequent vse of Duels and single Combats, in this our Realme, moued as most Christian Kings with our duetie and the discharge of our consciences towards God: and as louing and good fathers, tending the safety and preservation of our subiects: hauing likewise a care to maintaine our soueraine Authority, which is much interested by the disorderd and vnbridled liberty of the sayd combats. To this end wee haue by our Edict dated in the moneth of Aprill, in the yeeres of our Lord 1602. with the aduice of the Princes of our blood, Officers of our Crowne, and others of our counsell, which did then assist vs, declared all such as vnder collout of drawing satisfaction from any one, for a pretended iniury, shall challenge, or cause to be challenged, guiltie of high treason; and withall wee did ordaine they should be punished accordingly, as also they that should answer to any such priuate challenge, or assist and second them; expressly forbidding all our Officers of what quality

1609. quality soeuer, to dispencc with any that are guiltie of the punnishments prescribed A by the Lawes of our Realme, for treason, or to moderate the same vpon any consideration. Hoping that the terrour of the sayd punishment would bee a meanes to suppress that detestable custome of combats.

But wee are so farre from attayning to our iust desire, as to our great griefe, and the contempt of Almighty Gods commandements and ours, these Duells haue since beene farre more frequent then before, which wee haue chiefly obserued, for to proceede from a false, erronious and long conceiued opinion, too deeply rooted in all the heartes of our Nobilitie ( who haue alwaies more valued their honours and dignities then their liues ) That they ought not to seeke any satisfaction for received iniuries, but by armes, without disparaging and disgracing their reputations, B and incurring some blemish of cowardise, especially in those cases which they thinke cannot bee sufficiently repaired but by armes.

Notwithstanding that, we, to free them from this doubt and collour, haue by our sayd Edi&th ( shewed that wee haue beene willing to charge our selues with whatsoeuer might bee objected in this regard, against those that should subiect themselves to the obleruation thereof.

Moreouer many, as mallitious, as rash, not considering how seuerely wee doe censure such actions, doe oftentimes willingly ingage themselves, to the hazard both of soule and bodie, thinking thereby to increaseth their reputations, and to get C the aduantage of others. Howbeit in effect it is contrarie to true honour, no way becoming a true Christian, and altogether displeasing vnto vs. So as they are to hope for so little fauour from vs, as wee hate those that practise these Duells, as a more then brutish madnesse.

Being therefore verie desirous now to satisfie them that build such opinions vpon so dangerous and deceitfull foundations, and by the same meanes provide (as much as in vs lieth) for the inconueniences and discommodities which fall out daylie by this vnrestrained libertie; Experience teaching, that it is sometimes necessarie and commodious for the publike good of the whole commonweale, to alter and change Lawes and Decrees, and to accommodate them to such accidents as shall D happen in succeeding times, to make them the more profitable and beneficiall: wee likewise haue thought it good and requisite, with the aduice of the Princes of our blood, Officers of our Crowne, and other great personages neere vnto vs, who by expresse commandement haue often met about this subiect, to adde to those precedent Edi&ths and Ordinances, made by our former Predecessours and our selfe against the sayd combats ( without reuoking or disannulling them in any sort ) this Edi&th, which wee will and commaund to bee inuiolably obserued and kept by all persons, of what estate and condition soeuer they bee. Expressly forbidding all persons: As also the Queene our deere and welbeloued spouse, with all the Princes of our blood, and our chiefe Officers and Seruants, nor to make any petitions, E supplication or sute vnto vs to the contrarie, vpon paine of our displeasure. Protesting and swearing by the cuer lyuing God, neuer to grant any grace nor pardon, that may derogate from this present Edi&th, nor to dispencc with any many for the punishment thereby prescribed, in fauour of any whatsoeuer, nor for any cause, collour, or perticular respect, that may bee propounded, pretended, or vpon what ground soeuer alledged.

First wee inioyne all our foresayd louing and loyall subiects, of what estate or condition soeuer, to liue hereafter in peace, vnity and concord, without wronging, contemning or prouoking one another, either by priuate scandals or open iniuries, vpon paine of our indignation, and withall to bee exemplarily punished according to the fact committed.

2 Wee commaund them to honour and respect such persons, as by their birthes, or by their Offices and Dignities, wherevnto wee haue highlie aduanced them,

A them: deserue to bee distinguished from others, as wee vnderstand they are: and that such as shall faile in this their duty and respect, bee punished according to the qualitie of the person whom they haue offended.

3. The said persons of qualitie, shall in like manner forbear to wrong others, whereby to compell them to forget the respect which they owe them. And if they doe otherwise, they shall bee bound to satisfie them as shall be thought fit.

4- All controuersies which shall fall out among our subiects, whereof the decision belongs to Iustice, shall bee ended by the ordinary courie of lawe, established in our realme. And wee forbid the parties, to frame any quarrell for the cause, vpon paine of loosing the thing in question for him that shall attempt it: the which wee do B from this present day adudge to his aduerse party.

5. And for that through the indiscretion and mallice of some, others doe sometimes endure such indignities, as they thinke it impossible to drawe any satisfaction from them but by the sword, which beeing forbidden by our Edi&ths, they either seeke it them-selues, or attempt it by their friends, and practise it daily to the great contempt of our lawes and authority, from whence these disorders and frequent murders doe growe: wee haue held it necessarie, for the preuenting of greater dangers, to permit, as wee doe by these presents, any one that shall thinke him selfe wronged in his honor and reputation by another to complaine vnto vs, or to our deare and well beloued Cousins, the Constable and Marshalls of France, and to demand the combate, which C shall be granted vnto them, as wee shall thinke it expedient for their honors.

6. Such as remaine in our Prouinces, may adresse them-selues to the Gouvernours thereof, and in their absence to our Lieutenant Generall, and for want of them, to the Gouvernours or Lieutenants Generall of the next adioyning Prouinces, to deliuer their grieuances, and to demand the Combate of them. Which Gouvernours or Lieutenants generall shall decide the said controuersies, if it may bee. And if they bee of that nature, as they cannot bee ended but by combate, they shall aduertise vs thereof, that they may receiue order from vs touching the execution thereof.

7. The party offending shall bee bound to appeare before vs, or our Constable and Marshalls of France, or before our Gouvernours and Lieutenants Generall, when they D shall be called: whereof notice shall bee giuen to him selfe in person, or two seuerall times at his dwelling house, with the complaint of the party griued, and the demand of the combate which hath beene made; who beeing absent, it shall bee reiourned for three dayes: and then not appearing, hee shall bee suspended for bearing armes for his contempt, and turned ouer to our Iudges of our courts of Parliament, euery one according to the place of his aboade, to bee punished as breakers of our Edi&ths, which courts wee inioyne to procede duly therein.

8. If any of the said parties haue iust cause to refuse the sayd Iudges, to whom they are referred to make their complaints, hee may haue his recourse to vs, and wee will provide for it. But if the causes of such refusal be found friuolous, and not worthy to E bee allowed, then hee shall be returned with blame to the said Iudges, who shall dispose thereof as they shall thinke best.

9. Hee that shall demand the combate, and be held not receiueable, as hauing taken an offence too lightly, and vpon small cause, shall be returned with disgrace.

10. Hee that shall offer wrong vnto another to the preiudice of his honor, shall be suspended for the space of sixe yeares, from all such charges, honors, titles, offices, dignities, and pensions, as hee doth inioy, and not bee restored during the said time, nor afterwards, vnlesse hee shall haue demanded pardon of vs, and satisfied the party in such manner as hath beene adiudged, and withall receiued from vs a new declaration of our will for his re-entring into the said offices.

F 11. Hee that shall haue no office, charge, dignitie, nor pension, shall loose the third part of the annuall reuenue of the lands which hee holdeth: which third part shall bee leuiued before all other charges, debts, bands, or whatsoeuer, and bee employed to such vses as wee shall afterwards declare. And hee whose thirds shall amount to lesse then 1609. twenty-pound sterling, or shall haue none at all, shall be kept prisoner two whole yeares, A where-so-euer we shall appoint.

12. Who-soeuer shall call any man to field in the behalfe of another, or, giue notice of the challeng, or bee the bearer of any dishonorable message, shall be for euer degraded from his gentry and bearing armes, and bee kept in perpetuall prison, or put to some infamous death, as shall bee ordained by vs, or the sayd Iudges: moreouer he shall for euer forfeit the one halfe of his goods, both mouable and immouable.

13. Hee that holding him-selſe wronged, shall make his owne challenge notwithstanding formerly demanded leaue as is inioyned him, shall for euer be incapable to make his party good by armes with any one, as also for obtrayning any satisfaction for what-soeuer wrong he shall pretend to haue bene done him. And if he that hath bene called by him shall giue Vs or our said Cousins the Constable, and Marshall of France, or the sayd gouernors, and our Lieutenants Generall notice thereof, as we inioyne them to doe: then the charge, office, or pension, which the Challenger inioyeth, shall be giuen to the party challenged, if he bee a man of quality and fit to hold the place, but if he that is challenged repaire to the place appointed, or doth any thing tending to this end, without giuing notice as is aforesaid, hee shall vndergoe the same punishment with the party challenging, and we wil dispose of their offices and pensions as we shall thinke best.

14. If contrary to the Prohibition conteyned in this our Edict, it happeneth that any fight and kill, one another, he that shall haue killed shall vndergoe the paine of death set downe in our ordonances, and vntill hee be apprehended hee shall be deprived of all such charges dignities, and pensions as he doth inioy. Moreouer halfe the reuenues of all this goods shall be employed to such vses as wee shall hereafter ordaine without giuing any satisfaction to the heires of the partie that is slaine, for that hee disobeyed this our Edict: and if both parties bee slaine in the said combat, their bodies shall be deprived of buriall, and the thirds of their goods, in fee simple, employed to such vses as we shall ordaine. And if they haue no goods, their children shall be declared ignoble, and subiect to tax for 10. yeares: and in case they were before taxable, they shall be declared to be vnworthy for euer to be made noble, to hold any royal charge, dignity or office.

15. Such as shall haue assisted the said combatants, if they haue once drawne their weapons shall loose both life and goods, according to our former Edicts. And if they were but only lookers on, yet went thither to that end and purpose, they shall be degraded from bearing armes and deprived of all their offices, dignities and penosins. And if they were accidentally there, yet did not labour to part the said combatants, and to keepe them from fighting, they shall be suspended from their offices, charges and pensions for six yeares, after which time they shall not bee restored vntill they haue asked pardon of vs, and obtrayned a new declaration.

16. Such as shall of them-selues fight in single combat, shall incurre the paines of death, or perpetuall imprisonment, with losse of halfe their goods: and vntill they be apprehended, they shall be degraded from their nobility, and deprived of all their goods during life.

17. If the offences bee committed in places of respect, besides the penalties aboue mentioned (from the which we protest neuer to exempt any man) such as shall commit them, shall be subiect to the seuerest punishments contained in the edicts and ordonances, as well ancient as moderne, of our realme.

18. All lawes, how good and hole some soeuer, are neuerthelesse defectiue, and many times more preiudiciall then profitable to the commonweale, and dishonorable to the lawmaker, vnlesse they be duly obserued and put in execution, wherupon we doe expressly inioyne and command our sayd Cousins, the Constable and Marshalls of France, to whom the knowledge and decision of those contentions and quarrels which concerne the honor and reputations of our said subiects doth belong, that they haue a carefull regard to the obseruation of this our present edict, without vsing of any moderation, or suffering it to be infringed by any fauor or conniueance: notwithstanding all

A all letters, priuat or patent, or any command that may come from vs, the which we forbid them to respect as they desire to please and obey vs. 1609.

19. Wee giue the like charge to all other officers of our crowne, in regard of those that are vnder their charge; and to the gouernors and Lieutenants generall of our provinces for such of our subiects as dwell there, which shall repaire vnto them, as is ordained by this our present edict: referuig to our selues the liberty of adding here-vnto and augmenting the penalties, such as time and experience shall teach vs to bee necessary, that we may suppress the liberty of duells and single combats in this our Kingdome, as things to rashly vndertaken, presuming vpon our authority; and by this means free our subiects from the inenitable peril of their soules, as well as of their bodies and goods, into the which they runne headlong by these means: the which wee haue and doe by these presents declare, to be infamous, and repugnant to true honour, and those which shall obey it to be honorable.

20. And to the intent it may please God to blesse our intent, and to prosper it to his glory, and the safety of our subiects, we haue ordained that all such mony as shall be raised of the pecuniary fines, seyzures, proffits, and reuenues, of such as shall infringe this our edict, to be employed both for the norrishment of the poore, and the erecting of a Royall Hospitall, which wee haue resolved to build expressly to this end and purpose, as also for the repaying of decayed Churches in this our realme, forbidding the sayde summes to be employed to any other vses, vpon grieuous punishments. In the meane time we will and command, that the sayd summes of mony be receiued by the receiuer of Gods Hospitall in our good city of Paris, who shall keepe it carefully vntill that we shall otherwise dispose thereof. We also command our trusty and well beloued, the iudges of our Courts of Parliament, Sheriffes, Bayliffes, and all other our iustices and officers, to whome it shall belong, that they cause the contents of this present edict to be red, published, inrowled, and inuolably obserued, without any thing done to the contrary: for such is our pleasure. And to the end it may be firme and stable for euer, we haue signed these presents, and caused our seale to bee set therevnto, without preiudice to our owne right, or to others.

There was a Turke of Constantinople, a man of good yeares, who had bene taken prisoner by the knights of Malta: he spake the Siriack tongue very wel, and did write it perfectly. A Dominican Fryar at Malta, learned both in Diuinity and Philosophy, and very desirous of the tongs, obtrayned his liberty, and brought him to Paris, where he instructed him in the principles of Christian religion, and vpon our Ladies day he was brought to S. Bennets Church to be Christned. Being examined of his demand at the Church doore, the Dominican being his interpreter, he answered that he desired to be a Christian, wherupon (hauing abiured the superstition of the Alcaron) he was baptized, hauing noble witnesses. Alphonso d'Ornano, Marshall of France, and the Kings Liutennant in Guienne, was the one, and Mary of Seneton, a Lady of an honorable house, was the other. There was so great a concourse of people, as this spectacle was preiudiciall to many, who being sore bruised and hurt, could hardly retyre themselves out of the presse.

Charles of Gonzaga Duke of Neuers had layd the foundation of walles in the furthest part of his Country, neere vnto the riuer of Meuze, and caused his suruayours to measure out ground for the building of houses, hee determined and resolved to make and erect a goodly new Towne, imitating Sedan, Iametz and many such other

death and his praise,

Joachim of Chetardy a Councillor of the Court of Parliament at Paris, one of the Clergy, died in Iuly; But why should I ioine him (though a man of a singuler good life, and well deseruing his purple roabe) with great personages? his goodly A&t, deseruing eternall memory makes him worthy.

He was Prior of Saint Cosme neere vnto Tours vpon Loire, the which he repaired and restored, being decayed and ruined, as well by the violence of Ciuill-warres, as the negligence of his Predecessors, and not only tooke away the long deformity, being in old time a holy and sweet place, seated in the Elisian fields of France, but also finding great Ronsards boanes to lie in a base, mute and illiterate coffin, more iust then they that had beene aduanced by his rich spoyle, he would not suffer his Ghost to lie any longer neglected, causing a stately Tombe of Marble to bee made for Ronsard, and a liuely Image to bee cut by the Phideas of Parris, with a short inscription; for it was sufficient to admonish Passengers that there lay Ronsard; neither did he need this care and charge of mortall men, who in his life time saw his owne eternity, whose glory after death cannot exceed that, which hee did reape lyuing: yet this goodly and bountifull Councillor, by this good Office hath deserued much of all them that honour learning. And as it was some-times sayd of a Romaine, who when hee had erected an other mans decayed statue, that he had fixed his owne, so Chetardy building vp Ronsards monument in dumbe marble, he hath placed his own in the monuments of writers. Vpon the Tombe these words were grauen.

Marriage of the Duke of Vendosme.

In the beginning of Iuly the King performed an A&t of great content to him-selfe, which was the marriage of the Duke of Vendosme his base Sonne, by the Dutchesse of Beaufort, with the sole daughter and heire of the Duke of Mercuer, which marriage had beene formerly concluded vpon at the sayde Dukes reconciliation vnto the Kings seruice: But the Dutchesse her Mother was drawne, and perswasively induced vnto

A vnto it with great difficulty. She was one of the greatest marriages of France, for besides her fathers inheritance, she was by her mother heire of the house of Martigues in Brittany, a House of great possessions, and issued from the Dukes of Brittany. The King would haue this marriage solemnized at Fontainebleau, with as much pompe as might be, and therefore the Courtiers spared no cost to please the Kings humor: and the more to honor it, he called the Princes of the Bloud, the Officers of the Crown, and the chief Noblemen to Court: among others came the Prince of Condé, the first Prince of the Bloud, and the first Peere of France, who some few moneths before had beene married to the Constables daughter, one of the fayrest Ladies of France, whom the King did very much affect, and was the chiefe meanes of the making of that marriage. In consideration whereof, they say that the King augmented the Princes pension to ten thousand pounds sterling by yeare, beeing before but eight, and that he gaue vnto the yong Princeesse a pension of two thousand pounds sterling more. The marriage day at Fontainebleau being come, it was put off vpon some pretended cause, and so was protracted from day to day, sitteing dayes together vpon many coloured excuses: but those that knew best the humor of the Court, sayd, that the King did it of purpose, that hee might the longer enioy the sight of that faire Princeesse of Condé, whose beauty had made so great a breach in his heart, as he could no longer dissemble it, nor hide it from the eye of the world. But the Prince was not well pleased with these long delays, protesting that if the marriage were not consummated the next day, he would be gone home to his house, whereupon all excuses were layd apart, and the ceremony performed, after which were great triumphs and sports, especially running at the Ring, where the King himselfe wonne the prize from all the gallants of his Court, hauing taken the Ring three times in foure courses. The sports beeing ended the Prince of Condé hied him home with his Ladie to his house, meaning (if it were possible) to preuent that which hee feared, and to keepe his honour vntainted. The sequele you shall heare hereafter.

The marriage being ended, the King retired to Paris, whete they beganne to consule in Councell of making warre in the Duchie of Cleues. It was generally thought it would be so, for that the King had called some of his companies of men at armes, and giuen them their Rendezuouez by a certaine day in diuers frontier townes in Champaigne vpon the way to Luxembourg. There was Artillerie provided, leuies for foraine forces set downe, and all preparation for warre: but it went so slowly forward, as they might easily iudge of the euent by the beginning. In the end they began to treat of a peace by their messengers with no doubtfull hope, the Duke of Neuers (whose mother is issued from the House of Cleues, as appeares by the name she beares,) and Henry de la Marke, Earle of Mauleutier, and Titularie Duke of Bouillon being a younger brother of that House, who pretends no small interest to the Earledome of La Marke, sent their Commissioners to an assembly held at Delpord, where beeing heard, they were willed to shew their Titles: but the Marquis of Brandebourg, and the Duke of Newbourg challenged the whole inheritance: what the successe will be you shall heare in the following yeare.

We haue sayd in the yeare 1606, that by reason of the streightnes of the Pest-house which was built in S. Iaqués Suburbs, the plague was wonderfully disperst in Paris, and very violent, whereupon the Magistrates of the city, and such as had the charge of the publike health, resolued to build a more spacious one on the other side of the city: the worke did equall their desseigne: for in Saint Martins Suburbs they made so large and spacious a building of free-stone and Bricke, couered with Slate, with such chambers, porches, and walkes, as it doth equall or exceed many Pallaces. Which Worke was finished in three yeares: vpon the front of it this was grauen in Marble:

The Queene
brought in bed of a daughter.

On the five and twentieth day of Nouember the Queene was brought in bed early in the morning of a daughter: France being sufficiently supported with sons, had now need to be strengthened with daughters, by whose marriages it might get allyances with forraigne Princes. If euer children came happily, they do at this time, when as the ancient enemies of France renew their old practises, whereby they seeke to with-draw the chiefeft men from the duty and obedience which they owe vnto their Prince and Countrie, they receiue such as flie away, who thinking and desiring to returne, they disswade them with assurance of safetie, vainely seeking the ruine of France, which hath fallen out to their owne losse. So in the memorie of our Grand-fathers, the Burgondian receiued Charles the seventh his sonne, flying from his father, who commanding him to returne, he kept him and intertained him seuen yeares. But Charles sent the Burgondian word, that he did feed the Foxe, which would one day deuoure his pullaine: which Prophecie hee prouoed true: for Lewis pursued his receiuer and nurce with all force and policie, vntill that by his infortunate death, at the seage of Nancy, hee left France, Lorraine, the Suisses, and in a manner all the borderers in peace.

Prince of Condes retreat.

At this time there fell out an accident which did much trouble the whole Court, but especially the King. The Prince of Condé had during the Queenes lying in, come to Court to do his duty to the King, who receiued him very graciously, and dealt earnestly with him to bring the Princess to Court to see the Queene in child-bed. The King prest him so much, as in the end he promised to go and fetch her: and so he tooke his leaue, seeming to haue no other intent, but his thoughts were farre otherwise: for being come home to his house (which is about sixteene leagues from Paris, vpon the confines of Picardie) whether he gaue it out that he would go a hunting, so as within two dayes after he tooke his caroch with the Princess, one Gentleman and a Gentlewoman, and without any other trayne or prouision, hee posts with all speed possible through Picardy to recouer the Arch-dukes countrey. Two daies were past before the King was aduertised of his retreat, who vnderstanding the maner of it, conceiued what his intent was, whereat he was very much discontented, holding it a great affront and dishonour to haue the first Prince of the Bloud abandon his country after that manner, without his leaue or priuity. He sent the Knight of the watch with other in poste after him, to bring him backe if they could ouertake him: but they came too late, for hee was gotten out of the Kings dominions. At his returne the King vnderstanding where hee was, he sent Monsieur de Pralin one of the Captaines of his gard to the Arch-dukes, to demand the Prince, and to request him to perswade him to returne into France. He had charge also to tell the Prince how highly he had offended his Maiestie, who notwithstanding would pardon what was past, and receiue him againe into fauour: And the Arch-dukes dealt with the Prince to that end, who answered, that he was his Maiesties most humble subiect and seruant, but there was no safetie for him in France, vnlesse the King would grant him a towne for his assurance. With which answer Monsieur de Pralin returned. The King holding it an indignity to haue his subiect (who had offended him) capitulate with him, yet before he would take any seuerer course against him, hee

A resolved to make him another summons: whereupon he sent the Marquis of Coeuvre, brother to the Duchesse of Beaufort in ambassage to the Arch-dukes, who hauing deliuered his commission to the Prince at Bruxels, hee required to haue an act therof in writing vnder a Notaries hand as followeth:

The most high, most mightie, and most excellent Prince, Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Condé, first Prince of the Bloud, and first Peere of France, presented himselfe in his owne person before me a Notarie and witnesse vnder-signed, and hath required me to make an act, vpon the insinuation and summation which had bene made vnto him, by the Ambassadors of the most Christian King, the sixteenth day of this present moneth of Februarie: the tenor whereof followeth:

We Hannibal d'Estret, Marquis of Coeuvre, Councillor to the King in his Councils of Estate, and priuy, Captaine of fifty men at armes of his Ordinances, his Lieutenant Generall in the government of the Isle of France, Gouvernour of the towne and Cittadell of Laon, and Ambassador extraordinarie for his Maiestie to the Arch-dukes in Flanders: beeing assisted by M. Mathew Bruslard, Segnieur of Berny, Councillor to his Maiestie in the sayd Councill of Estate and Priuie, and Ambassadour resident with the sayd Arch-dukes for the Kings seruice, Philip of Longueuall, Seigneur of Maniquan, Lieutenant to the Duke of Vendosme in the Gouvernement of La Fere, and of Charles of Aubelpine, Councillor in the Court of Parliament at Paris, haue this day

Act of the Prince of Condes insinua-
tion.

C the 16. of February, 1610. by expresse letters of commandement from his Maicity brought vs for our instruction, Signed HENRIE, and vnderneath Bruslard, bearing Date the eleuenth day of Ianuarie last past, and re-iterated vnto vs by these expresse letters, of the fourteenth of this present moneth of Februarie, transported our selues vnto the Prince of Condé's Lodging, to whom in the presence of the Prince of Orange his brother-in-law, and of Rochefort one of his domesticke seruants, we haue presented a letter of credit from his Maiestie, bearing Date the eleuenth of Ianuarie last past, which hauing read, We let him vnderstand the greatnesse of the offence which he had committed, and his Maiesties iust discontentment, accompanied with sorrow, worthy the affection which a father (such an one as he hath bene) beares vnto his sonne whom he loues and fauors in all things. The grace which his Maiestie (vsing his accustomed bountie and clemencie) hath offered vnto him by the mediation of the Arch-dukes: which is, to forget, remit, and pardon not onely the first offence, but all others which he hath since committed by reason thereof. To restore him to his place, and the fauour which the Bloud from whence he is issued doth deserue: the affection which his Maiesty hath alwaies borne him, and that which he did enioy being neare him: the great wrong which he hath done vnto himselfe in contemning the counsels of the sayd Arch-dukes, the which hath increased his Maiesties indignation, by the refusall of his grace. Notwithstanding all this, his Maiestie so full of bounty towards him, hath commanded vs to signifie againe vnto him, and to repeat the same offers, and to assure him againe of the effects thereof for his person, if he would obtaine his will: who answered, that vntill he might haue some other assurances from the King, then that which they had offered him, there was no safetie for him to returne into France: adding these words which he repeated twise, My masters, take not this, if it please you, for disobedience. Whereupon they being silent awhile, to attend if he would speake any more, and seeing that he spake nothing, We haue (sayd they) according to the sayd commandement, sommoned and charged him in the name of his Maiestie, his King and Soueraigne Lord, to whome he owes all duty and obedience, to returne speedily into his Realme, without delay, colored excuse, or pretext whatsoever, vpon paine of incurring for euer his sayd Maiesties indignation and dis-fauour, and to be held as a Rebelle, and guiltie of high Treason, and to be proceeded against by such courses as are vsuall in the like cases.

The which the Prince hauing very attentiuely heard, and diligently obserued, hee sayd, he would make no other answer but by writing, and in the presence of Notaries, which he had sent for, intreating vs to giue him that in writing which we had declared vnto him, and that he would send for it, the which he did the next day by the Seigneur of 1610. of Nambone, to whom we haue caused a copie of this present A&t to be deliuered, signed by vs soure, the which wee haue caused to be made to serue when need shall require; Made at Bruxels the day and yeare aboue-written. Beneath at the margent is written d'Esfré, Bruslard, l'Abéspine, and Philip of Longueual, and I the Notarie haue bene required by the sayd Prince to go with the Seigneur of Nambone his Steward, vnto the sayd Ambassadors, and to make vnto them an Insinuation of the answer which the sayd Prince hath made vnto the sayd Summation and declaration, as followeth:

Prince of Condes answer to the summation.

We Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Condé, Earle of Soissons and Vallery, first Prince of the Bloud, and first Peere of France, Gouverneur, and Lieutenant generall for the King in Guienne. Vpon the Summation made vnto vs on his Maiesties behalfe, by the Marquis of Coeuure his Ambassadour extraordinarie to the Arch-dukes, beeing assisted by the Seigneur of Berny, resident for his Maiesties seruice with their Highnesses, and by the Seigneurs of Maniquam, and Aubespine, and beeing ready to returne into France, according vnto the offers made vnto vs by their sayd Highnesses, which is, that his Maiestie will forget and remit our pretended committed offences, as well in our retreat, as by reason thereof. As also vpon the declaration made vnto vs after the sayd Summation, to be held for a Rebell, and guiltie of high Treason, in case wee persist in our first answer which wee haue made by the mediation of their sayd Highnesses.

We therefore say and declare,, that we are the Kings most humble and most obedient seruant and subiect, borne of the Royall Houfe of France, and nere in bloud to his Maiestie, and as such, we are readie to obey his commandements, giuing reasonable assurance for vs and our Family: most humbly beseeching his Maiestie, that he will conceiue graciously of this our Answer, and not to take it for a refusall or disobedience, protesting Nullitie of all that which may bee done or practised hereafter to our preiudice.

Made at Bruxelles the nineteenth of Februarie, 1610. Signed vnderneath, Henry of Bourbon: and beneath that, By my Lord the Prince, the first Prince of the Bloud, and first Peere of France, Signed Viry: The sayd Prince requiring an A&t to be made of all that had past, to serue him when need shall require. Made and past at Bruxelles, in the house of my Lord the Prince of Orange, this nineteenth of Februarie 1610. in the presence of Maximilian de la Hay, Seigneur of Fresnoy, and John of Crostflomanie, witnesses thereunto called and required: And the sayd Prince with the witnesses, haue signed the Minute in witnes of the truth of these things. I Michel Maurissens a publike Notarie, made by the priuy Councell of Brabant for the Arch-dukes of Austria, Dukes of Bourgondy and Brabant, and Earle of Flanders, resident at Bruxelles, haue signed this present A&t with my accustomed Notariall signe, here vnderneath written:

According vnto the which, I the aboue-named Notary, did the same 19. day of Februarie, with the witnesses vnder-written, transport our selues to the lodging of the said Marquis of Coeuure, Ambassadour extraordinary for the most Christian King, to deliuer him this former Instrument, as he came from abroad vpon the sand in his Caroch, being accompanied with three horsemen: but for that there was no meanes to giue it him, for that he was set within it, and also for that he was knowne and discovered by the Seigneur of Preau and others which did accompany him, I was kept from approaching by the sayd horses, the street being very narrow: and to shew him the more honor and respect, I followed him into the court of his lodging, where most of them being come out of the Caroch, I declared vnto him the sayd answer, in the name and by the commandement of my Lord the Prince of Condé. Whereupon hee cryed out presently, stay him, stay him, so as finding my selfe enuironned by his men, the sayd Marquis came out of his Caroch, pulling me by the cloake, and vsing threatens, that if it were not for the respect he bare to the Arch-dukes, he wold strike me with his sword, forcing me me to take againe the sayd answer, saying, that ~~had~~ surprized him, commanding me to depart out of the Court of his lodging, and that he might not enter without his permission. Whereupon I answered, that I was a publike person, and that it was lawfull for me to make the like deliuerie. If it had bene the King himselfe, and that I would giue an A&t of his refusall vnto the sayd Prince of Condé. Thus it was done and past in the presence of James Moncleaux, and Anthony Daloghenhagen, beeing called and required as witnesses, and signed by me, as a publike and authentick person.

The last yeare was spent in Conferences, Messages, Ambassages, and Treaties touching the affaires of Cleues and Iuliers, to see if the question for the Inheritance, might be quietly compounded, but beeing of diuers humors and dispositions, the controuersie is not yet ended. Sigismond Marquis, and Elektor of Brandebourg, before he would go to Armes, published his pretensions, after this manner. About some hundred yeares since, there was a marriage made betwixt Mary Daughter to the Duke of Iuliers and Berke, and Countesse of Rauenspourg, and John Duke of Cleues, and Earle of Marke, and then it was concluded, that all those Estates and Seigneuries should bee for euer vnited by an indissoluble knot, and neuer diuided. As wands bound together are hardlier broken, then when they are dissolued, so they thought their houses and families well conioyned, would with greater difficulty be shaken and broken. Of this marriage betwixt Mary and John were borne Willyam, Sibilla, and Amallia: In the yere 1526. Sibilla married with John Frederick Duke of Saxony, vpon these conditions. That if either of them died without heires male, that then those vnited Prouinces shold descend vnto Sybill the eldest daughter, and John Frederick of Saxony her husband, vpon condition they should giue dowries to two Sisters answerable to their qualities.

D But that Willyam was married in the yere 1545. to Mary of Hongary, after that he returned into fauour with the Emperour Charles the fifth, from whome hee had fallen beeing in league with the French King. From him hee obtaines a grant, that if there were no issue male of him and Mary, or they should chance to die, that then those three Dukedomes should descend to the daughters of WVilliam being liuing, or if they were dead, to their heires. Charles beeing dead, and his brother Ferdinand succeeding in the Empire, he confirmed this coniunction of those States, and would haue it indissoluble: after him Maximilian and the Emperour Rodolphus, now liuing, renewed this first Decree, by a perpetuall Lawe, that the heires of WVilliam, in the direct line of either sexe, sonnes or daughters, should enioy the whole inheritance. This WVilliam thinking to haue made a firme coniunction of his Estates by the Emperours letters, in the yere 1572. married Maria Leonora his eldest daughter to Albert Frederick Marquis of Brandebourg, and Duke of Borrusia, with these conditions, that if he and his wife Mary should die without any issue male, then the Duchies of Iuliers, Cleues, and Berke, with the Counties of Marke and Rauenspourg, and all their dependances, should come vnto Maria Leonora, and to Albert Frederick Duke of Borrusia her husband, but with this caution, that Albert should out of his owne money pay a portion set downe by William his Father-in-lawe, vnto the Sisters of Maria Leonora, in regard of their pretensions to those Segneuries, and one of the Sisters dying, that money which shee should receiue in lieu of her Inheritance, should accrew to her suruiuing sisters, with this condition, that at the payment of the money by Albert, the future husbands of the sayd sisters, should renounce and vtterly disclaime all their right vnto the Inheritance.

Of Mary Leonora and William, the eldest was Anne wife to John Sigismond of Brandebourg: who by the disposition and conueyance of Duke William for want Rrrrr of 1610. of heires male, was called to these vnited Estates. It happened that the second daughter, being married to Philippe Lodowike, Count Palatine of Newbourg, confirmed this Decree, referuing by expresse words her interest to the Inheritance, if her elder sister should dye without children: The like was done by Magdaleine the younger sister, marrying with Iohn the Count Palatine of Rhin: and with this Caution Brandebourgs right was settled and confirmed, drawing his beginning from the elder: Notwithstanding, that by the contract of marriage betwixt Marie Leonora and Albert Fredericke, not onely she and the heires male that were to be borne, but also the women by right of substitution were called to the succession. The Duke of Newbourg defended his right, by other letters and grants, but hee soone agreed with Brandebourg, and they two ioyned their forces together, and vnited their martiall powers against the other Pretendants: whereby it appears, the Christian King could not iustly refuse his succours to the confederate Princes of Germany.

Leopold's title by the Emperours gift.

The greatest Pretendants against Brandebourg, were the Electour of Saxonie, and Leopold, who had obtaigned a right and Inuestiture from the Emperour. He contends that the Duchies of Cleues and Iuliers, are fethers taken from the Eagle, boughes from the stocke, and beames from the Sunne. And therefore a Fee belonging to Males cannot fall to women: for if any one will search into the Record of Antiquitie, he shall not onely find, that the Emperours of Germany, but also of Rome, haue giuen Prouinces and Lands conquered from their enemies in warre, in reward to their old souldiers, vpon condition, that as often as the Empire should be preft with warre, they should willingly serue it, by reason of their fees. And no man will deny, but the Electors of the Germane Empire, the chiefe Ministers and Officers, are tyed to a manly seruice and duty, both in peace and warre, at the Emperours pleasure. The Lawes of the Empire haue excluded women from all Iurisdiction and publike charges, yea in priuate causes, much more where the Maiestie of the Empire is in question. In France (which falles not to the distaffe) after the death of Charles Duke of Bourgondy, who was slaine at Nancy, the Earle of Neuers might iustly haue challenged the Countie of Bourgondy, for that a disposition made in fauour of Philip the Hardy, extended to the women, who notwithstanding by the publike lawes of the Empire are excluded. By which example the Lawe made in the Contract of marriage betwixt Mary Leonora and Albert Fredericke, is to be held vaine, void, and of no force. Tacitus hath obserued in his booke of the manners of the Germanes, that they did not onely fauour males, but did hate the women kind, and that it was their manner and accustomed order to leaue the whole Inheritance to the eldest sonne as his lawfull right, left being diuided into diuers parts, it should runne to nothing, and to their younger children they gaue their cattle, money, plate, stufte, and other furniture belonging to an house.

Pretensions of the Elector of Saxony to Cleues.

The Electour of Saxonie pretended the inheritance of Cleues by two titles: first, by a grant from the Emperour Fredericke the third, who gaue Cleues and Iuliers in Fee to Albert of Saxonie, for the great seruice he had done vnto his Maiestie, and Maximilian did grant the same vnto Ernest, the Earle of Saxonyes brother. His other title was grounded vpon the contract made at the marriage of Sybille with Iohn Fredericke of Saxonie. These were the words: That if Duke Iohn and Mary Duchesse of Cleues, Iuliers and Berke his wife die without any issue male, or if the males issued shal leaue no heires, in that case it was agreed, that all those vnited Seigneuries should descend to his daughter Sybille, and to the children that should come of her and Fredericke of Saxony.

The Electour of Brandebourg did so impugn the title of Saxonie, as that grant made by Fredericke the third, and Maximilian the first Emperours, vnto Albert and Ernest of Saxony, was held as abandoned: for after the departure of William Duke of Iuliers and Berke, the Saxons neuer obtained that possession of the soile, which the Interpreter of Fees tearme dominium utile: or if they had it, they lost it for want of vse. Such is the nature of Fees, as hee that suffers an Inuestiture to be made to another, and makes not his clayme within the yeare, is excluded from the Fee: much more hee that 1610. that suffers another to enioy the Fee, tenn, twentie, thirtie, or forty yeares, and neuer makes any question to it. Neither did it auayle the Saxons to haue made a protestation of their right, wherein no due forme of Lawe was obserued, and hath beene made voyde by prescription. When as a sute begunne, and relinquished three years together, is voyde: and fiscall causes if they be not produced in time, after a long intermission are reiecte.

Duke William, and Iohn the sonne of William, receiued the Inuestiture of these States, from the Emperour, and King of Romaines, without any question or opposition made by the Saxons, of their pretended right, so as that first protestation made by words onely, is to be held voyde. For it is receiued by the ciuill Lawes, that those protestations are voyde, which are not often repeated, and fortified by formes of lawe, and therefore the Saxons right (if they had any) is lost by their owne negligence. Neither is the Saxon to be tolerated, who so much brags, that Albert had deferred the Inuestiture of the Emperour, for his warlike exploites, when as he and Ernest by their continuall silence foure-score yeares, haue silently renounced it. How often did they (being aliue) terme William Iohn Duke of Iuliers and Cleues, in their priuate letters, writings, and titles? It makes nothing to the question, whether it bee a masculine fee, and impatiēt of a womans command. For the clause which is contained in the Emperour Fredericke the thirds grant: If the Duke of Iuliers shall happen to die without issue male, is to be referred to the first case, that is, when as Iohn and Marie should die without sonnes, and that by the opinion of Lawyers, who hold, That euery disposition speaking of any Act, is onely to be understood of the first: and he that is once excluded from the succession of a fee, is neuer more admitted. For a Right being once extinct riseth no more, as in the yeare 1511. the Estate of Cleues was giuen to Mary daughter to Duke William, by Maximilian the first, so all the Right of these Estates was giuen by Charles the fifth, and after him by a new grant, vnto the Daughters of William and their heirs.

But it appears by the Annales, that the Estates of Cleues and Iuliers are falsely tearmed a masculine Fee, where it is manifest that Arnold Duke of Gueldres and Iuliers, gaue vnto Charles Duke of Bourgondie, Gueldres, Iuliers, and the Countie of Zutphen, who dying, they came to Marie his onely daughter, wife to the Emperour Maximilian, whence it happened, that in the yeare 1511: whereas William Duke of Iuliers died, not the House of Saxony, but his daughter, and wife to Iohn Duke of Cleues, challenged her fathers inheritance, with whome there was neuer any controuerfie. It hath bin obserued in all ages, that the foure Dukedomes of Iuliers, Cleues, Gueldres, and Berke, the issue male failing, the inheritance hath by right gone vnto the women. Marie after the death of Edward her brother, succeeded in Gueldres, and afterwards marrying with William of Iuliers, she brought it as her dowrie.

Renold made Joane his sister heire of Gueldres and Iuliers by his testament. Engilbert Earle of Berke, hauing lost his sonne, hee left the Earledome to his suruiuing daughter. And the daughter of Theodorice of Cleues, wife to Asolph of Marke, obtained the inheritance of Cleues. In Henault and Holland it is receiued, that such Estates shold come vnto the daughters: neither is that insolent lawe allowed of in the greatest kingdomes: neither in old time were women tyed to their distaues. Among the Scythians Tomyris, and ouer the Egyptians Semyramis, Arfinoe, and Cleopatra did raigne. And now England, Spayne, Scotland, Ireland, and Naples are subiect to the Gouvernement of women; yea women are called to such Kingdomes, not onely by right of Inheritance, but also by testament.

Charles the fifth in his last Will made 1534. and in a codicile 1538. ordained, that if Philip his sonne should die, then Mary his daughter, Queene of Bohemia, should succeed in all his kingdoms. And likewise Philip in his last Will made 1597. provided, that if his son should die without heires, his daughter Isabella Clara Eugenia should then be heire of all his Estates. It is therefore manifest by these examples, that women are called not onely to Duchies, but to great kingdoms. And Cor. Neostadius in his book of Fees, proues, that Cleues is subiect to the rule of a woman. The nature (sayes he) of the fee of Cleues

1610. Cleues is, That no males remaining, the females are called to the succession in their order. A

Whereas the Saxon and others pretend the Emperour to bee Iudge of this controuersie, they flatter themselues with an error: although it be provided by the Imperiall Lawes, that if there grow any controuersie for a Dukedome, Earledome, or any other great fee, they must go vnto the Emperour, as to the head of all Fees, that he may determine of the possession, and command them to be quiet which offer violence to the possessor, yet this was not alwaies obserued, but it hath bene often tried in other Tribunalles, and euen that hath bene lawfull for the Saxons, when as they were oppressed and grievously iniured by the Emperours seueritie, and the preheminence and power of their ill-willers.

Moreover, the grant which Leopold hath obtained, it comes not from the Emperour himselfe, neither is it gotten by iust suffrages, but by the sinister practises of Courtiers, the which was not allowed by the Electors and Imperiall Cities, who haue of late required by their Deputies, that it should bee made void. The Saxon knowes it well by many familiar examples, that the Emperour decrees nothing priuately in such controuersies, but hath sent for the Electors, Princes, and Vicars of the Empire: In their Decrees they obserued more strict formes, then in these which are granted in fauour of the Saxon and Leopold. No man but knowes, that the Electors and Princes cannot be called by any Libell or Edict out of Germany, into a forraigne Court: as the Bohemians and they of Prague may not (by the Lawes of the Countrey) be called out of their owne limits.

No man is ignorant, that Leopold having left the course of Law and Equitie, hath settled all his Interest in Armes, hath leuied souldiers, hath called in the aydes of his Confederates: forced townes and castels, built new Forts, hath called religious men to accompany him in this warre, who attentue to the Trumpet, as if the question were for their Altars and Religion, and not for a prophane thing, haue promised him money to make a tenne yeares warre. If the Saxon bee not blind, hee will easily see, that these attempts are not for his good, nor for the dignitie and greatnesse of the House of Saxonie, but that the Spaniards may be the more mightie in Germany, (who haue already swallowed it vp in hope) that they may vndermine it, and quite ruine it, the which D his Predecessors of Saxony haue long since made tryall of, to their owne losse, when as they like true Germanes, and louers of their Countries liberty, suppress that violence and imminent destruction which beganne to disperse it self through their countrey.

Brandebourg who pretended to be before all others in the right of Inheritance, when as hee had protested his Right by written Tables after the manner of Clyents, throughout all Germanie and the Netherlands: yet admonished by the examples of the Ancient, that the controuersies of Princes are not decided in Iudiciall Courts, but that their Right consists in armes, lest if his Competitors should seeke to oppresse him by force, he should be found vnprepared, He drawes his Allies and confederate Princes of Germany vnto him, who were not slow to assist him, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Wirtemberg and the Prince of Anhalt, who beeing sent Ambassadour from the rest to craue ayde and succors of the French King, hee found him very tractable and willing, and the rather in that respect: for if his heires should bee debarred or deprived of their Inheritance, it were to be recouered by iust Armes, and the vniust possessors to be expelled by force.

The instance of the Prince of Anhalt, and other Germane Princes, mooued him to ioyne with him in this warre: for that when as the King was oppressed with ciuill warre, they had sent him great succours. Hee therefore thought that ayde was not to be denied them, who first of all had so well assisted him. And to the end hee should not faile his friends being in danger, and might remoue all violence and oppression from them, he sent Boisile, a man of great wisdom, of sound iudgement and knowledge, who had bene employed in many Ambassages, and had performed weightie affaires, and important negotiations, vnto a generall Assembly of the Princes of Germanie: who

A Who whilst he remained there in the Kings name, to obserue their Councils, and to perswade them to that which concerned the libertie and dignitie of Germany, and whilst that in this assembly they contend with words and speeches, they make preparation for warre in France: money is giuen to Captaines to leuie men, artillerie, powder, and shot is drawne out of the Arcenall, it is put into boates, and carryed vp the river in Champagne, that if happily they should fall to open warre for the question of Cleues, all this preparation might be ready, and the Christian King performe that in deeds, which he had promised in words. In the meane time Boisile deliuered the causes of his Ambassage vnto the Germane Princes, in these termes:

The beginning of my imposed charge (most renowned, & mighty Princes, Electors of the sacred Romain Empire, worthy and noble Earles, magnificent and honorable Ambassadors of the Citties of the Empire) shall rise from the manifold health, where-with Henry the most Christian King of France and Nauarre, my souerain Lord, greeteth you, Wishing that in this Assembly you enter into such sound counsels, as the imminent danger which now threatens Germany, may be repelled, and that you may proceed in your affaires well and couragiously: moreover, he wisheth you to expect such good offices from him, as you may iustly hope for, from a most friendly King, your kinsman and affociate. But when as by the singular grace and mercy of God, and the victorious arms of the King my master, the practises of the most wicked were preuented, and that France began to enioy her ancient peace and tranquility, his highnesse out of his most Royall disposition, thought it not sufficient for the glory and honour of his name, vnlesse he might also prouide for the general peace and quiet of Christendome. Of which his commendable intent, the ten yeares Truce in the Netherlands, obtained by his mediation and authoritie, are sufficient witness, whereby those Prouinces are now refreshed, and Iray freed from the feare of a most cruell warre by the reconciliation made betweene the Pope and the Venetians. But there was nothing, whereof his Highnesse tooke like care, as the safetie & libertie of your countrey of Germany: the which when he saw to be many waies infringed, after the example of his worthy progenitors, he hath profest himself a champion and defender thereof. Thus much D he thought himselfe indebted vnto you, both in respect of ancient amity and league of the Kings of France with the Princes of the Empire, and for your owne great merits, and good offices, conferred towards himselfe and his Kingdome, in his greatest extremity: which kindnes that he might sometimes requite, he thought he should do a matter worthy and becomming himselfe, if he were carefull for your general safeties. When therefore not many yeres since he obserued many things to be attempted to your ruin, as the depopulation of your countreies, and the vsurpation of your townes and citties, contrary to the lawes and priuiledges of the Empire, and that there were Factions nourished amongst the Princes, he could not chuse but by the lawes of friendship to admonish you, how necessary true loue and vnity was among you, the better to repell those E iniuries, and herein he dealt the more earnestly, for that he did presage to himselfe, that Cleues and Iuliers, and other Prouinces of the house of Cleues would be the subiect of all troubles and dissensions in Germany, touching the which, he oftentimes treated with you in the Dukes life time. And since his death (because that businesse seemed directly to concerne the peace of Germany) how willing and ready he hath bene euer to vndertake the protection of lawfull heires, I thinke you do all know sufficiently. And to the end hee might manifest his mind the more plainly in that cause, wherein the safety of Germany is in question, he thought good to publish the same to all the Princes in Europe, that he wold neuer faile in to iust a cause to assist his friends and associat Princes, to whom those Estates by lawes descended, the which he did not, thereby rashly to intangle those Princes in warre (for who hath knowne the hazards of warre better then himselfe?) but rather the King his Master out of his great wisdom was highly pleased with that Treaty obayned by the labour and counsell of that most excellent, prudent, and most couragious Prince the Lantgraue of Hesse, touching the getting possession of those Countreys, and referring the contention and variance betweene

1610. " the Princes pretendants, to the iudgement and ordering of friends, which busines that A
 " it might be the more safely effected, he sent afore-hand some troupes of horse to the " Confines of the Kingdome, to be assisting to these Princes, howsoever things should " happen: for he knew very well, that some neighbour-Princes had long since plotted, by " what meanes they might adde those countries to their owne Dominions. But after the " possession of those countries gotten, when the Princes seemed somewhat remisse, nei" ther did impart their resolutions to the King, he fearing lest that delay might hinder
 " their affairs, in respect of the warlike preparations then made against them, he thought
 " good to admonish them by letters and secret messengers, that they should beware that " they were not surprized whilst they were in consultation of their busines. But in the " meane time, whilst that the messengers went and came from one to another, the noble B
 " Prince of Anhalt came fitly to Paris, being most deservedly welcome to the King my " Master, as well for his valiant and worthy seruice in warre with his Maiesty vnder your
 " fauours, as also for his great knowledge and praise-worthy experience in martiall affaires, " wherein he excelleth and is renowned amongst the Captaines of our age: who by let" ters brought from the excellent and mighty Princes, the Elector Palatine, and Duke of " Wittemberg, signified to my Lord the King: That it was resolved by the confederate " Princes, to defend by force of arms the possession of the Princes the heires, if so his Ma-" iesty wold supply them with those aydes which they expected. How royally and friend" ly he was intertayned, and how affable and tractable he found the King, you haue heard C
 " by report of the Prince himselfe: He treated further about sending an Embassador, that " might confirme the Confederats in their resolution, and might thoroughly certifie them
 " of the Kings intention: to which charge, though vnfit for it, I was by his Maiestic cho" sen, and sent to be as it were the interpreter of his good pleasure and liking. Now there" fore most excellent Princes, it is your parts to looke that the Common-weale bee not " damnified, nor that the Princes your kinsmen be not vnworthily cast out from their an" cient seates by forraine Princes that are no friends to you, who by possessing these con-
 " tries lay themselves out a way to inuade Germany. As for that which concerns the K.
 " my Lord & master, although he be not ignorant that by taking your part, he doth (as it " were) draw vpon himself much trouble and discommodity, yet the interest of his friends D
 " shalbe cuer of more force with him, he will protect and defend you and your Councels
 " against all violence and wrong, with men, mony, and all kind of helpes, which hee hath " already provided and in readinesse, wherein notwithstanding there will nothing be at" tempted against the Maiestic or right of the Emperour: neither hath he any priuate re" spect herein, but this onely he desireth, that Germany, being the Bulwarke of the Chri" stian Common-weale, may enioy all happy peace and security, and that his friends and " wel-deseruing associat Princes may still retaine their owne rights and priuiledges, if so
 " as their Ancestors haue done, and you haue constantly performed, yee do still remaine
 " in league and amity with the King my Master.

Death of the Marshall Dornano.

The Marshall d'Ornano, famous for his worthie seruice in the warres, brought vppe E vnder his father, a Collonel of forraine souldiers, that were then stipendiaries to the French Kings. Afterwards he grew renowned by many prosperous exploites done vnder Charles the ninth, and Henry the third: for in the yeare 1587. he defeated Chastillon leading two thousand Suisses by crosse waies through the countrey of Auvergne for them of the Religion, where he took diuers of their colours, and mightily annoyed that party. Henry the third being cruelly murdered, Alphonso was a violent and vnrecon-ciled enemy to the league, from whom he took Lyons and many other strong towers and forts in those parts, at length being taken prisoner by the Leaguers, they offered to give him his liberty, with the chiefe charge of the army, and other aduancements and preferments, if he would quit the Kings party, yet he rather chose his freedom by the payment of fifty thousand Crownes, then by his defection to ioyne with them, which F thing in a souldier is like to a white crow: he was an vsuall and frequent seruer of God, and more zealous in his prayers, then many that were religious, and had taken holy orders, as he that had a daily custome to sing his Psalter.

When

A When as the passage of his vrine was stopped, and that with much torment he cal-ed his bladder, he was content to be cut, which falling out vnfortunately, he died of that deadly disease at Paris, whose death was a great griefe both to the King, and all true lo-uers of the commonweale: For he not onely shewed by his valour how much he lou-ed his countrie, but hee did also without feare in August last past, dissuade the King constantly and courageously from certaine Edicts too grievous and bitter to the people, and so much preuailed by that his worthy and manly speech, as hee made certaine horseleeches and brokers (which make sale of our soules) to bluth, andooke the morfell out of their iawes.

B Hee being dead, how few Alphonso's hath the court, which play not the claw-backes, but are vpright and iust Counsellors? In his last words hee willed his body should be carried to Bourdeaux: and because all power of a Testament dieth, if the living neglect the behests of the dead, his body being imbalded and put in a Caroch couered with blacke, drawne with foure horses, was brought to that graue which himselfe had appointed, all the States of Aquitaine bewailed him, not onely as the Kings Lieutenant, but as their father, and the want found by his death, shewed how honest his life was.

C But after that France had lost Alphonso, the most Christian King substituted in his Office and place Desdiguieres, equall vnto him if not superior in valour, who being brought forth by the Duke of Vendosme, and a most choise company of souldiers to the Court of Parliament, was for his noble exploites publicly praised, in an eloquent Oration, as truly in this late ciuill warre, hee had serued the King very valiantly: A while after he was sent to treat with the Sauoyard, about most waighy affaires, which I will publish as soone as they come to light: for whatsoeuer is worth the knowing, both in this and the yeeres ensuing, I will adde to my Commentaries, if I may steale so much leisure from other sutes.

Wee shewed in the proceeding yeere, that the attempt of Terrail and Bastide against Geneva did not onely remaine vneffected, but that it was publicly reuenged by the death of them both: This yeere an attempt not vnlike the other, not by strangers and Catholics, but their owne home-bred and native Citizens, was reuenged and D reuenged, so they will neuer cease from treacheries and stratagems, both within the walls and without, vntill either by surprize or a siege, it loose all command and power.
Canalis, a man not meanelly reputed of, both for his knowledge in physicke, and the languages, was drawne into suspicion of treason, detected by obscure signes, and his inconsiderate speech increased the same: for such is the force of truth, that it will breake forth euen in spite of the offender, and being tortured, hee confessed all things more plainely: He being a man of good reckoning, and not the last or lowest amongst the Treasurers and Decurions of the Citie, did by spies certifie the Duke of Sauoy of all the counsells of the Citizens, hauing promised him all his faithfull indeuor, and if at any time he intended the surprize of the City, by some stratagem in the night or by E scalado or wild fire, that then hee would priuily fire the poulder, that thereby he might auert the Cittizens (being euery where scattered and busied in quenching the fire) from keeping out the enemy: Neither was there ability wanting to performe his treachery, in so much as to his custody the poulder and munition was committed: Hee accused also (as priuie to this villany) one Maillerie, before that time found guilty and imprisoned for robbing the Treasury, and one Blondet, whose brother for the same cause was before executed. But I here that Canalis beeing found guilty aswell of that first conspiracy, whereof we formerly made mention, and which was not farre from effecting, as also of this new and fresh remembred treason, was condemned, and his body broken, and so laied halfe dead on a wheele vnbound hee was cast from thence to bee burned in a fire vnder him. It is strange that so often treacheries against Geneva F haue bene vnderaken in so few yeeres, or rather that before a yeere compleat (the treason of Terrailins beeing discouered and punished) an other within the same yeere should breake forth.

So neglected is the knowledge of holy things, as they which professe themselves

A godly institution.

Christians by name, disdain to expresse the same in deed, being children in faith, so as they are ignorant of the rudiments thereof, and they which are most quicke of sight in prophane matters, are most blind in matters of faith, which thing when Nicholas Pellegens maister in the chamber of the Kings accounts did obserue to bee done, to the great despight of Religion, and hinderance of saluation, being a man of singular Godlinesse and learning, he instituted for a yeerely stipend a holy preacher of the dominican Order, who out of the publike pulpit euery Sunday in the yeere should evidently shew to the youth, and the people the rudiments of faith by short questions or oppositions (which wee call the Catechisme) a counsellor excellently well deseruing of the Christian commonweale, which hath renewed the godly institution of the primitive Church, for they which were willing to beare the name of Christians, before they were baptized, were instructed by preaching of the holy misteries. Which custome by degrees through the negligence and ignorance of the parish Priests is discontinued, and of so many hundreds of Ecclesiasticall persons, onely the Iesuites in their Colledges haue not suffered this light of faith to be extinguished. Many perchance will account mee idle to make mention of such a popular matter, although posterity ought not to know any thing more, then those things which are ordained to teach vs how to lead a godly and blessed life: Neither ought that to bee a reproofe vnto me, which the Protestants reckon as a great honour to Sleidan, who spends himselfe wholly in the commendacions of his reformed Religion.

About the end of February it was seriously debated by the meanes of Cardinall Perron, Augustus Thuanus, and other welwillers of learning, concerning the enlargement of the Kings, or Cambray Colledge, and the increasing the number and stipend of the professours, and also for the pulling downe of certaine cottages, which hindered the prospect of the Court and Orchard, and now the Surveyors haue set out the bounds of the place, although indeed the Vniuersity hauing bene long wast, and like a wildernes, needes not so much large walkes and Colledges, as Students to frequent and liue in it.

Skirmish between Leopold and Brandenburg.

Wee here also that Leopoldus and the Saxon, haue had some bickering with Brandenburg, as it seemes rather in some accidentall light skirmishes, then any set or generall battaile. The Marquis of Brandenburg had sent afore-hand some thousand foote without ordinance, to winne, or more likely, to surprize a little towne, whilest hee kept himselfe with his footmen not farre off in his campe to be ready to releue his men, if need required: but the businesse succeeded not as hee expected, for whilest the Brandenburgers were ouer-long in winning the place (beeing vnprovided of Ordinance) Leopoldus being aduertised of the townsmens necessity, lending some field peeces before him, set vpon them on a suddaine with a great power of horse, at the first vollee of whose Ordinance the count of Solms Collonel, and at the second vollee his Lieutenant were both slaine: the rest being terrified with their death, and afraide of a greater power of the enemy approaching, tooke them to their heeles. The Marquis hearing of their flight by some run-awaies (who are quicker in comming home, then going to the field) came in all hast with some troupes of horse, and restrained Leopoldus in time, who hauing the victorie in his owne hands, knew not how to vse it, for if hee had pursued them more speedily, whilest they were dispersed, and in that perplexity, hee might vtterly haue defeated them, but by these euents the Brandenburgers were well warned to bee more prouident. But oh the inconsistency of humane things! that no nation hath peace permanent, and quiet fastened with some sure hold, for behold the Germanians and the high Dutches, who since the death of Charles the fift, haue so long abstained from domesticke armes, who by their helpes maintained warres abroad, are now inforced to vse them for themselves, and to desire helpes from others, shaking off the rust from their swords, and the rest of so many yeeres.

An Edict concerning Ad-uocates for the poore.

Our auncestors (saith Tully) would neuer suffer a poore man to loose his cause for want of a Patron, or Ad-uocate to defend it. When many in France through their great pouerty vnable to defray or sustaine the charge of their suites being destitute of helpe 1610.

A helpe or counsell from Ad-uocates, were constrained to forsake their intangled, though wealthy inheritances, or whatsoever else they had, and to yeeld them vp into the hands of the mighty and more powerfull partie: it was decreed in the Kings Councell, that in euery Court Parliament as other Courts, there should bee chosen Ad-uocates and Proctors of approued integrity, that should helpe poore men with their best counsell and furtherance without any fee or reward: so straightly was the law Cincia imposed vpon them, that if they were lame and crippled, they should not take so much as a wand of their needy clientes, but that contenting themselves with the Kings allowance, they should looke for a greater reward in heauen: for euen amongst the heathen it hath bene accounted glorious to helpe the distressed, and to defend and support those that are oppressed, as it was also accounted most wicked and execrable to abandon or deceiue the client: for Cato against Lentulus did earnestly auouch, that there was nothing more religiously obserued of the auncients then to defend Orphans, and to bee faithfull to their client; inso much as it was lawfull for Ad-uocates to witness for their client against their owne kinsmen, but by all meanes prohibited for their kinsmen against their clients, questionlesse a godly decree, but no longer of force then the like good and excellent lawes, whose setting or fall hath not bene much distant from their first rising.

Religion and custome require of necessity to anoint the Kings of France with that sacred oyle which is kept at Rhemes, as anoynting was necessarily imposed vpon the Kings of Israell by the Hebrew law, but for the Queenes of France to bee anointed, it is more of custome then of precept. Neuerthelesse it is now growne to that order, that the Queenes also bee installed with those Christian ceremonies: Neither ought we to enuy that this honour is done them, from whom spring young grafts, and siens for the Floure de Lucis, who are companions of the bed and scepter, who also are regents of the Kingdome, either in the sicknesse, or after the death of the Kings their husbands, to whom onely the law Salique enuieth the royall throne, although through them it is neuer empty: with the like step of honour haue the Cesars dignified their Emperresses. For Princes (saith Papynian) honour their Princesses with the same priuiledges which themselves haue, and Ulpian doubts not to mention the Treasures of Cesar and the Emperresse by one and the same title: hence it is that in ancient monuments & coynes, we behold the portraictures of Kings and Queenes, circled with Lawrell and Coroll. After the golden mines of India were discovered, Ferdinandus and Isabella caused both their Images to bee grauen in that new gold, as it were the one beholding the other: In like manner Katherine de Mediceis, caused to bee coined a peece of gold with the sunne vpon it, so made and called in her owne praise and application: and now of late the Archdukes Albertus and Isabella in the Low countries, haue caused their coyne to be stamped with their two faces. The marriage bed makes the Queenes companions, so as they may well say, according to that old prouerbe, where women challenge to themselves halfe the charge and command of the house. where thou art Caius, there am I Caia. They report out of the three wishes of Saint Augustine, that hee wished to see the Cesars and the victorious Consulls going vp to the capitol in their triumphant Chariots, but I wish to see a Queene drawne in a golden Chariot.

In such a Chariot as Cybele rides,
Through Ida's towred townes.

But now the Court of Parliament (according to the ancient custome in the happy and ioyful Inaugurations of Kings and Queenes) prepareth to remooue out of the ancient house of Themis and the lawes, into the house of the Augustines next adioyning, not to returne thither againe, till the publike triumph be accomplished. Not vnworthily sometimes, and very seldome in many yeeres, doe the Lords of the councell lend this house (appointed for ministracion of right and iustice) to the Kings and Queenes 1610. Queenes for some few daies, as the Kings haue confirmed the same to them for euer; A for therein they hold the Royaltie of their court and coronation. This remouing hath happened three times in this age, as I gather out of the Annales, the more ancient of which was, when Charles the fifth, Emperor, hauing safe conduct to passe out of Spaine through France, aduanced himselfe to repress the insolencies of the Gantois: the next when Henry the second espoused his daughter Elizabeth, to Philip the second King of Spaine, and his Sister vnto Philbert Emanuel Duke of Sauoy. The third and last was in the yeere 1562. That I am more tedious in a matter, that is yet to come and vneffected, my desire to see it constraineth me, and desire to enioy the pleasure of it carrieth me beyond my selfe. B

The Coronation of the Queene.

He King after hee had receiued the protestations of the King of Spaine by his Ambassador, not to infringe nor alter any thing in the peace, nor to medle in the action of Clueues: hauing bene also in-treated by the Emperor, to be an arbitrator in that businesse, knowing that the Pope sent the Seignior Rinarello Bishop of Nazareth to that end; that the Protestant Princes did wholly incline to his intentions, and that the Archdukes had assured him of passage, victuals, and of their own forces: Hauing resolved to see his Queene crowned with as much State as might be, all things for the solemnity being prepared, they came to Saint Denis in France, on Wednesday the twelfth of May 1610. being attended on by the Daulphin, the Lady Elizabeth his sister, Queene Marguerite Duchesse of Valois, and by many Princes and Princesses, with a great number of Noblemen and Ladies, the next day beeing Thursday, the act and ceremony of the coronation was done, as followeth. D

There was a great Scaffold built in the midst of the quier of the Church in the Ab-bay of Saint Denis, set before the great Altar, about nine foote high, being eight and twenty foote long, and two and twenty foote broad, to the which there was an ascent made of many steps. About the midst of this Scaffold inclining somewhat towards the backe part, there was an other Scaffold about a foot high, hauing two steps vp vnto it, which Scaffold and steps contayning about ten foot in length, and six in bredth, were covered with carpets, on the which was set the throne or chaire of State, appointed for the Queene; which chaire was couered with azur'd veluet imbroidred with Flower de Lucies of gold, and ouer it a cloth of State of the same sute: the great Scaffold and staires were covered with crimson veluet imbrodered with gold. There were other Scaffolds both on the right hand and the left, as well for the Princes, Knights of the Kings Orders, Gentlemen of the Chamber, and other Noblemen, Captaines and men of Marke, as for Ambassadors, Ladies, the Queenes women, and others: within the compasse of the high Altar, there was a forme covered with cloth of gold, for the Cardinals of Gondy, Sourdis and Perron, and behinde them was an other for the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelats, appointed aswell to serue at the coronation and masse, as to assist there. E

Ioyning vnto the Altar on the same side, there was a table honorably prepared for the great and lesse crownes, the hand of Iustice, and the ring appointed for the sayd coronation: On the other side on the right hand there was a chaire couered with violet colour veluet imbrodered and fringed with gold, hauing two long cushions, for the Cardinall of Ioyeuze who did the office; and behinde on the same side was a table richlie appointed for the bread, wine and candle, vntill that the maister of the ceremonies

A ceremonies should come to fetch them, and deliuer them vnto Ladies appointed to carry them vnto the offering. 1610.

The flower of the Quier, and from the great Scaffold vnto the high Altar, was coue-red with crimson veluet imbrodered with gold, with good and rich carpets round about the sayd Altar, and ouer the sayd carpets was a couering of cloth of gold.

The sayd Thursday beeing the thirteenth day of May, the Queene was found ready in the morning in her chamber, attired with a kirtle and bodies of Ermines, a mantle ornament of her head, and other royall habits. Her mantle was of blue veluet imbrodered with flower de Lucies of gold, and furred with Ermines, hauing a traine seuen ells long. The attier of her head, was all garnished with precious stones, her bodies were also of blue veluet, couered with flower de Lucies of fine gold, and her kirtle inriched with great diamonds, rubies and emerauds, all of such riches and excellency, as the value was inestimable.

Being thus attired, shee was conducted with great state vnto the Church, being ac-tended on by the Daulphin, who carried the traine of her Royall mantle, being assisted by Mounsier de Vitry, the Lady Elizabeth, Queene Marguerite, and by manie Princes and Princesses, and other Noblemen and Ladies in very good order. The Queene being come into the Church, she kneeled downe vpon a cushion before the great Altar, whereas he found the Cardinall of Ioyeuze in his pontificall ornaments, accompanied by the Cardinals of Gondy, Sourdis and Perron, and a good number of Bishops, Abbots and other Prelats, of either side of the great Altar, after which shee did prostrate her selfe, praying verie deuoutly, which beeing ended shee was raised vpon her knees, and then bending her head the Cardinall of Ioyeuze pronounced this prairer in Latin. Oh Lord God heare our praieris and supplications: that that which is to bee done by the Ministry of our humilisy, may bee filled with the effect of thy vertue, through Iesus Christ our Lord &c. This prairer being ended, he tooke the phyll in which was the holy vnction, and poored so much into a vessell of gold as hee thought necessary, and a-pointed the Queenes head, and then her brest, saying, In the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, this vnction of oyle may profit thee in honour and eternall confirmation. After which vnction he sayd this prayer. God eternall and almighty, pacified by our praieris, power the abundant spirit of thy blessing vpon thy seruant, so the end that this day being instituted Queene by the imposition of our hands, shee may alwaies remaine worthy by thy sanctification: and that shee may neuer after be seperated from thy grace, as unworthy; through our Lord Iesus Christ &c. D

The Cardinal proceeding in the sayd Coronation, hee tooke the ring and put it on the Queenes finger, saying: Take the ring of faith, the signe of the holy Trinity, by the which thou maist auoide all hereticall mallice, and by the vertue which is giuen thee call the Barbarous nations to the knowledge of the truth. After which he sayd this prairer following: God from whom proceeds al power and dignity, giue vnto thy seruant by this signe of faith, the prosperous effects of her dignity, in which faith shee may alwaies remaine constant, and strue continually to please thee, by our Lord Iesus Christ &c. E

Then the Cardinal put the Scepter into the Queenes hand, and the hand of Iustice, which done hee tooke the great crowne which hee offered to set vpon the Queenes head, being in the meane time supported by the Daulphin and his sister, and then was taken away, and in steed thereof was set on an other of lesse waight inriched with diamonds, rubies and pearles of inestimable value. The Cardinal setting the crowne vpon her head, sayd these words. Oh Lord shee fontaine of all goodnesse, and giuer of all honours, grant vnto thy seruant well to gouerne this dignity which shee hath taken, and fortese in her by good workes the glorie which thou hast giuen her, by our Lord Iesus Christ &c.

The Coronation beeing ended, and the praieris sayd, the Queene was placed in her Throne, which was prepared vpon the Scaffold, and the great crowne set before her vpon a stoole couered with cloath of tiffue of the same, and on the right hand there was a Nobleman which held the Scepter, and on the left an other, which held the hand of Iustice.

1610.

The Queene beeing thus seated in her throne, masse beganne to bee celebrated by A the sayd Cardinall of Ioyeuze. The Gospell beeing read, three Ladies carried vp the offering of bread, wine and candle, to the which there were thirteene peeces of gold tied. After the eleuation of the Sacrament, when they came vnto the Agnus Dei, they presented the Pix vnto the Queene, to kisse, who was afterwards led vnto the high Altar, where shee receiued the Sacrament with great deuotion and reuerence, which done, shee sayd her praiers and then was conducted backe againe vnto her throne, where she heard the end of masse.

Masse beeing ended, the Queene descended from her Throne, and was conducted backe vnto her Chamber with the same order and ceremony that shee had beene brought vnto the Church. After the end of masse there was a largesse cried for the B Queene in the Church, begunne of the Heralds, and good summes of gold and siluer cast vnto the people at diuers times. All which was done with great acclamations and signes of publike ioy. All which beeing ended the King did in some fort reconcile the Ambassadour of Spaine with him of Venice, who had giuen him a boxe of the care for that hee had called him Pantaloun in bidding him farewell: And the same night their Maiesties returned to Paris, where preparation was made for the Queenes entry vpon the Sunday following.

A quarrel betwixt the Ambassadors of Spaine and Venice.

But oh the inconstancy of humaine things! Man purposeth and God disposeth; Yesterdayes sunne-shine of glory, is sodenly ouercast with a darke cloude of heauynesse and mourning. France which did yesterday ioy to see her King triumphing in glory at the coronation of his Queene, doth now weepe and lament for the losse of him, and they apprehend the ruine of their fortunes, and the confusion of this flourishing Estate. Hee which yesterday supported the fortune and felicitie of France, like an other Atlas lies now wallowing in his owne goare, being treacherously murdered by the cursed hand of a damned and bloudy villaine, as you may heare by the discourse.

Discourse of the Kings murder.

On Friday, the daie after the Queenes coronation, the King beeing aduertised of some ominous influence and prediction, which did threaten him that day, hee went to heare masse with great deuotion: at his returne they brought him some of his children, and amongst others the Duke of Aniou, whom hee loued deerely, and in whom his Maiesty rooke great delight, but beeing then very peniue, hee commanded they should carrie him to breakfast, then turning very sad, hee cast himselfe vpon his bed to sleepe if hee might (the which hee beeing full of life and spirit was not accustomed to doe) but not beeing able to take any rest, hee fell vpon his knees, and beganne to pray, then hee lay downe againe, and praied againe; and thus hee did three times. In the end he went and walked in the Gallery vntill dinner time.

D

After dinner many Noblemen came into his chamber, and beganne to tell some tales to put him out of his melancholic humour, and to make him laugh; hauing smiled a little with the rest (beeing by nature of a pleasant disposition) in the end hee sayd; E wee haue laughed enough for Friday, wee may well weepe on Sunday. Herevpon he made a partie to goe to the Arcenall at toure of the clocke; where they say, that the Duke of Vendosme tould him that hee had beene warned to be gone of the fourteenth day; yet making no account thereof, hee went downe into the Court, whereas a man of a meane condition entertained him a quarter of an houre, then hee went into his Caroch, by the Dukes of Espernon (who sat in the first place of the boote vpon the Kings right hand) Montbazon, the Marshall of Lauardin, La Force and Praulin, beeing followed by two foote men, and one of his garde on horse-backe, hauing commanded Monsieur De Vytry and the rest of his garde to stay behinde.

Prouerbe vsed in France.

Beeing betwixt the draw-bridge and the port, this miserable wretch who watched his oportunitie, drew neere vnto the Caroch on the right side, thinking his Maiestie F had beene there, but seeing hee was on the left hand, and hearing them command the Coach-man to goe on, hee went the neereft way by narrowe lanes, and met with his Maiety in the streete called Ferroniere, neere vnto Saint Innocents Church, where staying 1610.

A staying to make way for a cart to passe, the King leaned downe on the one side towards Monsieur De Espernon, pressing him to read a letter without spectacles; the Duke of Montbazon turned towards them, and one of the foot-men was busie tying vp his garter on the other side, so as this monster had the opportunity to stab the King into the left pap, but the wound was not great, wherevpon crying out. O my God I am wounded, hee gaue him meanes to giue him a second blow, which was mortall, the knife entring betwixt the fifth and sixth ribbe, it cut a sunder the veine leading vnto the heart, and the wound was so deepe as it entred into Cana Vena, the which was peered, wherewith the King did presently spit bloud, loosing all apprehension and knowledge, for any thing they could perceiue. They had great difficulty to saue the murderer from killing presently, yet in the end hee was conuaid to the house of Retz.

Henry the fourthaine.

The King was carried backe vnto the Louvre: vpon the way they met with the Daulphin, who went to take the ayre; but they caused him to returne, and to bee carried into the Queenes chamber. The King was laied vpon a couch in his cabinet, whereas presently after hee gaue vp the ghost. Many spake vnto him of God, and amongst others the Archbishop of Ambrun, doing the last seruice of a Church-man, exhorted him in this last action, but he made no shew to vnderstand him.

Thus died King Henry the fourth, whose victories and martiall exploits had purchased him amongst his owne subiects, the surname of Great, whose life and actions future ages will read with admiration.

Neuer Prince was more respected of strangers, more feared of enemies, nor better beloued and obeyed of his subiects. And euen now beeing in his greatest glory, and holding himselfe as it were the moderator of Christendome, it pleased God to suffer him to bee deprived of this light by an vntimely death.

L E W I S

LEVVIS the thirteenth, the 64. French King.

LEWIS his Sonne, a young Prince, not then tenne yeares old, was called by Succession to the Gouernment of this Monarchie, in a season when as all things threatened confusion, by reason of this sudden accident, and the diuers dispositions of great men. But it pleased God (the Protector of Monarchies) to prevent this storme, and to calme the passions and factious humours of such as might otherwise haue troubled the State, for their own priuate interests, every one bending his thoughts to the seruice of his King and Countrie. This strange deed filled the City with terror and amazement, and the Court with teares and lamentations, especially the Queene his deare spouse.

At which instant the Duke of Guise comming to the Louvre, hee went to comfort the Queene, whom he found wonderfully afflicted with the newes of this lamentable accident: from whence he went with the Duke of Espernon to the Court of Parliament where they caused the Queene to be declared Regent, carrying a Register with them to the Louvre, to signifie it vnto her: which done, the Duke of Guise demanded two things of the Queene, the one was, the restoring of the Marquis of Vernueil to her fauour: and the other, the continuing of the Duke of Suilly in his charge, the which she willingly granted. After which he went through the City with five or sixe hundred horse directly to the Arcenal, where he entred with five more in his companie, whereas the Duke of Suilly and he embraced one another, and sware a strict league of loue and friendship, and then he returned to his house.

Aa

A An houre before, the Duke of Suilly hearing of the Kings hurt, was going with about some three score horse towards the Louvre, but meeting with Mounseur De Vi-try in Saint Honores streete, and hee telling him in his care, that hee was dead, hee returned presently, and put himselfe into the Arcenal, lodging that night, and the two following in the Bastille. It was strange to see the disorder, despaire, cries and confusion which was generally through the citie, the people casting themselues prostrate vpon the ground, nor caring if horses went ouer them, nor what became of them. Mounseur De Vi-try going to the Louvre, and entering into a little streete right against it, hee was incountred by a capitaine, one of his friends and familiar acquaintance, who was so troubled and transported with griefe, as hee knew him not, but sought to stoppe his passage, charging him with his pike, and putting him in daunger of his life; but in the end knowing him, hee cast away his pike, and crauing pardon of him, hee sayd vnto him. Sir cause mee to bee hanged, kill mee, I am so troubled as I know not what I doe, for I did not know you. Wherevpon hee passed on, and entred into the Louvre, where he found the Chancellor, who had been there before the blow, and there they lodged three nights together.

Duke of Suilly puts himselfe into the Bastille.

The daie the King was murdered, the Court of Parliament, hauing notice thereof, (as I haue sayd) made this decree.

C Whereas the Kings Attorney Generall hath informed the Court of Parliament, & at the chambers therof assembled that the King being now murdered by a most cruell, inhumaine and detestable Paricide, committed vpon his most sacred person, it were necessarie to provide for the affaires of the present King, and for his Estate; and hath required that there may bee present order giuen concerning his seruice, and the the good of his Estate, which cannot bee well gouerned but by the Queene, during the minoritie of the King her sonne; and that it would please the sayd Court to declare her Regent, that the affaires of the Kingdome may bee gouerned by her. Wherevpon hauing consulted, the Court hath declared, and doth declare the sayd Queene (mother to this King) Regent in France, for the gouernment of the State, during the minority of her sonne, with all power and Authority.

Decree made by the Court of Parliament.

Made in Parliament the fourteenth daie of May in the yeere of our Lord. 1610.

ON Saturday the fifteenth day, the King, beeing assisted by the Queene, the Prince of Conty, and other Princes, Noblemen, Prelats and Officers of the Crowne, (for the Earle of Soysons was yet at his house and came not til Monday) went vnto the Court of Parliament, where sitting in his seate of Iustice, hee made a little speech vnto them without interruption: but the Queene beginning to speake shee sunke downe in a fowne, but in the end the Chancellor wonne great reputation for the order and successe of this action, the which was as famous for the manner of it, as pittifull for the teares that were shed.

The King goes to the Court of Parliament.

It seemed that heauen and all creatures did second the mourning of men, all was so horrible and desolate, both in Court and citie, and much more in the country. At that time the King made a declaration, confirming the Decree of the Court of Parliament, for the Regencie of the Queene his mother, as followeth.

THe King sitting in his seate of Iustice, by the aduice of the Princes of his bloud, Prelats, Dukes, Peeres and Officers of his crowne, hauing heard the request made by his Attorney Generall, hath declared, and doth declare (according to a Decree made by the Court of Parliament) the Queene his mother Regent in France, and to haue the care of the bringing vp of his person, and the gouernment of the affaires of his Kingdome, during his minoritie. Commanding this present Edict to be inrowled and published in all the Ballewikes, Seneschaushes and other iurisdiccions depending

A declaration made by the King.

1610. vpon the sayd Court of Parliaments, and in all other Parliaments of this Realme. Gr. A men in the Court Pariment the fifteenth day of May 1610.

I suites se it for to receiue the Kings heart.

The King vpon the foundation of his royall Colledge at La Fleche for the Iesuities, had resolved to haue his heart laied there, after his death; the which they remembering, sought all meanes to recover it, and to preferue this pretious peece of that cruell shipwrack. Mounseigneur De La Varenne who had from the beginning laboured to aduance this Colledge, did now shew his loue and affection to them. He remembered the Queene of the deceased Kings will, who willingly granted that it should bee executed in euery point; wherevpon hee presently sent vnto the Iesuities beeing in their profect house of Saint Lewis, that they should bee readie to come and receiue this Treasure when they should bee sent for, and soone after hee sent them certaine Carosses, in the which they were brought vnto the Louvre, to salute the King and Queene and to offer them a new their most humble seruice on Saterday the fifteenth of May.

Iesuities come to the King
and Queene.

Beeing come into the Kings chamber, and hauing done their ordinarie obeysance, his Maiestie hauing imbraced the chiefe of them, father Cotton made a speech for them all, witnessing the extreame griefe which the company felt, by the incurable wounde it receiued by the deceased Kings death, and that they were resolved for to spend and consume themselves in the seruice of his crowne. The King assisted by Mounseigneur De Souure his Gouvernour, assured them that amongst the other qualities which hee desired to inherit of his Lord and most honoured father, was his loue to this Order, and that continuing to affect his seruice, they should finde the like affection.

Queenes
speeche to the Iesuities.

This beeing done they went vnto the Queenes chamber, whom they found accompanied with certaine Ladies of her Court, and some Noblemen and others. All the fathers hauing humbly saluted her, father Cotton made offer of the like seruice as hee protested vnto the King. To whom the Queene sayd, The deceased King my most honoured Lord and husband loued you deerely, as euery man knowes, and in testimony thereof, hee would haue you after his death, to bee the depositors and gardiens of his heart, I haue commaunded it shalbe deliuered vnto you, and that his will bee effected. Hauing this pretious pawne, and continuing towards the King my sonne in that duetie which you haue shewed vnto him, my loue and affection cannot faile you. Assure your selues I will maintaine you, and will haue a great care of your preferuation, as men who I thinke doe watch for this our Royall Estate.

These wordes were followed with humble thanks from the Iesuities, who hauing taken their leaue, went directly to the chamber where they did imbalme the Kings bodie. A lamentable sight, namely for those who but two daies before had seene him so pleasant and full of helth. The Prince of Condé arriued presently after, who melted in teares; Hee kneeled downe before the royall heart, and his praies beeing ended, taking it vp on a cushion, hee deliuered it into the handes of Bartlemew lacquimoit superior of the house of Saint Lewis, who beeing attired in a surplise and stoale, hee receiued it in the name of the whole companie, with protestation of the eternall bond which the whole Order should owe vnto the memorie of the deceased King, in that hee had honoured them with so precious a gage. Then beeing accompanied by his brethren: and followed by a great number of the Nobility, many torches beeing light hee was conducted to the great gate of the Louvre, where as the Caroches did attend them. Hee entred with foure others of the same Order, and two Gentlemen which carried torches in that where the Kings heart was, which was the same wherein this good Prince had receiued that lamentable and bloudie wound of death. The garde appointed, by Mounseigneur De Verry did accompanie this doulfull conuoy, the which came to Saint Lewis about eight of the clocke at night, on Saterday the fifteenth of May.

The

1610.

A The furniture of this mournfull conuoy, made the afflicted Parisiens (who loue their King with passion) easily to discouer what it was: so as many notwithstanding the raine and the great discommodity of the time, went on with the troupe, the more to witness their affection to their deceased Prince, and not satisfied to haue cast holy waters vpon his heart, they would in imitation of the Iesuities, kisse it one after an other: yea if it had beene possible a thousand times, euer detesting the memory of that damnable Paricide and wicked murderer that had deprived them of their dearest Jewel, the which was not done without great lamentation and shedding of many teares.

B This rich treasure rested three daies together in the Chappell of that house: vpon the fourth which was Assention Eve, it was set forth to the view of the people, it was on the right side of the high Altar vnder a pavillion, and vpon the same cushion whereon it was brought, hauing two tapers of white waxe burning continually before it, hauing the goodliest and richest Ornaments of either side their house could yeeld.

In the meane time Ignatius Armand Prouinciall of the company in France, beeing at that time at Neuers, where hee did visit the Colledge which they haue in that towne, hee tookt his way to Paris, where hauing kissed the King and Queenes hands, hee understood by Mounseigneur De La Varenne, that on Whitsun Mondae they should part to carrie this gage to the Royall Colledge of La Fleche, where it was appointed, and twentie of the companie were named to accompanie it by the waie. All hauing sayd masse verie earlie in the morning for the deceased, at that of the Prouinciall, which was the last, there assisted the Earle of Soylons, the Duke of Elsperton, and the Maister of the horse, with many other Noble men of marke.

Massé beeing ended, all these Religious men hauing their surplises on, and white waxe candles in their hands, put themselves in order, one of them carrying a silver crosse gilt, and two carrying two candlestickes of either side of the same, the rest following two and two in great deuotion.

D Last of all came the Prouinciall in his surplis and stoale, carrying the heart vpon a cushion of blacke velvet couered with cypres, and in this order they entered the Caroches, which attended them at the Church-doore. The Prouinciall with five others tooke their places in the Kings Caroeche, carrying in his armes this mournfull charge and spectacle of sorrowe, the which at noone and at night hee let rest in Churches, where it was conducted with diuers Processions which came for to meete it.

Those Princes and Noblemen which had assisted them at Massé, went to horsebacke, who were presentlie followed by many others, as well Princes, as the chiefe Noblemen of the Court, which marched for a time in troupes, but beeing ioyned together they made a bodie of a thousand horse, and so did accompanie it to Bourg La Roine.

The Iesuities in their Caroches, especiallie those that were in the Kings where the heart was, sung continually. All that long iourney was nothing but continuall testimonies of the singular loue and affection of those people vnto their King. Euen so that good Prince was accustomed to say speaking of his subiects. They will know mee better when they haue lost mee. The first encounter was of the Earle of Curlon, who knowing the mourning, leaped from his horse, and bathed all in teares, came and kissed the heart of his good maister. The Chancellour beeing accompanied with many Noblemen, came and yeelded the like Office to him, whom hee had serued so faithfully: Mounseigneur De Pallescan would haue approached three times, and euery time his knee bowed verie low, beeing touched with feruent loue, feare and reuerence, towards the memory of his deceased Maister. The Duke of Montbaçon and Mounseigneur De La Varenne, to whom the Queen had committed this charge,

1610. were still full of teares, not able to dessemble the vnspeakable sorrow which they felt A in their soules to haue lost, and in that manner, so good and louing a Maister.

The third daies iourney Mounseigneur De La Varenne went before to see the preparati- on made by the inhabitants of La Fleche. There was not any parish but the Priest met them with his crosse and his parishioners, not respecting the discommoditie of the waies, which was verie great, by reason of the continuall raine, whereas they saw nothing but teares and sighes of these country people.

Mounseigneur De La Ferette Gouvernor of Chartres, being accompanied with the chiefe Gentlemen and Citizens, came to meet them two Leagues from the towne: and that reuerent chapter of our Lady, with the rest of the Clergie, and all the Magistrates B of the towne came out of the portes, every man thinking hee did not any thing if hee did not more then any other, to honour the Prince without Peere. They arrived when it was darke, and they had no light but by torches, the which could hardly bee kept light, by reason of the raine which fell in such abundance as streames ranne downe the streets: The heauens meaning to let vs vnderstand that the teares of men were not sufficient to weepe for this disaster.

The Iesuite which carried the heart, went out of the Caroehe when they met with this procession, and so went on, the Deane hauing ioyned with him. The greatest part of this deuout people were bare-headed, and the Clergie with their square capps in the midst of this deluge, and in this manner they past the Suburbes, and the towne, C vnto the Cathedrall Church, where the heart was laied, and giuen in garde to the Deane, who beeing accompanied by many other Chanoins, watched all the night in prayers and deuotion.

The next day all the Iesuites sayd masse, after which they assembled together in the Church to take their deere charge, and the Deane hauing a desire to carrie it vnto the Church-dore, they granted it willingly. So departing from Chartres, they came to Champ-rond in good time, where the rest of the daie was spent by the Iesuites to sing Euen-song and Vigiles for the dead.

Early on Wednesdaie morning they went towards Nogeant, where approaching, the Clergy and a great number of the inhabitants came to meet them, witnessing D; all they could, the honour and respect they bare vnto the memorie of their Prince: where the Capuchins sayled not of their duties: Heere Gontier the Iesuite made a Sermon, such as the time and place would permit, exhorting his Auditory to praie feruently for the soule of the deceased King, and to affect with the like zeale the seruice of him who hath succeeded to his crowne.

The night was spent at La Ferté Bernard, where the heart did rest in a burning chappell, which was made in a little Church in the suburbs, where both the Clergy, and the Inhabitants did their duties. Before their departure father Jaquinot made a Sermon of the same subiect.

On Thursday they came to Guecelar, but wee may not passe ouer in silence the demonstration of the singular affection of the Towne of Mans, to their Prince and soueraigne Lord. Hauing newes of this conuoy, and that they should not haue the happinesse to see it passe through their towne: The Earle of Negrepalisse the Gouverneur, with a goodlie troupe of Gentlemen, the Lieutenant Generall with the other Officers of Iustice, with a verie great number of men and women of all sortes, came about a League into the high waie, where it should passe, powring forth more teares then if they had lost their neereft kinsfolkes, thinking themselves happy if they might kisse, or but touch the cushion whereon the heart lay. And if any one had the fauour to kisse it (as it was graunted to the most apparent) they left it all bathed with laymenting teares. The Lieutenant Generall adrest himselfe vnto the Duke of Montbason, and made him an eloquent Oration vpon the feeling of this losse, to whome the Duke answered wisely, with great readines and eloquence. In the end they arrived at la Fleche on Friday, about ten of the clocke, a towne which about all

A all others had felt this cruell disaster, and had yet teares in her eyes: a towne which this incomparable Monarch did cherish particularly, and which hee intended to make one of the goodliest of his Realme in her quality.

The reception was after this manner: The Prouost with his Archers marched before, after whom went the Schollers in order, to the number of twelue hundred, according to their Degrees, the Diuines carrying tapers in their hands. The Clergie went after, among them the Fathers Recollets, and the religious schollers of diuers Orders, beeing followed by that of the towne. The Fathers of the Colledge Royall being in their surplices, and every one carrying a B taper in his hand, ended that ranke. Monsieur de la Varenne was in the head of the Seculars, and the Baron of Saint Sufanne his sonne, beeing accompanied by foure and twentie Noble men schollers, most of them in mourning gowhes. Then followed the Court of Iustice, and other Officers, with the Bourgeses, Marchants, and all the Inhabitants of the towne, all carrying white torches burning, every one according to his ranke. In this order they stayed in a great meadow without the towne, vntill the coming of the Heart, which was not long. Before they ioyned, the Duke of Montbason, and the Iesuits went out of their Caroches.

In this meadow they had set a table covered with blacke, on the which the Prouinciall layd the cushion with a crosse betwixt two gilt candlesticks. All the Procession past C before it, and kneeling downe, did an humble homage. The Iesuites of Paris ioyned with them of the Colledge Royall. This done, the Prouinciall tooke the Heart againe, before him therewent a Herald with a gard of twelue Archers, and two Exemptes, euery one with a pistoll in his hand, and two supported his Armes. In this order they came to the towne gate, which was all covered with blacke cloth, and Scutcheons with the Kings armes on it: from thence they marched to Saint Thomas, the chiefe church of la Fleche, the which was hanged with blacke, as that of Saint Francis, and the Nunnes chappell: During the Procession, the Iesuites and other Clergie-men sung vnto the entry of the Church. Then presently began the Seruice, where the peoples teares expressed the griefe they had for his losse. Which done, father Cotton began the funeral Oration, where among other things, he shewed how infinitely the whole companie was bound vnto the memorie of the deceased King, and the seruice they desired to do vnto the King his sonne now raigning, and to the Queene Regent his mother, holding it a great fauour and honour done vnto the Companie, to haue the possession of so precious a gift.

The Sermon beeing ended, the Procession began to go out of S. Thomas church. Then the Duke of Montbason tooke the Heart from the Prouinciall, and carried it vnto the Colledge, which the Iesuits had hung with blacke. The great gate of the Colledge was all blacke, the ornament whereof did shew, that the deceased King did liue still in his sonne, vpon the front of this portall there was a great table with the name of E Iesus in the midst, whereon was a heart casting forth beames, and richly crowned: on the right hand was a Phenix burning, with this Motto: — Semilis in prole resurgo: and on the left hand a Pelican, with these words: Mors & vita inuoluit natos: beneath there was written, P. M. Henrici 4. posuit Ludovicus de Rohan. This was the Earle of Rochefort, sonne to the Duke of Montbason, a Student in that Colledge. In the midst of the great Court there was an Arch seuen and twenty foot high, and six and twentie broad, all blacke, full of torches, the passage was ten foot broad, and eightene high, Out of the midst thereof appeared a great Scutcheon with the Armes of France and Nauarre, and vpon the Arch there was written: Deuictori omnium hostium, & super omnes retro Principes, prouidentissimo Regi Henrico 4. soli Inuicto, immortalis memoria, & M. A. statui eius semper dicatissimi PP. Ludovicus de la Valesse: Arthusius d'Espimay: the first is son to the Duke of Espernon, and the second is brother to Monsieur Saint Luc.

On either side of the Court was a gallerie, distinguished into seuentene Arcades by pillars full of teares, and Flowers-de-luce of siluer in a fable field. In the midst of euery Arcade were the Armes of France with deaths heads, and great torches. On the Basis of Reception of the Kings heart into la Fleche.

1610. of it were Images delicately cut, whereas the King like the ancient Cæsars, being weary A of the Earth, seemed to seeke for Heauen, being carried by an Eagle about the Cloudes.

This funerall pompe being past this great Arch, they saw on the one side a Piramide, and on the other a Pillar, but by reason of the shortnesse of time they could not bee finished: Then they discovered the house which the deceased King gave vnto the Iesuites when he founded the Colledge. The portal, being covered with blacke and Scutcheons, lamented the death of this Prince, and shewed them the way to the great Hall, (which now serues for their Chappell) which was hung with veluet. Before the Altar which was all in mourning, there was a scaffold covered with silke to receiue the B heart, and to giue some little time to their sighes and teares. At either end of the Altar was a pillar covered with gold of a browne collour, and an Arch which was fixt to the toppes of the sayd pillars, and reached to the toppes of the Hall, the voyde place betwixt the Arch and the Pillars was full of the Armes of France and Nauarre. At the beginning of the Arch, there came forth a golden flower with branches, to receiue this pretious gage.

The Herald being mounted vpon the Scaffold, received this great treasure from the hands of the Duke of Montbaçon, and hauing pronounced with a loude voyce. Here lyeth the heart of Henry the fourth, most high, most mightie, and most Christian King of France and Nauarre, and hauing repeated thrice, according to the custome of France: The King is dead, pray to God for his soule, hee layed the heart in his place C of rest, vntill the vynes more richly wrought may be finished, the which shall be set before the chiefe Altar of the Church. Then hauing taken off his coate of Armes, and put it on again by commandement of those that had the charge of the Conuoy, he sayd with a loud voice. God saue Lewis the 13. most Christian King of France and Nauarre. God saue the King. This being ended, the Lieutenant Generall went to Monsieur de la Varennes house, and there in the behalfe of all the Iustice, and the towne, he did wites by a discourte full of zeale and affection, the extreame grieve which that towne had in particular for the losse of their good master, together with the honour which they did receiue by that pretious gage of his heart: thanking the Duke of Montbaçon, and Monsieur D d'la Varenne for the towne, which had received from their hands a present of so high esteem. To whom the Duke of Montbaçon answered very grauely vpon the same subiect; his countenance, words, & gesture, witnessing his affliction. Afterwards it was concluded in an assembly of the town, held before the Lieutenant generall, that for euer after on the 4. of Iune, on which day the heart of the deceased King was brought vnto the towne, and layd in the Iesuites church, there should bee a generall Procession from S. Thomas church to that of the Iesuites, where all the Clergie, the body of the Iustice, the Kings Officers, and other inhabitants should assist. At the returne of the Procession there should be a sollemne seruice sayd for the soule of the most Christian King deceased, and that al pleading and handy-worke should cease that morning.

This sudden and lamentable disaster did wonderfully afflict all the French in general E and bred strange apprehensions in the minds of many, who remembring the miseries and confusions which had grown through the factions of great men, during the minority of former Kings, prayed generally for vnity, and some did write of that subiect: among others one Pellester discoursing of this miserable accident, concludes with an exhortation to great men to liue in vnity, for the generall good of the Estate.

It is not (sayes he) the propertie of greatest sorrowes to speake, for teares and hart-breaking-sighes are the best demonstrations of greatest passions; the which maketh me to expresse in few words, the great grieve and publike sorrow wherewith France is now afflicted: Know then, and let future ages for euer lament, that on Friday the 14. of May, F the next day after the Queens coronation, our great Henry (of most famous memory) K. of France and Nauarre, passing through the city in his Caroch, as a Prince which liued without feare or suspicion of his subiects, accompanied with some few of his Nobilitie, and without any of his vsuall Guard, was murdered by an accursed and execrable

Is it not a wonder to the Christian world, to see France a second Affricke, breeding such detestable monsters? how infamous is this age, in regard of that of our forefathers? What a miserie is it, that a French King should not be free from the rage and furie of a cur-throate villaine, one of his owne subiects? Accursed villaine, thou hast depriued vs of this great Prince, whom we lament with teares, and whose losse wee shall euer feele. Thou didst thinke in thy damnable desseigne to swallow vs vp in a gulf of miserie and desolation: but God in his goodnesse hath preserued vs; and otherwise disposed the hearts and affections of the French, then thou in thy frenzie didst conceiue, or the hellish counsell of Sathan suggest. The darke prison wherein thou art iustly detained, where new torments are prepared for thy offence, will not let thee see how (notwithstanding thy wicked Act) that all things remaine constant in the same tranquillitie they were in before. It is to God alone to whome we are bound for this grace, yet will we not forget to giue due prayes to those instruments which hee hath vouchsafed to vse in this action: for the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, the famous Court of Parliament, with the Magistrates of Paris, haue all with one heart and common consent assured the Estate: so as there is not any shew of mutinie or sedition amongst this great multitude: but resolution and modestie, which make the Parisiens to bee much commended, and serues as an example to all other Prouinces of the Realme.

C Thou (I say) canst not see how the very hower of thy horrible attempt, all the Nobilitie ranne to the Louvre, making offers and protestations of their seruice and fidelities: thou seest not, though the father be taken away, the sonne is left vs, to succeed in the Gouvernement: though he be young, yet shall he be fortified with the wise aduice of great Princes, and of the Queene his mother, who amidst her greatest sorrowes, will remember the common good; and hath vouchsafed for our comfort to accept of the Regencie and Gouvernement of the Kingdome. In the presence of the Princes, Peeres, Constable, Chancellor, Cardinals, Marshals of France, and other great Officers of State, all assembled in the great Chamber of the Pallace, with authoritie of the Court of Parliament, his lawfull Successor sitting in his throne, was sollemnly acknowledged D and proclaimed King of France.

To conclude, this young Prince is so worthily brought vp, in the loue and feare of God with all other vertues, which serue to the ornament of a great King, that treading in the foot-steps of the late King his father, he will cherish Religion, loue Iustice, be generous, meeke, affable, gracious, and shine in a full luster, like a glorious Sunne ouer all France. All things shall flourish under his Raigne, his people shall bleffe him, and with eyes lift vp to heauen, pray to God for his preseruatiō.

Thus now wee see this Prince happily settled, and so well supported with the force of armes, aduice of his Council, and the loue of his subiects, as it shalbe in vaine for any one to presume to attempt any inuouation without condigne punishment: seeing then E his comming to the Crowne is so blessed, and seconded by the fauors of heauen, let vs not prouoke the anger of God by our ill dispositions: let vs indeauor to haue this cursed murderer not only detested of all French-men, but also held in abomination of all strangers: Let vs remember, that as contrarie winds cause stormes and tempests at sea, so disunion and factions trouble a State. If our owne iudgement cannot instruct vs, let the schole of reason teach vs, let vs consider that in an humane bodie there is a head, and vnder that head many noble parts: that the member appointed for one seruice, dares not execute anothers office. The legges will not be the armes, nor the lungs the heart. Euen so in a wel-gouerned State, one is acknowledged for head, and giueth life to all the other members; which moue not but vnder his command, so as euery one F discharging his duty, by a good vnion and correspondencie, Kingdomes are preserued, and of small become great, whereas contrariwise by diuisions and factions great States are ruined and come to nothing.

Remember, that it is about 1200. yeares since this Realme of France hath bene held for one of the greatest Monarchies in the world: Let not posteritie reproch vs, that it hath 1610. hath bene ruined in our time; and that by our intemperate rage, we haue ouerthrowne A that which our Ancestors haue built vp by their wisedomes and valors: and if the publike interest do not mooue you, yet let euery man respect his owne particular: wee are all imbarcked in one vessell, if it perish, hardly will any one escape: wee are all in one house, if it fall, wee shall be buried in the ruines. Let vs not forget, that wee are yet drenched with our last shipwracke: that we haue not bene long freed from ciuill war, the which neuer comes alone, but is attended on by plague, famine, and all other calamities and miseries, as losse of goods, imprisonment, ransoming of our bodies, the sack and spoile of our townes, the rauishing of our wiues and daughters, and the slaughter of our children.

Let vs know, that experience is the mistresse of fooles, and let vs not attend repentance after our errors. We are now in peace, let vs continue, preferue, and seeke to B maintaine it with the assistance of God. Let vs not be like vnto Magicians, which procure stormes by their charmes, contrarie to the course of nature. Calamities and miseries come but too soone, let vs not prouoke them, or go to meet them. You great men which haue the charge and gouernment of the State, in Gods name, haue no other obiect before your eyes, but the good and seruice of your King: sie diuision, which like a bad Councillor, seeking to ruine others, ouerthrowes it selfe. Assure your selues the greatnesse of the Estate is your owne, her tranquility is the Basis and foundation C of your owne families. Study not who shall ruine his companion, but who shall serue his countrie with greatest loyalty. It is incident to men of weake iudgements to be full of enuie, malice, and dissimulation: carry your hearts in your faces, loue one another, that you may the better serue one master. It shalbe your prosperitie, and doubt not but there are more good then bad in an Estate, and that there was neuer any one so mutinous and factious, but in the end he was curbed by the Authority of his Soueraigne. You haue at this day a King redoubtable, ouer whose person the eye of the diuine Providence doth so watch, as although he be young, yet shall he not be lesse obeyed and feared throughout all his Kingdome: the Edicts of the deceased King his father shalbe obserued as his owne: you shall haue him a common father to all his subiects.

It is sayd that Alexander made no distinction betwixt Greek and Barbarian, but only D by their vertues, not regarding the difference of their habits. So our King will iudge who are good and bad French-men, by their obedience and fidelitie, euery one shalbe partaker of his grace and fauour, as he shall make himselfe worthy by his seruice. So as all things being thus firmly settled within the Realme, we shall haue no cause to feare any danger from abroad: The King is in peace with his neighbours, and we assure our selues, that there is not any one of them but he is so generous, as he doth deplore this lamentable accident befallen our late King. And although hee had before the death of this Prince, some desseignes to preiudice France, yet now he will turne his hatred into loue, moued onely by commiseration of this disaster. And if wee may hope for this kinde from forraigne Princes, what ought we to expect from those which are natu- E rall borne French-men.

G O D indeed in this dangerous confusion, did heare the prayers and vowes of good men, and did so vnite the hearts of great men, as euery one did striue by emulation, who should do best seruice to the King and State: but aboue all, the Queenes constancie was admirable, who in the midst of her greatest afflictions labored continually, and did not neglect any thing, that might tend to the publike quiet of the Realme, causing the King the two and twentieth of May, to make a Declaration for the intertaynement of the Edict of Pacification made at Nantes, as followeth:

L E W I S by the Grace of God, &c. Since the most vnfortunate and detestable murder of our most honoured Lord and Father, the King last deceased (whome God F absolue) the Queene Regent our most honoured Lady and mother, (hauing alwaies teares in her eyes, and sorrow in her heart) hath not let to labour incessantly, and with great magnanimitie and wisedome, lest this fatall accident should be preiudiciall to our

A our person, our state and subiects, holding her selfe bound vnto this duetie, not onely for the naturall affection which she beareth vs: but also for that shee hath bene declared Regent, and in this quality charged with the gouernment of the affaires of the Kingdome, by the suffrages and consent of the Princes of our blood, and other Princes, Peeres, Prelats and chiefe Officers of the crowne and the Iudges of our Parliament, being all assembled there together (we sitting in our seate of Iustice) wherein her endeauours were so happy, and the affection of all our subiects which were then neere vs (especially of the inhabitants of our good citie of Paris) so great and sincere towards vs, as wee cannot wish nor desire more in their obedience and loyalties, then in the good and wise gouernment of the Queene Regent, our most honoured Ladie B and mother: Hauing also had intelligence by the aduice which comes dailey vnto vs, that in all partes of our Kingdome all our subiects, as well Catholikes as they of the pretended reformed Religion of all qualities, striue by a commendable emulation, to exceed one another in redinesse of obedience, and in actions which may yeeld some testimony of their loyalties and duetie: for the which wee haue great cause to thanke God, and to hope that as it hath pleased him heretofore to preferue this Realme from great daungers; to make it flourish so many ages, that hee will still by his bountie take our young yeeres into his protection, and giue vs leisure to grow in pietie and vertue, hereafter to imploy the greatnesse, wherevnto hee hath raised vs, to his honour and C glorie. The which wee heartely craue at his hands, and that he will inspire vs with such counsell as shalbe fit and necessary for the well gouerning of our subiects in his feare, and to make them liue in peace, vnitie and loue, one with another, as beeing the true ground, whereon (next after God) depends the safety and preservation of the Realme: Experience hauing taught Kings our Predecessors, that the furie and violence of armes, had not onely bene vnprofitable to drawe vnto the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romaine Church, their subiects that were diuided from it, but was rather hurtfull: which made them haue recourse by a more happie counsell, to mildnesse, granting them the exercise of the sayd pretended reformed Religion, whereof they made profession: In whose imitation, the deceased King our most honoured Lord D and father, had made the Edict of Nantes, to reconcile all his louing subiects: The obseruation of which Edict, with the Orders made in consequence thereof, haue settled an assured quiet amongst them, the which hath euer since continued without any interruption. By meanes whereof, although that Edict bee perpetuall and irrevocable, and by that meanes hath no need to be confirmed by any new declarations. Notwithstanding to the end our sayd subiects may bee assured of our loue, and that our intention and will is to cause the sayd Edict to bee inuiolably kept, beeing made for the good and quiet of all our subiects as well Catholikes, as those of the pretended reformed Religion.

Wee make it knowne, that it hauing bene propounded in our presence, by the E Queene Regent, our most honoured Ladie and Mother, wee haue by her good aduice, of the Princes of our blood, and other Princes, Dukes, Peeres, Officers of our Crowne, and manie notable personages of our Councill, decreed, and ordained, and our pleasure is, that the aforesayd Edict of Nantes in all pointes and Articles, together with all other Articles which haue bene graunted vnto them, and the Orders made, and Iudgements giuen vpon the interpretation, or execution of the Edict, and in consequence thereof, shalbe entertained and kept inuiolably, and those which shall infringe it, seuerely punished, as troublers of the publike quiet: inioyning all our Officers to this effect, to see it verie carefully kept, as they will answer F to the contrary, whose negligence shalbe punished as rigorously as the disobedience of such as haue broken it.

Wee also command our louing and faithfull Iudges of our Court of Parliament at Paris, to cause these presents to bee proclaimed and inrowled, and the contentes to bee kept, entertained, and obserued in euery point according to their forme and tenour, not suffering any thing to bee done to the contrarie. For such is our pleasure.

Arraignement of the murderer.

Execution of the murderer

THE State being some-what settled, and freed from all feare of factions and alterations: the Court of Parliament proceeded to the arraignment and condemnation of the infernall monster of nature, Francis Rauillac, borne at Angoulesme, by profession a Lawyer. Beeing prisoner in the Concergerie, (which is the prison for the Court of Parliament) his processe was duly instructed and made, in the chamber of the Tournelle (which be the ordinary Iudges for all criminal offenders,) who being put to the Racke on the 25. day of May; on the 27. day sentence of death was giuen against him, by the which he was declared duly attainted and conuicted of treason in the highest degree, both against God and man. His execution was according to the sentence, after this manner. He was brought out of the prison in his shirt, with a torch of two pound weight lighted in one hand, and the knife wherewith he had murdered the King, chained to the other; and then he was set right vp in a tumbrell or dung-cart, and so he was conducted with a good gard vnto our Ladies church, where beeing condemned to do penance, he had bene torne in peeces by the peoples rage, if the Officers had not restrained them. After this he was accompanied to the place of execution by two Doctors of Diuinity, who still perswaded him to saue his soule from euertlasting punishment, by reuealing his associates, the which he would not, but still maintained, that he did it only by the instigation of the deuill, and the reason was, for that the King did tolerate two Religions in France. In this manner he was carried to the Greue, where there was a strong scaffold built for his execution. Du Vic the Kings Attorney was appointed to assist at his execution, and there to gather (if it might be) some further light of this hellish conspiracie. His death was terrible, to diuert all murderers from the like attempts. At his coming vp to the Scaffold, he crost himself, in signe that he died a Papiist, then he was bound vnto an engine of wood made like vnto a S. Andrews crosse, which done his hand with the knife chained to it (wherewith he had slaine the King) was put into a furnace, then flaming with fire and brimstone, wherein it was in a most terrible manner consumed, and yet hee would not confesse any thing, but cast forth horrible cries, like a soule tormented in hell: and surely if helts torments might be felt on earth, it was proued in this mans punishment, the which (had not the foulness of his fact bene so horrid) would haue moued all the lookers on to pittie and commiseration. After which the executioners hauing made pincers red hot in the same furnace, they did pinch his paps, the brawnes of his armes and thighes, with the calues of his legges, and other fleshy parts of his body, pulling out collops of flesh, and burning them before his face: then they poured into those wounds, scalding oyle, rozen, pitch, and brimstone molt together: after which they did set a hard roundell of clay vpon his nauell, hauing a hole in the midst, into the which they powred molten lead, yet hee reuealed nothing, but roared out most horrible, like vnto him that was tormented in the brazen Bull of the tyrant Phalaris. But to make the last act of his Tragedie equal in torments to the rest, they caused foure strong horses to bee brought to teare his body in peeces, where being ready to suffer his last torments, he was againe questioned with, touching the discouery of this truth, but he would not reueale any thing, & so died, without speaking one word of God. But his flesh and ioynts were so strongly knit together, as those 4. horses could not of a long time dismember him, nor pul him asunder: but one of them fainting, it is remarkable to see the affection of a Gentleman who was present, mounted vpon a mighty strong horse, who seeing one of the horses straine but faintly, he lighted from his owne, and taking off his saddle, he tyed him to one of this wretches members, yet for all this, they were constrained to cutt the flesh vnder his armes and thighes, with

A with a sharpe rasor, by which meanes his body was the easier torne in peeces: which done the fury of the people was so great, as they pulled this dismembred carcase out of the executioners hands, which they dragged vp and downe through the dirt, and cutting of the flesh with their kniues, the boans which remayned were brought to the place of execution, and there burnt, the ashes were scattered in the wind, as being held vnworthy of earths burial: the people shewing by these exterierour acts the great and sincere affection which they bare vnto the deceased King, our common father, and restorer of the estate. By the same sentence of condemnation all his goods were declared forfeited to the King; and more ouer it was ordayned that the house where hee had bene borne should be beaten downe (a recompence being giuen to the owner thereof) and that neuer any other should be built vpon that ground. That within fiftene daies after the publication of the said sentence, being proclaymed by the sound of a Trompet in the towne of Angoulesme, his Father and Mother should depart the realme, and neuer to returne againe, which if they did, they should be presently hanged without any other forme of processe. His Brethren, Sisters, Vncles, and other his kinsfolkes, were forbidden euer after to carry the name of Rauillac, inioyning them to take an other, vpon the like paines, the substitute of the Kings Attorney generall hauing charge to see the execution of the said sentence at his perill.

It was an admirable thing after so great a disaster to see the vnion and tranquillity which was generally in the state, there remaying not any markes of so great a mischief, but the mourning weeds which all men did weare, and the sighes which all good French-men did breath forth for the losse of their good King: neuer King was more lamented, nor Parricide more detested. This wicked murderer confessed no other motive of his crime, but the booke of Mariana, a Spanish Iesuite (so horrible a fact could not bee committed if a Iesuite were not an actor) which booke by a decree made by the Colledge of Sorbonne, and confirmed by a sentence from the Courts of Parliament was for that cause condemned to be publicly burnt before our Ladies Church in Paris the tender of the sentence was. The Court, the great Chamber, the Turnelle, and the Chamber of the Edict being assembled, hauing scene the decree of the faculty of diuinity assembled the fourth of this Month of Iune, according to a sentence giuen in May last, vpon the renewing of the censure in matter of Doctrine made by the said faculty in the year 1413. confirmed by the holy councell of Constance; that it is an heresie full of impiety to maintaine that it is lawfull for subiects or strangers, vpon any pretext or cause whatsoever, to attempt against the sacred persons of Kings and Soueraigne Princes. The Booke of John Mariana intituled, De Rege et Regis institutione, Printed as well at Mentz as in other places, contayning many execrable blasphemies against the deceased King Henry the third of most happy memory, the persons and estates of Kings and Soueraigne Princes, and other propositions contrary to the said decree: vpon the conclusions of the Kings Attorney generall, the matter being propounded; the sayde Court hath and doth ordaine, that the sayde Decree of the fourth of this present month of Iune, shalbee entred into the registers thereof, and heard at the instance of the Kings Attorney Generall, and read euery yeare on the like day on Sunday in the Parishes of this City and Suburbs of Paris. It doth also ordaine that the booke of Mariana shalbe burnt by the executioner of Iustice, before our Ladies Church in Parris, forbidding all men, of what estate, quality and conditions soeuer they be, vpon payne of high treason, to write or cause any bookes to be Printed against the sayd decree and sentence. It doth also inioyne that coppies taken out of the Originalls of the sayd decree, and this present sentence shalbe sent vnto the Bailewicks and Seneschau-shes of this iurisdiction, there to bee read and published after the accustomed manner and forme. And moreouer at Euen-song in Parrishes, in Townes, Suburbs and other Burroughes the first Sunday of Iune. Inioyning all Bayliffes and Seneshalls to proceed to the sayd publication, and the substitutes of the Kings Attorney generall to haue a care of the execution, and to certifie the Court of their diligence.

Boy condemned for words.

Yet those holy men had such power and credit as they staid the publication of the A sayd sentence for a time, whereat many were much scandalized. Presently after the execution of this Parricide there was a young boy of the age of thirteene yeares dwelling with a weauer, apprehended, for that he had said, that if he had the knife and the caracters which Rauillac had, he would doe as much to the young King, wherevpon hee was condemned to be hanged by the prouost of Paris, from which sentence he appealed to the Court of Parliament. And the Prouost of Pluviers, twenty leagues from Paris, being accused to haue said, the day that the King was murdered, that he was slaine or wounded that day, strangled him selfe in prison.

Succors of Cleues resol-ued on.

An other man of Meaux making profession of the religion and reputed for a very honest man, came vnto the Duke of Bouillion (being accompanied with letters B from the Minister of that place) to let him vnderstand that the Diuell had appered vnto him, and had incited him, to kill the King, saying, that if hee would not doe it, another should effect it before the end of Iuly. In the beeginning of the Queenes Regency, all her care and endeuer was for the preseruacion of the peace and the safety of the realme; She sought to giue contentment to the Princes at home, and to entertaine the alliances of France, which made them resolute (though not without some opposition and difficultie) to pursue the desseine of Cleues, and to send the 10000. men which the deceased King had promised vnto the Princes, but the number of horse was not so compleat; the Marshall of La Chastre was chosen generall of this army, and Monsieur de Montigny was made Marshall of the Campe; there were foure C pieces of artillery, commanded by the young Marquis of Rosny (who was newly made Master of the Ordinance) to begin his apprenticeship there. This army began to march but slowly in Iuly towards Mets. The Marshall preparing himselfe for the voyage, there came two Iesuits to seeke him out, who told him that hee could not goe this Iorney, nor carry succors vnto Heretikes with a good conscience, seeking to terrifie, his conscience with threats, as that if he vndertoke it, hee could not bee saved. But the Marshall giuing noe credit vnto their words sent them away with a softer answer: yet soone after they came vnto him to change their language, and to pacifie him.

They now prepared for the Kings Funerall, and the Duke of Espernon with Mounsieur de Bélegarde Master of the King hortes, were sent to Compiègne to fetch the body D of King Henry the third which made many thinke that his funeralls should haue bene ioyned with the Kings, but his body was carried directly to Saint Denis where it was interred without any pompe and ceremony.

Earle of Soissons made gouernor of Normandy.

The Prince of Condé being aduertised of the Kings death, he sought to make his peace and reconciliation, writing letters full of humility & obedience to the King and Queene Regent, where-vpon their Maiesties did write graciously vnto him, by a gentleman whome the Princeesse of Condé his mother sent vnto him with 20000. Crownes to degage him from the Spaniards. At this time the Gouvernement of Normandy was giuen to the Earle of Soissons, and that of Dauphine to his Sonne, which bred great debate betwixt the Prince of Conty and the Earle his Brother, the which did much E trouble the Queene, who could not well tell how to pacifie the Prince; The Court of Parliament at Rouen, refused to verifie the Earles Patent for the sayed government, where-vpon they had a new commandement sent them: They grownded their refusal vpon this reason, for that they had already receyued the Duke of Orleans for their gouernor, by commandement from the deceased King.

After the execution of the Parricide Rauillac, and his confession, that the booke of Mariana the Iesuite, had bene the onely moriue to draw him to that damnable attempt; there was a fowle imputation layd vpon the Iesuits, and many condemned them as abettors and fauorers of the murderers of Princes, wherein they were the more confirmed, for that Marianas booke had bene condemned to bee burnt by a decree F of the Court of Parliament. Father Cotton a Iesuite, who had bene in more credit and fauour with the deceased King then any one of that company, seeing their credits now in question, and that this brand of infamy was like to stick vpon them

A them, he employes all his Art and eloquence to wipe it off, and to that end hee writes a letter or declaration vnto the Queene Regent, of the Iesuites doctrine, in the which he disauowes Marianas Booke in the name of their whole Company. And to winne them the more credit, he procures them a Testimoniall from the Bishop of Paris, the which he plants in the Preface of his discourse. The Bishop writes. That whereas since the cruell Parricide of the deceased King, there had bene many bruits disperted in Paris, to the preiudice of the remarkable Order of the Iesuites, we being desirous to prouide for the honour and reputation of the sayd Order, knowing well that such bruits proceed onely from ill will, grounded vpon spleene against the sayd Fathers: We declare by these presents, that the sayd bruits are Impositions, and slanders inuented B litiously against them, to the preiudice of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, and that not onely the sayd Fathers are free from all such blame: but also that their Order is as well for doctrine, as good life, profitable for the Church of God, and to this Estate. In witness whereof we haue signed these presents. After all this, Cotton begins his declaration vnto the Queene Regent after this manner:

Madame: God ordayned in the old Testament, That they should not see the the Kid in the mothers milke: to teach vs, (as Philon the Iew doth expound it) that we must not surcharge him with new affliction, that is otherwise oppressed. According to this rule being of the same nature, those of our Societie did hope, that after this fatal accident

C which hath shaken the two Poles of Christendome, they should at the least haue had free liberty to sigh after their incomparable losse, a losse which is as particular to them, as it is common and generall to all. But it is befallen them, as vnto those that are vnder the ruines of a great building, where as one stone attends not another, to couer and o-uerwhelme those vpon whom it falls. We were busied both hearts and bodies at the translation of that pretious gage, which it pleased your Maiestie to cause to bee consigned into our hands by my Lord the Prince of Conty, and to the which the chiefe Noblemen of France yielded the last honors, when as some (ill affected to the Catholike Religion, and to them of our profession, to defame vs, and make profit of our absence)
D disperted bruits, so far from likelihood and probability, as no man could think such slanders could enter (no not in dreaming) in the conceit of any reasonable creature. This grew by reason of a bad booke, the doctrine whereof hath bene iustly censured by the Court of Parliament: some maintaining that the doctrine contained in the said booke was common to all the Iesuits: others, that it was so particular to the Author, as many of the same company had written against it, and altogether condemned it in a Provincial congregation, some yeares past. A controuersie which the least passionate will decide, concluding, that a disauow were a satisfaction, and that they should attend what we could say. Wherevpon (Madam) hauing bin particularly named, it hath made mee now to set pen to paper, to represent vnto you (as to her who is wholly affected to the E true Religion, the most interested in the good of this State, and the most assured Sanctuarie which Innocency can find) that which the Doctores of our Company haue written of that subiect, knowing that the greatnesse of our affaires will not suffer you to seeke it, nor the little loue which our ill-willers beare vs, to make you a true discourse of it.

After which he cites some Authors of that Societie writing of obedience to Princes, which held, that it was not lawfull for subiect nor stranger to attempt against the life of a Prince, although he doth abuse his authoritie: directly condemning the error of Marina. And then he sets downe the opinion of the whole Company, touching the question of obedience to Princes, concluding, that it is not onely vnlawfull to attempt against the persons of Princes, but that it is an execrable Parricide, a prodigious offence and a detestable sacriledge.

This Declaration was no sooner printed, but there was a refutation presently written, called Anti-Cotton, maintayning, that the doctrine of the Iesuites allowes and maintaines the parricide of Kings, and the Rebellion of subiects, the which he prouoed out of their owne Authors.

Anti-Cotton.

1610.

1 Francis Ribadineira writing of the parricide of James Clement, he saith, Forasmuch as the resolution which Henry the 3. took upon him, was the advice of a Polititian and a Machinist, not conformable to the rules of our Sanior, behold the reason, that by the iust iudgement of God, the saye Henry was killed by a yong Monke, and dyed by the stroke of a knife.

2 Carolus Scribanius a Flemish Iesuit, who calls himself Clarus Bonarscius, in his book intituled, Amphitheatrum honoris, sayes, That if it so fall out, that a Denis, a Machanidas, or an Aristotimus, monsters of their ages, oppresse France, that not the Pope haue absolute power to animate against them some Dion, Timoleon, or Philopœmen, that is to say, tamers and suppressers of monsters. And afterwards speaking of a tyrant wasting France, Vill no man (sayes he) take armes against that tyrant wasting France: will no Pope set free the noble kingdom from the stroke of the axe?

3 He cites Bellarmine, who although he condemneth treason against Princes: yet in ambiguous termes he seemes to approue it, by commending Garnet the Iesuit in these words: VWherefore was Henry Garnet, a man unmatched in all kinds of learning and holines of life, so punished in the highest degree, but only for that he would not detect that, which with a safe conscience he could not. And the same Author in his booke De Pontifice Romano, sayes, The Pope may dispose of kingdomes, taking from one, and giuing to another, as being the superior Prince Ecclesiastical. And the Iesuit Gretzer sayes, VVe are not such dastards, as we feare to affirme openly, that the Pope of Rome may (if necessity so require) free his Catholike subiects from their oath of obedience, if their Soueraigne intreate them tyrannically: yea he addes in the same place, That if the Pope do it discreetly and warily, it is a meritorious worke. After all this he coates the doctrine of Tolet, Mariana, and Iohn Guignard, a Iesuited Priest residing in Paris, who had written a treatise in praise of James Clement, with diuers motiues to make away the King which last died: for the which hee was executed. But Franc. Verona Constant. exceeds them all: he affirmes: That notwithstanding the Councell of Constance, it is lawfull for any priuat man to murder Kings condemned of heresie and tyranny. And Emanuel Sa writes, that the rebellion of a Clerke against the King, is no treason, inasmuch as he is not subiect to him. The which Bellarmine in a manner confirms, saying: The Pope of Rome hath exempted Clerkes from their subiection to Princes: kings are now no more superiors of Clerks. And to proue their doctrine of killing Kings more plainly, he produceth the equiuocations and euasions of Garnet, being apprehended for the powder-treason, the which is iustified by many of that Society: Iohn l'Heureux writing thus: when any man is drawn into question vnder an vnjust trial, no man standing bound to informe against himselfe (as the law of nature teacheth vs plainly) he may peremptorily and freely deny that for which he is called into question, without any tergiversation, because he alwaies vnderstands this clause, Vt teneat dicere. Which doctrine is confirmed by diuers other Iesuits. One of them affirming, that the doctrine of Equiuocation is grounded vpon the memorable example of S. Francis. In the end he shewes their opinion touching concealing of confessions, which they hold, ought not to be reuealed. Iohn l'Heureux writing of that subiect, sayes: That a thing sealed vp with the most holy signet of Confession, cannot be broken without detestable sacriledge: and that there cannot fall so great a mischief, for the auoyding of which, it can bee lawfull to bewray a confession. And Suares addes: yea though the safety of the whole Common-wealth should stand vpon it. By all which proofes he shewes, that it was not Mariana's doctrine alone, to murder Kings, but that all the Iesuits haue erred with him in this whome Father Cotton cannot iustifie in generall.

Iesuits doctrine proued by their actions.

Aut-cotton hauing set downe the Iesuites doctrine, he prooues it by their actions. And first, by the fact of Iohn Chastel Clerke, brought vp in the Iesuites Colledge, who hauing stabbed the King in the mouth the 27. of December, 1604. being examined vpon sundry questions, and among others, whether he had studied Diuinity in the Iesuits Colledge, he answered: That hee had bene there vnder Father Gueret, with whom he had continued two yeares and a halfe. And beeing asked if he had euer bin in the chamber of Meditations, whether the Iesuits vse to bring the greatest sinners, there to behold the representation of many deuils, set forth (vnder colour to reduce them to a better life)

1610.

A life) thereby to cause a perturbation in their minds, and consequently vpon such resolutions, to thrust them forward to the vndertaking of some great action. His answer was, that he had often bin in this chamber of meditations. And beeing questioned, whether the killing of the King were not an ordinarie discourse among the Iesuites, he answered, that he had heard them say: It was lawfull to kill the King, and that hee was no member of the Church, and that we ought not to obey him, nor hold him for our King, vnless he had receiued approbation from the Pope.

Peter Barriere being apprehended at Melun in April 1593, beeing discouered by an honest Friar, confessed that he came purposely to Court, to kil the King, & that he had bin perswaded therunto by one Varadé a Iesuite, whose daily practise was to defame the King with vild speeches: by whose perswasion hee had prouided a knife to do the fact. He first of all discouered his intent to Aubry, Curate of S. Andrew des Arts, who directed him to Varadé Rector of the Iesuits colledge, who confirmed him in his resolution to kill the King, assuring him, that in case he were put to death, he shold obtaine in heauen a crowne of Martyrdome: and adiuring him vnto this action, vpon the Sacrament of Confession, and the holy Communion. And omitting many other actions of Iesuites both at home and abroad to prooue their damnable doctrine, he concludes with Garnet, Hal, and others of the Sect, who were complices in that powder-treason, which was practised to ruine the King and the whole Estates of England.

C In the end he seeks to prooue by many pregnant presumptions, that the Iesuites are guilty of the murther. First, by an aduertisement sent from M. de la Force, the Kings Lieutenant in Bearn, that a Spaniard described by him, was come into France with an intent to kill the King, which Spaniard was brought vnto the King by Cotton, but the King hauing receiued these letters, shewed them to Cotton, and commanded him to bring the Spaniard againe, but he could not be found.

Iesuits guilty of the Kings
murther.

Secondly, the seditious preachings of Gontier and Hardy both Iesuites, the Lent before the fact was committed: in somuch as the Marshall d'Ornano told the King, that if Gontier had preached so at Bourdeaux, he wold haue caused him to be cast into the river, and yet he was a very zealous Catholike.

D Thirdly, the confession of Rauillac, who iustified vnto father Aubigny, that he had told him in confession, that he had bin sent to giue a great blow, and that he had shewed him the knife, hauing a heart grauen vpon it. But the Iesuite protested, that God had giuen him the grace to forget that presently which was reuealed to him in confession, whereby he saued his life.

And last of all, the predictions before the Kings death, as at Bruxelles, where the Iesuits domineere, it was spoken of 12. or 15. daies before it hapned. At Prague, a Iesuite had giuen it out, that the K. was dead, before it fell out so, and moreover, he told them, that after his death the Daulphin shold not be King, but the K. of Spaine, and that for some reasons which Gontier gaue in his Sermons in Lent last. And then the prediction of the Prouost of Pluviers, that the King was either slaine or hurt that day. He was a Iesuit in faction, and hath a son a Iesuit.

Predictions
death.

The King being dead, the Queene with all the Nobility, propounded in councell to yeeld him the last duty in his obsequie: she giues order, as well to pray for his soule, as for all all things requisite for the ornament of the funeral of so great a Monarch. Two daies after the death of this great King, his body was layd in a bed, his face bare to the view of all, and then they opened his bodie to embalme it, out of the which they tooke his hart to carry to la Fleche, and his bowels to S. Denis, as he had appointed in his life time: the which being done, he was layd in a coffin of lead, couered with purple velvet, on the which was a great crosse of white satten. On Whitson-monday about foure of the clocke in the morning, his heart being honorably imbalmed, and laid in lead, was carried to la Fleche. The body being layd in a coffin, it was set in a chamber hangd with rich tapistry, on either side were altars set, where there were daily an 100. Masses said. In the chamber were many formes richly couered, for the Princes, Officers of the Crown, Cardinals, Arch-bishops, Bishops, chiefe Almner, and other Prelates, & Officers of the Church:

Kings heart carried to la Fleche.

1610. church: and neere vnto the holy water pot, were two Heralds: on either side there were A many other seats for religious men, who did sing day and night. Vpon the Kings bodie, were his Crowne, his scepter, and the hand of Iustice, vpon a cushion of rich embroderie. The Kings bodie remained in the sayd chamber fifteene or sixteene dayes together, then was it carryed downe with great honour and ceremonie into the great lower Hall at the Louvre, beeing attended on by the Bishoppes, Prelates, and Noblemen of the Court.

Hall of honor. The sayd great Hall was hanged with the richest of the Kings Tapistrie, from the toppe to the bottome, and the pillars and planchers were covered. Along the sayd Hall there was a Gallerie on either side, for the comming in and going forth of Princes and Noblemen, which Galleries were covered with rich Tapistrie. At the vpper end B of the sayd Hall, there was a scaffold made with foure steppes, vpon the which was set a great bed-stead, couered with cloth of Gold, vpon the which the Kings Image (being made in waxe) was layd, hauing his hands ioyned together, and attired in his royall Roabes, with a Crowne vpon his head, the which did rest vpon a cushion of rich imbroderie. Vpon his Royall mantle was the Collar of the Order, and on either side, were layd the Royall Scepter, and the hand of Iustice, the Scepter on the right hand, and the hand of Iustice on the left.

Neere vnto the sayd Image were two Altars richly adorned, of either hand one, at that on the right hand was sung a Masse of Requiem in Musicke, and at the other were C sayd foure other great Masses: Ouer either Altar was a rich Canopie, and bewixt the Altars were many seats for Prelates and Religious men, who sung as in the fore-sayd chamber, and at the lower end of the Hall there were many other Altars richly adorned, where they sayd Masse. The sayd Image beeing made as like him as might be, was daily serued with meate to his table, by his Stewards, Sewers, Cup-bearers, Caruers, Almoner, and all other Officers, and all order was duly obserued, as if the deceased King had bene liuing, and then the meate was distributed vnto the poore. The one and twentieth of Iune, the sayd Image and hangings were taken away, and the sayd hall both top, sides and floore were hanged and couered with blacke cloath, and the body of the deceased King beeing in his coffin, was set in the place of the Image, couered with a paul D of blacke veluet, which hung downe to the ground, with a crosse of white fatten, and a cloth of State ouer it of blacke veluet: vpon the Kings coffin, were the Crown, the Collar of the Order, the Scepter, and the hand of Iustice. At the foot thereof was a great crosse of siluer, vpon a cushion, neere vnto the which were two great tapers burning continually, and a holy water-pot of siluer: on either side of which stood a Herald, the which were euery two houres releued by other of their companions which took their places. On the 25. of Iune, Lewis the 13. now raigning, dined in Longueville house, after dinner he was conducted with great state to the Louvre, to cast holy water vpon the body of the deceased K. his father, being accompanied by his brethren, who were carryed of either side of him, the Duke of Orleans on the right hand, and the D. of Aniou on the left. Neere vnto his Maiestie followed the Cardinals of Ioyeuze and Sourdy. E The King mourned in purple, hauing a very long traine, the which was carryed vpe by the Prince of Conty, the Earle of Soissons, the Duke of Guise, the Prince Ionuille, and the D. of Elbœuf: being followed by the Marshals of France, and the Knights of the Order. Many Bishops, Prelates, and Noblemen, and an infinit number of men of accompt, Ladies and Gentlewomen were in the sayd hall, attending the Kings comming, who hauing giuen holy water, retired himselfe into the Louvre. The next day the Iudges of the Court of Parliament at the rising of the Court, went also after their accustomed manner to the Louvre, to giue holy water, being followed by the Iudges of the chambers of Accompts and Aydes, the Generals of the money, and the whole body of Iustice, the Prouost of Paris, the Prouost of Marchants, and the Sherifes of the sayd city. F On the 28. day of the moneth, the 24. sworne Criers of the city, hauing commaundement giuen them, went with the Kings Armes on their breasts and backs, throughout all the streetes of Paris, to denounce the Conuoy and funerals of the deceased King,

King goes to cast holy water vpon his fathers bodie.

Order of the Kings going to the Louvre.

A crying out thus with a loude voice. Noble and deuout people, pray vnto God for the soule of the most high, most mighty, and most excellent Prince, Henry the great, by the grace of God, King of France and of Nauarre, most Christian, most venerable, most victorious, incomparable in magnanimity and clemency, who is dead in his palace of the Louvre, pray vnto God to receiue his soule. On Twelofday at two of the clocke in the afternoone, his Maiesties body shalbe taken vp to bee carryed to our Ladies Church in Paris, where the same day shalbe sayd an Euen-song for the dead, and the next day in the morning his seruice and accustomed prayers shalbe sayd, after which hee shalbe carryed to the Church at Saint Denis, to be interred in the Sepulcher of the Kings of France.

B On Twelofday the nine and twentieth day the streetes were hung with blacke, on either side from the Louvre to our Ladies Church, vpon the which were the Kings and the cities armes, one neere vnto an other, and at euery house a burning torch. About two of the clocke in the afternoone, the same day, the funerall began, after this manner. First marched the Capraines, Lieutenants and Ensignes of the Towne-house, with their gownes, swords by their sides, hoods and cornets, the archers and shot of the sayd towne-house, followed in their cassakes of collour imbrodred, and vpon it a mourning hood, beeing one hundred three score and twelue in number, going two and two, with their marches light, carrying their Harguebuses and Halberds bending towards the ground, all which were diuided into three bands.

The order of the conuoy to our Ladies Church.

After them followed the Orders of Churchmen: First marched the fathers Penitents of the third Order of Saint Francis, in number three score. Then followed the fathers of the third Order of Saint Lewis, being fife and forty. The Capets otherwise called the poore Schollers of the Colledge of Montagu three and thirty. The Capuchins in number foure score and three. The Minimes beeing sixty eight. The Franciscans in number two hundred twenty foure. The Iacobins one hundred and ninty. The Augustines to the number of an hundred. The Carmes fifty. The Feuillans thirty fife. Before all which Religious men were carried their crosses, and of either side of euery crosse were carried foure torches, against them was a Scutcheon with the deceased D Kings armes of either side.

Then marched fife hundred poore men in black gownes and hoods, with new hose and shoes, euery one carrying a burning torch with the deceased Kings armes before and behind. After whom followed the foure and twenty sworne cryers of Paris ringing their bells, hauing Scutchions on their breasts and backs. After them marched the Knight of the watch, with his Lieutenant in mourning gownes, and a truncheon in his hand, being followed by his company, in their cassakes, hauing tipets of black cloth vpon their shoulders, in the midst of the sayd company marched the Ensigne, dragging his collours vpon the ground, beeing couered with blacke cypres, the drums making a mournfull sound, being also couered with blacke. Then followed the Sargents of the Chastelet in long blacke gownes, and square caps, carrying blacke truncheons in their hands, being in number thirty. After them marched the Sargents of the Towne-house on the left hand, and those of the Chastelet on horse-backe of the right hand. Then followed the Notaries, Commisaries of the quarters, Proctors, and Aduocats of the Chastelet, in order, in their long mourning roabes, and square caps, on the right hand: And the Proctors, Deputies, Registers and Bourgeses of the towne on the left hand, beeing attired after the same manner. After them marched the Lieutenant Ciuill of the Chastelet on the right hand, and the Lieutenant Criminal on the left, being followed by the Councillors of the sayd Chastelet.

After whom marched the Priests, Curats and Religious men of most of the chief Churches in Paris, singing; and on the left hand went the Vniuersity, that is the Masters of Arts, Licentiats, heads of houses, Regents, Bachelors and Doctors of Physick, with their scarlet gownes and miter; the Doctors of the cannon and ciuill law, the Doctors of Diuinity of all Orders, the Bedels of the Vniuersity, and the Rector.

Then followed the sworne Messengers, after whom came the maister of the Ports, beeing 1610. beeing all in long gownes and hoods. Then came the Pages of the Stable, attired in A blacke serge. After whom marched the masters of the Haubois, Flutes, Musical instruments, Trumpets and Drummes couered with blacke, making a dolefull sound. Then followed Mounſieur De Creguy on the right hand, and Mounſieur Del' Eſcure on the left, beeing followed by the Captaines, Lieutenants and Enſignes of the Regiment of the Kings garde. After whom marched the great Prouost of the Kings house on horse-backe, wearing a mourning gowne with a long traine, hauing his Officers of either side him, and followed by his Lieutenants, Enſignes and Archers on foote, in blacke gownes and hoods, and their cassakes vpon them, carrying their Petronells and Halberds vnder their armes.

The captaine of the port of the Kings house, with his porters, hauing their imbodered cassakes and a mourning hood vpon it. Mounſieur De Merolles on the right hand, and Mounſieur De Bonillon, with Mounſieur De La Bourdesiere his Lieutenant, being followed by the captaine of the hundred Suisses of the body, attired in blacke water chamlet, and round caps of chamlet pleited, their ensigne being couered with blacke cypres.

After whom followeth Mounſieur de la Palus in the head of the two companies of two hundred Gentlemen of honour, beeing followed by the two ensignes, that of the Vidame of Mans on the right hand, and that of Mounſieur de la Bourdesiere on the left, all attired in blacke serge with tipets. Then marched the ordinary officers of the Kings house, to the number of an hundred and sixty: and after them came the Musicians, Physitions, Surgions, Groomes of the wardrobe, and of the deceased Kings chambers, every one apart. The Vsshers of the hall, with their heads bare: The Gentlemen Waiters, and Clarkes of the kitchen, on the right hand, on the left hand went the Generals of the money, of the Aydes, and of the Chamber of accompts. After them went eight trumpets in mourning weeds, their trumpets beeing couered with blacke cypres. Then came Mounſieur de Rhodes master of the ceremonies, who carried the Kings Penon.

The Chariot of armes couered with a great Paule of blacke veluet, hauing a crosse of white fatten, beeing enriched with foure and twenty great scutchions imbodered with the armes of France, was drawne by sixe great coursers, beeing also couered with blacke veluet downe to the ground with a crosse in the midst of white fatten, guided by two coach-men attired in blacke veluet, bare headed, and their hoods off. Then followed Beniamin the ryder, carrying the golden spurs: Betseze an other ryder came after him with the Gantlets: Pluuine carried after a Scutchion with the armes of France and Nauarre, and an other rider carried the coate of armes.

After all these came the first Quierrie, who carried the Helmet mantled with purple veluet, Semeè Flower de Lucs of gold, and lined with Ermines, and vpon the helme was a royall crowne, all couered with blacke cypres: all the riders which carried these peeces of honour, were on horse-backe, with long mourning gownes and hoods.

After these marched the Preachers, Confessors and Almoners of the deceased King. Then followed on foote seuteene Archbishops and Bishops, two and two, all with white miters, and blacke veluet coapes, after whom marched the Archbishop of Lions alone, and a good distance from the rest. Then went the Ambassadors of Sauoy, Venice and Spaine on horse-backe, in mourning gownes with long traines, every one beeing carried by sixe of their Officers, every of which Ambassadors was conducted by an Archbishop or a Bishop mounted vpon moyles.

After them came the Popes two Nuncios, the ordinary and the extraordinary, and of either side of them went the Archbishops of Aix and Ambrun, mounted vpon their moyles. Then followed the Cardinals of Ioyeuze and Surdy with their purple coapes and red hats, beeing also mounted vpon their moyles, and followed by their Officers.

After all these went the horse of honour, all couered with purple veluet, imbodered with Flower de Lucs of gold, and fringed about with gold, the saddle and stirrups were 1610. A were richly guilt; there was nothing to bee seene of the horse but the eyes; hee was led by either reine by two Squires, beeing a foote and their hoods on. Of either side of the sayd horse marched ten Heralds, in mourning gownes and hoods, hauing their coates of armes vpon their gownes imbodered with Flower de Lucs of gold.

Then followed the Maister of the horse, his horse being all couered with blacke veluet, and a great crosse of white fatten, carrying the royall sword in a scarfe, and a scabberd of purple veluet, richly imbodered with Flower de Lucs of gold.

After him came foureteene vsers of the Court of Parliament, with wands in their hands, and after them the Presidents and Councillors in their scarlet robes, beeing eighty nine in number. After whom went two Vsshers of the Chamber with their Mases, being bare headed, and then followed the Bishop of Paris, and the Bishop of Angers on his left hand, with their Miters, surplises and Coapes of blacke veluet. Then followed the Kings Image in the same honour as it was lying in the great hall at the Louvre, holding in his right hand the Royall scepter, and in his left the hand of Iustice, beeing carried by the porters of salt in Paris: About which Image went many Presidents and Councillors of the great chamber, and the Scottish garde. The ground of the canopie was of purple cloth of tiffue, all imbodered with flower de Lucs, and fringed with gold, the which was carried by the Prouost of Marchants, and the Sheriffes of the city of Paris.

After which came the Earle of Saint Paul, carrying the Lord Stewards staffe, representing the Earle of Soylons, Lord Steward of France, on the right hand, and the Cheualier of Guise, representing the Duke of Esquillon, great Chamberlaine, carrying the banner of France on the left hand, being mounted vpon great coursers, couered with blacke veluet, with crosses of white fatten.

The Prince of Contry marched after them, vpon a little horse all couered, hauing a mourning gowne with a long traine, and vpon it the collour of the Order; his traine was carried vp by seuen gentlemen.

The Earle of Soylons followed him, beeing also on horse-backe, attired in the like habit, and with the order. After whom came the Dukes of Guise and Elbeuf on horse-backe in the same weed, but without the Order: the Duke of Elperton followed them, in the same mourning attire, and with the Order, and then came the Duke of Montbazon, with the same order and habit; their traines were carried vp by Gentlemen which attended them. Then followed the Vssher of the Order, carrying a blacke wand in his hand, being in his mourning gowne, and his hood off. After the Princes and Dukes came the Knights of the Order on foote, with their collours vpon their mourning gownes, their traines were carried vp by their pages. And then followed a great number of the Nobility in order two and two: After whom came the twelue Pages of the Chamber, attired in blacke veluet, and caps. And last of all marched the captaines of foure hundred Archers of the Kings garde, with their ensignes, being followed by all the Archers of the sayd gardes, carrying their armes to the ground, they hauing gownes and hoods.

Before they came from the Louvre, there was some difference betwixt some great men, the Court of Parliament, and the Scottish garde, but the Queenes wisdom and foresight did pacifie all without brute. This is the order which was held from the Louvre to our Ladies Church, the way they went was ouer the new bridge along the Augustines kaie, and then ouer Saint Michaells bridge, to the new market, and so to our Ladies Church, into the which they entred at nine of the clocke at night.

The bodie of the deceased King was set in the midst of the Quier of the sayd Church, vnder a burning chappell, the which was made of the heigh of two pikes (it was so called, for that it had an infinite number of waxe candles that were continually burning on it): The Quier of the aforesayd Church was hanged round about with blacke cloth, and in the midst of the sayd cloth was a band of veluet, on the which there were fastened Scutchions of the Kings armes, within two foote one

Our Ladies Church hanged.

1610. of an other. The great bodie of the sayd Church, was also hung in like manner, and all along were two rankes of waxe tapers, and the same night Euenfong and Vigile for the dead was sayd.

The next day in the morning, beeing the last day of Iune, the Princes, Cardinalls, Noblemen and Officers of the crowne, the Court of Parliament, the Conuents, Parishes and all those that had accompanied the Kings bodie the daie before, came vnto our Ladies Church, about tenne of the clocke in the morning, whereas diuine seruice was sayd by the Bishop of Paris. After the offering the Bishop of Sees made the funerall Oration, the which continued a good houre. The seruice beeing done about two of the clocke in the afternoone, the Princes, Cardinalls, Bishops and all the chiefe men went to dine in the Bishops palace, and thereabouts, where preparation was made for them.

In the meane time the first beganne to march euery one in his first ranke and order, as they had done the daie before, from the Louvre vnto the sayd Church: they went ouer our Ladies bridge, and so through Saint Denis streete, and withour any staie, vntill they came to Saint Denis in France. The streetes from our Ladies Church vnto Saint Denis gate were hanged on either side with blacke. Vpon the which were fixed the Kings armes, and those of the cittie, about an elle distant one from the other.

The Religious men, Curates of Parishes, with the Fathers confessors, Almoners, Bachelers, Regents of the Vniuersitie, and Doctors of Diuinity, did accompany the Kings bodie through the cittie, in their order, vnto the Church of Saint Ladre, which is in Saint Denis subarbes, and then most of them retired, and left the bodie, the which was accompanied by the whole Court, his Officers, the Court of Parliament, the Princes, Dukes, Earles, Noblemen, Gentlemen, Capitaines, Gardes and Archers, and by the Chanoins of our Ladies Church, vnto the crosse which is in the mid way of Saint Denis, where the Prior and Religious men of Saint Denis came to receiue the body. There the Priests of all the parishes departed; and the Princes, Cardinalls, Bishops, Dukes, Earles, Noblemen, with all the Kings court, the court of Parliament and Officers attended the bodie vnto Saint Denis Church, where it was laied vnder a burning chappell, and there were Vigiles and Suffrages sayd for the dead.

The Church of Saint Denis was all hanged both bodie and quier with black cloth, and in the midst of it there was a large band of blacke veluet, vpon the which were Scutchions with the Kings armes fixed. The high masse was celebrated by the Cardinall of Ioyeuze, and answered in musicke: After the offering the Bishop of Angers made a funerall Oration. The offices beeing ended, and the accustomed prayers sayd, the Maister of the ceremonies tooke vp from the Kings bodie, the crowne, the scepter, and the hand of Iustice, which lay vpon it, and withall the coverings of cloath of gold: Then the Gentlemen Waiters and the Archers carried the bodie into the vault, which is before the high Altar of the sayd Church, vpon the right hand. Then came the Cardinall vnto the vault, and cast earth vpon the bodie, and the last holie water, which done hee sat downe on the one side of the sayd vault, by the high Altar, and the Maister of the ceremonies of the other; Betwixt both stood a Herald, who called the Noblemen and Gentlemen, which had carried the peeces of honour, one after one, the which beeing brought by them, were cast into the vault.

This done, the Earle of Saint Paul strooke the Lord Stewards staffe against the ground, and sayd in a low voice. The King is dead. Then the sayd Herald taking the word, cryed out three times, The King is dead, The king is dead, The king is dead, pray all vnto God for his soule. Then all fell vpon their knees, with teares in their eies.

Soone after, the sayd Earle of Saint Paul, tooke his staffe againe, and sayd, God saue the king, and then the Herald tooke the word, and cryed out thrice, God saue the king Lewis the thirteenth of that name, by the grace of God king of France and of Navarre, the most Christian, our most Soueraigne Lord and good Maister, to whom God giue a most happy

A happy and long life. Which hauing sayd, the trompets drummes, phifes, hautbois and flutes began to sound. After which euery one of the Noblemen and Gentlemen tooke againe the peeces of honour which they had laide into the vault, and the Princes and cheefe of the Nobility were conducted into the great Hall, where the funerall feast was prepared for their dinner. Euery one hauing dyned the Presidents and Councillors of the Court Parliament, of the Chamber of accounts, of aydes, generalls of the mony, Magistrats of the city of Paris, and other officers, came into the said Hall, where, as the Earle of Saint Paule holding his staffe in his hand, made a short speech vnto them touching the Kings death, to whom hee offred his seruice, promising to recommend them vnto the King now raigining, to maintaine them in their offices and estates. And in token that his place was also voide, he brake his staffe in their presence.

There were many funerall Orations made in diuers parts vpon this lamentable subject, euery one struiuing to descouer the greefe of his soule, by the eloquence of his tongue, among which I haue made choyce of one, as followeth.

C A Funerall discourse, made vpon the death of the deceased King, by the Bishop of Sees cheefe Almoner to the Queene.

MY minde is so opprest with horror, so wounded with greefe and so troubled with amazement (be it for the feeling of present things, or the apprehension of future) as I know not what bounds to giue my thoughts in their amazement, nor what rule to my words in their complaint: being vnable to gouerne the one by the lawes of iudgement, nor the other by those of rethorique.

Shall the miserable point of a vild and base knife, handled by an enraged Monster, inspired rather with a Diuell then a reasonable soule, bee hereafter ordayned tratorously to murder the greatest Monarkes of the earth? and that which the condition of a man should hold most reuerent, as well by the institution of God, as by the consent of nations, shall it hereafter be exposed, not to the fury of some great and fearefull enemy, who by the lawes of his victorious sword, shal barbarously depriue him both of life and state, but to the frenzy of the most abiect and cōtemptible vagabond, which lurkes amonge the scumme of the people: so as by wicked perswasions, or by cursed illusions, he may be drawne to this impious resolution, to giue his life, so as he may take away that of a great Potentate, and to ruine himselfe so as hee may ruine him withall. O lamentable age which doest belold such accidents! O cursed earth which doest produce such monsters!

It is almost one and twenty yeares since our late King Henry the third, after so many great and famous victories which this realme owes to the happinesse of his sword, when as the prosperity of his affaires was ready to open him the gates of Paris, being al that time rebelled against his Lawes, and to settle him in the Throne of his fathers, from whence the fury of his people nad in a manner delected him, was miserably slaine in his Cabinet, by the vilanous knife of an infamous petty humaine fury, who to haue access vnto this religious Prince, vsed (as a passport throughout the whole army) the name and habit of a religious man. We did not thinke the Sunne should euer see the like, as I thinke it had neuer seene, but wee did imagine that as this parricide had noe president, so it should finde noe imitation: but behold (wretches that wee are) at the ende of twenty reuolutions of yeares, wee finde our selues plunged in the

the same gulfes of sorrowes, and confusion of affaires, that wee were then: and by the A like accident, and in a maner the like murtherer reduced by the blow of a knife, no lesse contemptible then the other, to the like or greater dispaire, and to more lamentable miseries, our losse being so much the more greivous, as the wife and mild gouernment of our last Prince, with the disposition of the affaires, made his life more necessary for this Estate, and the parricide so much the more detestable, as this good King hauing wronged no man, and receyued so many; but rather bound all the world vnto him by his bounty, and shewed his power rather in pardoning and sauing, then in punishing and destroying: for which reason hee should not bee hated of any one, but of such (if there bee any such) whome good deeds incite to doe ill, and of whome to haue well deserued, is a sufficient subiect to be hated. I pray you what can bee obserued in the life B of this Prince, where they haue seene his indignation employ the severity of the publike sword to reueng any priuat iniury of his owne? what hath he euer done fence his like sword to reueng any priuat iniury of his owne? change by a royall Metamorphosis, with the Charmes of his bounty, his very enemies to faithfull seruants? as well to suppress their hatred by good vsage, as their power by the force of his armes, and by his free confidence to binde the faith of the most faithlesse to serue him, loyally? without doubt I doe not finde that euer Prince did equall him in this, whose life doth not rather serue him as a lustre to make his glory shine the more, then of compaision to shew any equality. Wee haue heard him some-times say that hee would make his gards vnecessary, shewing by his words the confidence which the remembrance C of his mild actions gaue him. Alasse poore Prince! thou hast done it: thou hast made the care of thy gards fruitlesse: and euen that which thou didst royally vante of, we doe now lament bitterly: It succeeded ill for thee, for if thou hadest not refused the faithfull seruice of their ordinary assistance when as the unhappinesse of France did seeme to lead thee to that cursed and farall street, the which thy death hath for euer made odious vnto vs, we should rather now haue bene troubled to sing thy victories, then to wepe for thy lamentable death: and rather busied to erect Trophæes for thee, then to prepare thee a monument and funerall pompe. But who would not in a manner say that the euent of things which are called contingent and casuall (for that they seeme so to them which know not the motiues) are tyed to their first causes, with such chaines D of necessity, as it is almost impossible for the wit of man to auoyd them, either by the counsell of any other, or by his owne prouidence? no man is ignorant but that this miserable accident was enigmatically fore-told him by the inspection of his particular Horoscope, almost at the same time when it happened. His most deere did aduertise him; the most learned in that art besought him to haue a care of him-selfe: the mournfull dreame which some few daies before the Queene his faithfull Spouse had had lying by his side, and awaking sodenly with the terror of her vision, was also a speaking Image of his future misfortune, which should haue serued him as an Oracle to make him more carefull of his preferuation, if the courage of this Prince had bene capable of amazement, and if hee had had for him-selfe the thousand part of the iust feare E which did afflict us continually.

But as nothing can assure a Hare, so nothing can amaze a Lyon. The memory of his royall actions, and the consideration of his mildnesse, whereby hee bound all the world to loue him, made all such attempts incredible vnto him. He did rather cast the eye of his thoughts vpon his owne bounty, then vpon an others wickednesse. It was Cæsar which would neither giue credit to his wife Spurina, nor to his faithfull Calphurnia, and it seemes he must of necessity imitate his disaster, as hee had imitated his clemency and vallor. wherefore in our complaints we accuse him to haue procured his owne death by the refusall of his Gards, and in a manner condemning him as culpable, we grow passionate against him for whome we are oppress with passions: yet in the end, looking with the eyes of Iudgement vpon this first mouer of all our fortunes, who by the rauishment of his incomprehensible course, drawes all after him, what resistance soeuer they seeme to make, we doe presently absolue him of the fauour which in

A in thew hee gaue vnto this detestable Paricide, and accuse onely our owne offences, which deserued this punishment, and the tormenting treachery of that internall monster, whom the unhappinesse of this Realme had made choise of, to execute so brutish and barbarous a murther; For as Saint Jerome saith wel; Cursed is he who for his vices meritts to be the executioner of wicked and fatal actions, as by the instrument of cursednesse it selfe.

And what act can bee imagined, more wicked, more fatal, and more cursed, then traitorously to murther his owne King? His lawfull Prince? His visible God on earth? Whom the Soueraigne King of Kings hath himselfe anointed by the hand of his Ministers, at the foot of his Altars, to make him as it were the Lieutenant of all his power amongst men, and the humane Image of his diuine Maiesty? But can their bee any found so wicked as to make this proposition disputable? Hath it not bene decided by the mouth of the Holy Ghost, in the decrees of the Law of Grace? Our Saviour as man, and the sonne of Dauid was the true King of Iury, as well as King of the whole world by his diuinity: So as it it had pleased him to re-establish his temporall Kingdome, the Gouernors of Iury had bene but his Lieutenants: And yet when hee was vniuistly accused before Pilate, hee refused not his Iudgement, neither did hee tell him that hee did vsurpe vpon him (becing the true Prince and Maiestate) an vnlawfull and tiranous power: But hee onely answered him in milde and respectiue termes. C Thou shouldest haue no power ouer mee, if it were not giuen thee from aboue. And Saint Paul besides the commaundement which he giueth vs to obey our Princes and Lords, although they be bad, hauing by chance offended in words, the High Priests of the Iewes, and being aduertized thereof, he answered, condemning himselfe, Brethren, I did not know that it was the High Priest; for it is written, thou shalt not speake ill of the Prince of the people. How then? If it be not tollerable to speake ill of our Princes, shall it bee lawfull to murther them? And not with the publike sword, which sometimes a generall rebellion of subiects against their Kings, puts into the hand of a furious multitude; but with the dagger or knife of any desperate madde man, who imagining that hee is chosen of God for such an enterprize, will of his owne motion make D him selfe Iudge, Accuser, and Executioner, altogether, of him, whom hee should not looke on but with trembling, or at the least with the reuerence which is due vnto the liuely Image of the monarke of all the world. And I pray you what wilbe the end if it shalbe lawfull for euery priuate man, not onely to censure the actions, but the very intentions of his Prince, and holding them reprehensible, not before any other tribunall but himselfe, and his owne fancy, to vsurpe insolently a commission to punish him, as if hee were some new Iehu, secretly anointed by the hand of a Prophet, to reuenge the sinnes of Achab, and to raigine in his place? Oh wretched and most cursed are they which by such maxims incourage weake and superstitious soules to such wicked and damnable resolutions, and who vnder a shadow of piety, make them dare things E so monstrosly impious. But it may be I declaime against an opinion, which is not approved by any one in France, and that his bretheren, who they say did tow in other countries, and vnder another heauen, like an accursed graine of hell, doe abhor, condemn & detest it. As without all doubt it is detestable, and the booke which seemes to confirme it, worthy to burne the band of the Author in his owne flame, as a damnable infant which should punish his father for giuing him life. For although he speakes not of any but tyrants, the which doth nothing concerne our Kings, being the true lawfull and iust Princes of this Estate, yet doth he giue vnder this proposition (most wicked of it selfe) a silent praise of a murther like vnto that which wee now lament: And who knowes not that to commend an action, is secretly to periwade the like?

F Moreover from this Maxime which doth onely concerne tyrants, may bee drawne most wicked and dangerous conclusions. For if hee hold it for certaine that it is lawfull for any man to kill a tyrant, what Prince liuing, how lawfull soeuer, can be hereafter assured of his life in the midst of his gards, and in his chaire of State. The greatest Monarkes doe, they as soone as they are Kings, change their humane and lawfull nature 1610. nature into one that is diuine, perfect, and not subiect to sinne, and shall they neuer more commit error which may in any sort scandalize their subiects? No, no, they are still men in imperfection, although they seeme gods in power: Neither doth greatness, which giues them more meanes to sinne, take from them the desire. And will there not bee alwaies found, some extrauagant spirit in their Prouinces, who censuring their faults, it may be, more bitterly then hee ought, will araigne them in his fancy, giue them his imaginations for soueraigne Iudges, will conuict them to bee tyrants, and as such will seeke to murder them, if hee can come nere them? Yes without doubt, there wilbe alwaies some one found; And this venemous seed will still finde some soyle to make it fructifie especially if they crowne so desperat an enterprize with praises, if they propound the recompence of an eternall and future life, to those who to execute it, loose the present and mortall life, and yet they call the punishment of such murders Martirdome, communicating vnto murderers and Parricides, the glory of Saints, and of the blessed Champions of our faith.

Wherefore oh all you Kings and Princes of the earth, which shall heare the report of this horrible assassinate! you haue an interest in this lamentable accident, whether that you loue vs, or bee our enemies, or hold vs indifferent, and the murder of our Prince should fil you with horror and amazement for your selues; there being not any one of you, whom the same knife by the which this great Monarke receiued death, doth not threaten with the like aduerture: when as neither the innocency of his life, the glory of his actions, the wonders of his valor, his mildnesse, bounty, freedome, piety, liberality, wisdom, and all other royall vertues, shall not shroud and protect any one, against the impious presumption of the like frenzy. For if we shal distinctly measure all the actions of his life, by the compasse and particular rule of euery one of the vertues which I named; I assure my selfe that in some hee shalbe found without equal, in others without a superior, and in al without a second. And to begin by the innocency of his life (I alwaies except those fraile and humane sinnes, which make the most iust culpable before God) can they iustly reproch him, that hee hath against reason attempted against the life, honor or goods of any one of his subiects. Did he euer take away any mans wife by force? And hath it euer bene scene that by his incontinency, as by that of many other Princes, the beauty of Ladies hath bene mortal and fatal to their husbands? The delights of a goodly house did neuer cost the Masters life? and during his raigne hath there bene found a new Quintus Aurelius, or a second Naboth, which haue accused their goodly vines and farmes to bee the causes of their death? His greatest choller and indignation against any one, was it euer made a crime against them whom he hath most hated? No, no, but contrariwise that royall soule which had nothing in it but fealing and courage, seemed to faile in reuenge: and although that offences and seruices did equally touch him, yet had hee no memory but for the last.

As for his valor, whosoever holds it vulgar and ordinary, after so many proofes which he hath giuen within these twenty yeeres, hee hath had neither eyes nor eares, or else mallice and enuy hath made him stop them. I will not therefore come to examples, as if I treated of a thing that were vnknowne or disputable. France doth proclaim it sufficiently by the eternall memory of so many combats, so many encounters, and so many townes besieged. Wee will produce new testimonies, when his owne enemies shall cease to confesse it: we will extoll him with new praises, when euen those whom hee hath vanquished shall forbear to preach it: and finally wee will note them particularly, when as Arques, Yury, Fontaine-Françoise, Aumale, Noion, and many other Theaters of his glory, that is to say, when as the mountaines, vallies, fields, rampars of the townes, and in a manner all the corners of France shall cease to witnesse it. But I thinke it now as superfluous to produce testimonies, as it is impudent, F iniust and mallicious to doubt of it.

I will say the like of his clemency: for as the fields couered with dead bodies were the proofes of his valour, in like manner, so many townes preserved from sacke and 1610. A and spoile, during the greatest furie of his victorious armes, are and shalbe for euer the monuments of his mildnesse and bounty. But this needes no more confirmation of proofes then his valour: they are both without contestation, as well as without comparison. His vanquished enemies confesse the one, and his subiects preferred witnesse the other. The acts of the one haue bene in a manner alwaies signed with blood, the actes of the other, haue bene most commonly with teares of ioy, and pittie: as if hee had receiued as great pleasure to pardon, as glorie to vanquish: and as if to raise vp with an vnarmed hand, an enemy lying prostrate, after the combate, were as royall as to ouerthrow him valiantly with his sword in fighting.

I know well there may be one action in his life noted, wherein his clemency hath as it were suspended her ordinarie effects, to giue way to the seuerity of his Iustice: but the griefe which hee seemed to haue in his soule, that he could not without danger, extend vpon the accused, the golden rod of his grace, and making compensation of his offences with his seruices, pardon his error, the loue of his valour, doth witnesse sufficiently that he was forced therevnto, by the authority of the Lawes which he desired to see in force by reason of state which did oppose against his mercy; and by that wise Maxime which sayth, that there is nothing more dangerous then to bring a great courage to the place of execution, and then draw him back: for that he doth alwaies remember the affront, and forgets the pardon.

As for his confidence and trust; Alas! we haue but too many proofes; and I would C to God this vertue had not bene so great in him: It is that which hath vndone vs, for that he hath thereby vndone himselfe. We reuerence the memory of all his other perfections, but doubtlesse wee may iustly hate the remembrance and proofes of this: why was hee not more distrustfull? Why did hee not feare like vnto other Princes, who hold that a moderate distrust is one of the partes of wisdom? Did hee thinke to bee alwaies with his sword in his hand in the midst of combates, where it is a crime (at the least for Cæsars) to shew any feare? Not to feare is a great perfection in batailles, to assure his owne souldiers, and to strike terror into his enemies: for feare is contrary to all other things: onely they which haue it not, may giue much. D But yet this vertue, as all other, must be restrained within the center of mediocrity, being equally distant from her extremes. It is as great an error not to feare any thing, as to feare euery thing: and without doubt by too much confidence, men are made too bold.

In the meane time wee doe not forbear to commend this vertue in him, although wee doe now complaine, for that hee did grounde it, neither vpon his valour, nor vpon his power, neither vpon the care of his seruants, nor vpon the ranks of armes which did enuiron him hourly: but vpon the onely protection, safegarde and fauour of him, who can preferue the sillie Sheepe amongst rauinous and deuouring Volues, and can make Lions stand in feare of Hares. As on a time E falling vpon that discourse, and we seeming to wish that he wold not so lightly expose himselfe, and that in fearing some-what more, he should giue vs lesse subiect to feare. Hee answered vs with the words of the two and twentieth Psalme. The Lord is the light which guides mee, and my helth, what should I feare &c. according to the instruction which he had learned from his infancy.

As for his pietie, the life which hee had lead from his infancy, being in a manner borne and nurst in armes, was the cause hee could not make it so apparent to the sight of the world, as it is great and visible to our God. But yet I will say, without flattery, that I did neuer see warrior, that was more religious being not ceremonious; who seeking not the outward shew, had more of the effects. Such as did obserue his F life and actions more strictly then my selfe, know well, and doe witnesse it; that hee seldome drest himselfe, before hee had humbly made his praier vpon his knees, sometimes briefly, but yet his zeale did recompence the shortnesse: sometimes with a longer praier, which did not abate his zeale.

This did he often at night, offering to God by this meanes, the first fruites, and the remainder of the day. For my part, I haue seene him sometimes Masse beeing ended, and when as all men were risen, to continue at his prayers vpon his knees, with such signes of true pietie, as I was in a manner ashamed for vs who should haue beene an example to him, and not hee to vs. And to say that it was a fained hypocricie, the humour of this Prince farre from dissembling, both by nature and custome, would make this slander incredible. I spare to speake of other publike testimonies of his zeale to Christian religion, for that they are well knowne to all the world; as well those by the which hee hath newly rayled from their ashes, and more richly endowed many Churches that were ruined; as those by the which hee hath caused the standard of the B crosse to be freely worshiped in Constantinople, and in this Babilon of all the Turkish Empire, the perpetuall sacrifice foretold by Malachie, to be celebrated. But I will not conceale that when as hee gaue Bishoprikes to such as hee held capable, hee recommended vnto them with great care the duties of their charges: the pastorall care of their flockes, the preaching of the word of God, an exemplary life, extirpation of abuses, and other holy Episcopall duties, which hee sayd were the onely meanes to ruine heresie insensibly, rather vndermyning it secretly then to secke to beat it downe by open violence.

Neither will I conceale how carefull hee was to inquire if any one gone astray were newly returned to the Catholike Church; and how ioyfull hee was to vnderstand that any one of worth had therein followed his example. For although hee would not haue any one forced, no more then hee could indure to bee himselfe; yet hee tooke great delight to vnderstand; that reason had done that in any one, which the threats of fire and sword, had attempted in vaine at the massacre of Saint Bartholomew: Thinking that the surest meanes to draw one vnto God, was by the care vnto the heart, and that the sweetnesse of perswasions should be the onely violence.

What shall I say of liberality, the which of all his vertues hath beene least recommended in him? Those which haue a hand with the greatest in the gouernment of publike affaires, and especially of the treasure, will be witnesses with mee, that aswell in pensions as in free gifts, he gaue really euery yeere three hundred thousand pounds sterling, dispersed here and there vpon an infinite number of persons, like vnto the Jewes Manna ouer al the people of Israel. Was not this to giue? What King of France did euer exceed him, howsoeuer hee were reputed to bee another Alexander in liberality? Without doubt I doe not thinke that there is any Prince or Monarke liuing that can equall him in this bounty.

And why then hath hee not beene esteemed for this vertue aswell as for the glory of the rest? It is as I conceiue, for that an infinite number of men hauing assisted him in the conquest of his owne Realme, with their meanes, persons, tongues, pens, authority and industry, and finally with all that their condition did permit, and euery one imagining that this Prince was bound vnto him for part of his crowne: the greatest part of E them held his free gifts for iust payments and recompences due vnto them: wherevpon many being lesse thankfull vnto him then they ought, and on the other side many being not recompenced nor rewarded, who notwithstanding held themselves to be aswell deseruing as those that were gratified, and by consequence held there good vsage to bee a priuat wronge done vnto them: whereby it happened that most of them that receiued spake not any thing, and such as receiued not, complained bitterly: whence grew in my opinion that fame so contrary to his effects, and that imputation so maliciously repugnant to the truth. But such as would curiously search into the truth, and not vnto that which was spoken, they shall find that in this perfection hee hath shewed himselfe as it were superior to himselfe, in regard of his other more eminent vertues: At the least in this point hee hath beene superior to all the Kings now F liuing vpon the earth.

Also he neuer had knowledge of any excellent man within his Realm, especially being recommended for the glory of his learning, who he did not fauor with some honest pension:

A pension; and the rather if hee had a penne which might make the fame and honour of his actes liue eternally; for as hee loued to doe things commendable and praise worthy, so hee desired to bee praised. Wherefore such as he found to haue golden pens, hee made their condition to bee of gold: neither had the Vniuersity of Paris euer a more iust subiect to hope for a resurrection, if I may so terme it, of the glory which shee hath some-times had in the world, as shee should promise vnto her during his raigne; and by his bountie, by the desire which wee saw him haue to build and enrich great Colledges, whereas Schollers might bee freely taught, and the Schoole-masters haue good entertainments: besides the publike Chaires filled with excellent men, whom with rich conditions hee desired to call from all partes of the B world.

But in the meane time Alas! so many rare vertues which did shine in him like goodly starres in their mansions, haue not hindred but that the wretched fortune of France hath found an infernall monster among men, who without any respect of royall Maiesty, had no horror to murder him traitrouly, to precipitate at an instant this Estate from the toppe of glorie, greatnesse and power, wherevnto the wisdom and valour of so great a monarke had raised it, into a gulf of totall ruine, or at the least into a Chaos of an immortall confusion of affaires. For what could bee lesse expected from so sodaine and terrible a clappe, but the totall ruine of the bodie, whose C head was so miserably taken away, what wisdom soeuer shine in the discreet moyetie which hee hath left behinde him, to hold his place for a time, and to represent him during the minority of the King his sonne? Certainly it is the iust effect of humane providence, that wee feare it: but in that it happens not; it is the mercy and grace of God: besides the wise gouernment of so vertuous a Queene, and the fidelitie of the great Princes of France: But by the wise gouernment of the one, and the Royall obedience of the other, both lightned with the beames of a wife and faithfull Councell, this blow which should haue ruined vs all, hath but afflicted vs desperately; and for floods of blood which should haue flowed, the wrath of heauen is contented with streames of teares.

D No, no, execrable fury, who by so detestable a murder, hast brought vs to the brinke of our preceps, vaunt not insolently in hell, that thou hast ruined the Empire of the French, as thou hadest propounded vnto thy selfe, hauing murdered the Father and the Prince.

Thou hast indeed shaken it, but in despite of thy impious hope it shall subsist forever by the assistance of God, great, happie, triumphant, rich, mighty and glorious, alwaies the feare of our enemies, the honour of Europe, the hope of her Allies, the wonder of strangers, and the protector of the Church, aswell as the eldest sonne. Such as thought (with thee) to see her glorie for euer laied in the graue, shall not see it at this time but a little infirme and sicke for griefe, for the death of her father: But after E this mourning past, which habit shee weares by thy treacherie, shee shall resume her former beauty and force, and shall raigne as before either triumphing in warre, or flourishing in peace, like vnto those solide Triangles which stand right with one point vpward howsoeuer you turne them. I doe presage it both by this marke of heauenly fauour, which doth shine like vnto a fortunate starre vpon the fore-head of our new Prince, and by the incredible tranquillity of the state, which the wisdom and care of the Queene, his vertuous mother, and our wise Regent, hath made suddenly to succeed the preparatiues of so great and cruell a storme. Wherefore burne more then euer in the eternall flames which torment thee, with an iraged dispight to see thy hopes frustrate, accursed soule that thou art, who didest promise vnto thy selfe to ruine so great a F Kingdome, in ouerthrowing the pillar of her greatnesse, and hath executed but one of the two: Our God suffering the one for our finnes, but preserving vs from the other for his glorie.

And you oh wife Princeesse! whose happie wisdom doth in a manner keepe the publike from sealing of this losse, and makes vs iustly to say that our deceased King liues Vvvvv 3

1610. liues in our Queene Regent as not able to die whilst that you are liuing: continue A great Artemisa, continue as you haue happily begun, to entertaine by good order this great body of the Estate in his disposition and former helth; not suffering bad humors to ingender, for want of precautions, which in the end may cause some burning feuer of sedition. Entertaine this wonderfull calme which raignes by your conduct vpon the waues of so great a sea of publike affaires, and of different passions, as they bee which wee may imagine should proceed from the flowing and ebbing of so many people subiect to your obedience, and especially of so many great men which doe assist you, who most commonly are carried away with contrary respects. Imagine I beseech you, Imagine that great monarke (who to raigne elsewhere in a more happy Empire, hath assigned vnto you his Scepter and his Crowne, to the end you B should preferue it for the King his sonne) saies vnto you, as comming from heauen, to comfort you in your cares, and to fortifie you in your glorious trauell; My deere Moyetie, seeing that death hath seperated vs, touching the corporall vnion, it is a great content vnto mee, to see thee with such happy successe beginne to hold my place in the throne of this Kingdome. I see thee gouerne thy selfe so wisely, as I cannot wish more for the good of my sonne and my subiects, but that in this part of gouernement thou wilt bee alwaies equall vnto thy selfe. Cause the King my sonne to bee bread vp in the loue and feare of God, rather then in all humane sciences, holding it for certaine, that in seruing God humbly, hee shall command men ab- C solutely. Doe what you can to procure him peace, vntill that a more manlike age, shall suffer him to doe that, which his infancy doth yet seeme to forbid him. Peace gathers treasure together, warre disperseth it: and it is no small meanes to make a Prince to bee feared, and to retaine his neighbours from attempting against him, to bee reputed to haue his cofers full of gold and siluer, as well as his storehouses full of armes. Continue this course which I see thee take, not to determine any thing of importance, but in Councell, and to assist their daylie, force the naturall delicacie of thy sexe, forgetting in a manner that thou art a woman, to support the trauelles of a man bread vp in the toyles of affaires, and to put off the person of a Queene to assume that of a King.

Yet vse a moderation in thy continuall care, and so labour in these Royall vocations, as thou maist long labour in them: for thy life is alwaies more necessarie for France, then thy daillie presence is for the Councell. I haue held great men tied to the yoke of my obedience as much by benefits and good vsage, as they themselues are retained by consideration of their duties, and my authoritie. Perseuer as much as you may to follow my steppes in this course, vsing these meanes as a coyn of such price, as for it they giue that which is inestimable, that is to say, life: and remember that thou doest command Frenchmen, that is to say, freemen, to whom a good countenance doth often serue in steed of recompence, but yet in the end they fall off, if the field of their hopes brings forth nothing but flowers, this good Iudgement which B God hath giuen thee, will make thee knowe (as I see the experience) how farre Royall greatnesse, should admit of easie access, and the familiarity which the French doe commonly desire of their Prince. For doubtlesse as to much austerity is the losse of loue, so to much familiarity makes them to neglect respect: vse it then as wisdom shall aduise thee; but about all things seeke by all possible meanes to ease the people, and to haue the lesse subiect to leauy money draw thy selfe as little as may be into necessity to spend: To the end that being first blest of God, and then of men, thou maist reape more happy fruites of the prayers which I make incessantly in heauen, for thy prosperity, for that of my sonne and of the whole Realme.

Thinke I say Madam, that this great Prince doth some times in your dreame make such or the like exhortations vnto you. Although it bee a rashnesse in vs to F presume to put you in minde by fained wordes and conceptions, of one part of that which either the Oracle of his mouth, or the wise discourses of your excellent spirit doth speake vnto your thoughts.

But

A But pardon (if it please you) our zeale, which makes vs erre by a desire of well doing, and that falling vpon the lamentable subiect to witnesse the vertues, greatnes, and glorie of that incomparable Monarch, we had rather stammer then be silent, and rather faile in the lawes of discretion then in those of affection. I haue receiued from his grace and liberalitie, and partly by your intercession, the liuings and Ecclesiasticall dignities which I enjoy: his bounry did esteeme my writings much about their merit: and his greatnes did not disdayne to looke vpon me sometime with a good eye: how then could my remembrance moderate my words in blessing him, or my teares in lamenting him? Without doubt I haue as great cause to weepe for him, as any man of my profession, if complaints should be proportionable to the losse which is made: but I protest
B it is not mine owne priuate interest that makes me thus bitterly to lament him, so much as the consideration of the generall harme, which not onely France, but all Europe hath sustained by this lamentable losse.

And therefore when as to performe the generall offices of our duty, wee entred into the Chamber where as his body lay pitifully in the Hearse that did inuiron him, mee thought that all the walles of his Pallace, yea all the valleys and fields thereabouts, should accompany with their sad accents, the sound of our mournfull songs, and that all the holy water wherewith we did sprinkle the foot of his mortuarie sheet, should bee composed of our teares. For we haue not onely lost a good King, but a good master, C and not onely a good master, but a good father, whose remembrance is vnto our harts, as myrrh is vnto bodies which it imbalmes, incorruptible, but wonderfully bitter. Alas, how can it be but bitter vnto vs, seeing it puts vs in mind of his name, which was so sweet: seeing that putting vs in mind of his perfections, and making vs to see how necessarie he was for vs, it doth shew vs by consequence how miserable wee are to haue lost him, conuerting by these meanes his vertues into sorrow; his happines into despaire; and his owne good deeds into sad subiects of complaints, not suffering vs to remember them, or binding vs to sigh for them? No, no, it is not possible but for such to whom his vertues were indifferent (if there be any such vpon the earth) to remember them without teares, either of eyes or heart, it is in vaine in this case to obiect constan-D cie, and the lawes of reason: Constancy may in other subiects be a vertue, but in this I hold it for a vice, at the least an insensibility: the reasons which I should admit in other accidents, should seeme to me in these vnreasonable Paradoxes, and the consolations which I should hold in other losses for morall Sentences, should appeare vnto mee in this case Blasphemies. For what can be sayd vnto vs herein, to comfort and fortifie vs against sorrow, the which hath not alreadie represented it self vnto our thoughts without fruite? What, that he was mortall like to other men? It is true, but that is one of the subiects of our complaints. For the good of France required, that hee had bin im-mortall. What, that we must will what the Destinies decree? It is force, perforce, but this necessitie doth not mollifie our griefe. What, that teares and sighes cannot recall E him againe? Alas, I know it well: but it is that which makes vs lament more bitterly.
For if teares and sighes could recall him to life, it is long since we had wept no more;
It is long since he had returned into the possession of the light, and had bene no longer deprived, but whilst the bruit of his death was disperled ouer the countie. Are these the considerations where-with they thinke suddenly to appease so sensible a grief as ours? do they thinke with such admonitions instantly to dry vp the iust and pittifull teares of poore orphans, the which they shed for the death of their father miserably murdered before their eyes? Thinke they, that for such reasons poore and desolate ser-uants lamenting the death of their master and protector, should suddenly stoppe their mouths to all complaints? No, no, these petty reasons do not cure the griefe, but of F minds which are not greatly sicke. Euen so we cannot approach neare vnto his Royall Hearse to wish him eternall rest, but in making our prayers at his feet, we do not feele our hearts as it were diuided in two by the knife of sorrow, and that after we haue cursed the brutish boldnesse of that vile Parricide, which hath so wickedly caused his body to be conuerted into dust, as well as our eyes into teares, wee do not say vnto him in casting

1610. casting holy water, the words wherewith I will end this miserable discourse: Farewell A great Prince, farewell good master, farewell our sword, farewell our buckler, farewell our glorie, the rest which thou hast purchased for vs vpon earth, may be restored vnto thee in heauen, with an eternall rest for thy soule: And neuer may it happen, that our ingratefull memorie may cease to remember with blessings and prayes, although it be with teares and sighes, the name of great Henry the fourth, King of France and Na-uarre, the hope of Learning, and the glorie of Armes.

Duke of Espernon sea-zed vpon the Citadell of Metz.

THe Duke of Espèrnon did cunningly seaze vpon the Cittadell of Metz, by an example of most dangerous consequence, expelling Monsieur d'Arbien, to whome the deceased King had giuen it in charge: The Gouvernour hauing notice, that some B Captaines and other creatures of the Duke of Espèrnon had an enterprize to ceaze vpon the Cittadell, he put them out of it. VWhereuppon the Duke complained to the Queene, and intreated her to send for the Gouvernour, to giue an accompt of that which he had done: who hauing receiued her Maiesties letters, he presently tooke his way towards the Court. As soone as he was gone out of Metz, the Dukes friends and seruants seized on the Cittadell for him. Many did wonder at the Queenes patience, that shee would suffer her authority to bee so abused in this manner, yet no man opposed himselfe.

Jesuites seeke to be incorporate in the Vniuersity of Paris.

The Iesuites since their reuocation some seuen or eight yeares since, had laboured C by all meanes possible to be incorporate in the Vniuersitie of Paris, and to haue free libertie to open their schoole: and to this end they had built a house for their Nouices in the Suburbes of S. Germaine, the which is so great, as a little towne may stand within the compasse of the walles. The Vniuersity of Paris opposed it selfe against them in this demand, and the deceased King in his life time (at the instance of the Vniuersitie) would not yeeld vnto it. After whose death, the Iesuites through the fauour of the Q.
Regent, and some Noblemen, began their poursuite more hotely then before. The V-niuersitie still opposing, it grew to be a question in lawe, and was brought before the Court of Parliament, during which contention, the Vniuersitie presented this Petition vnto the Queene Regent.

To the Queene Regent, the Princes of the Bloud, and the Lords of the Councell.

Petition made by the Vniuersity of Paris.

MADAME, The Vniuersitie of Paris most humbly shewes vnto your Maiestie, that the Doctrin of murthering of Kings by Assassins, who through deuotion vow themselves to death, as to a martyrdome pleasing vnto God, is a pestilent infection neuer scene nor read of in all the Records of Antiquitie: neither Pagans nor Christians euer knew it. Among the Mahometans, onely one, called the old man of the Mountaine, had put it in practise: but the rest of that Sect did presently suppress it, and neuer since haue they vsed it, although their hatred against Christian Kings is nothing decreased.
Onely within these three-score yeares this infection hath crept into Christendom, and hath bin practised in England and France: we say in England, for that in respect of ci-uill and temporall obedience, due to Kings, and for the safety of their persons, all Christian Kings, Pagans, Heretikes, Idolaters, Infidels, Excommunicates, and Apostats, are holy and sacred vnto vs, as the Apostles, the ancient Christian Church, and the example of the Saints in Paradise, which haue bene Prelates and Bishops in France, do teach. This hellish position vpon another erroneous doctrine, which is the Popes su-premacie, whom we acknowledge Head of the Church, as our Ancestours haue done.
The doctrine of this supreme power is not found in the writings of the Diuines of Paris, nor in the bosome of the Vniuersitie, but in the Sermons and writings of Iesuites,
and

A and in the answers of murtherers, when they are examined by their Iudges. Their own words do versifie it. Parry (who vnderooke to kill the Queene of England) sayd, that he might lawfully do it, for that she was excommunicate by the Pope, and therefore her life was abandoned. Catesby the attempter of that powder-treason, which should haue blowne vp the King, the Queene, their children, and the States of England, maintained that this enterprize was holy: For seeing that Clement the eight had by two Briefes for-bidden the Catholikes to receiue him, by a greater reason being receiued, hee would haue him made away.

John Chaste! sayd, that it was meritorious to kill the deceased King, for that notwithstanding the Bishops of France had receiued him into the Church, yet was he not in it, the Pope hauing not admitted him. Rauillac the last murtherer, sayd, That the King made warre contrarie to the Popes liking, That God was the Pope, and the Pope was God, by these words: Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke, &c. Hereuppon the Bishop of Clermont, one of their Disciples, sayled not, after the execution of the paricide, to come to the assembly of the Sorbonne, according to the custome of our Ancestors, to condemne this doctrine of murtherers: where going from forme to forme before the Doctors were set, he aduised them to be carefull what they did: You haue here (sayd hee) two Nuncios from the Pope. And the company beeing set, he gaue his opinion, that the matter then in question had bene diuersly handled, and that it was necessarie to speake vnto the Nuntios, who would write vnto the Pope, as if Kings might not liue but at the Popes pleasure. After that many good Preachers of this Vniuersity had detested the murtherers of Kings, and the fauourers of this doctrine. In the end P. Cotton presented a letter declaratorie vnto your Maiestie of the Iesuites doctrine, vpon this subiect, wher-by he seeks to giue satisfaction to such as complaine, that their writings do too much maintaine these three approaching doctrines: the Popes Supreme power, and thereon depending, Rebellion against Kings, and abandoning of their liues, when as such men shall hold them to be Tyrants.

Many men of vnderstanding are well acquainted with their Equiuocations and Fallacies, wherewith they hide their wicked doctrine: according to the practise whereof, D that Sect dorth make profession by Treaties allowed by their Generall, as may be seene in the Apologie of Henry Garnet, in the chapter of Equiuocations. We should be loth to discouer them, and to hinder the course of their false coyne, if any good might grow thereby. But seeing by the merit of their fallacies, that Sect will gaine that aduantage ouer vs, as to instruct youth in the Vniuersity of Paris, contrarie to the constant and determinate will of the deceased King: This Vniuersity, the daughter of the Kings of France, should hold her selfe guilty of infidelity, if shee should not lay open vnto you their deceites, and be an humble tutor vnto your Maiestie, not to suffer this daughter, so loyall vnto her Soueraignes (so long as she is kept from forcing or corruption) to be infected with the company of a Sect which hath bene found so dangerous to our Kings. He tels you (Madame) that the Authors of this Order say, we may not kill a Tyrant, but the Authors produced by him, and especially Valentia, their last great Doctor addes a limitation: If it be not (sayth he) by publike iudgement. And to the end you shold not doubt of this publike authoritie, he afterwards sets downe Articles of their doctrin ouer the authoritie of Kings in this manner: That a Monarchy is the best kind of Gouernement: that the Pope is Monarch in the Church touching the Spirituall government, and the King in his Realme for the temporall: not meaning the King should bee King in his Realme, vnlesse the Pope be Monarch, and haue absolute power in the spirituall government of the Church. But (Madame) it is directly opposit to the doctrin of the Church, the which your Vniuersity of Paris hath alwaies maintained, that the F Pope hath the power of a Monarch in the Church: for these be things contrarie, that the Councell is about the Pope, (as your Vniuersity hath alwaies held) and that the Pope is absolute Monarch of the Church. This doctrine of your Vniuersity, if it were euer necessary, it is now more then euer, both for the King, and all the Kingdomes of Christendome.

What

1610.

What be the effects of this absolute spirituall Monarchie? he tels you plainly in another booke which he presents vnto your Maiestie, and to the Princes and Noblemen of the Kings Councell. It is at the end of the second Tome of his Institutions, in the 35 question, where hee saith, That the Pope hath not absolute power to take and giue Kings Crownes and Kingdomes. All his fallacie consists in this word (absolute) for he saith, that he hath power to giue and take away the goods of your subiects, but onely by way of Iustice. So P. Cotton a little after affirms, That the Pope by vertue of his spirituall gouernement, and for the coniunction of Religion and State, of the spirituall and temporall, may by vertue of his censures dispose of the Crownes of Kings, For Religion, the seruice of God, the good of the Church, and for the saluation of soules. This doctrine is not particular to him alone, but common to all his Societie. This doctrine of coniunction which he sayes is betwixt Religion and the State, the spirituall and temporall, is contrarie to the doctrine of our Lord Iesus Christ, who hath for euer made a great separation betwixt Religion and State, saying: yeeld vnto God that which is Gods, that is, Religion: and to Cesar that which is Cessars, that is, ciuill and temporall obedience, honour, seruice and tribute. Madam, your Vniuersitie of Paris hath alwaies taught it thus, holding with the ancient Councels, and reiecting the new, in that they haue oppugned this holosome doctrine. Wherein our Kings, the Bishops of France, the Courts of Parliament, the Kings Councell, the French Doctors, and your Vniuersitie haue alwaies maintained, that the liberty of the French Church, and of the realme of France consisted. It is no question of small importance: it concerns the Kings Estate: wherof these men affirme the Pope may depriue him: these men (I say) to whome at this day they commit the instruction of youth in all towns: the consciences of people in confessions, and the teaching of all in generall. The Kings life and your Maiesties is also in danger: for when he hath depriued a Prince of his right of gouernement, they hold him for a tyrant, which vsurpes an Estate against the iudgement of this publike authority, which may by the Iesuites doctrine make of a King a tyrant: yea they maintaine, that subiects may rebell against their Prince, although he be not excommunicate, if they beleue that for feare of his greatnes, they dare not do it: This is the decision of the Iesuite Suares, who thereby brings the Estate and life of all great Princes into danger. Such is also the practise of some murderers of Kings; men which acknowledge the Popes suprem power, taught by the Iesuites, and beleue no other: but so far-forth as it shall please the Pope. And this plainly was the practise of the last parricide, as it did appeare by his execrable discourse with the Diuines which were sent vnto him, to whome hee shewed himselfe perfectly instructed in all the shifts and fallacies which Sophistrie could vse of that subiect, whereas otherwise hee was very ignorant of all other knowledge and learning.

We doubt not, Madam, but the Pope, beeing well aduised, would performe his dutie, in damning (by his Buls) such murderers and Assassins to the paines of hell, and causing (as he may with a word) these great mischiefs to cease, which cast a shame and reproch vpon the innocencie of Christian religion. For hitherto the power of such men at Rome, hath giuen some men occasion to say: That he which doth not hinder nor preuent crimes committed by them ouer whom he hath all power, and whome he may restraints by so easie a censure, hee himselfe is the author, as the rules of Iustice do teach.

The pretext which P. Cotton takes from the good of the Church, to giue power vnto the Pope, to take away and giue Crowns is a counterfeit colour: for by the same separation which our Lord Iesus Christ hath for euer made betwixt Religion and state, throughout the whole world, where he will haue his Gospell preached, wee are bound (notwithstanding all Ecclesiasticall Censures, Interdictions, Dispensations from the Oath of Allegiance or commandements from the Pope) not to take Armes against our Kings, but to yeeld them all Ciuill and Temporall obedience, and to expose our liues for the defence of theirs. This is the Law of Nature written in the hearts of men, when they came into the world, the which the Sonne of God taking our flesh vpon him

A him, hath since confirmed, binding Christians more strictly then Pagans, who were led by the onely instinct of nature: and Priests more then Lay-men, whome they should instruct in this holy doctrine, both by word and example. And much more Bishops then Priests, and most of all the first Bishop, for that his example to Christians should be of more force then all other pastors of the Church.

And the King of Great Brittain, to warrant himselfe against these murderers was forced to require an oath of Allegiance from his subiects, for his ciuill and temporall obedience, and for the safety of his life, notwithstanding all Popish censures. An oth which the doctrine & practise of murderers makes necessarie at this day throughout all Christendome, to assure the Estates and liues of the annoynted of God, and to free the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion, to all Kings and Princes, of that blame and hatred which this pestilent doctrine hath procured it. And to make it to be more fauoured with those Princes which hold a different Religion. But this holy doctrine is more necessarie in France then in any other countrie, seeing that the effects of the contrarie, fall chiefly vpon the life of our Kings, and the Crowne of France: and more, in the minoritie of our King, then in his full age, this false doctrine should be refused, and the fauourers thereof reiected, for that the practise of former ages hath euer taught vs, that when they will employ their censures against the temporall gouernment of Kings, they excommunicate the weakest.

C For these causes, Madame, the Vniuersitie of Paris, daughter to the Kings of France, doth most humbly beseech your Maiestie, and you my Lords the Princes and Noblemen of the Councell, not to suffer the Iesuits, holding a doctrine of the Popes supreme power ouer the Estates and liues of Kings, contrarie to the doctrine which the Vniuersitie hath alwaies maintained, to instruct youth in Paris, much lesse to be incorporate in the Vniuersitie, to make the doctrine and manners thereof as repugnant to the Estates of Kings, as their Sect is, as may appeare by the writings of Peter Cotton, dedicated to your Maiestie, and deliuered daily in their name; and by the experience which is made in many parts of Christendome. And the Vniuersitie shall pray for the preservation and prosperity of the King, your Maiestie, and of you my Lords the Princes and Noblemen of the Kings Councell.

A Afterwards the Iesuits presented a petition vnto the Court of Parliament, requiring that they might bee receiued into the Body of the Sorbonne: wherupon it was answered: Let it be signified. At this signification the Sorbonne consented, so as they would submit. They demanded interpretation of that word, whereunto it was told them, that they must be subiect to the Rector, and to all the Statutes of the Vniuersity. But the decision of this cause was remitted to the opening of the Court againe at Saint Martins.

E In Iuly the Court of Parliament amerced the Bishop of Paris in a pecuniarie Fine, for that rashly, and to the preiudice and dishonor of the sayd Court, he had past before them, at the funerals of the deceased King. This small formality bred bad blood, and many were amazed to see the Queene, and much more the Earle of Soissons, to affect any party in this contention, especially against the Court of Parliament, who had bene so officious to them. Hereupon (and it may be vpon some lighter cause) factions began to grow among the great men. The Earle of Soissons, the Duke of Espernon, the Chancellor, Villeroy, and the Iesuites made one partie: The Dukes of Bouillon, Sully, and Rohan, Des Dignieres with the Court of Parliament were the other. A strange alteration in Court, a strange myserie of State, being supported and assisted by the house of Guise. The Prince of Condé had written to them of this partie, and especially to the Duke of Bouillon, that he would be wholly gouerned by their Councell, and by the first President. Monsieur de Barraut had bene sent to Bruxelles to hasten his departure. This cloude of factions being risen, it threatened a storme of combustions, considering the contrariety of humors of the Princes and Noblemen, and the incompatibility of their quarels, vnder the gouernement of a woman. There was then no speech but 1610. of parties and factions, and such as obserued the humor of the French, and the libertie A of the present time, thought they could not belong in forme, before they entred into action. Whereupon they did renew and augment the Capitaines in all the quarters and ports of Paris, who tooke the oath of Allegiance to the King and Queene. All the houses were visited, and commandement given them to be armed: all idle persons were commanded to depart, and the guards at the Louvre doubled. This grew vpon certain threates, secret practises, and brutes of bad presage against them of the Religion. In the heate of these alterations, such as hated the Huguenots fought to trie the peoples affections: but they answered: That if they wished ill to them of the Religion, they should do it themselves, as for their parts they would not bring the publike quiet into danger. During these broyles, the Prince of Condé arrived at Paris, much more glori- B ous in his returne, then at his departure. He entred into Paris, being accompanied with about 1500. horse, where were all the Nobility of the Court, and most of the Princes, which had gone forth to meet him. Among others the Duke of Bouillon went vnto the frontiers: all good men hoped for much by his presence, to ballance the affairs betwixt these new parties. He came directly to the Louvre, where hee was very well recei- ued by the Queene, who in testimonie of her fauor, presented him with a goodly house in S. Germain's suburbs, built by Gandy an Italian, and a rich cupberd of plate.

Prince of Condé returns
to Paris.

But his coming did not pacifie these alarmes at Paris: it was daily feared there would haue bene some Tragedie among the great men: which caused the Prince of Condé, C and the Dukes of Guise and Bouillon to keepe guards in their houses two nights together, vpon some apparent aduise, that they would force their lodgings. But it was the wil of God to disperse this cloud: so as amidst all these brutes all things continued quiet and peaceable, the people seeming to haue no will to stir: for in effect all the Commonalties and townes of the realme in generall, were not only resolu'd to obedience, but so banded to peace, as if any one should haue sought to vndermine it, it was thought he should not haue found any one retreat. These were the works of God, & some fruits of their former follies. The carriage and power of the D. of Espernon were the chiefe causes of all these broiles and distrust, hauing 4000. men of the Kings guard in the suburbs at his deuotion, being their Colonel, wherewith he did fortifie himselfe as hee pleas- D ed. They of the Religion had their part in this feare, yet they continued their exercise, relying wholly vpon the assurance which the Q. had given them: who also assured the Noblemen of their protection, contenting them with great pensions, & other aduancements. The Earle of Fuentes made great preparatiues at Milan for war, which put the D. of Sauoy into a great alarme, but especially they of Geneua, who feared them both: wherupon they sent for M. de la Noue, being at Pontz, who went vnto them with leaue: they did assure both the one and the other from the Court as much as might bee, and they confirmed the D. of Sauoy the marriage of the Lady Elizabeth for his eldest son, with a dowrie of 300000. crownes, and some small Seignourie during her life.

The Queene being settled in the Regencie by a free consent of the whole State, M. Pasquier, one of the Masters of Requests, a man of great learning and iudgement, did write a discourse of aduice vnto her, touching the preseruatiue of the State, during the minoritye of the King her sonne, in these termes:

Pasquier
letter to the
Q. Regent.

M Adam: it is the worke of a discret Pilot to provide for an approaching storme during a stil calme, and to fore-see the remedy before the danger, or if hee be surpris- ed with the tempest, to oppose himselfe courageously against the fury of the waues and winds, to bring his ship to a safe port. Euen so should you during the calme wher- in wee are, thinke of all alterations which may grow both within and with- out the realme, and to provide a fit cure to hinder their course, and to oppose your self resolutely against their attempts, that would trouble this State, to preserue it from ap- parent shipwracke whereinto it may fall, if the helme be not rightly gouerned. Where- upon I haue thought it my duty, to a King, and a part of those that are within this ship, to contribute this my discourse, which I most humbly beseech your Maiesty to receiue with the like deuotion, as it is presented.

We

A VVE haue the King your Sonne very young, who is our lawfull Lord, nor giuen vs by chance, but ordained, yea pre-ordained of God, by a continuall succe- sion, descent, and generation of Kings, receiued, nourished and bredde vp amongst vs. Education of the King
The first care you ought to haue of him, concerns his education, and breeding vp in good maners: for according to the good impressions he shal receiue in his tender age, he will continue to the end, if bad, they will not endure the touch, but wil soon change. You must cause him to bee bredde vp in the feare of God, not with a partiall hand, which must be liuely printed in his soule, that it may be a bridle vnto him, to keep him in the ordinarie course of reason. Let vs adde what we please of humane wisdom to our opinions, they are but follies, yea precipitations of our greatnesse, if the honor of God be not our guide. VVherefore this holy obiect must be a lesson vnto him, whereon he must daily feed in this tender age, else all your desseignes in the conduct and direction of his life, will be built vpon sand.

This feare of God being grauen in his heart, he must withal be presently taught, that one of the first motions of a great King, consists in the obseruation of Iustice, whereof he is a debter to his subiects, the assured ground of his Estate: the which hee must be taught to see visibly, by the examples of happy succeffe, which haue accompanied those who reigning iustly, haue maintained their subiects in all obedience. Or on the other side (the which God forbid) that he which holds another course of life, leaues not his Crowne to his posterity.

Let him vnderstand that this Iustice must bee distributed with an equall proportion (I meane according to their merits) to all his subiects, both great and small, and to punish such seuerly as abuse their greatnesse to the preiudice of the weaker sort: A seuerity which will purchase him much loue with the people: but also to recompence this rigour he must be milde, affable and gracious to such as haue the honour to bee about him. A good countenance, and an embrace of our King, to the Princes, Noblemen, and others of what quality focuer, doe most commonly carry a generall discharge for all the bonds which they thinke he owes them. These propositions well managed will produce an other of no lesse worth, which is, that although hee haue supreme power within his Realme, and that the common sort of Courtiers hold his will to bee a Law, yet he will Iudge by an instinct of Nature, that it is not ment of all that he will or may, but only of that which he ought iustly to will. For the Law is made to giue perfection to the thing for the which it is made, and not to satisfie a disordered appetite. The King must in this case set a strong barre betwixt him and his opinion, least hee take for his deuise, That which I will, is iust; but rather, I will it, for that it is iust. This maxime will frame in him the Law of reason, not written in paper, but grauen in his heart, which will keepe him company day and night; It will aduertise him and aduice him in all places and at all times, after what manner hee should gouerne his subiects with iudgment. Any Prince that hath suffred himself to bee transported with his own passions, in doing that which he ought not, there often happens that vnto him which he would not: and about all things hee must haue a continuall care, not to make a difference and seperation betwixt the affaires of State and those of God, who must bee the first and last end of his actions. You must accustom him in his yong yeeres to haue an exact and diligent care of affaires, wherin he must be instructed as he growes, to the end that being thus framed, and comming to ripen yeeres, labour may bee but a pastime vnto him: the Maisters eye makes the field fertile, and the horse fat; so the knowledge which the Prince takes of his affairs, makes that his Councillors do not gouerne them at their pleasures. Breed him vp, not in prodigality, but in a wise liberality, worthy of a great King: represent still vnto him, the knowing well how to vse this vertue; and how, where, and when it is necessary, his bounty will redound vnto himselfe, and the more he shall giue, the more he shall reape.

If you desire that he shall first please God, and then the people, let him wholly direct his heart to clemencie, whereof he hath an admirable president before his eyes, by the memorie of the deceased King his father, your honoured Lord and royall husband.

It

1610. "It is a great wisdom, and fit for a great spirit, to winke (when occasion serues) at offences which are done vnto him, hauing so great a power, who may reuenge the least without controule. These be the vertues which our King should seeke in his tender age which will grow with him, and will by litle and litle so increase, as they will one day make him repared the true father of the people.

"And for that in a publike fountaine the common interest is, that no man cast any filth into it: euen so, that no dishonest thing should fall into our King, the generall spring of all his people: wherefore there must be a careful regard had, when hee enters into that heate of youth, that he suffer not his wil to runne headlong to voluptuousnes, & that hauing power to do what he please, he doth not that which he ought not: for that the way of liberty to great vices is so easie and sweet, as it is almost insensible. For this cause you must teach him in time, what honour and reputation he shall reape by a continent youth, and contrariwise how that God will be highly offended, if hee abuse his suprem power in vnchastitie. Although that all vices be naturally odious vnto God in all persons, yet is it more particularly in a Prince, for that he doth not so much offend in himselfe, as in his example. Cursed is he which glories in that which he should punish in another. An iniurie done to a priuate man, breeds in his soule such a liuely resolution of reuenge, as oftentimes it tends to the ruine and vtter desolation of an Estate.

"You shall let him know the miserable effects of Couetousnesse, which produceth nothing of it selfe but a contempt of God, with an absolute will to make all things veniall, to the ruine of a King and his people. The object of vnlimited Auarice in a King, giues great lustre to prodigalitie, which was held prodigious in another Prince. Above all, if his naturall inclination carries him to violent things, he may bee withdrawne, letting him see, that Cruelty is vnworthy of so mild a spirit as that of a King ought to be, and that the Prince which is infected there-with, hath nothing of a man but the shape. It is a vice much to be feared in a King, for it is in him as couetousnesse in old men, which increaseth continually without any hope of decrease. These are in effect the vices whereof a King should bee free. These vertues and these vices will shew, that there is not any thing so auaylable for the generall profite and publike commoditie of an Estate and Common-wealth, as a good Prince, nor any thing so hurtfull as a bad and vicious.

Vnion.

"Hauing provided for that which concerneth our Kings person, wee must passe to that which belongs to his Estate. In this first incounter of affaires, that which you should haue in greatest recommendation, is the vnion of the Princes, Officers of the Crowne, great Noblemen, and then the people. When all shall bee well vnited, there shall not be any King or Prince, how mighty soeuer, that shall dare to attempt against this Estate without his vndoubted ruine.

"Vnion is your strength, Diuision your weaknesse; Vnion maintaines and preserues Estates in their greatnesse; Diuision vndermines and ruines them, without hope euer to rise againe. That King of Egypt meaning to teach his children the force of Vnion, and the weaknesse of Discord, represented vnto them a bundle of arrowes, which they could not breake beeing tyed together, but diuided, there was nothing more easie. This Estate is like vnto mans bodie, the which liues long by the accord and harmonie of the foure humors. But when as any of these qualities seekes to commaund ouer the rest, the body falls into diseases, and so dyes. It is euen so of this Estate, if by your iudgment and wisdom you reduce both great and small to one will, the same intention and the same desire to maintaine the Estate vnder the Kings obedience; you shall make it the feare and terrour of her enemies. But if the parts of the bodie be once dismembered, if this perfect Vnion and correspondencie of all the members do not subsist by a mutuall and reciprocall entertainment, the corruption and desolation of the Estate will follow.

"To entertain Vnion, let Princes and great men be called to Councell, in matters which

A which concerne the State, and the greater they are by extraction of birth, the more precedence and prerogatiue should be giuen them, both in regard of the memorie of their ancestors, and of their owne vertues. From the greater, descend to them that hold the second and the third ranks; and then vnto the meaner, and so reward euery one according to his merit, with the charges and dignities of the Realme. It is one of the chiefe means to maintaine this Estate. But in this distribution of Charges, flatterie, false reports, malice or enuie, must not bee admitted, least they abuse you with false apperances.

The most holesome and best aduice will come from the common voyce of the people. I speake of the Cleargie, where are the wisest and most learned of France: of the Nobilitie, whereon depends the force, and of the third Estate intermixt with a great number of vertuous and learned men.

It is not sufficient to haue provided for the vnion of great men: but it is to bee feared that God will giue way vnto his furie; beeing wonderfully incensed against vs, for the great abuses and manifold disorders which are committed as well in the Ministerie of the Church, as in the administration of Iustice. To pacifie him, and to diuert his wrath and indignation, name men that are learned, and of a holy and vndeified life, to spirituall liuings, who may according to the dutie of their charges, and the Kings Edicts, keepe residence at their Benefices, to edifie their flockes: For there is not any thing that doth so much moue the wrath of God, as to see his Churches prophaned, and to fall into the hands of such as are vowed to the Temporall seruice of the Prince, and not of the Spirituall. Whensoever it hath bene practised, it is a certaine demonstration of the alteration and change of an Estate, and of their miserie and disgrace, which abuse it lycientiously, whose affaires alwayes decline euen vnto their ends.

Aduance men of knowledge, merit, and discretion to places of Iustice, who may be knowne and approoued to bee vertuous, louers of the publike weale, and not giuen to auaice. Do nothing against Iustice: take away the abuses which are committed through fauour and surpriſe in Euocations and Abolitions: Cause the Royall Ordonances to be obserued in euery poynt, without any alteration, and leaue Suites to their ordinarie formes in Lawe, not causing them to bee iudged by Commissioners: Breake not the authoritie of the holy Lawes, let not their vertue be in paper, but in effect: for men will iudge of your bountie, as they shall find your Inclination to the obseruation or breach of the lawes. If you tye your selfe to maintaine them, you yeelde vnto the people that which you owe them: And contrariwise, if you breake them, you deprive the people of that which you are bound to distribute vnto them, which be the cause of infinite miseries to the King and his subiects. Let Iustice bee equally and without partiality distributed.

E As in mans bodie Nature imparts to euery member as much nourishment as is needfull, not suffering one to vnrpe any thing of another of the common Nutriment: Euen so ought you with the like Ballance maintaine the Kings subiects, fore-seeing that the substance of one passe not to another, to the end that the whole bodie bee maintayned with equalitie. Remember that the meanest within the Realme, is the Kings subiect, as well as the mightiest: and therefore you owe him, in the place which you hold, the like Iustice. See that the aduancement of one may not be the disgrace of another. And consider that the least haire makes his shadow against the Sun-beames, and that the lustre of your authoritie which consists in Iustice, will decay, when it shall not be vniuersall, to giue vnto euery one that which belongs vnto him: For this effect, giue care to al men: notwithstanding that you are raised to this honor, yet must you with the like eye receiue the poore and the rich which come to be suiters to your Maiesty, to the end that euery one in the time of his affliction, may haue recourse vnto your bountie, fauour, and protection to haue reliefe and succour. Remember, that God is aboue you; and as you shew your selfe in fauorable clemency vnto the people,

1610. "So will he be vnto you: it were better to heare no complaints, then hauing heard them A
 "to giue no ease vnto the complaynants. And aboute all, Madame, remember, if it please
 "you, that the Courts of Parliament, and other Soueraigne Courts, in their Iurisdic-
 "tions are the fundamentall parts of the State, by the which our Kings haue happily con"tinued their realme from father to sonne vnto this day. Wherefore you must haue a "principall care to support these companies, and thinke that they are the chiefe arms by "the which during the minority of our King, his Maiefty and yours shalbee wonderfully
 "preserued against all those, that flattering themselves with their owne ambition, shall "make any attempt, the which, I humbly beseech God may not happen.

Ease of the people.

"Next to this, you must prouide for the general and too-true complaints of the vex- B
 "ation of the people, by innouations, tributes, creations of Offices, parties, & other "like mischiefs, by the which in promising to re-vnite the reuenues of the Crown, they "do alienate the peoples hearts, which is the Kings chiefe treasure. Wherefore by your wil-
 "dome & gouernment, you shal iudge whether it be not needfull to ease them, if not of "all, yet at the least of a good part of these new impositions. And specially to abolish alto"gether that party so preiudiciall, which giues life againe to so many states, the which at "the time of their beginning were dead about 60. yeares since, whereof the not vsing
 "them for many ages, teacheth vs, that they should by no means be reuiued. When I
 "speake this (Madam) my meaning is, that a Prince should intreat his subiects, like vnto C
 "Bees, and not take from them both hony and waxe: but to intertaine them alwaies in a "good disposition, and to suffer them to enioy part of the fruits of their labour: it is hee
 "that by his painefull exercise intertaines and makes the rest of the Realme to liue in "quiet. From him comes trafficke, riches, gold and tribute. It is a Spring which flowes
 "continually and is neuer drie: if the people cease from labour, all the bodie of the State "will perishe.

"If you desire to maintaine the Realme, you must preserue the people, and accom"modate them: the which will be easily and speedily done, when as by visiting one vnto
 "the other, you shall not will any thing but what is pleasing to the people, nor they with
 "for any thing but with your good liking. There must be a reciprocall communication D
 "betwixt you and them; they must performe the duty of obedience, and you must shew
 "that which belongs to your wife command in your Regencie. If you take vpon you
 "this resolution, you shall make them wonderfully affected to the Kings seruice, and the "preseruatiō of the State: for they haue beene accustomed to do for their King, as the "bodie for the soule: they bring a mutuall consent to submit themselves to his wil that "leades them, that makes them breath and subsist: but if they be too much oppress, they "will do like vnto those that are tormented with burning feauers, who turne vpe and
 "downe continually, and can find no place of rest, which is a certaine foretelling of the "ruine of a State. So as it is needfull you should be carefull of their health. Haue onely
 "this apprehension, that the Kings greatnesse depends of his subiects ease, and then to E
 "maintaine the Kings greatnesse, you will resolue to haue the people rich and at ease:
 "that is to say, such as they shall bee, such will the King be: the heart commonly feels "the infirmities of the body.

"If the people bee poore, hee will bee a poore King (were his Store-houses heaped
 "vpe with gold and siluer) his qualitie depending vpon that of his people, for that he "takes his name from the subiect. Will you haue them loue you? do them good: for
 "he that intreates them ill, he may well haue the commandement of their bodies, but "not of their hearts. Be then (during this great charge which you hold) like vnto a good-
 "ly running riuer, which brings profit to euery one: the fruite which you shall gather
 "by good vsage of them, will be of wonderfull increase: For they shall not afterwards
 "breath, but by your Maiesties bountie: by which you shall frustrate the designs of such F
 "as would trouble the State, who cannot do any thing without them: the people "from then you leaue them naked, and disarme them of all force. Oppose then a people
 "against them freed from all extraordinary Imposts, experience will teach you, that
 "with

A with hand and heart, they will smother their enterprises in the breeding. It were feare- 1610.
 "full experience should let vs see what a discontented people linked to the ambition of "great men can do, who neuer incense the subiects against their Prince, but vnder the "maske of the Common-weale, whereof in effect they are the first corrupters.

A "Feare that you haue eased the people of all these superfluities which did afflict them,
 "keep an account of the number of Prouinces within the Realme, and what Subsi"dies, Taxes, Imposts, Customes, Ayds, Tributes, and other publicke reuenues, euery one "doth contribute, that you may certainly know what is raised yearely of the people,
 "and then examine what the pensions, rents, fees of Officers, payments of souldiers, and "other expences may amount vnto; to the end that by good husbandrie you may so
 "gouerne the Kings treasure, as the glute hands may not retaine that which shold come "cleare into his coffers. The receipt and expences scene and truly knowne, let not all the "expences of the Kingdome (if you will haue it durable) exceed the Kings reuenues, o"therwise it cannot long subsist. Auid warre all you can both at home and abroad,
 "they can yeeld nothing but ruine, death, and confusion. Leauē not peace, vnion, and "concord, which you enioy both within and without the Realme, which will bring infinit
 "benefices, to the honor and quiet of this State. Whosoever seeks to ingage our King "lightly in warre, during his minority, shewes, that he seeks to liue in the troubles and "confusions of the time, fearing lest his actions should be knowne, or else he desires to "satisfie his ambition and coutousnesse with the hazard of the King and realme: or to "speake more plainly, that he desires to giue vent to his secret enterprises, which can"not burst forth but by colour of publicke diuisions: and in a word, you must purchase
 "peace at what rate soeuer, rather then to come to Armes. Whosoever takes Armes
 "in hand during the Kings minority, making shew to defend him, prescribes him often"times a law, to the preiudice of his Estate.

Touching ciuill warre, and home-bredde confusion, be carefull and respectiue to
 "auoide it: for as inward diseases are more hard to cure then those which are exteriour,
 "and bring a man by degrees vnto the graue, Euen so warre which beginnes in the bo-
 "D wells of a Realme, is much more dangerous then a forraine warre, for that it drawes
 "it insensibly to ruine. If you desire to ouerthrow this Estate, vndertake a ciuill warre,
 "within few dayes it will bring you to the graue.

As for forraine warres, you should much lesse vndertake them, nor wish them: for
 "it opens a gate, and admits a passage to strangers to practise the bad intents which "they may haue against the King and his Crowne: shame which restrayned them will "turne into furie, which will free them a passage to enter into France. Whereas if you
 "keepe your selfe within the bounds of peace, nor any one of your neighbours, (al"though he haue a desire) will in regard of his honour, attempt against the King in his
 "minoritie.

E "VVhat will bee the fruites of eyther of these warres? I will tell you: They will "cause new Impositions, new Edicts, which will consume the bloud and sub"stance, which the people haue yet remayning, and by this meanes you shall leaue the "fields without labour, the poore without bread, the rich without meanes, and in the "end bring this Estate to its last period. The beginning and continuance of warre, ga"thers together a great superfluitie of bad humours, which by degrees makes the bodie
 "of a Monarchie fit to receiue an alteration in all the members: For Warre is the mo"ther and nurse of all liberty and impunity, the which doth dispende and exempte euery
 "one from the subiection of lawes, and the commandement of Superiors, which is the
 "F sole and only meanes, by the which the bond and vnity of people is dissolued.

Learn wisdom by our examples, and follow the way which hath beene made
 "vnto you by the deceased King for twelue yeares together. Hee made triall what dan"ger warre brings with it. Seeke peace both within and without the Realme: you shall "thereby preserue the Estate, and you shall haue meanes to ease the people of a heauie

X x x x x 3 burthen,

1610. "burthen which they haue so long borne. Let your life be a liuely image of the happie A "condition of a people exempt from the calamities and miseries of war. Where can you
"seeke war, to enioy a more absolute peace? war must not be vndertaken, but to keepe the "people from affliction during a peace. True it is, that although you haue peace with "the Kings subiects, and all your neighbors, yet must you not keepe it so strictly, as war
"may not be vndertaken. And therefore if you find it conuenient, you may inttaine
"garrisons vpon the frontiers, lest you be suddenly surprisid: All peace without Armes "is weak.

Troublers
of the State

"I will adde one exception to that which I haue formerly sayd, that there may be some B
"one so rash, during the tender age of our King, as to stir vp the subiects to mutinies,
"either vnder colour of Religion, or of the common-weale, to make his owne profite
"with the preiudice of our King. As a light discafe increaseth and kills the bodie, if it re"medies be not applyed in time, so in this first motion of alteration, if you do not em"ploy force and authority to stay the course of such a mischief, it will let the foure cor"ners, and the hart of France on fire. The first medicin should come from the soueraign "Courts, and therein you shal know of what importance and necessity they be, by whose "decrees such an one shalbe declared guilty of high treason, whereunto you shall pre"sently adde force to put it in execution with fire and sword, and follow him with such
"resolution, as he may be presently inuested wheresoeuer he hath shew himselfe, and that C
"he may be taken there without mercy, to the end that by his head the rest of France
"may be diuerted from once dreaming of such foule offences: and that his ashes may "make a remedy for posterity. God forbid I shold presume any euill by any Nobleman
"in France, being assured of their general loyalties: yet I may say by the way, that the suf-
"ferance of one iniurie drawes on a thousand others: and on the other side one iniurie
"reuenged, suppresseth all bad desseignes.

Warre of Germany.

"Some aduise you to succor the Germans, others to remaine quiet: the first say, that "the deceased King was bound not onely by word, but in effect: that not relieuing
"them now, the honour of France was engaged: that it was a worke worthy of a great D
"King to succor afflicted Princes, when as one more mighty will vlturpe their Estates, by "some coloured title: that not doing it, they might draw them into despair to ioyne with "him against this realme: or for want of succouring them, to prepare the way to haue a "great neighbor against vs, who by our negligence hath extended his limits to bee a fu"ture scourge vnto vs. In which case we shold haue nothing left vs but a late repentance.
"A lesion which is ordinarie to the Princes and Potentates of Italy, who will not suffer
"a new Prince to grow great among them. Others say, that we must ballance all affaires
"according to the diuersitie of obiects which are presented vnto our eyes: that what was "good to a great warrior, cannot bee applyed to his sonne in his tender age: that it is a "goodly thing to succour afflicted Princes, but it is better not to trouble his owne af-
"fares vnseasonably: that the death of the King his father hath freed him from all pro"mises: that the rules of duty do not bind him to giue succors, for that in matter of state
"honor must be measured by that which is most necessary for the good, quiet and pro"fit of him and his subiects: that in his youth he must feare a confusion, and an Anarchy
"which Armes may draw into France: and that in seeking to preserue another, we shall "lose our selues.

"To conclude, it may happen that by our succors these forraigne Princes may bee set-
"led in their countries. And on the other side, it may be, that both they and our succours
"may be defeated: and that in this infortunat successe, there will be a port opened for the "conqueror to enter into France: the which during the minority of our King, you must F
"auoide by all meanes possible. A lesion which was well obserued by our great K. Lewis
"the 11. who dying, aduised them to keepe the Realme in peace, and not to enter into "any quarrell with the Britton, and the other neighbours: to the end that his son Charles
"the 8. being but 13. yeares old, his state might be in peace, till he came to age, to dispose "of

A of things at his pleasure. And long before him that wife Gontran King of Orleance, " 1610.
"tutor to Cloaire the second his Nephew, being but foure months old, thought (that "not to expose his Realme to all the miseries whereunto an Estate is subiect) hee must "breed vp his little nephew, and preserue his Realme by all mild courses, dispersing with "an admirable dexterity all inuasions that might grow in it, how dangerous soeuer:
"And yet he, for his greatnesse, with that of his nephew, might haue made head against "any vndertakers. And aboue all things you must haue a speciall care that Princes and "Noblemen, may not be armed vnder any pretext which they shall borrow of the Ma-
"iesty of a King, so long as he shall be in this tender age.

Madame, the rebels of each side are great, the which you must weigh in a iust
B ballance, to incline vnto that which shalbe most profitable for the good and preferua-
"tion of the King and his Realme; and take counsell with God what you haue to doe in "this point: And aboue all things thinke that at this day, in a fall assurance of all things
"in this Realme, you must feare any thing.

R Religion may alter the subiects wils: It peereeth the hearts of men vnto the quick, " Religion.
"and carries them away with a violent and extraordinary motion, the which blinds
"the eyes to all consideration of respect, duty and obedience, which they owe vnto their "Prince. We should all wish that there were no any but the ancient Religion, wherein "wee haue beene baptized and bred vp: But the miseries past which had in a manner

C brought France to her last periede, should teach vs, what calamities do follow vs, if the "same maxime which the deceased King hath established, bee not inuiolably obserued:
"who by a wise aduise tolerating the exercise of the pretended, reformed religion, hath
"by the same meanes fedled the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish Religion, in townes
"whereas it had not bene exercised these forty or fifty yeers. This subiect concerneth the "preseruatiō of the State, whereof religion makes a part: And therefore you may not "alter any thing. Allow vnto them of the reformed religion, free exercise of their Re"ligion, the Chambers of the Edict, and the townes which haue beene granted them for "their assurance: forget not any thing that the deceased King granted them, as a D Prince who knew well how much it did import the State not to touch this stringe.

"It will conaine them within the vow of obedience: Neither shall it bee in the power "of any, how great soeuer, to draw them from the duty which they owe naturally to "their King. It is a body so composed as it receiues no motion, but when any thing is "attempted against the Edict, the which was made to preserue them: Make no breach "in this Edict, it is immouable, and the chiefe parts without motion. This bodie is "not like vnto a clock whereas the greater and lesser peeces moue all together, one
"by an other: heere the greater haue no force, nor vertue, without the people, what "shew soeuer they make, as wee haue sometimes seene, when they had an humour to "rise, from the which they were wisely diuerted by the people: And contrariwise, wee
"remember that the people of Rochell alone endured the extremities of war without "their support, who haue alwaies maintained themselves in obedience, by the wisdom
"of the Edicts of pacification.

E Madame, entertaine these Edicts in euery point, and that which hath beene autho"rized by the wisdom of the deceased King; you need not then feare them that hold "the chiefe rankes amongst them. But breake them in any part, they bee firebrands to "inflame the humours of the people; the which would turne to the desolation of the "State, I meane of both religions: the one would draw with it the losse and ruine of "the other, whereas the maintaining of both, adding thereto prayers, fasting, mode"sty, chastity, preachings, with a holy life, wilbe the support of the ancient, and the
"F uerthrow of the new.

The faculty of eloquence in the mouth of a Preacher, is a goodly gift of nature, " Preachers.
"the which being augmented by long vse and study, giues light and ornament to "the goodly conceptions of his minde; which concerneth the health of our soules. But if "he 1610. "he will abuse the sweetnesse of his tongue, there is no plague so prejudicial to a Realm, A

 "as this well speaking Preacher. It is a torrent which overflows to drowne a multitude,
 "his tongue is a sword, wheron depends the life and death of those, for or against whom
 "he doth employ it, he stormes, he thunders, and confounds heaven and earth together,
 "when as to prevaile in his intentions he vnfittingly abuseth passages of the holy Scrip"ture, by the exposition whereof he wins what credit with them hee list: There is not a "ny thing how incredible soeuer, but with good words hee will make probable: and no"thing so rude and vnpublished, but hee will make plausible with his eloquence: his "speech in a multitude is of as great force, as iron in an army: especially with those who "booming to heare him, bring nothing but spirits of deuotion and obedience, whereof B
 "the Preacher doth cunningly make his profit: He doth by gouerne their mindes at his "pleasure, and knowes how to moue their affections, and to intire their courages in such "sort, as they forget all feare of danger, and all bonds of benefits. Hearing of the sentences
 "by meanes of the way, brings greatest passions vnto the minde. To prevent the effects "of such an instrument, you must by your absolute command, forbid all inuectiues in "their Sermons, which be the firebrands of sedition, and that they follow their texts, and
 "reach the subiect, obedience to his King, with vnity and concord, both of great and "small. If he doe otherwise intreat him like Anthony Eremita a Franciscan, who was ba-
 "nished out of the Realme by Lewis the eleuenth, for that hee had exceeded the bounds
 "of Preaching, and disputed of the State of the Crowne in his pulpit. Cardinal de Beaufort C "Lahough we cannot force the Lawes of Nature, and giue vnto the youth of our "King, that great sence, iudgement and conduct which is requisite for the gouern-
 "ment of his Realm, which only time must produce, yet must you not attend the time of "his ful age, to haue him crowned. He is our King, old or young, you must alwaies apply
 "vnto him these holy Characters, whereas al the Princes of the bloud, other Princes and "Officers of the Crowne must assist. After this let him make a progresse throughout his "whole Realme, to the end his subiects may know him, and yeld him the oath of allege-
 "ance. The Princes presence at what age soeuer, is of so great merit and recommenda"tion with his subiects, as it doth wonderfully moue them to loue him. And yet D
 "Madame, herein it is necessary, to make warre by the eye, and doe according to the dis"position of affaires, not withdrawing your selfe easily from the first, and chiefe Ci"ty of France, the which you see by their teares is wholly vowed to the seruice of their "Prince.
 "You must not forbear to assemble the Estates for the reason which they suggest vn-
 "to you, that they wilbe some blemish to your greatness. It is quite contrary, "the Estates hauing confirmed it by publike Authority, will sence it fully. But I "will tell you the reason why you should forbear to call this assembly. It would
 "bee an instrument for them that would trouble the State to giue a forme vnto their E
 "practises, euery one would seeke to winne the Deputies by courtisie, presents, ben"efits, goodly promises and other fauours, and al these private persons returning into their "Prouinces, would serue as torches to kindle new fires and combustions. I know well
 "there is not any Prince or Nobleman that hath this proiect in his head, beeing all with "one deuotion, vowed to the Kings seruice: but they are men, & therefore you must take "away al occasions of doing ill, or thinking ill. Commonly the Estates assemble to prouid
 "for the present and future complaints of the generall of this Monarchy, and to reduce
 "things to their ancient course. You know where the disease lies, prescribe the like re"medy, as you would haue done, if it had beene heard. To Prelats abate the tents, F
 "these bee they who either by their doctrine or good example hold the hearts of the "Nobility and people tied to their Princes seruice. As for the Nobilitie, gratifie
 "them, honour them, and put publike charges into their hands, they bee the Kings "creatures, who referre all their exploits to the profit and advancement of the head,
 "from whom they take their being, and nourishment. As for the people, beeing the "fondation

states.

 should subsist, ease them, take away these new Edicts, Imposts and Subsidies: It is bet- 1610.
 ter to gratifie a people then to intreat them roughly. The force of diseases decline as the naturall vigor of the sicke body increaseth. But a people how rich, stronge and vigorous soeuer it bee, declines, as taxes and imposts increaseth, wee doe not perceiue it but like vnto the going of the hand of a dyall, whose motion is not seene, but when it hath finished the course, nor the losse and ruine of a people but in their fall. Thereby Madame, you shall both stop the mouthes of the three Estates, and of all those that shall make any motion to haue them called, and withall you shall auoide an alteration, which time might breed.
 B Do not disapoint the Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Officers, to whom the deceased King gaue honours and pensions; Remember that he gaue them not but to men of merit, and who had assisted him to recouer his Realme, and to settle it in peace and good order. Lewis the eleuenth, a true patterne of wisdom, a little before his death, desired to see his sonne, whom hee had not seene in many yeeres; about all things hee aduised him not to alter any thing in his Court, nor with them whom he had aduanced to dignities. A commandement grounded, for that after the death of Charles the seuenrh his father, hee had cut off the pensions of Noblemen and other Officers, C who had with the losse of their blood deserued what they enjoyed: the successe of which Councell had like to haue beene his ruine, and of the whole Realme, by so many Malcontents. He would thereby teach his sonne that an inconsiderate change is of very dangerous consequence.
 WIL you put a wise Councell in practise? call all the Princes, generall Gouernors, and one or two Noblemen of euery Prouince, neere vnto the King and you, giue them pensions that they may be able to maintaine themselves there, and countenance them indifferently according to their qualities, to auoide ialousie, the mother of diuisions, and factions. The benefits and fauours which they shall receiue from the King D and you, will augment the desire they haue to his and your seruice, and euery one in his Prouince will disperse such practises as may grow prejudiciall to his Maiesties seruice.
 T O know all things that shall passe in the Prouinces, consider if it shalbe conueni-ent to depute intendants or suprauisors of Iustice, which shall report vnto you as occasion shall require, what is done, and the complaints of all the people.
 Keepe our King in good termes with the Pope, the King of Spaine, the King of England, the Archdukes, the Suisses, and all our other Allies, renew the League with E them. It wilbe a great and Soueraigne remedy to maintaine peace in this Realme, when as you shalbe assured that your neighbours will not practise anything against the King nor his State.
 T He affection and fidelity which the Parisiens had vnto the seruice of their deceased King, is well knowne vnto you, by the last teares which all in generall poored forth to witnesse vnto the King, and you, their wonderful griefe for the losse which they haue receiued in the death of him, by whom they liued. As in a clocke one instrument makes all the rest to moue. Euen so this Realme, according to the modell of Paris, the other townes doe commonly frame their opinions, you are assured of the Parisiens af-F fection to the Kings seruice, the which they haue continued in his person by a continuation from the father to the sonne. Wherefore you must alwaies arme your selfe with their loue, to draw others to doe the like. Establish Capitaines, Lieutenants and Ensignes in all the quarters, which shalbe knowne to be honest men, and that breath nothing but the Kings seruice, mixt with some Lawyers, Treasurers and Marchants,

These men will maintaine the Parisiens in their obedience, and if there happen any vnexpected accident, you shall be assured the King hath there so many seruants, who will willingly imploy their liues to preserve his person, and maintaine their countymen vnder that yoke of seruice which they owe naturally vnto their Prince.

" Command that in Paris there be not so many strangers that professe armes, and that matters may be reduced to the same estate they were in the time of the deceased King, euery Nobleman being for his owne particular as well assured now as he was then. A policy which it may be wilbe hard to digest, but yet it should bee allowed of by euery good subiect: As for all other townes, entertaine them by letters, making them often know how desirous the King and you are to ease them, and to maintaine them in peace, that they bee carefull not to suffer themselves to bee abused with false reportes, which some wicked people may giue out for truth, which would but increase their miseries.

Audiences: " If you desire to content the Clergy, the Gentlemen, and the common people, admit any (if it please your Maiesty) that desires to speake with you, to your presence without a mediator, to the end the whole bond may remaine to you. Appoint certaine daies to this end, when as euery one may haue free access vnto your Maiesty (being assisted by such Noblemen as it shall please you) to make their complaints. There will grow a double profit thereby, the one is, you shall vnderstand matters truly, without any disguising, the other is, that hee to whom you giue a fauourable audience will goe away content, although he sometimes bee discontented for that he hath not obtained all that hee demanded. To passe at the mercy of such as haue liberty to giue, or refuse the entry, to them that would complaine, is to sell the perfumes of Princes, with a blemish to their reputation and greatnesse.

Councill. " A Boue all things beware you follow not your owne opinion alone, in managing the affaires of this Realm. Our wills are most commonly partiall, which may diuert our Iudgement from the right way. First take Councill of God, and let him bee the guide of your actions; let them bring what maximes they please for the preservation of the State, it is a vaine wisdom, if God be not of the party: Then take aduice of men experienced in many things, which may be full of discretion, age and wisdom, and which haue nothing in their soules which age hath not made graue, constant and settled. Yong mens Councill is sometimes good, but that of the aged is most commonly better. And about all things labour carefully to know them from whom you shall take councill, for many times vnder a vale of integrity, there lurkes disloyalty. Madame; all these discourses giue you power to gouerne this Estate well. I assure my selfe you haue also a will: Euery action is contained within power and will, and no man can bee deceiued of his expectation when hee makes both of them his end. God of his mercy grant you both, to guide all things to good and to gouerne them in an equall course, to the end they may haue a good and a happy end, which may tend to the increase of the greatnesse of the King and State: Most humbly beseeching your Maiesty to take in good part these Remonstrances, which are made by him. The Duke of Feria Ambassador from Spaine
comes
to Paris.

A Mbassadors came from all parts to console the death of the deceased King. Among others the Duke of Feria came from Spaine, with a great traine. The Duke of

A of Montbazon being accompanied with two hundred horse and foure Caroches, went to meete him a League without Paris, and brought him to his lodging. At his first audience hee was fetch't by the Duke of Esquillon with twelue Caroches and many Gentlemen, where comming to the King, hee told him that he was sent from the King his Maister to visite his Maiesty and to offer him the like friendship and intelligence, as hee had with the deceased King his father, for whose death hee had much greeued. The young King, hauing heard his interpreter, answered him sodainely. I thanke the King my Brother for his good will, I will remember him and you also: Seeing he desires it, hee may expect from mee all friendship and good intelligence, such as hee had with the deceased King my father. And then hee asked him many pretty questions of the King of Spaines helth, the Queene, the Princes and the Infanta, which bred an admiration in the Spaniards, to see the Maiesty of the young King, which seemed then supernaturall and extraordinary.

The Ambassador being retired, and the King set downe in his chaire, there comes sodainely a Church man of his traine, thrusting through the presse, and cast himselfe at his Maiesties feet, making great signes of the Crosse, as if hee blest him, and crying out in his language. God blesse you my King, God blesse you my Prince, God assist you for euer, and make you alwaies prosper. Wherevpon they inquired of him what hee was? And he answered them cheerefully, that he was a Nauarrois, his Maiesties most humble and most faithfull subiect.

C Some daies after the Lord Wotton Ambassador for the King of great Brittain, arrived at Paris, being sent to the same effect to condole, and to make all offers in his Maisters name, of cordiall loue and friendship: his comming was so pleasing as it bred a ialousie in the Castillian Ambassador. The Marshall of Lauerdin met him neere Saint Denis gate with aboute two hundred horse, and so accompanied him to Luxembourg house: within three daies after the Prince Ionuille, accompanied with a great troupe of Gentlemen, went and fetch't him to his audience, where hee gaue and receiued much content: on Twesday hee, with the Ambassador Leager, dined with the King at the Tuileries, after which he receiued the oth of the Queene (in the Kings presence) for the obseruation of the League, with great solemnity, in the Feuillants Church. Then after some priuate audience of the Queene, he tooke his leaue of their Maiesties to returne for England.

After all these condolences, it was resolved in requitall of these Ambassages, and to confirme the League which the deceased King had with those Princes, that Mounsieur De Bellegarde, Maister of the Kings horse, should goe into Spaine, the Marshall of Lauerdin into England, and the Duke of Espernon to Rome. And then they began to prepare for the Kings Coronation, which was appointed at Rheims on the seuenteenth day of October, with that Pompe and State, that is usuall at such sollemne ceremonies.
